5. Mortify, therefore, your members. Νεκρωσατε, put them to death: the verb is used metaphorically, to signify to deprive a thing of its power; to destroy its strength. Use no member of your body to sin against God; keep all under dominion; and never permit the beast to run away with the man. To gratify any sensual appetite, is to give it the very food and nourishment by which it lives, thrives, and is active. However the body may suffer by excessive sensual indulgences, the appetite increases with the indulgence. Deny yourselves, and let reason rule; and the animal will not get the ascendancy over the rational man. See the notes on Rom. vi. 11, &c.

Inordinate affection. Πάθος, unnatural and degrading passion, bestial lusts. See Rom. i. 26, 27. and the notes there.

6 For which things' sake the wrath of God cometh on the children of disobedience:

7 In the which ye also walked sometime, when ye lived in them.

8 But now ye also put off all these; anger, wrath, malice, blasphemy, filthy communication out of your mouth.

9 Lie not one to another, seeing that ye have put off the old man with his deeds:

10 And have put on the new man, which is renewed in knowledge, after the image of him that created him:

Evil concupiscence. Εὐθηρία καρπ. As εὐθηρία, signifies strong and vehement desire of any kind; it is here joined with κακῶ, evil, to show the sense more particularly, in which the apostle uses it.

Covetousness, which is idolatry. For the covetous man makes his money his God. Now, it is the prerogative of God to confer happiness; every goodly man seeks his happiness in God: the covetous man seeks that in his money, which God alone can give; therefore, his covetousness is property idolatry. It is true, his idol is of gold and silver; but his idolatry is not the less criminal on that account.

6. The wrath of God cometh. God is angry with such persons; and He inflicts on them the punishment which they deserve.

7. In the which ye also walked sometime. When ye were in your unconverted state, ye served divers lusts and pleasures. See on Rom. vii. 5. and Eph. ii. 2.

8. But now ye also put off all these. See on Eph. iv. 22. Being now converted, sin had no more dominion over them. Anger, wrath, &c.] They had not only lived in the evil mentioned, ver. 5. but also in those enumerated here; and they had not only laid aside the former, but they had laid aside the latter also. They retained no bosom, no easily breeding sin. They were risen with Christ; and they sought the things which were above.

Blasphemy. The word seems here to mean injuries and calumnious speaking.

9. Lie not one to another. Do not deceive each other: speak the truth in all your dealings; do not say, "My goods are so and so," when you know them to be otherwise. Do not undervalue the goods of your neighbour, when your conscience tells you that you are not speaking the truth. It is sought, it is sought, with the buyer; but afterward he becomes; i. e. he underrates his neighbour's property till he gets him persuaded to part with it for less than its worth; and, when he has thus got it, he boasts what a good bargain he has made. Such a knave speaks not truth with his neighbour.

Ye have put off the old man. See the notes on Rom. vi. 6 and particularly on Rom. xiii. 11-14. Ye have received a religion widely different from that ye had before: set according to its principles.

11 Where there is neither Greek nor Jew, circumcision nor uncircumcision, Barbarian, Scythian, bond nor free: * but Christ in all, and in all,

12 * Put on therefore, * as the elect of God, holy and beloved, bowels of mercies, kindness, humbleness of mind, meekness, long-suffering, 13 * Forbearing one another, and forgiving one another, if any man have a quarrel against any; even as Christ forgave you, to also do ye.

10. And have put on the new man] See on Rom. xii. 1, 2. Is righteousness in knowledge] IANSON has the grand characteristic of the heathen state; knowledges of the Christian. The utmost to which heathenism could pretend, was a certain knowledge of nature. How far this went, and how much it fell short of the truth, may be seen in the writings of Aristotle and Pliny. Christianity reveals God himself the author of nature; or, rather, God has revealed himself in the Christian system with which He has blessed mankind. Christianity teaches a man the true knowledge, both of himself and of God: but it is impossible to know one's-self, but in the light of God: the famous γρῶθι σεαυτον, know thyself, was practicable only under the Christian religion.

After the image of him that created him] We have already seen, that God made man in His own image; and we have seen in what that image consisted.—See the notes on Gen. 1. 26.—See, also, on Ephes. iv. 23, 24. Does not the apostle refer here to the case of an artist who wishes to make a perfect resemblance of some exquisite form, or person? God, in this case, is the artist; man is the copy; and God, himself, the original, from which this copy is to be taken. Thus, then, man is made by his Creator, not according to the image or likeness of any other being, but according to His own; the image rev Kριστατος, of the Creator. And, as the Divine Nature cannot exist in forms, or fashions, moral qualities, alone, are those which must be produced. Hence, the apostle, interpreting the words of Moses, says, that the image in which man was made, and in which he must be re-made, ανακαινομενον, made anew, consists in: knowledge, righteousness, and true holiness.

11. Where there is neither Greek nor Jew] In which new creation, no inquiry is made what nation the persons belonged to; or from what ancestry sprung; whether in Judea or Greece:—

Circumcision, nor uncircumcision] Nor is their peculiar form of religion of any consideration, whether circumcised like the Jews, or uncircumcised like the Heathens:—

Barbarian, Scythian] Nor whether of the more or less tractable of the nations of the world: for, although knowledge, and the most refined and sublime knowledge, is the object to be attained; yet, under the teaching and influence of the blessed Spirit, the most dull, and least informed, are perfectly capable of comprehending this Divine science; and becoming wise unto salvation.—

Bond nor free] Nor does the particular state, or circumstances, in which a man may be found, either help him to, or exclude him from, the benefit of this religion; the slave having as good a title to salvation by grace as the freeman:—

But Christ is all and in all] All mankind are His creatures; all conditions are disposed and regulated by His Providence; and all human beings are equally purchased by His blood. He, alone, is the source whence all have proceeded; and, to Him, alone, all must return. He is the Maker, Preserver, Saviour, and Judge, of all men.

12. Put on—as the elect of God] As the principal design of the apostle was to show that God had chosen the Gentiles, and called them to the same privileges as the Jews, and He intended to make them as truly His people as the Jews ever were, he calls them the elect or chosen of God: and, as the Jews, who were formerly the elect, were still beloved, and called to be holy; so he calls the Colossians beloved; and shows them that they are called with the same holy calling.

Bowels of mercies, &c.] Be merciful, not in act merely, but in spirit and affection. In all cases of this kind, let your heart dictate to your hand; be clothed with bowels of mercy; let your tenderest feelings come in contact with the miseries of the distressed, as soon as ever they present themselves. Though I know that to put on, or to be clothed with, are figurative expressions, and mean to assume such and such characters, and qualities; yet there may be a higher meaning here. The apostle would have them to feel the slightest touch of another's misery; and, as their clothes are put over their body, so their tenderest feeling should be always within the reach of the miserable. Let your feelings be at hand; and feel and commiserate as soon as touched.—See on Ephes. iv. 2. Instead of οικτιρῶν, mercies, in the plural, almost every MS. of importance, with many of the Fathers, read οικτιρῶν, bowels of mercy, in the singular. This various reading, makes scarcely any alteration in the sense.

13. Forbearing one another] Avoid all occasions of irritating or provoking each other.

Forgiving one another] If ye receive offence, be instantly ready to forgive, on the first acknowledgment of the fault.

Even as Christ forgave you] Who required no satisfaction, and sought for nothing in you but the broken, contrite

14 And above all these things * put on charity, which is the bond of perfectness

15 And let the peace of God rule in your hearts, to the which also ye are called in one body: * and be ye thankful, 16 Let the word of Christ dwell in you richly in all wisdom; teaching and admonishing one another * in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs, singing * with grace in your hearts to the Lord.

17 And whatsoever ye do in word or deed, do all in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, our Lord, and in his love, and in the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of glory, to whom be all honour and glory for ever and ever. Amen.

And above all these things] Ἐπι παντι ὁ παντος, upon all, over all; as the outer garment envelopes all the clothing; so let charity, or love, invest and encompass all the rest. Even bowels of mercy are to be set in motion by love; from love they derive all their feeling, and all their power and promptitude to action. Let this, therefore, be as the upper garment; the warmest that invests the whole man.

Which is the bond of perfectness.] Love to God and man is not only to cover all, but also to unite and consolidate the whole. It is, therefore, represented here under the notion of a girdle, by which all the rest of the clothing is bound close about the body. To love God with all the heart, soul, mind, and strength, and one's neighbour as one's self, is the perfection which the New Covenant requires, and which the grace and Spirit of Christ work in every sincerely obedient, humble believer: and that very love which is the fulfilling of the law, and the perfection itself which the Gospel requires, is also the bond of that perfection. It is by love to God and man, that love is to be preserved. Love begets love; and the more a man loves God and his neighbour, the more he is enabled to do so. Love, while properly exercised, is ever increasing and re-producing itself.

Instead of τελειωματος, perfection, several reputable MSS. with the Itala, read ἰσότητος, unity; but the former is doubt less the genuine reading.

15. And let the peace of God rule] Instead of Θεου, God, Χριστου, Christ, is the reading of ABC'D'FG. several others; both the Syriac, the Arabic of Erpen, Coptic, Ethiopic, Armenian,  Vulgate, and Itala, with several of the Fathers: on this evidence, Griesbach has inserted it in the text.

Rule in your hearts] Ραβδευετε, let the peace of Christ, judge, decide, and govern in your hearts, as the brabeus, or judge, does in the Olympic contests. No heart is right with God, where the peace of Christ does not rule; and the continual prevalence of the peace of Christ is the decisive proof that the heart is right with God. When a man loses his peace, it is an awful proof that he has lost something else; that he has given way to evil, and grieved the Spirit of God. While peace rules, all is safe.

In one body] Ye cannot have peace with God, in yourselves, nor among each other, unless ye continue in unity; and, as one body, continue in connexion and dependence on Him who is your only head: to this ye are called, it is a glorious state of salvation, and ye should be for ever thankful that ye are thus privileged.

16. Let the word of Christ dwell in you richly] I believe the apostle means that the Colossians should be well instructed in the doctrine of Christ; that it should be their constant study; that it should be frequently preached, explained, and enforced among them; and that all the wisdom comprised in it should be well understood. Thus the doctrine of God will dwell richly, that is, abundantly among them. But there appears to be here an allusion to the Shechinah or symbol of the Divine presence, which dwell in the tabernacle, and first temple: and to an opinion common among the Jews, which is thus expressed in Melchita, fol. 38. 4. כבודו של משה יושב עליו In whatever place the Law is, there the Shechinah is present with it. Nor is this a vain supposition; wherever God's word is seriously read, heard, or preached, there is God himself. And in that church or religious society where the truth of God is proclaimed and conscientiously believed, there is the constant dwelling of God. Through bad pointing, this verse is not very intelligible; the several members of it should be distinguished thus: Let the doctrine of Christ dwell richly among you; teaching and admonishing each other in all wisdom; singing, with grace in your hearts unto the Lord, in psalms, hymns, and spiritual songs. This arrangement the original will not only bear; but it absolutely requires it, and is not sense without it. See the note on Ephes. v. 19.

The singing which is here recommended is widely differ-of the Lord Jesus, giving thanks to God and the Father by him.

 18 *Wives, submit yourselves unto your own husbands, * as it is fit in the Lord.
 19 *Husbands, love your wives, and be not * bitter against them.
 20 *Children, obey your parents * in all things: for this is well pleasing unto the Lord.
 21 *Fathers, provoke not your children to anger, lest they be discouraged.

ent from what is commonly used in most Christian congregations; a congeries of unmeaning sounds, associated to bundles of nonsensical and often ridiculous repetitions, which at once both deprave and disgrace the church of Christ. Melody, which is allowed to be the most proper for devotional music, is now sacrificed to an exuberant harmony, which requires not only many different kinds of voices, but different musical instruments, to support it. And by these preposterous means, the simplicity of the Christian worship is destroyed; and all edification totally prevented. And this kind of singing is amply proved to be very injurious to the personal piety of those employed in it: even of those who enter with a considerable share of humility and Christian meekness, how few continue to sing with arrogance in their hearts unto the Lord?

17. Whatever ye do in word or deed Let your words be right, and your actions upright.

Do all in the name of the Lord Jesus] Begin with Him, and end with Him; invoke His name; and pray for His direction and support in all that ye do; and thus every work will be crowned with all requisite success. Doing every thing in the name of God, and referring every thing to His glory, is as rational as it is pious. Could it be ever supposed that any person would begin a bad work in God's name?—However, it is so. No people in the universe more strictly adhere to the letter of this advice, than the Mohammedans; for they never undertake a work, eat meat, nor write a book, without prefacing all with—بِسْمِ اللّٰهِ الرَّحْمٰنِ الرَّحِیْمِ Bismillahi, Arrahmani, Arrahemi: "In the name of the most merciful and compassionate God." Not only books of devotion, but books on all arts and sciences: books of tales and romances; books of poetry, and those on the elements of reading, &c. begin thus. Nay, it is prefixed to the Litani un Nissa, one of the most abominable productions that ever came from the pen of man; and is precisely the same among the Mohammedans, as the infamous work of Nicholas Choriier, called Elegantia Latini Sermonis, falsely attributed to John Meursius, has been among some called Christians. Of both, with a trifling hyperbole, it may be said, "Surely these books were written in hell; and the author of them must certainly be the devil."

Giving thanks to God] Even praises, as well as prayers, must ascend to God through this Mediator. We have no authority to say that God will accept even our thanksgiving, unless it ascend to Him through Christ Jesus.

22 *Servants, obey * in all things your masters * according to the flesh; not with eye-service, as men-pleasers; but in singleness of heart, fearing God;
 23 * And whatsoever ye do, do it heartily, as to the Lord, and not unto men:
 24 * Knowing that of the Lord ye shall receive the reward of the inheritance; * for ye serve the Lord Christ.
 25 But he that doeth wrong shall receive for the wrong which he hath done: and * there is no respect of persons.

18. Wives, submit yourselves] Having done with general directions, the apostle comes to particular duties, which are commonly called relative; because they only belong to persons in certain situations; and are not incumbent on all. No man has the duty of a wife to perform, but she who is one; and no man has the duty of a husband to perform, but he who is married.

The directions here to wives, husbands, children, parents, servants, and masters, are so exactly the same in substance with those in Ephes. v. 22—33, and vi. 1—9, that there is no need to repeat what has been said on those passages; and in the notes there, the reader is requested to refer.

As it is fit in the Lord] God commands it; and it is both proper and decent.

19. Be not bitter against them] Wherever bitterness is, there love is wanting. And where love is wanting in the married life, there is hell upon earth.

20. Children, obey—in all things] That is, in the Lord; in every thing that your parents command you, which is not contrary to the will or word of God.

21. Fathers, provoke not] See the notes on Ephes. vi. 4.

22. Servants, obey! See on Ephes. vi. 5—8.

24. The reward of the inheritance] Here, ye have neither lands nor property; ye are servants or slaves. Be not discouraged, ye have an inheritance in store; be faithful unto God and to your employers, and Christ will give you a heavenly inheritance.

25. But he that doeth wrong] It is possible for an unfaithful servant to wrong and defraud his master in a great variety of ways, without being detected: but let all such remember what is here said—He that doeth wrong, shall receive for the wrong which he has done: God sees him, and will punish him for his breach of trust and his dishonesty. Waiting or not taking proper care of the goods of your master, is such a wrong as God will resent. He that is unfaithful in that which is little, will be unfaithful in much, if he have an opportunity; and God alone is the defence against an unfaithful servant.

There is no respect] God neither esteems nor despises any man because of his outward condition and circumstances; for there is no respect of persons with Him. Every man is, in the eye of God, what he is in his soul: if holy, loved; if wicked, despised and rejected.

NOTES.—Verse 1. Masters, give unto your servants] This verse should have been added to the preceding, to which it properly belongs: and this chapter should have begun with ver. 2.

That which is just and equal.] As it is bondmen or slaves, of whom the apostle speaks, we may at once see with what propriety this exhortation is given. The condition of slaves among the Greeks and Romans, was wretched in the extreme: they could appeal to no law; and they could neither expect justice nor equity. The apostle, therefore, informs those proprietors of these slaves, that they should act towards them both according to justice and equity; for God, their Master, required this of them; and would at last call them to account for their conduct in this respect. Justice and equity required that they should have proper food, proper raiment, due rest, and no more than moderate work. This is a lesson that all masters throughout the universe should carefully learn. Do not treat your servants as if God had made them of an inferior blood to yours.

2. Continue in prayer] This was the apostle's general advice to all; without this, neither wives, husbands, children, parents, servants nor masters, could fulfil the duties, which God, in their respective stations, required of them.

All light, power, and life, come from God; his creatures are continually dependent upon Him for all these; to earnest, persevering prayer, He has promised every supply; but he who prays not, has no promise. How few wretches feel it their duty to pray to God to give them grace to behave as slaves! How few husbands pray for the grace suited to their situation, that they may be able to fulfil its duties! The like may be said of children, parents, servants, and masters. As every situation in life has its peculiar duties, trials, &c. so, to every situation, there is peculiar grace appointed. No man can fulfil the duties of any station, without the grace suited to that station. The grace suited to him, as a member of society in general, will not be sufficient for him as a husband, father, or master. Many proper marriages become unhappy in the end, because the parties have not earnestly besought God for that grace necessary for them as husbands and wives. This is the origin of family broils in general; and a proper attention to the apostle's advice, would prevent them all.

Watch in the same] Be always on your guard; and when you have got the requisite grace by praying, take care of it, and bring it into its proper action by watchfulness; by which you will know when, and where, and how, to apply it.

With thanksgiving] Being always grateful to God, who has called you into such a state of salvation; and affords you such abundant means and opportunities to glorify Him.

5 Walk in wisdom toward them that are without, <sup>2</sup> redeeming the time.

3. Praying also for us) Let the success and spread of the Gospel be ever dear to you; and neglect not to pray fervently to God that it may have free course, run, and be glorified.

A door of utterance. Θυρα τῶν λόγων. The word θυρα, which commonly signifies a door, or such like entrance into a house, or passage through a wall, is often used metaphorically for an entrance to any business, occasion or opportunity to converse or perform any particular work. So in Acts xiv. 27. the door of faith is opened to the Gentiles, i. e. there was now an opportunity of preaching the Gospel to the nations of the earth. 1 Cor. xvi. 9. A great and effectual door is opened unto me; i. e. I have now a glorious opportunity of preaching the truth to the people of Ephesus. 2 Cor. ii. 12. When I came to Troas, a door was opened unto me; I had a fine opportunity of preaching Christ crucified at that place. So here the θυρα τῶν λόγων, which we translate door of utterance, signifies an occasion, opportunity, or entrance, for the doctrine of the Gospel. The same metaphor is used by the best Latin writers. Cicero, xiii. Ep. 10. Amicitia fores aperitur—the doors of friendship are opened; there is now an opportunity of reconciliation. And, Ovid Amor. lib. iii. Eleg. iii. ver. 12.

JANUA per nostras est adopena manus.

"The gate is opened by our hands."

Of this use of the word among the Greek writers, Schleusener gives several examples. See also Rev. iii. 8 where the word is used in the same sense. To multiply examples, would be needless; the apostle excites them to pray, not that a door of utterance, i. e. a readiness and fluency of speech, may be given to him and his fellow-labourers, but that they may have an opportunity of preaching the doctrine of Christ; and so the term θυρα is to be understood here, as well as in many other places of the New Testament; in most of which we have either lost or obscured its meaning by translating it word, instead of doctrine.

The mystery of Christ) The Gospel, which had been hidden from all former times, and which revealed that purpose long hidden in the Divine councils, that the Gentiles should be allowed to enjoy the same privileges with the Jews.

For which I am also in bonds) He was suffering under Jewish malice; and for preaching this very mystery; for they could not bear to hear announced, as from heaven, that he Gentiles, whom they considered eternally shut out from any participation of the Divine favour, should be made fellow-seers with them of the grace of life; much less could they bear to hear that they were about to be reproached, and the Gentiles elected in their place. It was for asserting these things that they persecuted Paul at Jerusalem; so that to save his life, he was obliged to appeal to Cæsar; and, being taken to Rome, he was detained a prisoner, till his case was fully heard; and he was a prisoner at Rome on this very account, when he wrote this Epistle to the Colossians.—See the note m chap. i. 24.

4. That I may make it manifest) It was a mystery, and he wished to make it manifest; to lay it open, and make all men see it.

5. Walk in wisdom) Act wisely and prudently in reference to them who are without; who yet continue unbelieving Gentiles, or persecuting Jews.

The church of Christ was considered an enclosure, a field, or vineyard, well hedged or walled. Those who were not members of it, were considered without; i. e. not under that special protection and defence which the true followers of Christ had. This has been since called, "the Pale of the Church;" from pala, a stake; or, as Dr. Johnson defines it, "a narrow piece of wood, joined above and below to a rail, to enclose grounds." As, to be a Christian, was essential to the salvation of the soul; so, to be in the church of Christ, was essential to the being a Christian: therefore it was concluded that "there was no salvation out of the pale of the church." Now this is true in all places where the doctrines of Christianity are preached; but when one description of people, professing Christianity, with their own peculiar mode of worship and creed, arrogate to themselves, exclusive of all others, the title of True Church; and then, on the ground of maxim which is true in itself, but falsely understood and applied by them, assert that, as they are the church, and here is no church besides, then you must be one of them; believe as they believe, and worship as they worship, or you will be infallibly damned. I say, when this is asserted, every man, who feels he has an immortal spirit, is called on to examine the pretensions of such spiritual monopolists. Now, as the church of Christ is formed on the foundation of the prophets and apostles, Jesus Christ being the chief cornerstone, the doctrines of this Christian church must be sought for in the Sacred Scriptures. As to fathers, councils, and human

10 Aristarchus my fellow-prisoner saluteth you, and Marcus, sister's son to barnabas (touching whom ye received commandments: if he come unto you, receive him.)

11 And Jesus which is called Justus, who are of the circumcision. These only are my fellow-workers unto the kingdom of God, which have been a comfort unto me.

authorities of all kinds, they are, in this question, lighter than vanity; the Book of God alone must decide. The church which has been so hasty to condemn all others, and by its own sei disant, or self-constituted authority, to make itself the determiner of the fates of men, dealing out the mansions of glory to its partisans, and the abodes of endless misery to all those who are out of its anticristian and inhuman pale; this church, I say, has been brought to this standard, and proved, by the Scriptures, to be fallen from the faith of God's elect, and to be most awfully and dangerously corrupt; and that, to be within its pale, of all others professing Christianity, would be the most likely means of endangering the final salvation of the soul. Yet, even in it, many sincere and upright persons may be found, who, in spirit and practice, belong to the true church of Christ. Such persons are to be found in all religious persuasions, and in all sorts of Christian societies.

Redeeming the time.) See on Ephes. v. 15.

6. Let your speech be always with grace, seasoned with salt) Let it be such as has a tendency to oppose and preserve from the corruption of sin. The rabbins say, "He who, in prayer, omits any word, should begin again at the beginning; for he who does not, is like boiled pottage, in which there is no salt."—Beracoth, fol. 34. 1. Let all your conversation be such as may tend to exemplify and recommend Christianity: let it not only be holy, but wise, gracious, and intelligent. A harsh method of proposing or defending the doctrines of Christianity only serves to repel men from those doctrines and from the way of salvation. Salt, from its use in preserving food from corruption, and rendering it both savoury and wholesome, has always been made the emblem of wisdom. The word has been also used to express, in composition or conversation, what is terse, comprehensive, useful, elegant, and impressive. The term Attic salt has been used to express some of the principal beauties of the Greek tongue: of such beauties, the Gospel of Christ has an endless store.—See on Matt. v. 13. and Mark ix. 60.

How ye ought to answer every man.) That your discourse may be so judiciously managed, that ye may discern how to treat the prejudices, and meet the objections, both of Jews and Gentiles.

7. All my state shall Tycheius) See the note on Eph. vi. 21. Tycheius well knew the apostle's zeal and perseverance in preaching the Gospel; his sufferings on that account; and the success in converting both Jews and Gentiles; and the converts which were made in Cæsar's household; he could give these to the Colossians in ample detail; and some of them, it would not have been prudent to commit to writing.

8. That he may know your estate) Instead of iva γνητε τῆς ὑμετέρας ὑποθέσεως, that ye may know your affairs, ABD'FG. many others, with the Æthiopic, Itala, Theodoret, and Damascenus, read iva γνητε τῆς ὑμετέρας ὑποθέσεως, that ye may know our affairs: which is probably the true reading. Tycheius was sent to them, not to know their affairs, but with Onesimus, to carry this epistle, and make the apostle's state known to them; and comfort their hearts by the good news which he brought. The next verse confirms this meaning.

9. With Onesimus—who is one of you.) Onesimus was a native of some part of Phrygia, if not of Colosse itself; and being lately converted to the Christian faith, by the instrumentality of the apostle, he would be able, on this account, to give them satisfactory information concerning the apostle's state, which would be doubly acceptable to them, as he was their countryman.—See the Epistle to Philemon.

All things which are done here.) FG the Veilig, Itala, Jerom, and Bede, add here ὑποθέσεως, what is done, which we have supplied in italics in our translation. These brethren could give an account of the transactions at Rome, relative to the apostle and Christianity, which it might not be prudent for him to commit to writing.—See on ver. 7. The reign of Nero was not only cruel, but suspicious, jealous, and dangerous.

10. Aristarchus my fellow-prisoner) Concerning Aristarchus, see Acts xix. 29. xx. 4. and xxvii. 2. and see the note on this latter place. Aristarchus and Epaphras are mentioned as saluters in this epistle; and in that to Philemon, written at the same time; but here, he is said to be a prisoner, and Epaphras not. In that to Philemon, Epaphras is called a prisoner, and Aristarchus not. One of them is wrong, though it is uncertain which, unless both were prisoners.—See Wall's Crit. Notes. As Aristarchus had been a zealous and affectionate adherent to St. Paul, and followed him in all his journeys, ministering to him in prison, and assisting him in preaching the Gospel in Rome, he might have been imprisoned.—This account we need not suppose that both he and Epaphras were imprisoned at the same time: about the same time they might be imprisoned, but it might be so ordered by the providence of God, 12 <sup>1</sup> Epaphras, who is one of you, a servant of Christ, saluteth you, always <sup>2</sup> labouring <sup>3</sup> fervently for you in prayers, that ye may stand <sup>4</sup> perfect and <sup>5</sup> complete in all the will of God.

13 For I bear him record, that he hath a great zeal for you, and them that are in Laodicea, and them in Hierapolis.

that when Aristarchus was imprisoned, Epaphras was at liberty; and while Epaphras was in prison, Aristarchus was at liberty. This is a very possible, and easily to be conceived case.

Marcus] See the account of this person, Acts xv. 39. Though there had been some difference between the apostle and this Mark; yet, from this, and 2 Tim. lv. 11. we find they were fully reconciled, and that Mark was very useful to St. Paul, in the work of the ministry.

Touching whom ye received commandments] What those were we cannot tell: it was some private communication which had been previously sent to the Colossian church.

11. Jesus, which is called Justus] Jesus, Joshua, or Jehoshua, was his name among his countrymen the Jews: Justus was the name which he bore among the Greeks and Romans.

These only] That is, only Aristarchus, Marcus, and Jesus Justus, who were formerly Jews or proselytes; οι ουτοι εσιν κρητιμοι, for they were of the circumcision, and assisted the apostle in preaching the Gospel. There were others who did preach Christianity; but they did it from envy and strife, in order to add affliction to the apostle's bonds. It is evident, therefore, that St. Peter was not now at Rome; else he certainly would have been mentioned in this list; for we cannot suppose that he was in the list of those who preached Christ in an exceptional way, and from impure and unholly motives; indeed, there is no evidence that St. Peter ever saw Rome. And as it cannot be proved that he ever was bishop or pope of that city, the key-stone of the triumphal arch of the pope of Rome is pulled out: this building, therefore, of his supremacy, cannot stand.

12. Epaphras, who is one of you] A native of some part of Phrygia, and probably of Colosse itself.

A servant of Christ] A minister of the Gospel.
Labouring fervently for you] αγωνιζομενος, agonizing; very properly expressed by our Translators, labouring fervently.

That ye may stand perfect and complete] ινα ζηητε τελειοι και πληρωμενοι; that ye may stand firm, perfectly instructed, and fully persuaded, of the truth of those doctrines which have been taught you as the revealed will of God: this I believe to be the meaning of the apostle.

Instead of πληρωμενοι, complete, or filled up; almost all the MSS. of the Alexandrian Recension, which are considered the most authentic and correct, have πληροφωρημενοι, that ye may be fully persuaded. The word πληροφωρη, signifies such a complete persuasion of the certainty of a thing, as leaves the mind, which has it, neither room nor inclination to doubt; and φωροφωρεο, the verb, has the same meaning, viz. to be thus persuaded, or to persuade thus by demonstrative argumentation, and exhibition of unquestionable facts.

This is such a persuasion as the Spirit of God, by means of the Gospel, gives to every sincere and faithful man; and from which arises the solid happiness of the genuine Christian. They who argue against it, prove, at least, that they have not got it.

13. He hath a great zeal for you] Instead of ζηλον πολον, much zeal, ABCD: several others, with Versions and Fathers, read πολον τονον, much labour; they are here nearly of the same meaning, though the latter appears to be the better, and genuine reading.

Laodicea—and Hierapolis.] These were both cities of Phrygia, between which Colosse, or the city of Colosse, was situated: see on chap. ii. 1. The latter was called Hierapolis, or the holy city, from the multitude of its temples. Apollo, Diana, Esculapius, and Hygiea, were all worshipped here, as appears by the coins of this city, still extant.

14. Luke, the beloved physician] This is generally supposed to be the same with Luke the evangelist.—See the preface to the notes on this Gospel. Some, however, suppose them to be different persons; because, where it is evident that Luke the evangelist is meant, he never has more than his simple name Luke; and because the apostle is supposed to intend a different person here, he adds, ε ιατρος & αγαθος, the beloved physician. The word ιατρος, signifies a healer, and must not be restricted to physician, in the sense in which we use that word: he was surgeon, physician, and dispenser of medicines, &c. for all these were frequently combined in the same person.

15. Salute—Nymphas, and the church—in his house.] This person, and his whole family, which probably was very numerous, appear to have received the Gospel: and it seems that, for their benefit and that of his neighbours, he had opened his house for the worship of God. In those primitive times, there were no consecrated places; for it was supposed that the simple setting apart of any place for the worship of God, was a sufficient consecration.—See of those domestic churches, Rom. xvi. 5. 1 Cor. xvi. 19.

16 And when <sup>1</sup> this epistle is read among you, cause that it be read also in the church of the Laodiceans; and that ye likewise read the epistle from Laodicea.

17 And say to <sup>1</sup> Archippus, Take heed to <sup>2</sup> the ministry which thou hast received in the Lord, that thou fulfill it.

16. Cause that it be read also in the church of the Laodiceans] That is, let a copy be taken and sent to them, that it may be read there also. This appears to have been a regular custom in the apostolic church.

That ye likewise read the epistle from Laodicea] Some suppose that this was an epistle sent from Laodicea to the apostle, which he now sent by Aristarchus to the Colossians, that they might peruse it; that thereby they might see the propriety of sending a copy of his epistle to them, to the Laodicean church. Many eminent critics are of this opinion, which appears to me to be both forced and far-fetched. Others think that the Epistle to the Ephesians is the epistle in question; and that it was originally directed to them, and not to the Ephesians.—See the notes on Ephes. l. 1, &c. But others, equally learned, think that there was an epistle, different from that to the Ephesians, sent by St. Paul to the Laodiceans, which is now lost. There was an epistle under this direction, in the times of Theodoret and Jerom, for both of them mention it; but the latter mentions it as apocryphal, Legimus quoddam ad Laodiceenses Epistolam, sed ab omnibus episcopis: "Some read an epistle to the Laodiceans, but it is exploded by all." The seventh Œcumenic council, held in 787, states, that the ancients allowed that there was an epistle with this direction, but that all the orthodox rejected it as supposititious.

An epistle, ad Laodiceenses, is still extant in the Latin language; a very ancient copy of which is in the library of the Abbot Calmet at Nîmes, St. Alban's of Anjou. Hutter has translated it into Greek; but his translation is of no authority. Calmet has published this epistle, with various readings from the above MS. I shall subjoin it at the end of this epistle and give my opinion relative to its use and authenticity.

17. Say to Archippus] Who this person was we cannot tell; there have been various conjectures concerning him; some think he was bishop, or overseer, of the church at Colosse, in the absence of Epaphras. Whatever he was, it has been supposed that he had been remiss in discharging the duties of his office: and hence this direction of the apostle, which appears here in the light of a reprehension. But if the same person be meant, as in the Epistle to Philemon, var. 2. whom St. Paul calls his fellow-labourer and fellow-soldier, it cannot be supposed that any reproach is here intended: for, as the Epistle to the Colossians, and that to Philemon, were evidently written about the end of the year 62, Archippus could not be a fellow-labourer and fellow-soldier of the apostle at Rome, and yet a delinquent at Colosse at the same time. It is more likely, therefore, that the words of the apostle convey no censure, but are rather intended to stir him up to farther diligence, and to encourage him in the work, seeing he had so much false doctrine, and so many false teachers to contend with.

18. The salutation by the hand of me Paul] The preceding part of the epistle was written by a scribe, from the mouth of the apostle; this, and what follows, was written by the hand of St. Paul himself. A similar distinction we find 1 Cor. xv. 21. and in 2 Thess. iii. 17. and this, it seems, was the usage by which the apostle authenticated every epistle which he sent to the different churches. The salutation of Paul with mine own hand, which is the taken in every epistle, so I write. Remember my bonds] See what proof ye have of the truth of the Gospel; I am in bonds on this account; I suffer patiently; yea, exult in the Lord Jesus, so perfectly am I upheld by the grace of the Gospel. Remember my bonds, and take courage. How eloquent were these concluding words! That such a man should be in bonds for the Gospel, was the fullest proof of the truth of the Gospel; a cunningly devised fable could not have imposed on Saul of Tarsus; he was fully satisfied of the truth of the doctrines of Christianity; he proclaimed them as truths from heaven; and for their sake cheerfully suffered the loss of all things. The bonds of such a man are a plenary proof of the truth of the doctrines for which he was bound.

Grace be with you] May you still possess the favour and blessing of our Lord Jesus Christ: the apostle ends as he began this epistle. Without the grace of Christ they could not have become a church; without this grace, they could not continue to be one.

Amen.] This is omitted by the most ancient and correct MSS.

The subscriptions, as usual, are various and uncertain:—The common Greek Text, has, To the Colossians, written from Rome by Tychicus and Onesimus. The epistle to the Colossians; written at Rome, and sent by the hand of Tychicus. SYRIAC. To the Colossians. ΕΒΡΑΙΩΣ. In the Vulgate there is no subscription. The end of the epistle; and R was written from Rome, and sent by the hand of Tychicus and Onesimus. Praise be to God for ever and ever; and may His mercy be upon us—Amen. ARABIC. Written from Athens, by Tychicus, and Onesimus, and Mark, his disciples. CORRUPT. The MSS are not less various than the Versions: To the Colossians—That is the Colossians is completed: that is the Philippians begins.—That to the Colossians is finished: the First Epistle to the Thessalonians begins.—To the Colossians, from Rome.—Written to the Colossians from Rome.—Written from Rome by Tychicus, and Timothy, and Onesimus.—Written by Paul and Timothy; and sent by Tychicus and Onesimus.

That the epistle was written from Rome, there is little cause to doubt; that Timothy might be the scribe is very probable, because it appears he was at Rome with the apostle in the same year in which this epistle was written.—See Philip. ii. 19. And that it was sent by Tychicus and Onesimus, seems evident from the 8th and 9th verses of this chapter.

The common subscription, has the consent of the greater number of the most recent, and comparatively recent MSS. but this is not, in general, a proof of authenticity.

In the note on ver. 16. I promised to subjoin what is called the Epistle to the Laodiceans; I give it here from the best copies; and add a literal translation, that the curious, whether learned or unlearned, may have what some have believed to be authentic, and what has doubtless existed, in one form or other, from a very remote antiquity.

Epistola Pauli, Apostoli, ad Laodicenses.      The Epistle of Paul the Apostle to the Laodiceans.

1 Paulus, Apostolus, non ab hominibus, neque per hominem, sed per Jesum Christum. Fratribus qui estis (sunt) Laodices:

1 Paul an Apostle, not from men, nor by man, but by Jesus Christ, to the brethren which are in Laodicea.

2 Gratia vobis et pax a Deo Patre nostro; et Domino Jesu Christo.

2 Grace be to you, and peace from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ.

3 Gratias ago Christo per omnem orationem meam, quod permanentes estis, et perseverantes in operibus bonis, promotionem expectantes in die judicii.

3 I give thanks to Christ in all my prayers, that ye continue and persevere in good works; waiting for the promise in the day of judgment.

4 Neque disturbant (deficiunt) vos quorumdam vaniloquia insinulationum veritatem, (insanientium) ut vos avertant a veritate evangelii quod a me predicatur.

4 Be not troubled with the vain speeches of certain who pretend to the truth, that they may draw away your hearts from the truth of the Gospel which was preached by me.

5 Et nunc faciet Deus ut qui sunt ex me ad perfectionem veritatis evangelii sint deservientes, et benignitatem operum facientes que sunt salutis vite eterne.

5 And may God grant that those who are of me, may be led forward to the perfection of the truth of the Gospel, and perform the benignity of works which become the salvation of eternal life.

6 Et nunc palam sunt vincula mea que patior in Christo; in quibus lætor et gaudeo.

6 And now my bonds are manifest, which I suffer in Christ; and in them I rejoice and am glad.

7 Et hoc mihi est ad salutem perpetuam, quod (tempus) factum est in orationibus vestris, et administrante Spiritu Sancto, sive per vitam, sive per mortem.

7 And this shall turn to my perpetual salvation, by means of your prayers, and the assistance of the Holy Spirit, whether they be for life or for death.

8 Est enim mihi vivere vita in Christo, et mori gaudium (et lucrum).

8 For my life is to live in Christ; and to die will be joyous.

9 Et ipse Dominus noster in vobis faciet misericordiam suam, ut eandem dilectionem habeatis; et sitis unanimes.

9 And may our Lord himself grant you his mercy; that ye may have the same love, and be of one mind.

10 Ergo, dilectissimi, ut audistis præsentiam Domini, (ita sentite) retinetes et facite in timore (Domini); et erit vobis vita in æternum:

10 Therefore, my beloved, as ye have heard of the coming of the Lord, so think and act in the fear of the Lord, and it shall be to you eternal life.

11 Est enim Dominus qui operatur in vobis:

12 Et facite sine peccato quocunque facitis, (sine reatu) et quod est optimum.

13 Delectissimi, gaudete in Domino Jesu Christo, et cavete omnes sordos (sordidos) in omni lucro.

14 Omnes petitiones vestras sint palam apud Deum.

15 Estote firmi in sensu Christi, et que integra, et vera, et pudica, et casta, et justa, et amabilia sunt, facite.

16 Et que audistis, et acceptistis in corde retinete; et erit vobis pax.

17 Salutate vos omnes sancti.

18 Salutate omnes fratres in osculo sancto.

19 Gratia Domini nostri Jesu Christi cum spiritu vestro. Amen.

20 Et hanc facite legi Colossensibus; et eam quam est Colossensium vobis.

Ad Laodicenses scripta fuit a Româ, per Tychicum et Onesimum.

Such is the composition which pretends to be the Epistle of Paul the apostle to the Laodiceans, and of which I have endeavoured to give a literal version; though, even with the assistance of the various readings of the Anjou MS. which I have included in brackets, I found this difficult, so as to preserve any sense. Elias Hutter has published it after the Epistle to the Colossians, as if it were the genuine production of the apostle to whom it is attributed; and has taken the pains to exhibit it in twelve languages: viz. Syriac, Hebrew, Greek, Latin, German, Bohemian, Italian, Spanish, French, English, Danish, and Polish—All, the Latin excepted, appear to be of his own composing. To criticise them would be lost labour: the Greek is too bald to be the production of any remote age; and as to the English, no Englishman can understand it. The editor deserves the strongest reprehension, because he has associated it with the genuine Epistles of St. Paul, without a single note of its spuriousness.

As to its being a work of St. Paul, little or nothing need be said; its barrenness of meaning, poverty of style, incoherency of manner, and total want of design and object, are a sufficient refutation of its pretensions. It is said to be the work of some heretics of ancient times: this is very unlikely, as there is no heresy ever broached in the Christian church that could derive any support from any thing found in this epistle. It is a congeries of scraps, very injudiciously culled, here and there, from St. Paul's epistles; without arrangement, without connexion; and, as they stand here, almost without sense. It is a poor wretched tale, in no danger of ever being denominated even a curiously fictitious fable. It should keep no company but that of the pretended Epistle of Paul to Seneca, to which I have in other cases referred, and of which I have given my opinion. Should it be asked, "Why I have introduced it here?" I answer, to satisfy the curious reader; and to show how little ground there is for the opinion of some, that this epistle is of any importance: and to prove how miserably forgery itself succeeds, when it endeavours to add to, or corrupt, the word of God. The Sacred Writings are of such a peculiar character that it is utterly impossible to imitate them with any kind of success. They bear, deeply impressed, the seal of infinite wisdom; a seal which no human art can counterfeit. This is the criterion by which spurious Gospels, and apocryphal writings in general, have been judged and detected; and this heavenly stamp, under the care of Divine Providence, will continue to be their chief preservative, as long as sun and moon shall endure.

PREFACE TO THE FIRST EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE TO THE THESSALONIANS.

THESSALONICA, now called by the Turks Solonichi, a more corruption of its ancient name, is a seaport town of Turkey in Europe, situated on what was called the Thermaic Gulf, and was anciently the capital of Macedonia. According to Stephanus Byzantinus, it was embellished and enlarged by Philip, king of Macedon, father of Alexander the Great, who called it Thessalonica, or the victory of Thessalia, on account of the victory he obtained there over the Thessalians; prior to which, it was called Thermæ. Strabo, Tseles, and Zonaras, says that it obtained the name of Thessalonica from Thessalonica, wife of Cassander, and daughter of Philip. In 1431, it was taken from the Venetians by the Turks, in whose possession it still continues. It is still a large, rich, and populous city, being ten miles in circumference, and carrying on an extensive trade in silk, the principal merchants being Greek Christians, and Jews.

Christianity has never been extinct in Thessalonica since the year 51 or 52, in which it was planted there by the apostle Paul; see Acts xvii. &c. It contains at present thirty churches, belonging to the Greek Christians; and as many Jewish syna-pagans, besides some Mohammedan mosques. Thessalonica is the see of an archbishop; and is well fortified, being surrounded with walls, flanked with towers, and defended in the land side by a citadel; and near the harbour, with three forts.

St. Paul, in company with Silas, first preached the Gospel in this city, and the adjacent country, about A. D. 52 or 53. Though the Jews, who were sojourners in this city, rejected the Gospel in general; yet a great multitude of the devout Greeks, i. e. such as were proselytes to Judaism, or the descendants of Jewish parents, born and naturalised in Greece, believed, and associated with Paul and Silas; and not a few of the chief women of the city embraced the Christian faith. Acts xvii. 4.

As the Jews found, that according to the doctrine of the Gospel, the Gentiles were called to enjoy the same privileges with themselves, without being obliged to submit to circumcision, and other ordinances of the law, they persecuted that Gospel, and them who proclaimed it; for, moved with indignation, they employed certain lewd fellows of the baser sort; the heads of the people, set the city on an uproar, assaulted the house of Jason, where the apostles lodged; dragged him, and certain brethren, before the rulers; and charged these with seditious designs, and treason against the Roman emperor! The apostles escaped, and got to Berea, where they began anew their important evangelical labours; thither the Jews of Thessalonica pursuing them, raised a fresh tumult: so that the apostle, being counselled by the brethren, made his escape to Athens, Acts xvii. 5-15. Thus he followed the command of his Master; being persecuted in one city, he fled to another; not to hide himself, but to proclaim, in every place, the saving truths of the Gospel of Christ.

It does not appear that St. Paul staid long at Athens; he soon went thence to Corinth, where Timothy and Silas were, but probably not before Timothy met him, for whom he had sent, Acts xvii. 15. to come to him speedily; and whom, it appears, he sent immediately back to Thessalonica, to establish the believers there, and comfort them concerning the faith, 1 Thess. iii. 2. While Paul abode at Corinth, Timothy and Silas came to him from Thessalonica; and hearing by them of the steadfastness of the Thessalonian converts, in the faith of Christ, he wrote this epistle, and shortly after the second, to comfort and encourage them; to give them farther instructions in the doctrine of Christianity; and to rectify some mistaken views relative to the day of judgment, which had been propagated amongst them.—See the Preface to the second epistle.

Who the persons were who formed the apostolic church at Thessalonica, is not easy to determine. They were not Jews, for these, in general, persecuted the apostle and the Gospel in this place. We are therefore left to infer, that the church was formed, 1st, of Jewish proselytes, called, Acts xxi. 4. devout Greeks. And, 2dly, of converts from heathenism; for, on the preaching of the Gospel to them, it is said, chap. i. 1. that they turned to God from idols, to serve the living and true God. Though some of the Jews believed on the preaching of Paul and Silas, Acts xvii. 8 and 4. yet it is evident, that the great bulk of the church was composed of Gentile proselytes, and converts from heathenism. Hence we find in this epistle, but few allusions to the Jews; and but few references to the peculiarities of their religious or civil institutions.

There is a remarkable reading in the text of Acts xv. 1. which I neglected to quote in the note on that place: instead of τῶν εὐσεβῶντων Ἑλλήνων ἀποστόλων, Codex Bezae has a great multitude; the Codex Alexandrinus, Codex Bezae, and the Greek and Latin, two others, with the Vulgate, and the new Syriac version, and Ethiopic, of the descent; i. e. those who worshipped the true God; and of the Greeks; i. e. those who were previously heathenists, a great multitude; so that 1. Some few Jews.—2. A great number of those who were idolaters; the true God.—3. A great multitude of heathen, besides many of the chief women, received the doctrine preached by the apostle, and became members of the church at Thessalonica. See Dr. Paley's remarks on this versification.

The First Epistle to the Thessalonians is allowed, on all hands, to be the first epistle that St. Paul wrote to any of the churches of God; and from it two things may be particularly noted.—1. That the apostle was full of the Spirit of love.—2. That the church at Thessalonica was pure, upright, and faithful, as we scarcely find any reprehension in the whole epistle: the Thessalonian converts had FAITH that united; LOVE that laboured; and a more which induced them to bear afflictions patiently; and wait for the coming of the Lord Jesus Christ.

This epistle has been divided into different parts by commentators; but these are arbitrary, the apostle having made no division of this kind; for, although he treats of several subjects, yet he has not so distinguished them from each other, as to show that he had any formal division in his mind. In the divisions imposed on this epistle by commentators we do not find two of them alike:—a full proof that the apostle has made no divisions; else some of these learned men would have certainly found them out. Technical subdivisions of this nature are of little use to a proper understanding of the contents of this epistle.

CHAPTER I.

The inscription by Paul, Silvanus, and Timotheus, to the church of the Thessalonians, 1. St. Paul gives thanks to God for their good estate, and prays for their continuance in the faith, 2.—A. Shows how the Gospel came to them, and its blessed effects it produced in their life and conversation, 5-7. How it became published from them, through Macedonia and Achaia; and how their faith was every where celebrated, 8. He shows farther, that the Thessalonians had turned from idolatry; became worshippers of the true God, and were waiting for the revelation of Christ, 9, 10. [A. M. 68. 685. A. D. cir. 52. A. U. PAUL, and <sup>2</sup> Silvanus, and Timotheus, unto the church of the Thessalonians which is in God the Father, and in the Lord Jesus Christ: <sup>3</sup> Grace be unto you, and peace, from God our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ.

<sup>4</sup> We give thanks to God always for you all, making mention of you in our prayers;

NOTES.—Verse 1. Paul, and Silvanus, and Timotheus) Though St. Paul himself dictated this letter; yet he joins the names of Silas and Timothy, because they had been with him at Thessalonica, and were well known there.—See Acts xvii. 4, 14.

And Silvanus) This was certainly the same as Silas, who was St. Paul's companion in all his journeys through Asia Minor, and Greece; see Acts xv. 22. xvi. 17. xvii. 1, 10. Him and Timothy, the apostle took with him into Macedonia; and they continued at Berea, when the apostle went from thence to Athens: from this place, St. Paul sent for them to come to him speedily; and though it is not said that they came while he was at Athens, yet it is most probable that they did: after which, having sent them to Thessalonica, he proceeded to Corinth, where they afterward rejoined him; and from whence he wrote this epistle.—See the Preface.

2. We give thanks) See Phil. i. 3, 4. and Colos. i. 3. where the same forms of speech are used.

3. Your work of faith) This verse contains a very high character of the believers at Thessalonica: they had FAITH, not speculative and indolent, but true, sound, and operative; their faith worked. They had LOVE; not that gazed at, and became enamoured of the perfections of God; but such a love as laboured with faith to fulfil the whole will of God. Faith worked; but love, because it can do more, did more; and therefore laboured; worked energetically to promote the glory of God, and the salvation of men. They had more than an idle, cold, heartless expectation of future good, than which they felt no excitement, and for which they could give no reason; but such a hope as produced a satisfying expectation of a future life and state of blessedness: the reality of which faith had discerned, and love anticipated. A hope, not weary and impatient to get out of the trials of life, and possess the heavenly inheritance; but one that was as willing to endure hardships, as to enjoy glory itself, when God might be more honoured by this patient endurance. FAITH worked, and LOVE laboured, and more endured patiently.

<sup>4</sup> Remembering without ceasing your work of faith, and labour of love, and patience of hope, in our Lord Jesus Christ in the sight of God and our Father;

<sup>5</sup> For our Gospel came not unto you in word only, but also in power, and in the Holy Ghost, and in much assurance;

1. Rom. i. 8. Heb. x. 19.—2. Or, beloved of God, your election.—3. GAL. 1. 23.—4. Mark 16. 8. 1 Cor. 4. 4. 2 Cor. 1. 5. 2 Cor. 6. 4.—5. Col. 2. 2. 1 Thess. 1. 5.

It is not a mark of much grace to be longing to get to heaven, because of the troubles and difficulties of the present life; they who love Christ, are ever willing to submit to them. He may be as much glorified by patient endurance, as by the most active faith, or laboured love. FAITH worked, and LOVE laboured, and more endured patiently, which, through affliction or other means, is necessary to the will of God; but we can expect to be glorified, if we seek a heart that bears stilling, and is willing to endure, as seeing Him who is invisible, and who is not murmuring. This is a faith that is not only the most intense and ardent, but the most patient, and the most long-suffering, are, in our ye know what manner of men we were among you for our sakes.

And ye became followers of us, and of the Lord, having received the word in much affliction, with joy of the Holy Ghost; so that ye were ensamples to all that believe in Macedonia and Achaia.

For from you sounded out the word of the Lord, not only Macedonia and Achaia, but also in every place, your faith in Christ, I, 10, 11. 2 Thess. 2, 7.—a 1 Cor. 4, 16 & 11, 1. Phil. 3, 17. Chap. 2, 14. Rom. 15, 14.—Acts 5, 41. Heb. 10, 32.—p Romans 10, 13.—q Romans 1, 8. 2 Thess. 1, 11. Chap. 2, 1.

ives and others; and of more consequence in the sight of God, than all the ecstasies of the spirits of just men made perfect; and than all the raptures of an archangel. That church, Christian society, the members of which manifest the work of faith, labour of love, and patience of hope, is most nearly tied to heaven; and is on the suburbs of glory.

4. Knowing—your election of God] Being assured, from the time which I have delivered to you, and which God has stirred by various miracles and gifts of the Holy Spirit, at his chosen and called the Gentiles to the same privileges to which he chose and called the Jews; and that, as they rejected the offers of the Gospel, God has now elected the Gentiles in their stead. This is the election which the Thessalonians knew, and of which the apostle treats at large in his letter to the Romans; and also in his Epistles to the Galatians and Ephesians. No irrelative, unconditional, eternal, and personal election to everlasting glory, is meant by the apostle. As God had chosen the Jews, whom, because of their sin and unbelief, he had now rejected; so he had now chosen elected the Gentiles. And in neither case was there any thing absolute; all was most specifically conditional, as far as their final salvation was concerned; without any merit on their side, they were chosen and called to those blessings which, if they rightly used, would lead them to eternal glory; at these blessings could be abused, become finally useless, and forfeited, they had an ample proof in the case of the Jews, who, after having been elected of God for more than 2000 years, were now become reprobates.

5. For our Gospel] That is, the glad tidings of salvation by Jesus Christ; and of your being elected to enjoy all the privileges to which the Jews were called, without being obliged to submit to circumcision, or fulfil the rites and ceremonies of the Mosaic law.

Came not unto you in word only] It was not by simple preaching, or mere reasoning, that the doctrines which we preached recommended themselves to you; we did not insist upon your using this or the other religious institution; we insisted on a change of heart and life; and we held out the energy which was able to effect it.

But also in power] Εν δυναμει, with miraculous manifestations to your eyes and to your hearts; which induced you to acknowledge that this Gospel was the power of God unto salvation. And in the Holy Ghost] By his influence upon your hearts, changing and renewing them; and by the testimony which received from him, that you were accepted through the love; and became the adopted children of God.

And in much assurance] Εν πληροφωριαι πολλη. The Holy Spirit, which was given you, left no doubt, on your mind, her with respect to the general truth of the doctrine, or the efficacy of your own state. Ye had the fullest assurance that the Gospel was true; and the fullest assurance that ye had received the remission of sins through that Gospel. The Spirit himself bearing witness with your spirit, that you are the sons and daughters of God Almighty.

What manner of men we were] How we preached, and how we lived; our doctrines and our practices ever corresponding. And for your sakes we sustained difficulties, endured hardships, and were incessant in our labours.

Ye became followers of us] Ye became imitators, μιμηται, as; ye believed the same truths, walked in the same way, I minded the same thing; knowing that our doctrine was of the Lord; and that the way in which we walked, was prescribed by Himself; and that He also suffered the contradictions of ungodly men.

Having received the word in much affliction] That they received the doctrine of the Gospel in the midst of much persecution, we may learn from the history in general, and from 2d. xlvii. 5, 6.

to Godward is spread abroad; so that we need not to speak any thing.

9 For they themselves show of us what manner of entering in we had unto you, and how ye turned to God from idols to serve the living and true God; and God ye

With joy of the Holy Ghost] The consolations which they received, in consequence of believing in Christ, more than counterbalanced all the afflictions which they suffered from their persecutors.

7. Ye were ensamples] Τυτοι, types, models, or patterns, according to which all the churches, in Macedonia and Achaia, formed both their creed and their conduct.

8. From you sounded out] As Thessalonica was very conveniently situated for traffic, many merchants from thence traded through Macedonia, Achaia, and different parts of Greece. By these, the fame of the Thessalonians, having received the doctrine of the Gospel, was doubtless carried far and wide. And it appears that they had walked so conscientiously before God and man, that their friends could speak of them without a blush; and their adversaries could say nothing to their disgrace.

9. How ye turned to God from idols] This could not be spoken either of the Jews, or of the devoted persons, but of the heathen Greeks; and of such it appears that the majority of the church was formed. See what is said on this subject in the Preface to this epistle.

To serve the living and true God] The living God, in opposition to the idols, which were either inanimate stocks or stones; or the representations of dead men.

The true God—In opposition to the whole system of idolatry, which was false in the objects of its adoration, false in its pretensions, false in its promises, and false in all its practices.

10. And to wait for his Son from heaven] To expect a future state of glory, and resurrection of the body, according to the Gospel doctrine, after the example of Jesus Christ, who was raised from the dead, and ascended unto heaven, ever to appear in the presence of God for us.

Delivered us from the wrath to come.] From all the punishment due to us for our sins; and from the destruction which is about to come on the unbelieving and impenitent Jews.

This was the news, the sounding out, that went abroad concerning the converted Thessalonians. Every where it was said, they have believed the Gospel; they have renounced idolatry; they worship the living and true God; they have received the gifts and graces of the Holy Spirit; they are happy in their souls, unspotted in their lives, and full of joy; expecting an eternal glory through that Christ who had died for, and purged their sins; and who shall fashion their degraded bodies, and make them like to His glorious body, and give them an eternal residence with Himself, in a state of blessedness.

These were glorious news, and wherever they were told, prepared the way of the Gospel among the heathen. The mere preaching of the Gospel has done much to convince and convert sinners: but the lives of the sincere followers of Christ, as illustrative of the truth of these doctrines, has done much more. Truth represented in action, seems to assume a body, and thus render itself palpable. In heathen countries, which are under the dominion of Christian powers, the Gospel, though established there, does little good; because of the profane and irreligious lives of those who profess it. Why has not the whole peninsula of India been long since evangelized? The Gospel has been preached there; but the lives of the Europeans, professing Christianity there, have been in general profligate, sordid, and base. From them, sounded out no good report of the Gospel; and therefore the Mohammedans continue to prefer their Koran, and the Hindoos their Vedas and Shasters. It should, however, be acknowledged, to the glory of God, that of late years, a few apostolic men in that country are turning the tide in favour of the Gospel; and several eminent Europeans have warmly espoused the doctrine of Christ; and are labouring to circulate the word of God through the whole of British India.

CHAPTER II.

The apostle sets forth how the Gospel was brought and preached to the Thessalonians, in consequence of his being persecuted at Philippi, 1, 2. The manner in which the apostles preached; the matter of their doctrine, and the tenor of their lives, 3—11. He exhorts them to walk worthy of God, 12. And commends them for the manner in which they received the Gospel, 13. How they suffered from their own countrymen, as the first believers did from the Jews, who endeavoured to prevent the apostles from preaching the Gospel to the Gentiles, 14—16. St. Paul's apology for his absence from them, and his earnest desire to see them, founded on his great affection for them, 17—20. [A. M. cir. 4056. A. D. cir. 52. L. U. C. 505. Anno Claudii Cesar. 1. We ourselves, brethren, know our entrance in unto you, that it was not in vain:

try. This consideration gave him a right to deliver all the following exhortations.

2. Shamefully entreated—at Philippi] There, Paul and an our God & to speak unto you the Gospel of God with much contention.

3 For our exhortation was not of deceit, nor of uncleanness, nor in guile:

4 But as we were allowed of God to be put in trust with the Gospel, even so we speak; not as pleasing men, but God, which trieth our hearts.

5 For neither at any time used we flattering words, as ye know, nor a cloak of covetousness; for God is witness:

6 Nor of men sought we glory, neither of you, nor yet of others, when we might have been burdensome, as the apostles of Christ.

7 But we were gentle among you, even as a nurse cherisheth her children:

8 So being affectionately desirous of you, we were willing to have imparted unto you, not the Gospel of God only, but also our own souls, because ye were dear unto us.

Philim. 8.9.

Silas had been beaten with many stripes, shut up in the inner prison, and their feet made fast in the stocks.—See Acts xvi. 23, &c. and the notes there.

With much contention] The words σὺν πολλῇ ἀγωνίᾳ, not only signify with intense labour and earnestness, but may here mean exposed to the greatest danger; at the peril of our lives. The Greek phrase, quoted by Rosenmüller, is to the point, ἀγων ἀποβῆναι ἐκ ἀνεπιπέδου, in danger we must not delay; activity and despatch are then indispensably necessary.

3. Our exhortation] The word παράκλησις, has a very extensive meaning; it signifies not only exhortation and teaching in general, but also encouragement, consolation, and the like. When the apostles exhorted or admonished men, it was, that they should turn from evil to good; from misery to happiness; from Satan to God; and from hell to heaven. Their exhortations having this object, every word was consolatory; and, as the truth which they delivered was unquestionable, therefore their ministry was a subject of the highest encouragement and joy.

Not of deceit] We did not endeavour to allure you with false pretences: we did not deceive you; nor were we deceived ourselves.

Nor of uncleanness] Such as the teachings of the Gentile philosophers were; their supreme gods were celebrated for their adulteries, fornications, uncleanness, thefts, barbarities, and profligacies of the most odious kind. Our Gospel was pure; came from the pure and holy God; and was accompanied with the influences of the Holy Spirit, and produced purity both in the hearts and lives of all that received it.

Nor in guile] We had no false pretences, and were influenced by no sinister motives.

4. But as we were allowed of God] Καθὼς δέδοται μαρτυρεῖν; as we were accounted worthy to be put in trust. As God put confidence in us, and sent us on his most special message to mankind, even so we speak, keeping the dignity of our high calling continually in view; and acting as in the sight of God, we speak not to please or flatter man, though our doctrine is the most consolatory that can be conceived; but to please that God who searcheth the heart; and before whom all our motives are constantly without a veil.

5. Flattering words] Though we proclaim the Gospel, or glad tidings; yet we showed that, without holiness, none should see the Lord.

Ye know] That while we preached the whole Gospel, we never gave any countenance to sin.

Nor a cloak of covetousness] We did not seek temporal emolument; nor did we preach the Gospel for a cloak to our covetousness: God is witness that we did not; we sought you, not yours. Hear this, ye that preach the Gospel! Can ye call God to witness that, in preaching it, ye have no end in view by your ministry but His glory in the salvation of souls? Or, do ye enter into the priesthood for a morsel of bread; or for what is ordinarily and impiously called a living, a benefit! In better days your place and office were called a cura of souls; what care have you for the souls of them by whose labours you are in general more than sufficiently supported? Is it your study, your earnest labour to bring sinners to God? To preach among your heathen parishioners the unsearchable riches of Christ?

But I should speak to the thousands who have no parishes; but they have their chapels, their congregations, pew and seat-rents, &c. &c. Is it for the sake of these that ye have entered or continue in the Gospel ministry? Is God witness that in all these things, ye have no cloak of covetousness? Happy is the man who can say so, whether he have the provision which the law of the land allows him, or whether he lives on the free-will offerings of the people.

The faithful labourer is worthy of his hire: for the ox that treads out the corn should not be muzzled: and they that preach the Gospel should live (not riot) by the Gospel. But wo to that man who enters into the labour for the sake of the hire; he knows not Christ, and how can he preach Him!

6. Nor of men sought we glory] As we preached not for 9 For ye remember, brethren, our labour and travail: for labouring night and day, because we would not be chargeable unto any of you, we preached unto you the Gospel of God.

10 Ye are witnesses, and God also, how holily and justly and unblameably we behaved ourselves among you that to live:

11 As ye know how we exhorted and comforted and charged every one of you, as a father doth his children, 12 That ye would walk worthy of God, who hath called you unto his kingdom and glory.

13 For this cause also thank we God without ceasing, because, when ye received the word of God which ye heard of us, ye received it not as the word of men, but as it is truth, the word of God, which effectually worketh also in you that believe.

14 For ye, brethren, became followers of the churches of God, used unworship.—1 Cor. 11.9. & 13.13, 14. 2 Thess. 1.9.—1 Cor. 11.11.—1 Cor. 2.3. & 9.22. 2 Cor. 13.14. 2 Timothy 2.19.—Romans 1.11. & 16.11.—12.12.—Acts 20.24. 1 Cor. 4.12. 2 Cor. 11.9. 2 Thess. 1.3.—1 Cor. 11.15. 2 Thess. 1.1.—2 Cor. 7.7.—Thess. 3.7.—Eph. 4.1. worldly gain, so we preached not for popular applause; we had what we sought for, the approbation of God, and the testimony of a good conscience.

When we might have been burdensome] They had a right to their maintenance while they devoted themselves wholly to the work of the Gospel for the sake of the people's souls. Others understand the words σὺν βαρῇ ἐπιπέδῳ, to be burdensome; we sought no glory of you nor of others, though we were burdensome as the apostles of Christ. בָּרֵךְ cabed, in Hebrew, which the Greek βαρῶς answers, signifies not only weight but glory; and in both these senses the apostle uses it, 2 Cor. iv. 17.

7. But we were gentle among you] Far from assuming to authority which we had, we acted towards you as a tender nurse or parent does to a delicate child. We fed, counselled, cherished, and bore with you; we taught you to walk, preserved you from stumbling, and led you in a right path.

Instead of παισι, gentle, many MSS. and several Versions and Fathers, have παισίν, young children. But this sense can be considered the original reading, the scope of the passage being totally opposed to it. It is the Thessalonians whom the apostle considers as young children, and himself and fellow labourers as the nurse; he could with no propriety say that he was among them as a little child, while himself professed to be their nurse.

8. Being affectionately desirous of you] We had such intense love for you, that we were not only willing and intent to preach the unsearchable riches of Christ to you; but to give our own lives for your sake; because ye were dear, διεστὴ ἀγαπῶντες ὑμᾶς, because ye were beloved by us. The words used here by the apostle, are expressive of the strongest affection and attachment.

9. We remember—our labour and travail] From this it appears that St. Paul spent much more time at Thessalonica than is generally supposed; for the expressions in this verse denote a long continuance of a constantly exercised ministry, interrupted only by manual labour for their own support: labouring night and day, because we would not be chargeable to you. Probably Paul and his companions worked with their hands by day, and spent a considerable part of the night in evenings, in preaching Christ to the people.

10. Ye are witnesses, and God also, how holily] i. e. in reference to God; how justly, in reference to men; and blameably, in reference to our spirit and conduct, as ministers of Christ, we behaved ourselves among you. What a consciousness of his own integrity must St. Paul have had to use the expressions that are here! No hypocrite, and none who did the work of the Lord carelessly, could make such an appeal both to God and man.

11. How we exhorted] What pastoral care is marked here! They exhorted; were continually teaching and instructing the objects of their charge; this was their general work.

They comforted] They found many under trials and temptations: and those they encouraged.

They charged] Μαρτυροῦμενοι; continued to witness to the people that all the threatenings and promises of God were true; that He required faith, love, and obedience; that he could not behold sin with allowance; that Jesus died to save them from their sins; and that, without holiness, none should see God. And all these things they did, not in a general way only, but they spoke to every man; none was left unadmonished, uncomforted. The spirit in which they performed all these branches of the pastoral care, was that which was most likely to ensure success; as a father treats his children, so they treated every member of the church.

12. That ye should walk worthy of God] That they should, in every respect, act up to their high calling; that it would not be a reproach to the God of holiness, to acknowledge them as his sons and daughters.—See the notes on Ephes. iv. 1. Phil. i. 27. and Col. i. 10.

His kingdom and glory.] His church here; for that is the kingdom of God among men; and His glory hereafter; for that is the state to which the dispensation of grace in the church tend. The words, however, may be a testament, and signify His glorious kingdom.

od which in Judea are in Christ Jesus: for ye also have offered like things of your own countrymen, even as they also of the Jews:

13. Ye received the word of God] Ye received the doctrine of God, not as any thing fabricated by man, but as coming immediately from God himself; we being only His messengers, to declare what he had previously revealed to us. And e have had the fullest proof that ye have not believed in vain; or that doctrine under the power and influence of the Holy Ghost, has worked most powerfully in you; filling you with the life, and holiness

14. Ye became followers of the churches of God] There is not a word here of the church of Rome being the model after which the other churches were to be formed; it had no such pre-eminence; this honour belonged to the churches of Judea: it was according to them, not the church at Rome, that the Asiatic churches were modelled. The purest of all the apostolic churches was that of the Thessalonians, and this was deemed after the Christian churches in Judea.

Had any pre-eminence or authority belonged to the church of Rome, the apostle would have proposed this as a model to all those which he formed, either in Judea, Asia Minor, Greece, or Italy.

Ye also have suffered - of your own countrymen] It is worthy of remark that, in almost every case, the Jews were the leaders of all persecutions against the apostles, and the infant church. And what they could not do themselves, they instigated others to do: and, by gathering together lewd fellows of the baser sort, from among the Gentiles, they made frequent uproars, and especially at Thessalonica, where the opposition to the Gospel was very high, and the persecution of the Christians very hot.

15, 16. Who both killed the Lord Jesus, &c.] What a finish, but just character, is this of the Jews! 1. They slew the Lord Jesus, through the most unprincipled and fell malice. 2. They killed their own prophets; there was no time in which this seed of the serpent did not hate and oppose spiritual things; they slew even their own prophets who declared to them the will of God. 3. They persecuted the apostles, showing the same spirit of enmity to the Gospel which they did and shown to the law. 4. They did not please God, nor seek to please Him; though they pretended that their opposition to the Gospel, was through their zeal for God's glory! they were hypocrites of the worst kind. 5. They were contrary to all men; they hated the whole human race; and judged and wished them to perdition. 6. They forbade the apostles to preach to the Gentiles, lest they should be saved; this was an avowal of malice completely super-human; they persecuted the body to death, and the soul to damnation! They were afraid that the Gentiles should get their souls saved, if the Gospel was preached to them! 7. They filled up their sins aloud; they had no more purposes, or outlines of iniquity; all was filled up; every evil purpose was followed, as far as possible, with a wicked act! Is it any wonder, therefore, that wrath should come upon them to the uttermost? It is to be reckoned among the highest mercies of God, that the whole nation was not pursued, by the Divine justice, to utter and final extinction!

17. Being taken from you for a short time] Through the association raised by the Jews, see Acts xvii. he was obliged to leave Thessalonica, and yield to a storm that it would have been useless for him to have withstood.

Being taken from you - in presence, not in heart] The apostle had compared himself to a parent or nurse, ver. 7. and 11. and the people he considered as his most beloved children; here he represents himself as feeling what an affectionate father must feel, when torn from his children, for this is the import of the word ερασιανδρους, bereft of children, which we tamely translate, being taken from you.

Endeavouring the more abundantly] His separation from them did not destroy his parental feelings; and the manner

18 Wherefore we would have come unto you, even I Paul, once and again; but Satan hindered us.

18. Even I Paul] He had already sent Timothy and Silas to them; but he himself was anxious to see them; and had purposed this once and again, but Satan hindered; i. e. some adversary, as the word means, whether the devil himself, or some of his children. There was, however, such a storm of persecution raised up against him, that his friends did not think it prudent to permit him to go till the storms had been somewhat allayed.

19. For what is our hope] I can have no prospects from earth; I have forsaken all for the Gospel; and esteem every thing the world can afford, as dross and dung, that I may gain Christ. Why then should I continually labour at the risk of my life, preaching the Gospel? Is it not to get your souls saved that ye may be my crown of rejoicing in the day of Christ? For this I labour; and, having planted the Gospel among you, I wish to take every opportunity of watering it, that it may grow up unto eternal life.

20. For ye are our glory and joy.] Ye are the seal of our apostleship; your conversion and steadfastness a full proof that God hath sent us. Converts to Christ are our ornaments; persevering believers, our joy in the day of judgment.

1. In the preceding chapter we have the characters and marks of a genuine pastor, laid down in such a manner as not to be misunderstood. Every man who preaches the Gospel, should carefully read this chapter, and examine himself by it. Most preachers, on reading it conscientiously, will either give up their place to others, or purpose to do the work of the Lord more fervently for the future. He who expects nothing but the approbation of Christ will labour for Christ; and he who has the glory of his Master only in view, will ever have his Master's presence and blessing. Those who enter into this work for human applause, or secular emolument, may have their reward: but in that one smile of approbation from Christ is not included.

2. God, for reasons best known to himself, often permits the most pious and benevolent purposes of his servants to be frustrated for a time. It is well that the good purpose was in the heart; but God knows the fittest time and place to bring it to effect. Satan is ever opposing all that is pure, good, and benevolent; and he appears frequently to succeed; but this is not really the case; if at any time he prevents the followers of God from bringing a pious purpose into effect, that was the time in which it could not have been done, to secure its full effect. Let the purpose be retained, and the best time and place will be duly provided. As Satan constantly endeavours to oppose every good work; no wonder he is found opposing a good purpose, even at the very time that God sees it improper to bring it to the intended effect. Man proposes, but God disposes.

3. The apostle speaks of the wrath coming upon the Jews; it was about twenty years after this that their city was destroyed, their temple burnt, more than a million of them destroyed, their civil polity utterly subverted, and what remained of this wretched nation, scattered to all the winds of heaven and in this state, without a nation, without a temple, without worship, and apparently without any religion, they continue to this day, a monument of God's displeasure, and a proof of the Divine inspiration, both of the prophets and apostles, who, in the most explicit manner, have predicted all the evils which have since befallen them. Their crimes were great; to these their punishment is proportioned. For what end God has preserved them distinct from all the people of the earth, among whom they sojourn, we cannot pretend to say; but it must unquestionably be for a subject of the very highest importance. In the mean time, let the Christian world treat them with humanity and mercy.

CHAPTER III.

2. Paul informs them how, being hindered himself from visiting them, he had sent Timothy to comfort them; of whom he gives a high character. 1, 2. Shows that trials and difficulties are unavoidable in the present state. 3, 4. Mentions the joy he had on hearing by Timothy of their steadfastness in the faith; for which he returns thanks to God, and prays earnestly for their increase. 5-10. Prays also that God may afford him an opportunity of seeing them, 11. And that they may abound in love to God and one another; and be unblameable in holiness at the coming of Christ, 12, 13. [A. M. cir. 4066. A. D. cir. 62. A. U. C. 806. Anno Claudii Cæsaris. Aug. 12.]

WHEREFORE when we could no longer forbear, we thought it good to be left at Athens alone;

a Verse 5. - b Acts 17. 18.

2 And sent Timothy, our brother, and minister of God, and our fellow-labourer in the Gospel of Christ, to a Rom. 16. 22. 1 Cor. 16. 16. 2 Cor. 1. 19.

NOTES.—Verse 1. Wherefore when we could no longer, &c.] The apostle was anxious to hear of their state; and, as e could obtain no information without sending a messenger express, he therefore sent Timothy from Athens, choosing rather to be left alone, than to continue any longer in uncertainty relative to their state.

2 Timothy, our brother] It appears that Timothy was but a youth when converted to God: he had now, however establish you, and to comfort you, concerning your faith: 3 ¶ That no man should be moved by these afflictions; for yourselves know that we are appointed thereunto.

4 ¶ For verily, when we were with you, we told you before that we should suffer tribulation; even as it came to pass, and ye know.

5 For this cause, when I could no longer forbear, I sent to know your faith, lest by some means the tempter have tempted you, and our labour be in vain.

6 ¶ But now, when Timotheus came from you unto us, and brought us good tidings, of your faith and charity, and that ye have good remembrance of us always, desiring greatly to see us, as we also to see you:

7 Therefore, brethren, we were comforted over you in all our affliction and distress by your faith:

8 Eph. 3. 13.—Acts 9. 16. & 14. 22. & 20. 23. & 21. 11. 1 Cor. 4. 9. 2 Tim. 3. 12. 1 Pet. 2. 21.—Acts 20. 28.—Ver. 1.—1 Cor. 7. 5. 2 Cor. 11. 2.—1 Gal. 2. 2. & 4. 11. Phil. 2. 15.—1 Ks. 18. 1, 2.—Phil. 1. 2.—2 Cor. 1. 4. & 7. 7, 13.—Phil. 4. 1.—Ch. 1. 2.

9 ¶ As also, when I sent you Timotheus, the work of God; Paul, therefore, calls him his brother, being one of the same Christian family, a son of God by adoption; elsewhere he calls him his own son, 1 Tim. 1. 2. and his dearly beloved son, 2 Tim. 1. 2. because he was brought to the knowledge of the true God, and to salvation by Christ, through the apostle's instrumentality.—See the Preface to 1st Epist. to Timothy.

10 ¶ [Minister of God] Employed by God to preach the Gospel; this was God's work; and he had appointed Timothy to do it, and to do it at this time, in conjunction with St. Paul; and therefore he calls him his fellow-labourer. There were no sinners then; preaching the Gospel was God's work; the primitive preachers were His workmen, and laboured in this calling. It is the same still, but who works?

11 ¶ [That no man should be moved] This is, caused to apostatize from Christianity.

12 ¶ [We are appointed thereunto] Εἰς τοῦτο κληθεῖσθε,—we are exposed to this; we lie open to such; they are unavoidable in the present state of things; as the Latins say, sic est sorte nostra, "this is our lot." God appoints nothing of this kind; but He permits it, for He has made man a free agent.

13 ¶ [That we should suffer tribulation] I prepared you for it, because I knew that it was according to their nature for wicked men to persecute the followers of God.

14 ¶ [For this cause] Knowing that you would be persecuted, and knowing that your apostasy was possible, I sent to know your faith: whether you continued steadfast in the truth, lest you might have been tempted by Satan, to consult your present ease, and abandon the Gospel, for which you suffered persecution.

15 ¶ [When Timotheus came] We have already seen that he and Silas stood behind at Thessalonica, when Paul was obliged to leave it; for the persecution seems to have been principally directed against him. When Paul came to Athens, he sent pressingly to him and Silas, to come to him with all speed to that city. We are not informed that they did come; but it is most likely that they did: and that Paul sent Timothy back to Thessalonica to comfort and build up these new converts. After Paul had sent away Timothy, it is likely he went himself straight to Corinth, and there Timothy soon after met him, with the good news of the steadiness of the Thessalonian church.

16 ¶ [Your faith and charity] The good tidings which Timothy brought from Thessalonica, consisted of three particulars.—

1. Their faith; they continued steadfast in their belief of the Gospel.—2. Their charity; they loved one another, and lived in unity and harmony.—3. They were affectionately attached to the apostle; they had good remembrance of him, and desired earnestly to see him.

17 ¶ [Therefore—we were comforted] My afflictions and persecutions seemed trifles when I heard of your perseverance in the faith.

8 For now we live, if ye stand fast in the Lord.

9 ¶ For what thanks can we render to God again for you, for all the joy wherewith we joy for your sakes before our God?

10 ¶ Night and day praying exceedingly that we might see your face, and might perfect that which is lacking in your faith?

11 Now God himself and our Father, and our Lord Jesus Christ, direct our way unto you.

12 And the Lord make you to increase and abound in love one toward another, and toward all men, even as we do toward you:

13 To the end he may stablish your hearts unblamable in holiness before God, even our Father, at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ with all his saints.

14 ¶ [For now we live] 2 Tim. 1. 3.—Rom. 1. 10, 11. & 15. 22.—Ch. 2. 17.—2 Cor. 13. 10. 11. 12. 13. 14. 15. 16. 17. 18. 19. 20. 21. 22. 23. 24. 25. 26. 27. 28. 29. 30. 31. 32. 33. 34. 35. 36. 37. 38. 39. 40. 41. 42. 43. 44. 45. 46. 47. 48. 49. 50. 51. 52. 53. 54. 55. 56. 57. 58. 59. 60. 61. 62. 63. 64. 65. 66. 67. 68. 69. 70. 71. 72. 73. 74. 75. 76. 77. 78. 79. 80. 81. 82. 83. 84. 85. 86. 87. 88. 89. 90. 91. 92. 93. 94. 95. 96. 97. 98. 99. 100.

15 ¶ [For now we live] Your steadfastness in the faith, gives me new life and comfort; I now feel that I live to some purpose, as my labour in the Lord is not in vain.

16 ¶ [What thanks can we render to God] The high satisfaction and uncommon joy, which the apostle felt, are strongly depicted in the language he uses. How near his heart did the success of his ministry lie! It was not enough for him that he preached so often, laboured so hard, suffered so much; what were all these if souls were not converted? And what were all conversions, if those who embraced the Gospel did not walk steadily in the way to heaven, and persevere?

17 ¶ [Night and day praying exceedingly] Supplicating God at all times; mingling this with all my prayers; unceasingly desiring, abounding and superabounding to my entreaties to God, to permit me to revisit you. How strong was his affection for this church!

18 ¶ [Night perfect that which is lacking] That I might have the opportunity of giving you the fullest instructions in the doctrine of Christ; that ye might have every thing in the most ample detail; so that the great outlines of truth which you already know may be filled up, that ye may be perfectly fitted to every good word and work.

19 ¶ [Now God himself and our Father] That is, God who is our Father, who has adopted us into the heavenly family, and called us his sons and daughters.

20 ¶ [Direct our way] As he was employed in God's work, he dared not consult his own inclinations: he looked for continual directions from God, where, when, and how, to do his Master's work.

21 ¶ [Make you to increase and abound in love] They had already love in each other, so as to unite them in one Christian body; and he prays that they may have an increase and an abundance of it; that they might feel the same love to each other which he felt for them all.

22 ¶ [That he may stablish your hearts] Without love to God and man, there can be no establishment in the religion of Christ. It is love that produces both sobriety and continuance. And, as love is the fulfilling of the law, he who is filled with love, is unblamable in holiness; for he who has the love of God in him is a partaker of the Divine nature, for God is love.

23 ¶ [At the coming of our Lord] God is coming to judge the world: every hour that passes on in the general lapse of time, is advancing His approach: whatsoever He does, is in reference to this great event: and whatsoever we do, should be in reference to the same. But who, in that great day, shall give up his accounts with joy? That person only whose heart is established in holiness before God, i. e. so as to bear the eye and strict scrutiny of his Judge. Reader, lay this to heart, for thou knowest not what a moment may bring forth. When thy soul departs from thy body, it will be the coming of the Lord to thee.

CHAPTER IV.

The apostle exhorts them to attend to the directions which he had already given them, that they might know how to walk and please God, 1, 2. Gives them exhortations concerning continence, chastity, and matrimonial fidelity, 3—5. Speaks concerning their love to each other; and love to the churches of Christ; and exhorts them to continue and increase in it, 9, 10. Counsels them to observe an inoffensive conduct, to mind their own affairs, to do their own business, and to live honestly, 11, 12. Not to sorrow for the dead, as persons who have no hope of a resurrection; because, to Christians, the resurrection of Christ is a proof of the resurrection of his followers, 13, 14. Gives a short, but awful description, of the appearing of Christ to judge the world, 15. [A. M. cir. 4066. A. D. cir. 62. A. U. C. 805. Anno Claudii Cesar. Aug. 23.]

FURTHERMORE then we beseech you, brethren, and exhort you by the Lord Jesus, that as ye have received of us how ye ought to walk and to please God, so ye would abound more and more.

a Or, request.—b Or, beseech.—c Phil. 1. 27. Col. 2. 6.—d Ch. 2. 12.—e Col. 1. 10.

NOTES—Verse 1. We beseech you, brethren, and exhort you to give you proper instructions in heavenly things; and request you to attend to our advice. The apostle used the most pressing entreaties; for he had a strong and affectionate desire, that this church should excel in all righteousness and true holiness.

2. Please God—more and more] God sets no bounds to the communications of His grace and Spirit to them that are faithful. And, as there are no bounds to the graces, so there should be none to the exercise of those graces. No man can

2 For ye know what commandments we gave you by the Lord Jesus.

3 For this is the will of God, even your sanctification, that ye should abstain from fornication:

4 Rom. 12. 2. Eph. 5. 17.—Eph. 5. 27.—1 Cor. 6. 18. Eph. 4. 22.

ever feel that he loves God too much; or that he loves man too much for God's sake.

2. Ye know what commandments we gave you] He refers to his instructions, while he was among them; and particularly on particular subjects, which he does not mention, but only hints at.

3. This is the will of God, even your sanctification] He has called you to holiness; He requires that you should be holy; for, without holiness, none can see His face. It is a general calling; but in it, many particulars are required.

1 That every one of you should know how to possess his self in sanctification and honour;

2 Not in the lust of concupiscence, even as the Gentiles which know not God:

3 That no man go beyond and defraud his brother in any matter: because that the Lord is the avenger of all such, as we also have forewarned you and testified.
For God hath not called us unto uncleanness, but unto justice.

4 He therefore that despiseth, despiseth not man, but God, who hath also given unto us his Holy Spirit.

5 But as touching brotherly love ye need not that I write unto you; for ye yourselves are taught of God to love one another.

[Rom. 4. 18. 1 Cor. 4. 15, 16.—Col. 2. 6. Rom. 1. 24, 25.—1 Eph. 4. 17.—1 Cor.
3. Gal. 4. Eph. 4. 12, 13. 2 Thess. 1. 3.—a Lev. 19. 11, 12. 1 Cor. 6. 9.—Or, from, or over, or up. Or, in the matter.—2 Thess. 1. 8.—1 Lev. 11. 44, & 19. 17.
Gal. 1. 2. Heb. 12. 14. 1 Pet. 1. 14, 15.—Luzh. 10. 16.—Or, rejoicing.—1 Cor. 2. 10.
7. 1 John 2. 24.—Chap. II.—1 Jer. 31. 34. John 6. 63. & 14. 23. Hebrews 9. 11.
1st & 2d.]

one of these he proceeds to mention; and it is very likely at these had been points on which he gave them particular instructions while among them.

That ye should abstain from fornication] The word here, as we have seen in other places, includes all sorts of uncleanness; and it was probably this consideration that induced several MSS., some Versions and Fathers, to add here some, all. Directions of this kind were peculiarly necessary among the Greeks; and indeed heathens in general, who were strongly addicted to such vices.

4. How is possess his vessel] Let every man use his wife as the purpose stone for which God created her, and instituted marriage. The word vessel, answers to the Hebrew kyay, which, though it signifies vessel in general, has several other meanings. That the rabbins frequently express wife by it, Ekostein largely proves; and to me it appears very probable, that the apostle uses it in that sense here. St. Peter is the wife, the seabear vessant, 1 Pet. iii. 7. Others think, as the body is meant, which is the vessel in which the soul dwells. In this sense St. Paul uses it, 2 Cor. iv. 7. We have this sense in earlier versions; and in this sense it is used by all Greek and Roman authors. There is a third sense which interpreters have put on the word, which I forbear to use. The general sense is plain; purity and continency are most obviously intended, whether the word be understood referring to the wife or the husband, as the following verse sufficiently proves.

5. Not in the lust of concupiscence] Having no rational being, nor end. Some say, "not like beasts;" but this does not apply as they who use it wish; for the males and sales of the brute creation are regular and consistent in their intercourse; and scarcely ever exceed such bounds as reason itself would prescribe to those most capable of observing and obeying its dictates.

The Gentiles which knew not God] These are the beasts; strange brutes are rational creatures when compared with men. Enough has been said on this subject on Rom. I. and II.
they who wish to see more, may consult Juvenal, and particularly his 8th and 9th satires; and indeed all the writers on Greek and Roman morals.

6. That no man go beyond and defraud his brother] That man should, by any means, endeavour to corrupt the wife of another; or to alienate her affections or fidelity from her husband: this I believe to be the apostle's meaning; though we understand it of covetousness, overreaching, tricking, eating, and cozenage in general.

The Lord is the avenger of all such] He takes up the case of the injured husband, wherever the case has not been redressed by man: and all such vices he will signally punish.
Every species of uncleanness was practised among the heathens; and were they reputed as vices. Their gods, their poets, their philosophers, and their great men in general, were them examples of every species of impurity; and they had no system of ethics which forbade these abominations.
Christian religion not only discontinuances these things, it forbids them on the most awful penalties: therefore, wherever Christianity prevails, these vices, if practised at all,
are obliged to seek the deepest gloom of midnight to cover themselves from the eyes of men. On this account they are considerably rare: even among the mere professors of Christianity, they exist, but do not flourish.

7. God hath not called us into uncleanness] He is the creator of male and female; and the institutor of marriage; and has called men and women to this state: but the end of it, and all the other callings of God to man, is holiness, not uncleanness. And they who use the marriage state as he wishes, will find it conducive to their holiness and perfection.

8. He therefore that despiseth] He who will not receive our teachings, and is led either to undervalue or despise them, despises not us, but God, from whom we have received our commission; and by whose Spirit we give those directions.—See on ver. 15.

Hath also given unto us his holy Spirit] Instead of his grace, as we; see unto, unto you, is the reading of BDEFG. as at many others, the Syriac, all the Arabic, Armenian, or Syriac in the margin, some of the Itala; Clement, Irenaeus, and Ambrose; this seems to be the original. God has taught us, that we may teach you

10 And indeed ye do it toward all the brethren which are in all Macedonia: but we beseech you, brethren, that ye increase more and more;

11 And that ye study to be quiet, and to do your own business, and to work with your own hands, as we commanded you;

12 That ye may walk honestly toward them that are without, and that ye may have lack of nothing.

13 But I would not have you to be ignorant, brethren, concerning them which are asleep, that ye sorrow not, even as others which have no hope.

14 For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so shall they also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him.

15 For this we say unto you by the word of the Lord, that if we die, we shall live again with him. 1 Peter 4. 6. 1 John 2. 11, 23, &
4. 19. Chapter 1. 7.—Chapter 2. 12.—2 Thess. 2. 11. 1 Peter 4. 18.—b Acts 10. 25
Ephesians 1. 13. 2 Thess. 2. 7, & 12.—Romans 12. 13. 1 Cor. 13. 1. 1 Peter
2. 12.—Or, of no man.—See Leviticus 19. 28. Deuteronomy 4. 1, 2. 2 Samuel
16. 23.—Ephesians 2. 12.—1 Corinthians 16. 13.—1 Corinthians 16. 18. Chapter
3. 13.—1 Kings 12. 17, 18, & 20.

has also given you His Holy Spirit, that ye might understand, and be enabled to practise these things. It is one thing to receive a revelation from the Spirit of God; it is another thing to receive that Spirit to enable a man to live according to that revelation. In the first sense, the apostles alone received this Holy Spirit; in the latter sense, all true Christians, as well as the Thessalonians, received it. I think you, you, is the true reading; and that is confirmed by the following verse: For ye yourselves are taught of God to love one another. Griesbach has inserted it in the margin, but has not admitted it into the text, because it has not what he deemed full support from those MSS. which are of the Alexandrian Recension; but he thought its genuineness very probable.

9. Touching brotherly love] They were remarkable for this; and though the apostle appears to have had this as a topic on which he intended to write to them; yet, from the account which he received of their prosperous state by Timothy, he finds that it is unnecessary to spend any time in in-culcating a doctrine which they fully understood and practised.
See chap. iii. 6.

10. Ye do it toward all the brethren] Ye not only love one another at Thessalonica, but ye love all the brethren in Macedonia; we consider them all as children of the same Father; and that all the churches which are in Christ, make one great and glorious body, of which he is the head.

11. That ye study to be quiet] Though in general the church at Thessalonica was pure and exemplary; yet there seems to have been some idle, talking people among them, who disturbed the peace of others: persons who, under the pretence of religion, gadded about from house to house; did not work, but were burthensome to others; and were continually meddling with other people's business; making parties, and procuring their bread by religious gossiping. To these the apostle gives those directions which the whole church of God should enforce, wherever such troublesome and dangerous people are found; viz. that they should study to be quiet, νενηαται, to hold their peace, as their religious cant will never promote true religion; that they should do their own business, and let that of others alone; and that they should work with their own hands, and not be a burthen to the church of God, or to those well meaning, but weak and inconsiderate people, who entertain them; being imposed on by their apparent sanctity and glowing conversation. An idle person, though able to discourse like an angel, or pray like an apostle, cannot be a Christian; all such are hypocrites and deceivers: the true members of the church of Christ, walk, work, and labour.

12. That ye may walk honestly] Ενενηατος, becomingly, decently, respectably, as is consistent with the purity, holiness, gravity, and usefulness, of your Christian calling.

Them that are without] The unconverted Gentiles and Jews. See this expression explained at large on Coloss. iv. 5.

That ye may have lack of nothing] That ye may be able to get your bread by honest labour, which God will ever bless; and be chargeable to no man. He that is dependant on another, is necessarily in bondage; and he who is able to get his own bread by the sweat of his brow, should not be under obligation even to a king.

I do not recollect whether, in any other part of this work, I have given the following story from the History of Nimesh.
Hatem Tal was an Arabian nobleman, who flourished some time before the Mohammedan era: he was reputed the most generous and liberal man in all the East. One day, he slew one hundred camels, and made a feast, to which all the Arabian lords, and all the peasantry in the district, were invited.
About the time of the feast, he took a walk towards a neighbouring wood, to see if he could find any person whom he might invite to partake of the entertainment which he had then provided: walking along the skirt of the wood, he espied an old man coming out of it, laden with a burthen of fags; he accosted him, and asked if he had not heard of the entertainment made that day by Hatem Tal? The old man answered in the affirmative. He asked him why he did not attend and partake with the rest? The old man answered,
"He that is able to gain his bread, even by collecting fags in the wood, should not be beheld even to Hatem Tal."
saying, and has long been a rule of conduct his note.

we which are alive and remain until the coming of the Lord shall not prevent them which are asleep.

16 For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with trump of God; and the dead in Christ shall rise first:

1 Cor. 15. 51.—1 Matthew 24. 30, 31. Acts 1. 11. 3 Thess. 1. 7.—1 Cor. 15. 52.—1 Cor. 15. 53.

13. I would not wish you to be ignorant] Instead of εγνωσθε, Ave, Ave, Ave, in the reading of ADEFG. many others; besides the Arabic, Ethiopic, Armenian, some of the Slavonian, the Vulgate and Itala, with many of the Greek Fathers. This is undoubtedly the true reading: Brethren, I would not wish you to be ignorant; or I would not that you should be ignorant. This was probably one of the points which was lacking in their faith, that he wished to go to Thessalonica to instruct them in.

Them which are asleep] That is, them that are dead. It is supposed that the apostle had heard that the Thessalonians continued to lament over their dead as the heathens did in general, who had no hope of the resurrection of the body; and that they had been puzzled concerning the doctrine of the resurrection. To set them right on this important subject, he delivers three important truths.—1. He asserts, as he had done before, that they who died in the Lord, should have, in virtue of Christ's resurrection, a resurrection unto eternal life and blessedness.—2. He makes a new discovery, that the last generation should not die at all, but be in a moment changed to immortals.—3. He adds another new discovery, that though the living should not die, but be transformed; yet the dead should first be raised, and be made glorious and immortal; and so, in some measure, have the preference and advantage of such as shall then be found alive.—See Dodd.

14. For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again] He says, seeing that we believe; knowing that the resurrection of Christ is as fully authenticated as His death:

Even so them] It necessarily follows that they who sleep, die, in Him; in the faith of the Gospel: Will God bring with him; He will raise them up as Jesus was raised from the dead; in the same manner; i. e. by His own eternal power and energy; and He will bring them with Him, with Christ; for He is the head of the church, which is His body.

15. This we say unto you by the word of the Lord] This I have, by express revelation, from the Lord. What he now delivers, he gives as coming immediately from the Spirit of God. Indeed, human reason could not have found out the points which he immediately subjoins; no conjectures could lead to them. Allowing even the general doctrine of the resurrection to be believed, yet what follows does not flow from the premises: they are doctrines of pure revelation; and such as never could have been found out by human ingenuity. In no place does the apostle speak more confidently and positively of his inspiration, than here; and we should prepare ourselves to receive some momentous and interesting truth.

We which are alive and remain] By the pronoun we, the apostle does not intend himself and the Thessalonians, to whom he was then writing; he is speaking of the genuine Christians, which shall be found on earth when Christ comes to judgment. From not considering the manner in which the apostle uses this word, some have been led to suppose that he imagined that the day of judgment would take place in that generation; and while he, and the then believers at Thessalonica, were in life. But it is impossible that a man, under so direct an influence of the Holy Spirit, should be permitted to make such a mistake: nay, no man in the exercise of his sober reason could have formed such an opinion; there was nothing to warrant the supposition; no premises from which it could be fairly deduced; nor indeed any thing in the circumstances of the church, nor in the constitution of the world, that could have suggested a hint of the kind. The apostle is speaking of the thing indefinitely, as to the time when it shall happen; but positively as to the object that shall be then observed.

Shall not prevent them which are asleep.] Those who shall be found living in that day, though they shall not pass through death, but be suddenly changed, yet shall not go to glory be-

17 * Then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air: and so shall we ever be with the Lord.

18 * Wherefore comfort one another with these words.

1 Cor. 15. 51.—Acts 1. 9. Rev. 11. 12.—John 12. 35 & 14. 3 & 17. 36.—Chap. 5. 11.—1 Cor. 15. 52.

For them that are dead; for the dead in Christ shall rise first; they shall be raised, their bodies made glorious, and be caught up to meet the Lord before the others shall be changed. And this appears to be the meaning of the apostle's word, μεθωσομεν, which we translate, shall not prevent; for, although this word prevent, from pro and venis, literally signifies to go before, yet we use it now in the sense of to hinder, or obstruct. Μεθωσειν τινα, signifies the same, according to Eusebius, as προπεσειν, to go before; προλαμβανειν, to anticipate, be before. Those who shall be found alive on that day, shall not anticipate glory before the dead in Christ; for they shall rise first, and begin the enjoyment of it, before the others shall be changed. This appears to be the apostle's meaning.

16. The Lord himself] That is, Jesus Christ shall descend from heaven; shall, in like manner as He was seen by His disciples to ascend; i. e. in His human form; but now, infinitely more glorious, for thousands of thousands shall minister unto Him; and ten thousand times ten thousand shall stand before Him; for the Son of man shall come on the throne of His glory; but who may abide the day of His coming, or stand when He appeareth?

With a shout] Or order, εν ελευθερι; and probably in these words, Arise, ye dead, and come to judgment! which order shall be repeated by the archangel, who shall accompany it with the sound of the trumpet of God, whose great and terrible voice, like those on Mount Sinai, ascending louder and louder, shall shake both the heavens and the earth!

Observe the order of this terribly glorious day.—1. Jesus is in all the dignity and splendour of his eternal Majesty, shall descend from heaven to the mid region, what the apostle calls the air, somewhere within the earth's atmosphere.—2. Then the stars, about or order, shall be given for the dead to arise.—3. Next the archangel, as the herald of Christ, shall repeat the order, Arise, ye dead, and come to judgment.—4. When all the dead in Christ are raised, then the trumpet shall sound, as the signal for them all to flock together to the throne of Christ. It was by the sound of the trumpet that the solemn assemblies, under the law, were convoked; and to such convocations, there appears to be here an allusion.—5. When the dead in Christ are raised, their vile bodies being made like unto His glorious body—then, 6. Those who are alive shall be changed, and made immortal.—7. These shall be caught up together with them to meet the Lord in the air.—8. We may suppose that the judgment will now be set, and the books opened; and the dead judged out of the things written in those books.—9. The eternal states of quick and dead being thus determined, then all who shall be found to have made a covenant with Him by sacrifice, and to have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb, shall be taken to His eternal glory, and be for ever with the Lord! What an inexpressible terrific glory will then be exhibited!—I forbear to call in here the descriptions which men of a poetic turn have made of this terrible scene, because I cannot trust to their correctness; and it is a subject which we should speak of, and contemplate, as nearly as possible, in the words of Scripture.

18. Comfort one another with these words] Strange saying! comfort a man with the information that he is going to appear before the judgment seat of God! Who can feel comfort from these words? That man alone, with whose spirit the Spirit of God bears witness that his sins are blotted out, and the thoughts of whose heart are purified by the imputation of God's Holy Spirit; so that he can perfectly love Him, and worthily magnify His name. Reader, thou art not in such a state, unless it be thus with thee, or thou art hampering and thirsting after righteousness. If so, thou shalt be filled; for it is impossible that thou shouldst be taken away by thy sins, while mourning after the salvation of God. They that seek shall find

CHAPTER V.

The apostle continues to speak of Christ's coming to judgment; and the uncertainty of the time in which it shall take place; and the careless state of sinners, 1-3. Shows the Thessalonians that they are children of the light; that they should watch and pray, and put on the armour of God, being called to obtain salvation by Christ, who died for them, that, whether dead or alive, when the day of judgment comes, they may live for ever with Him: and that they should comfort and edify each other with these considerations, 4-11. He exhorts them to remember those who labour among them, and are over them in the Lord; and to esteem such highly for their work's sake, 12, 13. He charges them to wear, own, point out their high spiritual privileges; warns them against neglecting or misimproving the gift of the Spirit, and the means of grace, 14-20. They are also exhorted to prove all things, to abstain from all evil, and to expect to be sanctified through spirit, soul, and body, 21-24. Recommends himself and brethren to their prayers; charges them to read this epistle to all the brethren, 25-28. [A. M. cir. 4056. A. D. cir. 52. A. U. C. 806. An. Claudi Cæsar. Aug. 12.]

BUT OF the times and seasons, brethren, ye have no need that I write unto you.

1 Matt. 24. 3, 36. Acts 1. 7.—b Ch. 4. 9.

NOTES.—Verse 1. But of the times and seasons] It is natural to suppose, after what he had said in the conclusion of the preceding chapter, concerning the coming of Christ, the raising of the dead, and rendering those immortal who should then be found alive, without obliging them to pass through the empire of death; that the Thessalonians would feel an innocent

3 For when they shall say, Peace and safety; then a sudden destruction cometh upon them, as travail upon a woman with child; and they shall not escape.

4 But ye, brethren, are not in darkness, that that day should overtake you as a thief.

5 Ye are all the children of light, and the children of the day; we are not of the night, nor of darkness.

6 Therefore let us not sleep, as do others; but let us watch and be sober.

7 For they that sleep, sleep in the night; and they that be drunken, are drunken in the night.

8 But let us, who are of the day, be sober, putting on the breastplate of faith and love; and for an helmet, the hope of salvation.

curiosity to know as the disciples did concerning the destruction of Jerusalem, when those things should take place; and what should be the signs of those times, and of the coming of the Son of Man. And it is remarkable, that the apostle answers here to these anticipated questions, as our Lord did, in the above case, to the direct question of his disciples; and he seems to refer in these words, Of the times and the seasons, ye have no need that I write unto you, for yourselves know that the day of the Lord cometh as a thief in the night, to what our Lord said, Matt. xxiv. 42—44. xv. 13. and the apostle takes it for granted that they were acquainted with our Lord's prediction on the subject: For you yourselves know perfectly that the day of the Lord so cometh as a thief in the night. It is very likely, therefore, that the apostle, like our Lord, couples these two grand events, the destruction of Jerusalem, and the final judgment. And it appears most probable, that it is of the former event, chiefly, that he speaks here; as it was certainly of the latter that he treated in the conclusion of the preceding chapter. In the notes on Acts i. 6, 7. it has already been shown, that the xpovos; ἡ καιρος, times or season, (the very same terms which are used here,) refer to the destruction of the Jewish commonwealth; and we may fairly presume, that they have the same meaning in this place.

3. For when they shall say, Peace and safety] This points out, very particularly, the state of the Jewish people when the Romans came against them; and so fully persuaded were they that God would not deliver the city and temple to their enemies, that they refused every overture that was made to them.

Sudden destruction] In the storming of their city, and the burning of their temple, and the massacre of several hundreds of thousands of themselves, the rest being sold for slaves, and the whole of them dispersed over the face of the earth.

As travail upon a woman] This figure is perfectly consistent with what the apostle had said before; viz. that the times and seasons were not known; though the thing itself was expected; our Lord having predicted it in the most positive manner. So, a woman with child knows that, if she be spared, she will have a bearing time; but the week, the day, the hour, she cannot tell. In a great majority of cases, the time is accelerated or retarded such before or beyond the time that the woman expected; so with respect to the Jews; neither the day, week, month, nor year, was known. All that was specifically known was this: their destruction was coming; and it should be sudden, and they should not escape.

4. But ye, brethren, are not in darkness] Probably St. Paul refers to a notion that was very prevalent among the Jews; viz. that God would judge the Gentiles in the night-time, when utterly secure and careless; but he would judge the Jews in the day-time, when employed in reading and performing the words of the law. The words in Midrash Tehillim, on Psal. ix. 8. are the following—When the holy blessed God shall judge the Gentiles, it shall be in the night season, in which they shall be asleep in their transgressions; but when he shall judge the Israelites, it shall be in the day-time, when they are occupied in the study of the law. This maxim the apostle appears to have in view in the 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, and 8th verses.

5. Ye are all the children of light] Ye are children of God, and enjoy both His light and life. Ye are Christians; ye belong to Him who has brought life and immortality to light by His Gospel. This dispensation under which ye are, has illustrated all the preceding dispensations: in its light, all is become luminous; and ye who walked formerly in heathen ignorance, or in the darkness of Jewish prejudices, are now light in the Lord, because ye have believed in Him who is the light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory and splendour of His people Israel.

We are not of the night, nor of darkness] Our actions are such as we are not afraid to expose to the fullest and clearest light. Sinners hate the light; they are enemies to knowledge; they love darkness; they will not receive instruction; and their deeds are such as cannot bear the light.

6. Let us not sleep as do others] Let us, (who are of the day,) who believe the Gospel, and belong to Christ, not give way to a careless unconcerned state of mind, like to the Gentiles and sinners in general, who are stupified and blinded by sin, so that they neither think nor feel; but live in time as if it were eternity; or rather live as if there were no eternity, no future state of existence, rewards, or punishments.

9 For a God hath not appointed us to wrath, but to obtain salvation by our Lord Jesus Christ.

10 Who died for us, that, whether we wake or sleep, we should live together with him.

11 Wherefore comfort yourselves together, and edify one another, even as also ye do.

12 And we beseech you, brethren, to know them which labour among you, and are over you in the Lord, and admonish you;

13 And to esteem them very highly in love for their work's sake. And be at peace among yourselves.

14 Now we exhort you, brethren, warn them that are unruly, comfort the feeble minded, warn them that are patient towards all men.

Let us watch] Be always on the alert; to be sober; making a moderate use of all things.

7. For they that sleep] Sleepers and drunkards seek the night season; so the careless and the profligate persons indulge their evil propensities, and avoid all means of instruction; they prefer their ignorance to the word of God's grace, and to the light of life. There seems to be here an allusion to the opinion mentioned under ver. 4. to which the reader is requested to refer. It may be remarked also, that it was accounted doubly scandalous, even among the heathen, to be drunk in the day-time. They who were drunken, were drunk in the night.

8. Putting on the breastplate] We are not only called to work, but we are called also to fight; and, that we may not be surprised, we must watch; and that we may be in a condition to defend ourselves, we must be sober; and that we may be enabled to conquer, we must be armed; and what the breastplate and helmet are to a soldier's heart and head; so are faith, love, and hope, to us. Faith enables us to endure, as seeing Him who is invisible; love excites us to diligence and activity, and makes us bear our troubles and difficulties pleasantly; hope helps us to anticipate the great end, the glory that shall be revealed, and which we know we shall, in due time, obtain, if we faint not. For an explanation of the different parts of the Grecian armour, as illustrating that of the Christian, see the notes on Ephes. vi. where the subject is largely explained.

3. For God hath not appointed us to wrath] So then it appears, that some were appointed to wrath; ἡς ὀργῆς, to punishment; on this subject there can be no dispute. But who are they? When did this appointment take place? And for what cause? These are supposed to be very difficult questions, and such as cannot receive a satisfactory answer; and the whole must be referred to the sovereignty of God. If we look carefully at the apostle's words, we shall find all these difficulties vanishing. It is very obvious that, in the preceding verses, the apostle refers simply to the destruction of the Jewish polity, and to the terrible judgment, which were about to fall on the Jews as a nation; therefore, they are the people who were appointed to wrath; and they were thus appointed, not from eternity, nor from any indefinite or remote time; but from that time in which they utterly rejected the offer of salvation made to them by Jesus Christ and his apostles: the privileges of their election were still continued to them, even after they had crucified the Lord of glory; for, when He gave commandment to His disciples to go to all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature, he bade them begin at Jerusalem. They did so, and continued to offer salvation to them; till at last, being every where persecuted, and the whole nation appearing with one consent to reject the Gospel; then the kingdom of God was wholly taken away from them, and the apostles turned to the Gentiles. Then God appointed them to wrath; and the cause of that appointment was their final and determined rejection of Christ and his Gospel. But even this appointment to wrath does not signify eternal damnation; nothing of the kind is intended in the word. Though we are sure that those who die in their sins can never see God, yet it is possible that many of those wretched Jews, during their calamities, and especially during the siege of their city, did turn unto the Lord who smote them; and found that salvation which He never denies to the sincere penitent.

When the Jews were rejected and appointed to wrath, then the Gentiles were elected, and appointed to obtain salvation by our Lord Jesus Christ, whose Gospel they gladly received, and continue to prize it; while the remnant of the Jews continue, in all places of their dispersion, the same irreconcilable and blasphemous opponents to the Gospel of Christ. On these accounts, the election of the Gentiles, and the reprobation of the Jews, still continue.

10. Who died for us] His death was an atoning sacrifice for the Gentiles as well as for the Jews.

Whether we wake or sleep] Whether we die or live, whether we are in this state, or in the other world, we shall live together with Him, shall enjoy His life, and the consolations of His Spirit while here; and shall be glorified together with Him in the eternal world. The words show that every where, and in all circumstances, genuine believers who walk after God, have life and communion with Him, and are continually happy, and constantly safe. The apostle however, may refer to 15 * See that none render evil for evil unto any man ; but ever b follow that which is good, both among yourselves, and to all men.

the doctrine he has delivered, chap. iv. 15. concerning the dead in Christ rising first ; and the last generation of men not dying, but undergoing such a change as should render them immortal ; but on that great day, all the followers of God, both those who had long slept in the dust of the earth, as well as those who should be found living, should be acknowledged by Christ as His own, and live together for ever with Him.

11. Comfort — one another] Rest assured that, in all times and circumstances, it shall be well with the righteous : let every man lay this to heart ; and, with this consideration, comfort and edify each other in all trials and difficulties.

12. Know them] Act kindly towards them ; acknowledge them as the messengers of Christ, and treat them with tenderness and respect. This is a frequent meaning of the word γνωστω : see on John 1. 10.

Them which labour among you] The words τοσς κοπιωσασ, have appeared to some as expressing those who had laboured among them ; but as it is the participle of the present tense, there is no need to consider it in this light. Both it, and the word ποισαμενος, the superintendents, refer to persons then actually employed in the work of God. These were all administrators, teachers, and instructors of the people ; devoting their time and talents to this important work.

13. Esteem them very highly in love] Christian ministers, who preach the whole truth, and labour in the word and doctrine, are entitled to more than respect : the apostle commands them to be esteemed, υπεραποπνευσ, abundantly and superabundantly ; and this is to be done in love ; and as men delight to serve those whom they love, it necessarily follows that they should provide for them, and see that they wanted neither the necessities nor conveniences of life ; I do not say comforts, though these also should be furnished ; but of these the genuine messengers of Christ are frequently destitute. However, they should have food, raiment, and lodging, for themselves and their household. This they ought to have for their work's sake ; those who do not work, should not eat. As ministers of Christ, such as labour not, are unworthy either of respect or support.

14. Warn them that are unwrly] The whole phraseology of this verse is military ; I shall consider the import of each term. ΑΡΑΧΩΝ, those who are out of their ranks, and are neither in a disposition nor situation to perform the work and duty of a soldier : those who will not do the work prescribed, and who will meddle with what is not commanded. There are many such in every church, that is of considerable magnitude.

Comfort the feeble-minded] Τοσς ολιγοψυχους, those of little souls ; the faint-hearted : those who, on the eve of a battle are despirited, because of the number of the enemy, and their own feeble and unprovided state. Let them know, that the battle is not theirs, but the Lord's ; and that those who trust in Him shall conquer.

Support the weak] Ανυπεροχου των αδελφου, shore up, prop them that are weak ; strengthen those wings and companies that are likely to be most exposed, that they be not overpowered and broken in the day of battle.

Be patient towards all] Μακροθυμειτε προς παντας ; the disorderly, the feeble-minded, and the weak, will exercise your patience, and try your temper. If the troops be irregular, and cannot in every respect be reduced to proper order and discipline, let not the officers lose their temper nor courage : let them do the best they can ; God will be with them, and a victory will give confidence to their troops. We have often seen that the Christian life is compared to a warfare ; and that the directions given to soldiers are, mutatis mutandis, allowing for the different systems, suitable to Christians. This subject has been largely treated on Ephes. vi. The ministers of Christ being considered as officers, should acquit themselves with the officer's duty. He who has the direction and management of a church of God, will need all the skill and prudence he can acquire.

15. See that none render evil for evil] Every temper contrary to love, is contrary to Christianity. A peevish, fretful, vindictive man, may be a child of Satan : he certainly is not a child of God.

Follow that which is good] That by which ye may profit year brethren and your neighbours of every description, whether Jews or Gentiles.

16. Rejoice evermore] Be always happy ; the religion of Christ was intended to remove misery. He that has God for his portion may constantly exult. Four Marks of good note, add to το καρις, in the Lord ; rejoice in the Lord evermore.

23 And i the very God of peace sanctify you wholly ; and i pray God your whole spirit and soul and body be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ.

24 * Faithful is he that calleth you, who also will do it.

25 Brethren, pray for us.

26 * Greet all the brethren with a holy kiss.

27 * I charge you by the Lord that * this epistle be read unto all the holy brethren.

28 * The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you. Amen.

* The first epistle unto the Thessalonians was written from Athens.

17. Pray without ceasing.] Ye are dependant on God for every good ; without Him ye can do nothing : feel that dependance at all times, and ye will always be in the spirit of prayer ; and those who feel this spirit will, as frequently as possible, be found in the exercise of prayer.

18. In every thing give thanks] For this reason, that all things work together for good to them that love God ; therefore, every occurrence may be a subject of gratitude and thankfulness. While ye live to God, prosperity and adversity will be equally helpful to you.

For this is the will of God] That ye should be always happy ; that ye should ever be in the spirit of prayer ; and that ye should profit by every occurrence in life ; and be continually grateful and obedient ; for gratitude and obedience are inseparably connected.

19. Quench not the Spirit] The Holy Spirit is represented as a fire, because it is his province to enlighten and quicken the soul ; and to purge, purify, and refine it. This Spirit is represented as being quenched when any act is done, word spoken, or temper indulged, contrary to its dictates. It is the Spirit of love ; and therefore, anger, malice, revenge, or any unkind or unholly temper, will quench it so, that it will withdraw its influences ; and then the heart is left in a state of hardness and darkness. It has been observed, that fire may be quenched as well by heaping earth on it, as by throwing water on it ; and so the love of the world will as effectually grieve and quench the Spirit, as any ordinary acts of transgression.

Every genuine Christian is made a partaker of the Spirit of God ; and he who has not the Spirit of Christ, is none of His. It cannot be the miraculous gifts of the Spirit which the apostle means, for these were given to few, and not always ; for even apostles could not work miracles when they pleased ; but the direction in the text is general ; and refers to a gift which they were generally partakers.

20. Despise not prophesyings] Do not suppose that ye have not need of continual instruction ; without it ye cannot preserve the Christian life, nor go on to perfection. God will ever send a message of salvation by each of His ministers, to every faithful, attentive hearer. Do not suppose that ye are already wise enough ; ye are no more wise enough, than ye are holy enough. They who slight, or neglect, the means of grace, and especially the preaching of God's holy word, are generally vain, empty, self-conceited people ; and exceedingly superficial both in knowledge and piety.

21. Prove all things] Whatever ye hear in these prophesyings or preachings, examine by the words of Christ, and by the doctrines which, from time to time, we have delivered unto you in our preaching and writings. Try the spirits, the different teachers, by the word of God.

Hold fast that which is good] Whatever in these prophesyings has a tendency to increase your faith, love, holiness, and usefulness, that receive and hold fast. There were prophets or teachers even at that time, who professed to be of God, and yet were not.

22. Abtain from all appearance of evil.] Sin not, and avoid even the appearance of it. Do not drive your morality so near the bounds of evil, as to lead even weak persons to believe that ye actually touch, taste, or handle it. Let not the form of it, ειδος, appear with or among you ; much less the substance. Ye are called to holiness ; be ye holy, for God is holy.

23. And the very God of peace] That same God who is the author of peace, the giver of peace ; and who has sent, for the redemption of the world, the Prince of peace ; may that very God sanctify you wholly ; leave no more evil in your hearts than His precepts tolerate evil in your conduct. The word wholly, ολωσθεις, means precisely the same as our phrase, to all intents and purposes. May He sanctify you to the end, and to the uttermost ; that, as sin hath reigned unto death, even so may grace reign through righteousness unto eternal life by Jesus Christ our Lord.

Your whole spirit, and soul, and body] Some think, that the apostle alludes to the Pythagorean and Platonic doctrine, which was acknowledged among the Thessalonians. I should rather believe that he refers simply to the fact, that the creature called man, is a compound being, consisting—1. Of a body, σωμα, an organized system, formed, by the creative energy of God, out of the dust of the earth ; composed of bones, muscles, and nerves ; of arteries, veins, and a variety of other vessels, in which the blood and other fluids circulate—2. Of a soul, ψυχη ; which is the seat of the different affections and sensations; such as love, hatred, anger, &c. with sensations, appetites, and propensities of different kinds—3. Of anima, nervi; the immortal principle, the source of life to the body and soul, without which the animal functions cannot be performed, how perfect soever the bodily organs may be; and which alone, possesses the faculty of intelligence, understanding, thinking, and reasoning; and produces the faculty of speech wherever it resides, if accident have not impaired the organs of speech.

The apostle prays that this compound being, in all its parts, powers, and faculties, which he terms σώματα, their whole, comprehending all parts, every thing, that constitutes man, and manhood, may be sanctified, and preserved blameless, till the coming of Christ: hence we learn—1. That body, soul, and spirit, are debased and polluted by sin—2. That each is capable of being sanctified, consecrated in all its powers to God; and made holy—3. That the whole man is to be preserved to the coming of Christ, that body, soul, and spirit, may be then glorified for ever with Him—4. That in this state, the whole man may be so sanctified, as to be preserved blameless, till the coming of Christ. And thus we learn, that the sanctification is to take place in, or after death. On the olution, and sanctification of flesh and spirit, see the note 2 Cor. vii. 1.

24. Faithful is he that calleth you] In a great variety of places in His word, God has promised to sanctify His followers; and His faithfulness binds him to fulfil His promises: therefore, He will do it. He who can believe, will find this thing also possible to Him.

25. Pray for us.] Even apostles, while acting under an extraordinary mission, and enjoying the inspiration of the Holy Ghost, felt the necessity of the prayers of the faithful. God requires that His people should pray for His ministers: and it is not to be wondered at, if they, who pray not for their teachers, should receive no benefit from their teaching. How can they expect God to send a message by Him, for whom they who are the most interested, have not prayed! If the race and Spirit of Christ be not worth the most earnest prayers which a man can offer, they, and the heaven to which they lead, are not worth having.

26. Greet all the brethren] See the note on Rom. xvi. 16. instead of all the brethren, the Coptic has, greet one another; reading not noticed by either Griesbach or Wetstein.

27. I charge you by the Lord—that this epistle be read] There must have been some particular reason for this solemn charge: he certainly had some cause to suspect that the epistle would be suppressed in some way or other; and that the whole church would not be permitted to hear it: or, he may refer to the smaller churches contiguous to Thessalonica, or he churches in Macedonia in general, whom he wished to ear it; as well as those to whom it was more immediately directed. There is no doubt that the apostles designed that their epistles should be copied, and sent to all the churches in the vicinity of that to which they were directed. Had this not been the case, a great number of churches would have known scarcely any thing of the New Testament. As every Jewish synagogue had a copy of the law and the prophets; so every Christian church had a copy of the Gospels and the pistles; which were daily, or at least every Sabbath, read or the instruction of the people. This the apostle deemed necessary, that he adjured them by the Lord, to read this pistle to all the brethren; i. e. to all the Christians in that district. Other churches might get copies of it; and thus, no doubt, it soon became general. In this way, other parts of the sacred Writings were disseminated through all the churches of the Gentiles: and the errors of the different scribes, employed to take copies, constituted what are now called the various readings.

28. The grace of our Lord Jesus] As the epistle began, so ends; for the grace of Christ must be at the beginning and end of every work, in order to complete it, and bring it to good effect.

Amen.] This is wanting in BD<sup>PG</sup> and some others. It was probably not written by St. Paul.

The subscriptions are, as in other cases, various and contradictory. The chief MSS. conclude as follows:—

The first to the Thessalonians is completed; the 2d to the Thessalonians begins.—DFG.

The first to the Thessalonians, written from Athens.—AB. and others.

From Laodicea.—Cod. Claromont.

The first to the Thessalonians, written from Athens.—Common Greek text.

The Versions conclude thus:

The first epistle to the Thessalonians was written at Athens, and sent by the hands of Timothy.—SYRIAC.

To the Thessalonians.—ÆTHIOPIC. Nothing in the VULGATE.

The end of the epistle: it was written from a city of the Thracians, and sent by the hand of Timothy. And to the end be praise for ever and ever. Amen.—ARABIC.

Written from Athens, and sent by Silvanus and Timothy.—COPTIC.

That it was not sent by either Silvanus or Timothy, is evident enough from the inscription; for St. Paul associates some two with himself, in directing it to the Thessalonian church. Others say that it was sent by Tylicus and Onesimus; but this also is absurd, for Onesimus was not converted till a considerable time after the writing of this epistle. That it was written by St. Paul, there is no doubt; and that it was written at Corinth, and not at Athens, has been shown in the Preface.

1. The two preceding chapters are certainly among the most important, and the most sublime, in the New Testament. The general judgment, the resurrection of the body, and the states of the quick and dead, the unrighteous and the just, are described, concisely indeed, but they are exhibited in the most striking and affecting points of view. I have attempted little else than verbal illustrations; the subject is too vast for my comprehension: I cannot order my speech by reason of darkness. Though there are some topics handled here which do not appear in other parts of the sacred Writings, yet the main of what we learn is this, "Our God will come, and will not keep silence; a fire shall burn before Him; and it shall be very tempestuous round about Him: He shall call to the heavens above, and to the earth beneath, that He may judge His people." The day of judgment! what an awful word is this! what a truly terrific time, when the heavens shall be shrivelled as a scroll, and the elements melt with fervent heat! when the earth and its appendages shall be burnt up, and the fury of that conflagration be such, that there shall be no more sea! A time when the noble and ignoble dead, the small and the great, shall stand before God, and all be judged according to the deeds done in the body! yea, a time when the thoughts of the heart, and every secret thing, shall be brought to light! when the innumerable millions of transgressions, and embryo and abortive sins, shall be exhibited in all their purposes and intents; a time when Justice, eternal Justice, shall sit alone upon the throne, and pronounce a sentence as impartial as Irrevocable; and as awful as eternal! There is a term of human life; and every human being is rapidly gliding to it, as fast as the wings of time, in their onward motion, incomprehensively swift, can carry him! And shall not the living lay this to heart! should we not live, in order to die? should we not die, in order to be judged? and should we not live and die, so as to live again to all eternity? not with Satan and his angels, but with God and his saints? O thou man of God, thou Christian, thou immortal spirit, think of these things!

2. The subject in verse 27 of the last chapter, I have but slightly noticed: I charge you, by the Lord, that this epistle be read unto all the holy brethren. This is exceedingly strange! the epistles to the Romans, the Corinthians, Galatians, Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, and Thessalonians, were directed to the whole church in each of those places; why then, after directing this, as he did all the rest, to the whole church, should he, at the conclusion, address them, by the Lord, that it should be read to all the holy brethren? that is, to the very persons to whom it was addressed! Is there not some mystery here? has it not been the endeavour of Satan, from the beginning, to keep men from consulting the oracles of God! and has he not used even the authority of the church to accomplish this his purpose! Was not the prohibiting the use of the Scriptures to the people at large, the mystery of iniquity, which then began to work, and against which the adjuration of the apostle is directed?—See second epistle, chap. ii. This mystery, which was the grand agent in the hands of mystery, Babylon the great, to keep the people in darkness, that the unauthorised and wicked pretensions of this mother of the abominations of the earth might not be brought to the test; but that she might continue to wear her crown, sit on her scarlet seat, and subject the Christian world to her empire! Was it not the Christian world's total ignorance of God's Book, which the Romish church took care to keep from the people at large, that induced them, patiently, yet with terror, to bow down to all her usurpations, and to swallow down monstrous doctrines, which she imposed upon them as Christian scriptures? Was it not this deplorable ignorance which induced kings and emperors to put their necks, literally, under the feet of this usurped and anti-Christian power? This mystery of iniquity continues still to work; and with all the pretensions of the Romish church, the Scriptures are, in general, withheld from the people; or suffered to be read under such restrictions, and with such notes, as totally subvert the sense of those passages on which this church endeavours to build her unscriptural pretensions. It is generally allowed that the Vulgate version is the most favourable to these pretensions; and yet even that version the rulers of the church dare not trust in the hands of any of their people, even under their general ecclesiastical restrictions, without their counteracting notes and comments. How strange is this! and yet, in this church there have been, and still are, many enlightened and eminent men: surely truth has nothing to fear from the Bible. When the Romish church permits the free use of this book, she may be stripped, indeed, of some of her appendages, but she will lose nothing but her dross and tin, and become, what the original church at Rome was, beloved of God, called to be saints, and have her faith, once more, spoken of throughout all the world, Rom. i. 7, 8. She has in her own hands the means of her own regeneration; and a genuine Protestant will wish, not her destruction, but her reformation; and if she consent not to be reformed, her total destruction is inevitable.

PREFACE TO THE SECOND
EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE TO THE THESSALONIANS.

For an account of Thessalonica, and St. Paul's labours there, the reader is requested to consult the preface to the preceding epistle. That this Second Epistle was written shortly after the first, and from the same place too, is very probable, from the circumstance, that the same persons, Paul, Silvanus, and Timothy, who addressed the church at Thessalonica, in the former epistle, address the same church in this; and, as three such apostolic men were rarely long together in the same place, it is very likely that the two epistles were written not only in the same year, but also within a very short time of each other. It appears that the person who carried the First Epistle, returned speedily to Corinth, and gave the apostle a particular account of the state of the Thessalonian church; and, among other things, informed him, that many were in expectation of the speedy arrival of the day of judgment; and that they inferred from his epistle already sent, chap. iv. 15, 17, and v. 4. and 6. that it was to take place while the apostle and themselves should be yet alive. And it appears probable, from some parts of this epistle, that he was informed also that some, expecting this sudden appearance of the Lord Jesus, had given up all their secular concerns as inconsistent with a due preparation for such an important and awful event; see chap. iii. 6—13. To correct such a misapprehension, and redeem them from an error, which, if appearing to rest on the authority of an apostle, must, in its issue, be ruinous to the cause of Christianity, St. Paul would feel himself constrained to write immediately; and this is a sufficient reason why these epistles should appear to have been written at so short a distance from each other. What rendered this speedy intervention of the apostle's authority and direction the more necessary was, that there appear to have been some in that church, who professed to have a revelation concerning this thing; and to have endeavoured to confirm it by a pretended report from the apostle himself; and from the words already referred to in the former epistle; see here on chap. ii. 1, and 2. We beseech you, brethren, be not soon shaken in mind, or be troubled, neither by spirit, nor by word, nor by letter as from us, as that the day of Christ is at hand. As the apostle in this epistle, chap. iii. 2. exhorts the Thessalonians to pray the Lord that he and his companions might be delivered from unreasonable and wicked men. Dr. Macknight supposes that the epistle was written soon after the insurrection of the Jews at Corinth, in which they dragged Paul before Gallio, the pro-consul of Achaia, and accused him of persuading men to worship God contrary to the law, Acts xviii. 13. This argument places it also in the year 52, or 53, in the twelfth or thirteenth of Claudius, the successor of Caligula.

As there have been some eminent Christian writers who have entertained the same opinion with those at Thessalonica, that not only St. Paul, but other apostles of Christ, did believe that the day of general judgment should take place in their time, which opinion is shown, by the event, to be absolutely false; it appears to be a matter of the utmost consequence to the credit of Divine revelation, to rescue the character of the apostles from such an imputation. Dr. Macknight has written well on this subject, as the following extract from his preface to this epistle will prove:

"Grotius, Locke, and others," says he, "have affirmed, that the apostles believed that the end of the world was to happen in their time; and that they have declared this to be their belief in various passages of their epistles. But these learned men, and all who joined them in that opinion, have fallen into a most pernicious error; for, thereby they destroy the authority of the Gospel revelation, at least so far as it is contained in the discourses and writings of the apostles; because, if they have erred in a matter of such importance, and which they affirm was revealed to them by Christ, they may have been mistaken in other matters also, where their inspiration is not more strongly asserted by them than in this instance. It is therefore necessary to clear them from so injurious an imputation."

"And first, with respect to Paul, who was an apostle of Christ, and Silvanus, who was a prophet, and a chief man among the brethren, and Timothy, who was eminent for his spiritual gifts, I observe that the epistle under our consideration affords the clearest proof that these men knew the truth concerning the coming of Christ to judge the world; for in it they expressly assured the Thessalonians, (that the persons who made them believe that the day of judgment was at hand, were deceiving them; that, before the day of judgment, there was to be a great apostasy in religion, occasioned by the man of sin, who at that time was restrained from showing himself, but who was to be revealed in his season: that, when revealed, he will sit, that is, remain a long time in the church of God, as God, and showing himself that he is God; and that, afterward, he is to be destroyed. Now, as these events could not be accomplished in the course of a few years, the persons who foretold they were to happen before the coming of Christ, certainly did not think the day of judgment would be in their lifetime. Besides, St. Paul, Rom. xi. 23—26. by a long chain of reasoning, having showed that, after the general conversion of the Gentiles, the Jews, in a body, are to be brought into the Christian church; can any person be so absurd as to persevere in maintaining that this apostle believed the end of the world would happen in his life-time?

"Next, with respect to the apostle Peter, I think it plain, from the manner in which he has spoken of the coming of Christ, that he knew it was at a great distance, 2 Pet. iii. 3. Knowing this first, that scoffers will come in the last days, walking after their own lusts. 4. And saying, Where is the promise of his coming? For, from the time the fathers fell asleep, all things continue as at the beginning of the creation. 8. But this one thing, let it not escape you, beloved, that one day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day. 9. The Lord who hath promised, doth not delay, in the manner some account delaying. Now, seeing Peter has here foretold that, in the last age, the wicked will mock at the promise of Christ's coming, on account of its being long delayed; and, from the stability and regularity of the course of nature during so many ages, will argue that there is no probability that the world will ever come to an end; it is evident that he also knew the coming of Christ to judgment, was at a very great distance at the time he wrote that epistle.

"The same may be said of James; for, in the hearing of the apostles, elders, and brethren, assembled in the council of Jerusalem, he quoted passages from the Jewish prophets, to show that all the Gentiles were, in some future period, to see after the Lord, Acts xv. 17. But if James looked for the general conversion of the Gentiles, he certainly could not imagine the end of the world would happen in his time.

"Lastly, the apostle John, in his book of the Revelations, having foretold a great variety of important events, respecting the political and religious state of the world, which could not be accomplished in a few years, but required a series of ages to give them birth; there cannot be the least doubt that he likewise knew the truth concerning his Master's second coming; and therefore, to suppose that he imagined the day of judgment was to happen in his own life-time, is a palpable mistake.

"Upon the whole, seeing the apostles, and other inspired teachers of our religion, certainly knew that the coming of Christ to judgment was, at a great distance, every ignorant person must be sensible they have been much injured, not by the enemies of revelation alone, but by some of its friends; who, upon the strength of certain expressions, the meaning of which they evidently misunderstood, have endeavoured to persuade the world that the apostles ignorantly believed the day of judgment was at hand. These expressions may all be applied to other events, as shall be showed in the next notion, and therefore they ought to be so applied; because candour requires that sense to be put on an author's words which renders him most consistent with himself."

As the term coming of Christ, has several acceptations in the Sacred Writings, and the applying any one of these to the subject to which, in a given place, it does not belong, may lead to very erroneous, if not dangerous conclusions, as it appears to have done at Thessalonica; it is necessary to consider the different senses in which this phrase is used, that we may know its specific meaning in the different places where it occurs. Dr. Macknight, in the 4th section of his Preface, intitled, Different comings of Christ are spoken of in the New Testament, has treated this subject also with considerable judgment, as the reader will at once perceive.

"In this article, I propose to show that there are other comings of Christ spoken of in Scripture, besides his coming to judgment; and that there are other things besides this mundane system, whose end is there foretold; and that it is of these other matters the apostles speak, when they represent the day of their Master, and the end of all things, as at hand.

"First, then, in the prophetic writings of the Jews, (3 Sam. xxii. 10, 12. Psal. cviii. 2—5. Isa. xli. 1.) great exertions of the Divine power, whether for the salvation or destruction of nations, are called the coming, the appearance, the presence of God. Hence it was natural for the apostles, who were Jews, to call any signal and evident interposition of Christ, as governor of the world, for the accomplishment of His purpose, His coming and His day; accordingly, those exertions of His power and providence, whereby He destroyed Jerusalem and the temple, abrogated the Mosaic institutions, and established the Gospel, are called by the apostles His coming and day; not only in allusion to the ancient prophetic language, but because Christ himself, in his prophecy concerning these events, recorded Matt. xxiv. has termed them the coming of the Son of man, in allusion to the following prophecy of Daniel, of which his own prophecy is an explication: Dan. vii. 13. I saw in the night visions, and, behold, one like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of days. And they brought him near before him

4. And there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom; that all people, nations, and languages, should adore him. His dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away; and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed. This prophecy, the Jewish doctors, with one consent, attribute to the Messiah, and of that temporal kingdom which they expected was to be given Him. Farther, they opposed, He would erect that temporal kingdom by great and visible exertions of His power for the destruction of His enemies; but they little suspected that themselves were of the number of those enemies whom He was to destroy; and that His kingdom was to be established upon the ruin of their late. Yet that was the true meaning of the coming of the Son of man in the clouds of heaven. For while the Jewish state continued in Judea, and observed the institutions of Moses, they violently opposed the preaching of the Gospel, by which the Messiah was to reign over all people, nations, and languages. Wherefore, that the everlasting kingdom might be established effectually, it was necessary that Jerusalem and the Jewish state should be destroyed by the Roman armies. Now, since our Lord foretold this sad catastrophe in the words of the prophet Daniel, Matt. xxiv. 30. And they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven, with power and great glory; and after describing every particular of it with the greatest exactness, seeing he told his disciples, ver. 34. His generation shall not pass till all these things be fulfilled; can there be any doubt that the apostles (who, when they wrote their epistles, certainly understood the true import of his prophecy,) by their Master's coming, and by the end of all things, which they represent as at hand, mean His coming to destroy Jerusalem, and to put an end to the institutions of Moses? It is no objection to this, that when the apostles heard Christ declare, There shall not be left here one stone upon another, that shall not be thrown down, they connected the end of the world or age with that event. Matt. xxiv. 3. Tell us when shall these things be, and what shall be the sign of thy coming, as everlastings; so likewise, and of the end of the age? For as the Jewish doctors divided the duration of the world into three ages; the age before the law, the age under the law, and the age under the Messiah; the apostles knew that the age under the law was to end when the age under the Messiah began; and, therefore, by the end of the age, they meant, even at that time, not the end of the world, but the end of the age under the law, in which the Jews had been greatly oppressed by the heathens. And although they did not then understand the purpose for which their master was to come, nor the nature of his kingdom, nor suspect that he was to make any change in the institutions of Moses; yet when they wrote their epistles, being illuminated by the Holy Ghost, they certainly knew that the institutions of Moses were to be abolished; and that their Master's kingdom was not a temporal but a spiritual dominion, in which all people, nations, and languages, were to be governed, not by external force, but by the operation of truth upon their minds, through the preaching of the Gospel.

Farther, that the apostles, by the coming of Christ, which they represented as at hand when they wrote their epistles, meant His coming to establish His spiritual kingdom over all people, nations, and languages, and not his coming to put an end to this mundane system, is evident from what Christ himself told them, Matt. xvi. 28. 'There be some standing here, who shall not taste of death till they see the Son of Man coming in His kingdom.' And, agreeably to this account of the coming of Christ, and of the end of all things, I observe, that every passage of their epistles, in which the apostles have spoken of these things as at hand, may, with the greatest propriety, be interpreted of Christ's coming to establish His everlasting kingdom over all people, nations, and languages, by destroying Jerusalem, putting an end to the law of Moses, and spreading the Gospel through the world. Thus, 1 Cor. x. 11. 'These things are written for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the ages are come,' means the end of the age under the law, and the beginning of the age under the Messiah. Phil. iv. 5. 'Let your moderation be known to all men: the Lord is nigh;' namely, to destroy the Jews, your greatest adversaries. Heb. ix. 26. 'But now once, as everlastings we asseverate, at the conclusion of the ages,' the Jewish jubilee, 'he hath been manifested to abolish sin offering, by the sacrifice of Himself.' Heb. x. 25. 'Exhorting one another daily; and so much the more, as ye see the day approaching,' is a day of Christ's coming to destroy Jerusalem, and the Jewish state. Ver. 37. 'For yet a little while, and He who is coming, will come, and will not tarry.' James v. 7. 'Wherefore, be patient, brethren, unto the coming of the Lord.' Ver.

'Be ye also patient, strengthen your hearts, for the coming of the Lord,' to destroy the Jews, your persecutors, 'draweth nigh.' Ver. 9. 'Behold, the Judge standeth before the door.' Pet. iv. 7. 'The end of all things,' the end of Jerusalem, and the temple, and of all the Mosaic institutions, 'hath approached: Be ye, therefore, sober, and watch unto prayer.' 1 John ii. 18. 'Young children, it is the last hour' of the Jewish state; 'and, as ye have heard' from Christ, in His prophecy of the destruction of Jerusalem, that 'antichrist cometh, so now there are many antichrists, whence we know that it is the last hour' of the Jewish state.

2. 'There is another coming of Christ spoken of by the apostles, different, likewise, from his coming to judge the world, and to put an end to the present state of things, viz.: his coming to destroy the man of sin. 2 Thes. ii. 8. 'Him the Lord will consume by the breath of his mouth, and will render ineffectual by the bright shining of his coming.' This singular event, which will contribute greatly to the honour of God, and the good of his church, being accomplished by a visible and extraordinary interposition of the power of Christ in the government of the world, is, agreeably to the Scripture style, fitly called 'the coming of the Lord;' and 'the bright shining of his coming;' but this coming is nowhere in the Scriptures said to be at hand.

3. 'There is, likewise, a day, or coming of Christ, spoken of by Paul, different from His coming to judgment, and from both the former comings; I mean His releasing His people from their present trial, by death. 1 Cor. i. 8. 'He, also, will confirm you unto the end, without accusation, in the day of our Lord Jesus Christ.' Phil. i. 6. 'He who hath begun in you a good work, will be completing it, until the day of our Lord Jesus Christ.' It is true, the release of Christ's servants from their present trial, by death, is accomplished, for the most part, by no extraordinary display of His power; yet it is fitly enough called His day and coming; because, by His appointment, all men die; and by His power, each is carried to his own place after death. Besides, His servants, in particular, being put on their duty, like soldiers, must remain at their several posts, till released by their Commander; and when he releases them, He is fitly said to come for that purpose.

4. 'Besides all these, there is a day, or coming of the Lord, to judge the world, and to put an end to the present state of things. This coming, Christ himself has promised. Matt. xvi. 27. 'The Son of man shall come in the glory of his Father, with his holy angels; and then shall he reward every man according to his work.' Now, this being a real, personal appearing of Christ in the body, is more properly, than any other of His comings, called the day and coming of Christ. And the purposes of it being more important than those of His other comings, the exertions of His power for accomplishing them, will be most signal and glorious. Hence this coming is, with great propriety, termed, 'the revelation of Jesus Christ,' and 'the day' of His revelation, 'when he shall be glorified in his saints, and admired of all them who believe.'

Thus it appears, that when the apostles wrote, there were four comings of Christ to happen, three of them figurative, but the fourth a real appearance; that these different comings are frequently spoken of in Scripture; and that although the coming of Christ to destroy Jerusalem, and to establish His everlasting kingdom, be represented by the apostles as then at hand, no passage from their writings can be produced, in which His personal appearance to judge the world, is said, or even insinuated, to be at hand. The truth is, if the different comings of Christ are distinguished as they ought to be, we shall find that the apostles have spoken of each of them according to truth; and that the opinion which some Christians have, unadvisedly, espoused, to the great discredit of the inspiration of the apostles, has not the least foundation in Scripture.

The epistle naturally divides itself into three parts, and each is contained in a separate chapter.

PART I. CHAP. I.—Contains the address, and motives of consolation in their afflicted and persecuted state.

PART 2. CHAP. II.—Is partly prophetic, and partly didactic. It contains the doctrine concerning Christ's coming to judgment; and a prophecy concerning some future, but great apostasy from the Christian faith.

PART 3. CHAP. III.—Is wholly hortatory; and contains a number of important advices relative to Christian virtues, and a proper behaviour in those situations in life in which it had pleased God to call them.

This is the shortest of all St. Paul's epistles to the Churches, but is of very great importance; and, in many places, very sublime, especially in the second part; and in this there are several very great difficulties, and some things hard to be understood. After all the pains and labour of learned men, it would be hazardous to say, the meaning of every part is now clearly made out. What increases the difficulty, is, that the apostle refers to some private communication with themselves, no part of which is on record; and, without which, it would require St. Paul's inspiration to be able to fix the sense and meaning of all we find here. May the Father of lights give the reader a wise understanding in all things! Amen.

CHAPTER I.

The salvation of St. Paul and his companions, 1, 2. The apostle gives thanks to God for their faith, love, and unity, and for their patience under persecutions, 3, 4. Speaks of the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ; the punishment of the wicked, and the glorification of the righteous, 5-10. Prays that God may count them worthy of their calling; and the name of Jesus may be glorified in them, 11, 12. [A. M. cir. 4066. A. D. cir. 52. A. U. C. 805. Anno Claudi Cesar. Aug. 2.]

PAUL, and Sylvanus, and Timothy, unto the church of the Thessalonians in God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ:

2 Grace unto you, and peace, from God our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ.

3 We are bound to thank God always for you, brethren, as it is meet, because that your faith groweth exceedingly, and the charity of every one of you all toward each other aboundeth;

4 So that we ourselves glory in you in the churches of God for your patience and faith in all your persecutions and tribulations that ye endure;

5 Which is a manifest token of the righteous judgment of God, that ye may be counted worthy of the kingdom of God, for which ye also suffer:

6 Seeing it is a righteous thing with God to recompense tribulation to them that trouble you;

7 And to you who are troubled, rest with us, when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels,

8 In flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ:

9 Who shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power;

10 When he shall come to be glorified in his saints, and to be admired in all them that believe (because our testimony among you was believed) in that day.

11 Wherefore also we pray always for you, that our Lord Jesus Christ may count you worthy of his goodness, and of the work of faith with power.

12 That the name of our Lord Jesus Christ may be praised in you, and ye in him, according to the grace of our God and the Lord Jesus Christ.

7 And to you who are troubled, rest with us, when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels,

8 In flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ:

9 Who shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power;

10 When he shall come to be glorified in his saints, and to be admired in all them that believe (because our testimony among you was believed) in that day.

11 Wherefore also we pray always for you, that our Lord Jesus Christ may count you worthy of his goodness, and of the work of faith with power.

12 That the name of our Lord Jesus Christ may be praised in you, and ye in him, according to the grace of our God and the Lord Jesus Christ.

13 And to you who are troubled, rest with us, when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels,

14 In flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ:

15 Who shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power;

16 When he shall come to be glorified in his saints, and to be admired in all them that believe (because our testimony among you was believed) in that day.

17 Wherefore also we pray always for you, that our Lord Jesus Christ may count you worthy of his goodness, and of the work of faith with power.

18 That the name of our Lord Jesus Christ may be praised in you, and ye in him, according to the grace of our God and the Lord Jesus Christ.

NOTES.—Verse 1. Paul and Sylvanus, &c.] See the notes on 1 Thes. i. 1. This epistle was written a short time after the former; and as Silas and Timothy were still at Corinth, the apostle joins their names with his own, as in the former case.

3. Your faith groweth exceedingly] The word μεγαλυνω, signifies, to grow luxuriantly, as a good and healthy tree, planted in a good soil; and if a fruit tree bearing an abundance of fruit to compensate the labour of the husbandman. Faith is one of the seeds of the kingdom: this the apostle had sowed and watered, and God gave an abundant increase. Their faith was multiplied, and their love abounded; and this was the case with some distinguished characters only; it was the case with every one of them.

4. We ourselves glory in you in the churches of God] We hold you up as an example of what the grace of God can produce when communicated to honest and faithful hearts.

For your patience and faith] From Acts xvii. 5, 13, and from 1 Thes. ii. 14, we learn, that the people of Thessalonica had suffered much persecution, both from the Jews, and their own countrymen; but, being thoroughly convinced of the truth of the Gospel, and feeling it to be the power of God unto salvation, no persecution could turn them aside from it. And having suffered for the truth, it was precious to them. Persecution never essentially injured the genuine church of God.

5. A manifest token of the righteous judgment of God] The persecutions and tribulations which you endure, are a manifest proof that God has judged righteously in calling you Gentiles into his church; and these sufferings are also a proof that ye are called in: for they who enter into the kingdom of God, go through great tribulation; you going through that tribulation, is a proof that ye are entering in; and God sees it right and just that ye should be permitted to suffer, before ye enjoy that endless felicity.

The words, however, may be understood in another sense, and will form this maxim, "The sufferings of the just, and the triumphs of the wicked in this life, are a sure proof that there will be a future judgment in which the wicked shall be punished and the righteous rewarded." This maxim is not only true in itself, but it is most likely that this is the apostle's meaning.

That ye may be counted worthy] Your patient endurance of these sufferings, is a proof that ye are rendered meet for that glory on account of which ye suffer; and in a true Gospel sense of the word, worthy of that glory: for, he who is a child of God, and a partaker of the Divine nature, is worthy of God's kingdom; not because he has done any thing to merit it, but because he bears the image of God; and the image is that which gives the title.

6. Seeing it is a righteous thing] Though God neither rewards nor punishes in this life, in a general way, yet he often gives proofs of his displeasure; especially against those who persecute his followers. They, therefore, who have given you tribulation, shall have tribulation in recompense.

7. And to you who are troubled, Rest with us] And while they have tribulation you shall have that eternal rest which remains for the people of God.

When the Lord Jesus shall be revealed] But this fulness of tribulation to them, and rest to you, shall not take place till the Lord Jesus come to judge the world.

With his mighty angels] The coming of God to judge the world, is scarcely ever spoken of in the Sacred Writings without mentioning the holy angels who are to accompany his advent. See Deut. xxxiii. 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100.

8. In flaming fire] Εσ φλογι πυρος, in thunder and lightning; taking vengeance; inflicting just punishment on them that know not God; the heathen, who do not worship the true God, and will not acknowledge Him, but worship idols: and on them that obey not the Gospel, and persecuted Christ and his evangelists; and all nominal Christians, who, though they believe the Gospel as a revelation from God, yet do not obey it as a rule of life.

9. Who shall be punished] What this everlasting destruction consists in we cannot tell. It is not annihilation, for their being continues, and as the destruction is everlasting, it is an eternal continuance and presence of substantial evil, and absence of all good; for a part of this punishment consists in being banished from the presence of the Lord, excluded from His approbation for ever; so that the light of His countenance can be no more enjoyed, as there will be an eternal impossibility of ever being reconciled to Him.

The glory of his power] Never to see the face of God throughout eternity, is a heart-rending, soul-appalling thought; and to be banished from the glory of his power, that power, the glory of which is peculiarly manifested in saving the lost, and glorifying the faithful, is what cannot be reflected on, without confusion and dismay. But this must be the lot of all who do not acknowledge God, and obey not the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ.

10. When he shall come to be glorified in his saints] As the grace of God is peculiarly glorified in saving sinners, and making them into saints, this gracious power will be particularly manifested in the great day, when countless millions will appear before that Throne, who have come out of great tribulation, and have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb.

And to be admired] Θαυμασθησιν, to be wondered at, and on to the account of, all them that believe. Much as true believers admire the perfections of the Redeemer of mankind; and much as they wonder at His amazing condescension in becoming man, and dying for the sins of the world; all their present amazement and wonder will be as nothing when compared with what they shall feel when they come to see Him in all His glory; the glory that He had with the Father, before the world was. In reference to this we may apply those words of St. John, "Beloved, now are we the sons of God; and if doth not yet appear what we shall be, but we know that when he shall appear we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is." 1 John, chap. lii. 2.

Instead of τοις πιστοις, them that believe; τοις πιστοις, them that have believed, is the reading of A.B.C.D.E. many others; the latter Syriac, Slavonic, Vulgate, and Latin, with most of the Greek Fathers. This reading is undeniably genuine.

Because our testimony—was believed in that day.] The members of this sentence seem to have been strangely transposed. I believe it should be read thus: "In that day when he shall come to be glorified in his saints, and admired among all them that have believed: for our testimony was believed among you." The Thessalonians had credited what the apostles had said and written, not only concerning Jesus Christ in general; but concerning the day of judgment in particular.

11. We pray—that our God would count you worthy. It is our earnest prayer that God would make you worthy of us, afford those continual supplies of grace by His Holy Spirit, without which you cannot adorn your holy vocation; you are called into the Christian church, and to be proper members of this church, you must be members of the mystical body of Christ; and this implies that ye should be holy, as he who has called you is holy.

Fulfil all the good pleasure of his goodness. 1. The goodness of God, His own innate eternal kindness, has led Him to call you into this state of salvation. 2. It is the pleasure of that goodness, to save you unto eternal life. 3. It is the good pleasure, nothing can please God more, than your receiving and retaining His utmost salvation. 4. It is all the good pleasure of His goodness thus to save you: this He has amply proved, by sending His Son to die for you; beyond which gift, He has none greater. In this, all the good pleasure of His goodness is astonishingly manifested. 5. And if you be faithful to His grace, He will fulfil, completely accomplish, all the good pleasure of His goodness in you; which goodness is to be apprehended, and is to work by faith, the power of which must come from Him, though the act or exercise of that power must be of yourselves; but the very power to believe, affords excitement to the exercise of faith.

12. That the name of our Lord. This is the great end of your Christian calling, that Jesus who hath died for you, may have His passion and death magnified in your life and happiness; that ye may show forth the virtues of Him who called you from darkness into His marvelous light.

And ye in Him. That His glorious excellence may be seen upon you; that ye may be adorned with the graces of His Spirit; as He is glorified, by your salvation from all sin.

According to the grace. That your salvation may be such as God requires; and such as is worthy of His grace to communicate. God saves as becomes God to save; and thus the dignity of His nature, is seen in the excellence and glory of His work.

1. It is an awful consideration to the people of the world, that persecutions and afflictions should be the lot of the true church; and should be the proof of its being such: because this shows, more than any thing else, the desperate state of mankind; their total enmity to God: they persecute, not because the followers of God have done, or can do them hurt;

but they persecute because they have not the Spirit of Christ in them! Men may amuse themselves by arguing against the doctrine of original sin, or the total depravity of the soul of man; but while there is religious persecution in the world, there is a heart wholly alienated from God, could ever devise the persecution or maltreatment of a man, for no other cause, but that he has given himself up to glorify God with his body and spirit, which are His.

2. The everlasting destruction of the ungodly, is a subject that should be continually placed before the eyes of men by the preachers of the Gospel. How shall a man be induced to take measures to escape a danger, of the existence of which he is not convinced? Show him the hell which the justice of God has lighted up for the devil and his angels; and in which all Satan's children and followers must have their eternal portion. All the perfections of God require, that He should render to every man his due. And what is the due of a sinner, or a persecutor, of one who is a determinate enemy to God, goodness, and good men? Why, everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord and the glory of His power. And if God did not award this to such persons, He could not be the God of justice.

3. The grand object of God in giving His Gospel to mankind is to save them from their sins, make them like Himself, and take them to His eternal glory. He saves according to the measure of His eternal goodness: the scanty salvation contended for, and expected by the generality of Christians, it would be dishonourable to God to administer. He saves according to His grace. His own eternal goodness and holiness is the measure of His salvation to man: not the creeds and expectations of any class of Christians. To be saved at all we must not only be saved in God's way, and upon His own terms, but also according to His own measure. He who is not filled with the fullness of God, cannot expect the glory of God.

4. Another proof of the fall and degeneracy of man is, their general enmity to the doctrine of holiness: they cannot bear the thought of being sanctified through body, soul, and spirit, so as to perfect holiness in the fear of God. A spurious kind of Christianity is gaining ground in the world. Weakness, doubtfulness, littleness of faith, consciousness of inward corruptions, and sinful infirmities of different kinds, are, by some, considered the highest proofs of a gracious state; whereas, in the primitive church, they would have been considered as evidences that the persons in question had received just light enough to show them their wretchedness and danger; but not the healing virtue of the blood of Christ.

CHAPTER II.

He exhorts the Thessalonians to stand fast in the faith, and not to be alarmed at the rumours they heard concerning the sudden coming of Christ, 1, 2. Because, previously to this coming, there would be a great apostasy from the true faith, and a manifestation of a son of perdition, of whose unparalleled presumption he gives an awful description; as well as of his pernicious success among men, and the means which he would use to deceive and pervert the world; and particularly those who do not receive the love of the truth, but have pleasure in unrighteousness, 3—12. He thanks God for their steadfastness; shows the great privileges to which they were called; and prays that they may be comforted and established in every good word and work, 13—17. [A. M. cir. 4056. A. D. cir. 52. A. U. C. 806. An. Claudii Cæsar. Aug. 12.]

NOW we beseech you, brethren, &c. by the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, & by our gathering together unto him,

2 That ye be not soon shaken in mind, or be troubled, neither by spirit, nor by word, nor by letter as from us, as that the day of Christ is at hand.

NOTES.—Verse 1. We beseech you by the coming of our Lord. It is evident that the Thessalonians, incited or deceived by false teachers, had taken a wrong meaning out of the words of the 1st epistle, chap. iv. 15, &c. concerning the day of judgment; and were led then to conclude, that that day was at hand; and this had produced great confusion in the church: to correct this mistake, the apostle sent them this second letter, in which he shows, that this day must be necessarily distant, because a great work is to be done previously to its appearing.

Of the day of general judgment he had spoken before, and said that it should come as a thief in the night; i. e. when not expected: but he did not attempt to fix the time; nor did he insinuate that it was either near at hand, or far off. Now, however, he shows that it must necessarily be far off, because of the great transactions which must take place before it can come.

2. Be not soon shaken in mind. And you too, from the word; i. e. that they should retain the persuasion they had of the truths which he had before delivered to them: that they should still hold the same opinions; and hold fast the doctrines which they had been taught.

Neither by spirit; Any pretended revelation.

Nor by word; Any thing which any person may profess to have heard the apostles speak.

Nor by letter; Either the former one which he had sent, some passages of which have been misconceived and misconstrued; or by any other letter, as from us, pretending to have been written by us, the apostles, containing predictions of this kind. There is a diversity of opinion among critics concerning this last clause: some supposing that it refers simply

3 Let no man deceive you by any means: for that day shall not come, &c. except there come a falling away first, and that man of sin be revealed, &c. the son of perdition;

4 Who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped; so that he as God sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God.

to the first epistle; others, supposing that a forged epistle is intended. I have joined the two senses.

The word σαλευθήσεται, to be shaken, signifies to be agitated as a ship at sea in a storm; and strongly marks the confusion and distress which the Thessalonians had felt in their false apprehension of this coming of Christ.

As that the day of Christ is at hand. In the Preface to this epistle, I have given a general view of the meaning of the phrase the coming of Christ. Now, the question is, whether does the apostle mean the coming of Christ to execute judgment upon the Jews, and to destroy their polity; or His coming, at the end of time, to judge the world? There are certainly many expressions in the following verses, that may be applied indifferently to either; and some seem to apply to the one, and not to the other; and yet, the whole can scarcely be so interpreted as to suit any one of these comings exclusively. This is precisely the case with the predictions of our Lord, relative to these great events; one is used to point out and illustrate the other. On this ground, I am led to think that the apostle, in the following, (confessedly obscure words,) has both these in view, speaking of none of them exclusively; for it is the custom of the inspired penmen, or rather of that Spirit by which they spoke, to point out as many certain events by one prediction, as it was possible to do; and to choose the figures, metaphors, and similes accordingly; and thus, from the beginning, God has pointed out the things that were not, by the things that then existed; making the one the types or signifiers of the other. As the apostle spoke by the same Spirit, he most probably followed the same plan; and thus the following prophecy is to be interpreted and understood.

5 Remember ye not, that, when I was yet with you, I told you these things?

6 And now ye know what he withholdeth that he might be revealed in his time.

7 For the mystery of iniquity doth already work: only he who now letteth will let until he be taken out of the way.

8 And then shall that Wicked be revealed, whom the Lord shall consume with the Spirit of his mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness of his coming:

9 Even him, whose coming is after the working of Satan with all power and signs and lying wonders,

10 And with all deceivableness of unrighteousness in them that perish; because they received not the love of the truth, that they might be saved.

11 And for this cause God shall send them strong delusion, that they should believe a lie:

3. Except there come a falling away first] We have the original word apostasia, in our word apostacy; and by this term, we understand a dereliction of the essential principles of religious truth; either a total abandonment of Christianity itself, or such a corruption of its doctrines, as renders the whole system completely inefficient to salvation. But what this apostacy means, is a question which has not yet, and perhaps never will be answered to general satisfaction. At present, I shall content myself with making a few literal remarks on this obscure prophecy; and afterward give the opinions of learned men on its principal parts.

That man of sin] Ο ανθρωπος της αμαρτιας; the same as the Hebrew expresses, by פנ פנ ישא אעז, and כליקו פנ ישא בליל; the perverse, obstinate, and iniquitous man. It is worthy of remark, that, among the rabbins, Samael, or the devil, is called פנ פנ כליקו ישא ישא בליל ish belial veish avel, the man of Belial, and the man of iniquity; and that these titles are given to Adam after his fall.

The son of perdition] Ο υιος της απωλειας, the son of destruction, the same epithet that is given to Judas Iscariot, John xvii. 12. where see the note. The son of perdition, and the man of sin; or, as some excellent MSS. and Versions, with several of the Fathers read, ανθρωπος της αμαρτιας, the lawless man, see ver. 8. must mean the same person or thing. It is also remarkable, that the wicked Jews are styled by Isaiah, chap. l. 4. בנים משחיתים benim meshachitim, "children of perdition;" persons who destroy themselves and destroy others.

4. Who opposeth and exalteth] He stands against, and exalts himself above all Divine authority; and above every object of adoration; and every institution, relative to Divine worship, αβασα; himself being the source whence must originate all the doctrines of religion; and all its rites and ceremonies: so that sitting in the temple of God, having the highest place and authority in the Christian church, he acts as God, taking upon himself God's titles and attributes, and arrogates to himself the authority that belongs to the Most High.

The words ο θεος, as God, are wanting in ABD, many others. Erpen's Arabic, the Coptic, Sahidic, Ethiopic, Armenian, the Vulgate, some copies of the Itala, and the chief of the Greek Fathers. Griesbach has left them out of the text, and Professor White says, certissimè delenda: they should most certainly be erased. There is indeed no evidence of their being authentic, and the text reads much better without them: So that he sitteth in the temple of God, &c.

5. I told you these things] In several parts of this description of the man of sin, the apostle alludes to a conversation which had taken place between him and the members of his church, when he was at Thessalonica; and this one circumstance will account for much of the obscurity, that is in these verses. Besides, the apostle appears to speak with great caution, and does not at all wish to publish what he had communicated to them: the hints which he drops were sufficient to call the whole to their remembrance.

6. And now ye know what withholdeth] I told you this among other things; I informed you what it was that prevented this man of sin, this son of perdition, from revealing himself fully.

7. For the mystery of iniquity doth already work] There is a system of corrupt doctrine which will lead to the general apostacy, already in existence: but it is a mystery: it is as yet hidden; it dare not show itself because of that which hindereth, or withholdeth. But, when that which now restraineth be taken out of the way, then shall that wicked one be revealed: it will then be manifest who he is, and what he is.—See the observations at the end of this chapter.

8. Whom the Lord shall consume] He shall blast him so, that he shall wither and die away; and this shall be done by the Spirit of His mouth; the words of eternal life, the true doctrine of the Gospel of Jesus; this shall be the instrument used to destroy this man of sin: therefore, it is evident his death will not be a sudden but a gradual one; because, it is by the preaching of the truth that he is to be exposed, overthrown, and finally destroyed.

The brightness of his coming] This may refer to that full manifestation of the truth which had been obscured and kept under by the exaltation of this man of sin.

12 That they all might be damned who believed not the truth, but had pleasure in unrighteousness:

13 But we are bound to give thanks always to God for you, brethren, beloved of the Lord, because God hath from the beginning chosen you to salvation, through sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth:

14 Whereunto he called you by our Gospel, to the obtaining of the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ.

15 Therefore, brethren, stand fast and hold the traditions which ye have been taught, whether by word, or our epistle.

16 Now our Lord Jesus Christ himself, and God, even our Father, which hath loved us, and hath given us everlasting consolation and good hope through grace, 17 Comfort your hearts, and stablish you in every good word and work.

9. Whose coming is after the working of Satan] The operation of God's Spirit sends his messengers; the operation of Satan's spirit sends his emissaries. The one comes ανωψυχιαυ rev Οσο, after, or according to the energy, or inward powerful working of God; the other comes ανωψυχιαυ rev Ζαρωα, according to the energy, or inward working of Satan.

With all power] Πανω δυναται, all kinds of miracles, like the Egyptian magicians. And signs and lying wonders; the word lying may be applied to the whole of these: they were lying miracles, lying signs, and lying wonders: only appearances of what was real; and done to give credit to his presumption and imposture. Whereas God sent his messengers with real miracles, real signs, and real wonders; such, Satan cannot produce.

10. And with all deceivableness of unrighteousness] With every art that cunning can invent, and unrighteousness suggest, in order to delude and deceive.

In them that perish] Εσ τοις απωλλασσοις, among them that are destroyed, and they are destroyed and perish because they would not receive the love of the truth, that they might be saved. So, they perish because they obstinately refuse to be saved; and receive a lie in preference to the truth. This has been true of all the Jews, from the days of the apostle until now.

11. God shall send them strong delusion] For this very cause, that they would not receive the love of the truth, he had pleasure in unrighteousness; therefore, God permits strong delusion to occupy their minds; so that they believe a lie rather than the truth; prefer false apostles, and their erroneous doctrines, to the pure truths of the Gospel, brought to them by the well accredited messengers of God: being ever ready to receive any false Messiah, while they systematically, and virulently, reject the true one.

12. That they all might be damned] Ινα πασαν, as if they may all be condemned who believed not the truth, when it was proclaimed to them; but took pleasure in unrighteousness, preferring that to the way of holiness. Their condemnation was the effect of their refusal to believe the truth; and they refused to believe it because they loved their sins. For a farther, and more pointed, illustration of the preceding verses, see at the conclusion of this chapter.

13 and 14. God hath from the beginning chosen you to salvation] In your calling, God has shown the purpose that he had formed from the beginning, to call the Gentiles to the same privileges with the Jews; not through circumstances, and the observance of the Mosaic law, but by faith in Christ Jesus; but this simple way of salvation referred to the mass end, holiness; without which no man, whether Jew or Gentile, can see the Lord.

Let us observe the order of Divine grace in this business: 1. They were to hear the truth; the doctrines of the Gospel. 2. They were to believe this truth, when they heard it preached. 3. They were to receive the Spirit of God, in believing the truth. 4. The Spirit was to sanctify their souls; produce an inward holiness, which was to lead to all outward conformity to God—5. All this constituted their justification; that being fitted for the inheritance among the saints in light. 4. They were to obtain the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ; that state of felicity for which they were steeled, by being saved here from their sins, and by being sanctified by the Spirit of God.

15. Therefore, brethren, stand fast] Their obtaining eternal glory, depended on their faithfulness to the grace of God; for this calling did not necessarily and irresistibly end in faith; nor their faith, to the sanctification of the Spirit, nor their sanctification of the Spirit, to the glory of our Lord Jesus. Had they not attended to the calling, they could not have believed; had they not believed, they could not have been sanctified; had they not been sanctified, they could not have been glorified. All these things depended on each other, they were stages of the great journey; and at any of these stages they might have halted, and never finished their Christian race.

Hold the traditions which ye have been taught] The word traditions, which we render tradition, signifies an, thing delivered in the way of teaching; and here meant obviously means the doctrines delivered by the apostle to the Thessalonians; whether in his preaching, private conversation, or by these epistles; and particularly the first epistle, as the apostle here states. Whatever these traditions were, as to their matter, they were a revelation from God; for they came by men who spoke and acted under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit; and on this ground, the passage here can never, with any propriety, be brought to support the unapostolical, and antapostolical traditions of the Romish church; these being matters which are, confessedly, not taken from either Testament; nor were spoken either by a prophet or an apostle.

16. Now our Lord Jesus) As all your grace came from God through Christ, so the power that is necessary to strengthen and confirm you unto the end, must come in the same way.

Everlasting consolation) Παράκλησις αἰώνιος, the glad tidings of the Gospel; and the comfort which ye have received through believing; a gift which God had in His original purpose, in reference to the Gentiles; a purpose which was respected all times and places; and which shall continue to the conclusion of time; for the Gospel is everlasting, and shall not be superseded by any other dispensation. It is the best and best which God has provided for man; and it is good tidings, everlasting consolation; a complete system of complete peace and happiness. The words may also refer to the happiness which the believing Thessalonians then possessed.

And good hope through grace) The hope of the Gospel was the resurrection of the body, and the final glorification of it, and the soul, throughout eternity. This was the good hope which the Thessalonians had; not a hope that they should be rewarded or sanctified, &c. Pardon and holiness they enjoyed, therefore they were no objects of hope; but the resurrection of the body, and eternal glory, were necessarily future; hence they had in expectation; these they hoped for; and through the grace which they had already received, they had good hope, a well-grounded expectation, of this glorious state.

17. Comfort your hearts) Keep your souls ever under the influence of His Holy Spirit; and establish you; confirm and strengthen you in your belief of every good word, or doctrine, which we have delivered unto you; and in the practice of every good work, recommended and enjoyed by the doctrines of the Gospel.

It is not enough that we believe the truth; we must live the truth. Antinomianism says, "Believe the doctrines, and ye are safe." The testimony borne by the Gospel is—believe, see, obey: none of these can subsist without the other. The sith of a devil may exist without loving obedience; but the sith of a true believer worketh by love; and this faith and love have not respect to some one commandment, but to all; or God writes His whole law on the heart of every genuine Christian; and gives him that love which is the fulfilling of his law.

The reader will have observed, that, in going through this chapter, while examining the import of every leading word, I have avoided fixing any specific meaning to terms: the apostasy, or falling away, the man of sin; son of perdition; sin who sitteth; or withholdeth, &c. The reason is, I have found it extremely difficult to fix any sense to my own satisfaction; and, it was natural for me to think that, if I could not satisfy myself, it was not likely I could satisfy my readers: but, as something should be said relative to the persons and things intended by the apostle, I choose to give rather than others have said, than attempt any new mode of interpretation. The great variety of explanations given by wise and learned men, only prove the difficulty of the place.

1. The general rule of Protestant writers understand the whole as referring to the popes, and church of Rome; or the whole system of the papacy.—2. Others think that the defection of the Jewish nation, from their allegiance to the Roman emperor, is what is to be understood by the apostasy, or falling off; and that all the other terms refer to the destruction of Jerusalem.—3. The Fathers understood the antichrist to be intended; and that of this person they seem to have formed no specific idea.—4. Dr. Hammond refers the apostasy to the defection of the primitive Christians to the Gnostic heresy; and supposes that, by the man of sin, and son of perdition, Simon Magus is meant.—5. Grotius applies the whole to Cæsar.—6. Wetstein applies the apostasy to the rebellion and slaughter of the three princes that were proclaimed by the Roman armies, previously to the reign of Vespasian; and supposes Titus, and the Flavian family, to be intended by the man of sin, and son of perdition.—7. Schoettgen contends, strongly, that the whole refers to the case of the Jews. Incited to rebellion by the scribes and Pharisees; and to the utter and total destruction of the Rabbinic and Pharisaic system; and links he finds something in their spirit and conduct, and in that has happened to them, to illustrate every word in this prophecy. Dr. Whitby is nearly of the same sentiments.—

Calmét follows, in the main, the interpretation given by the ancient Fathers; and wonders at the want of candour in the Protestant writers, who have gleaned up every abusive tale against the bishops and church of Rome; and asks them, would they be willing that the Catholics should credit all the aspersions cast on Protestantism by its enemies? 9. Bishop Newton has examined the whole prophecy with his usual skill and judgment. The sum of what he says, as abridged by Dr. Hall, I think it right to subjoin. The principal part of modern commentators follow his steps. He applies the whole to the Romish church: the apostasy, its defection from the pure doctrines of Christianity; and the man of sin, &c. the general succession of the popes of Rome. But we must hear him for himself, as he takes up the subject in the order of the verses.

3. 4. For that day shall not come, except, &c.—The day of Christ shall not come, except there come the apostasy first. The apostasy here described, is plainly not of a civil, but of a religious nature; not a revolt from the government, but a defection from the true religion and worship. In the original, it is the apostasy, with an article to give it an emphasis: the article being added, signifies, "that famous, and before-mentioned prophecy." So likewise is the man of sin, with the like article, and the like emphasis. If, then, the notion of the man of sin be derived from any ancient prophet, it must be derived from Dan. vii. 25. and ix. 26. Any man may be satisfied that St. Paul alluded to Daniel's description, because he has not only borrowed the same ideas, but has even adopted some of the phrases and expressions. The man of sin, may signify either a single man, or a succession of men; a succession of men being meant in Daniel, it is probable that the same was intended here also. It is the more probable, because a single man appears hardly sufficient for the work here assigned; and it is agreeable to the phraseology of Scripture, and especially to that of the prophets, to speak of a body, or number of men, under the character of one: thus, a king, Dan. vii. 8. Rev. xvii. is used for a succession of kings. The man of sin being to be expressed from Dan. vii. 24. according to the Greek translation, he shall exceed in evil all that went before him; and he may fulfil the character either by promoting wickedness in general, or by advancing idolatry in particular, as the word sin signifies frequently in Scripture. The son of perdition is also the denomination of the traitor Judas, John xvii. 12. which implies, that the man of sin should be like Judas, a false apostle; like him, betray Christ; and like him, be devoted to destruction. Who opposeth, &c. is manifestly copied from Daniel, He shall exalt himself, &c. The features exactly resemble each other: He opposeth, and exalteth himself above all; or, according to the Greek, above every one that is called God, or that is worshipped. The Greek word for worshipped, is εὐσεβῶσα, alluding to the Greek title of the Roman emperors, εὐσεβῶσα, which signifies august, or venerable. He shall oppose; for the prophets speak of things future, as present: he shall oppose, and exalt himself, not only above inferior magistrates, (who are sometimes called gods in Holy Writ,) but even above the greatest emperors; and shall arrogate to himself Divine honours. So that he, as God, sitteth in the temple, &c. By the temple of God, the apostle could not well mean the temple of Jerusalem, because that, he knew, would be destroyed within a few years. After the death of Christ, the temple of Jerusalem is never called by the apostles the temple of God; and if, at any time, they make mention of the house, or temple of God, they mean the church in general, or every particular believer. Whoever will consult 1 Cor. iii. 16, 17. 2 Cor. vi. 16. 1 Tim. iii. 15. Rev. iii. 12. will want no examples to prove, that, under the Gospel dispensation, the temple of God is the church of Christ; and the man of sin's sitting, &c. implies his ruling and presiding there; and sitting there as God, implies his claiming Divine authority in things spiritual as well as temporal; and showing himself that he is God, implies his doing it with ostentation.

5, 6, 7. Remember ye not, &c.—The apostle thought it part of his duty, as he made it a part of his preaching and doctrine, to forewarn his new converts of the grand apostasy that would infect the church, even while he was at Thessalonica. From these verses, it appears that the man of sin was not then revealed; his time was not yet come; or the season of his manifestation. The mystery of iniquity was indeed already working: the seeds of corruption were sown; but they were not grown up to maturity: the man of sin was yet hardly conceived in the womb; it must be some time before he could be brought forth; there was some obstacle that hindered his appearing. What this was we cannot determine with absolute certainty, at so great a distance of time; but, if we may rely upon the concurrent testimony of the Fathers, it was the Roman empire. Most probably it was somewhat relating to the higher powers, because the apostle observes such caution; he mentioned it in discourse, but would not commit it to writing.

8. Then shall that Wicked be revealed.—When the obstacle, mentioned in the preceding verse, should be removed, then shall that Wicked, &c. Nothing can be plainer than that the lawless (ἀνομος), as the Greek signifies, the wicked one, here mentioned, and the man of sin, must be one and the same person. The apostle was speaking before of what hindered that he should be revealed, and would continue to hinder till it was taken away; and then the wicked one, &c. Not that he should be consumed immediately after he was revealed. But the apostle, to comfort the Thessalonians, no sooner mentions his revelation, than he foretells also his destruction, even before he describes his other qualifications. His other qualifications should have been described first, in order of time; but the apostle hastens to what was first and warmest in his thoughts and wishes, Whom the Lord shall consume, &c. If these two clauses refer to two distinct and different events, the meaning manifestly is, that the Lord Jesus shall gradually consume him with the free preaching and publication of His word; and shall utterly destroy him at His second coming, in the glory of His Father, with all the holy angels. If these two clauses relate to one and the same event, it is a plenasum very usual in the sacred, as well as other oriental writings; and the purport plainly is, that the Lord Jesus shall destroy him with the greatest facility, when he shall be revealed from heaven; as the apostle has expressed it in the preceding chapter.

9-12. Whose coming is after, &c.—The apostle was eager to forestall the destruction of the man of sin; and for this purpose, having broken in upon his subject, he now returns to it again, and describes the other qualifications by which this wicked one should advance, and establish himself in the world. He should rise to credit and authority by the most diabolical methods; should pretend to supernatural powers, and boast of revelations, visions, and miracles; false in themselves, and applied to promote false doctrines. Verse 9. He should likewise practise all other wicked acts of deceit; should be guilty of the most impious frauds and impositions upon mankind; but should prevail only among those who are destitute of a sincere affection for the truth; whereby they might attain eternal salvation. Verse 10. And indeed, it is a just and righteous judgment of God, to give them over to vanities and lies in this world, and to condemnation in the next, who have no regard to truth and virtue, but delight in falsehood and wickedness: ver. 11, 12.

Upon this survey, there appears little room to doubt of the genuine sense and meaning of the passage. The Thessalonians, (as we have seen from some expressions in the former epistle,) were alarmed as if the end of the world was at hand. The apostle, to correct their mistakes, and dissipate their fears, assures them that a great apostasy, or defection of the Christians, from the true faith and worship, must happen before the coming of Christ. This apostasy, all the concurrent marks and characters will justify us in charging upon the church of Rome. The true Christian worship is, the worship of the one only God, through the one only Mediator, the man Christ Jesus; and from this worship the church of Rome has most notoriously departed, by substituting other mediators, and invoking and adoring saints and angels: nothing is apostasy if idolatry be not. And are not the members of the church of Rome guilty of idolatry, in the worship of images, in the adoration of the host, in the invocation of angels and saints, and in the oblation of prayers and praises to the Virgin Mary; as much, or more, than to God blessed for ever? This is the grand corruption of the Christian church; this is the apostasy, as it is emphatically called, and deserves to be called; which was not only predicted by St. Paul, but by the prophet Daniel likewise. If the apostasy be rightly charged upon the church of Rome, it follows of consequence, that the man of sin is the pope; not meaning any pope in particular, but the pope in general, as the chief head and supporter of this apostasy. He is properly the man of sin, not only on account of the scandalous lives of many popes, but by reason of their most scandalous doctrines and principles; dispensing with the most necessary duties, and granting, or rather selling, pardons and indulgences to the most abominable crimes. Or, if by sin be meant idolatry in particular, as in the Old Testament, it is evident how he has perverted the worship of God to superstition and idolatry, of the grossest kind. He also, like the false apostle Judas, is the son of perdition; whether actively, as being the cause of destruction to others, or passively, as being devoted to destruction himself. He opposeth: he is the great adversary of God and man; persecuting and destroying by wizards, inquisitions, and massacres, those Christians who prefer the word of God to the authority of men. The heathen emperor of Rome may have slain his thousands of innocent Christians; but the Christian bishop of Rome, has slain his ten thousands. He exalteth himself above all that is called God, or is worshipped; not only above inferior magistrates, but likewise above bishops and primates; not only above bishops and primates, but likewise above kings and emperors; deposing some, obliging them to kiss his toe, to hold his stirrup, treading even upon the neck of a king, and kicking off the imperial crown with his foot; nay, not only kings and emperors, but likewise above Christ, and God himself: making even the word of God of none effect by his traditions; forbidding what God has commanded; as marriage, the use of the Scriptures, &c. and also commanding, or allowing what God has forbidden, as idolatry, persecution, &c. So that he, as God, sitteth in the temple of God, &c.; he is, therefore, in profession a Christian, and a Christian bishop. He sitting in the temple of God, implies plainly his having a seat, or cathedra, in the Christian church: and he sitteth there as God, especially at his inauguration, when he sits upon the high altar in St. Peter's church, and makes the table of the Lord his footstool; and in that position receives adoration. At all times he exercises Divine authority in the church; showing himself that he is God; affecting Divine titles, and asserting that his decrees are of the same, or greater authority, than the word of God. So that the pope is, evidently, according to the titles given him in the public decretals, The God upon earth: at least there is no one like him, who exalteth himself above every god; no one like him, who sitteth as God in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God. The foundations of popery were laid in the apostle's days, but the superstructure was raised by degrees; and several ages passed before the building was completed, and the man of sin revealed in full perfection. The tradition that generally prevailed was, that which hindered was the Roman empire: this tradition might have been derived even from the apostle himself; and therefore the primitive Christians in the public offices of the church, prayed for its peace and welfare; as knowing that, when the Roman empire should be dissolved, and broken in pieces, the empire of the man of sin would be raised upon its ruins. In the same proportion as the power of the empire decreased, the authority of the church increased; and the latter at the expense and ruin of the former; till at length the pope grew up above all, and the wicked, or lawless one, was fully manifested and revealed. His coming is after the energy of Satan, &c., and does it require any particular proof that the pretensions of the pope, and the corruption of the church of Rome, are all supported and authorized by feigned visions and miracles; by pious frauds and impositions of every kind? But how much sorer the man of sin may be extolled, and how long sorer he may reign, yet at last, The Lord shall consume him, &c. This is partly taken from Isa. xl. 4. (And with the breath of His lips shall he slay the wicked one) where the Jews put an emphasis upon the words the wicked one, as appears from the Chaldee; which renders it, He shall destroy the wicked Roman. If the two clauses, (as is said in the note on ver. 8) relate to two different events, the meaning is, that the Lord Jesus shall gradually consume him with the first preaching of the Gospel; and shall utterly destroy him at His second coming, in the glory of the Father. The former is to be accomplished in God's appointed time. The man of sin is now upon the decline, and he will be totally abolished when Christ shall come in judgment. Justin Martyr, Tertullian, Origen, Lactantius, Cyril of Jerusalem, Ambrose, Euseb. Hier. Jerome, Augustine, and Chrysostom, give much the same interpretation that has here been given of the whole passage. And it must be owned, that this is the genuine meaning of the apostle: that this is only consistent with the context; that every other interpretation is forced and unnatural; that this is liable to no material objection; that it coincides perfectly with Daniel; that it is agreeable to the tradition of the primitive church; and that it has been exactly fulfilled in all its particulars: which cannot be said of any other interpretation whatever. Such a prophecy as this is an illustrious proof of Divine revelation; and an excellent antidote to the poison of popery." See the Dissertations on the Prophecies; and Dodd, as above.

10. Dr. Macknight proceeds, in general, on the plan of Bishop Newton; but, as he thinks that the apostle had the prophecy of Daniel, in chap. vii. and viii. particularly in view, he collates his words with those of the prophet, in the following way.

3. That man of sin be revealed, the son of perdition.— Ο ανθρωπος της απαρτίας, ο υιος της απαρτίας. "The art etc." says he, "joined to these appellations, is emphatical, as in the former clause, importing that the ancient prophet had spoken of these persons, though under different names, particularly the prophet Daniel, whose description of the last horn, and blasphemous king, agrees so exactly in meaning with Paul's description of the man of sin, and son of perdition, and lawless one; that there can be little doubt of their being the same persons; but this will best appear by a comparison of the passages:

2 Thess. ii. 3.—And that man of sin be revealed, the son of perdition. Dan. vii. 21.—And the new horn made scorveth the saints, and prevailed against them 25.—And he shall speak great words against the Most High, and shall wear out the saints of the Most High.

2 Thess. ii. 4.—Who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped; so that he, as God, sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God. Dan. xi. 35.—And the king shall do according to his will, and he shall exalt himself above every God, and shall speak marvellous things against the God of gods.

2 Thess. ii. 7.—Only he who now letteth, will let, until he be taken out of the way. Dan. vii. 25.—He shall stand upon the feet of the Prince of princes.

2 Thess. ii. 8.—And then shall that wicked one be revealed. Dan. vii. 8.—I considered his horns, and behold, there came up among them another little horn, before whom there was three of the first horns plucked up by the roots.

2 Thess. ii. 9.—And then shall that wicked one be revealed. Dan. vii. 25.—And he shall think to change times and laws, and they shall be given into his hand. See Dan. vii. 25.

1 Tim. iv. 1.—Giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines of devils. Dan. xi. 38.—In his state he shall honour the god of forces, (Mahuzzim,) gods who are protectors, that is, auxiliary angels and spirits.

3.—Forbidding to marry. Dan. xi. 37.—Neither shall he regard the God of his fathers, nor the desire of women.

2 Thess. ii. 8.—Whom the Dan. vii. 11.—I beheld then, and shall consume with the spirit of His mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness of His coming.

because of the voice of the great words which the horn spoke, I beheld, even till the beast was slain, and his body destroyed and given to the burning flame.

26.—And they shall take away his dominion, to consume and to destroy it to the end.

Dan. viii. 26.—He shall be broken without hand."

After entering into great detail in his Notes, he sums up the hole in the following manner:—

"Now, as in the prophecies of Daniel, empires governed by succession of kings, are denoted by a single emblem; such, by a part of an image, a single beast, a horn, &c. of a beast; in Paul's prophecy, the man of sin, and son of perdition, in the lawless one, may denote an impious tyranny, exercised by a succession of men who cause great misery and ruin others; and who, at length, shall be destroyed themselves. It is true, the papists contend, that one person only is meant in these appellations, because they are in the singular number, and have the Greek article prefixed to them. But in scripture we find other words in the singular number, with the article, used to denote a multitude of persons; for example, Rom. i. 17. 5 deacons, the first one by faith shall live; that all just persons whatever: Tit. i. 7. 5 exorcists, the bishop set be blameless; that is, all bishops must be so. 2 John v. 7. charis, the deceiver, signifies many deceivers; as is plain on the preceding clause, where many deceivers are said to go out. In like manner, the false teachers, who desired Christ's servants, to commit fornication and idolatry, are called, that woman Jezebel, Rev. ii. 20, and the whore of babilon, Rev. xvii. 5, and in this Prophecy, ver. 7. the Roman emperors, and magistrates under them, are called carriers, he who restrained.—Further, a succession of persons, arising one after another, are denoted by appellations in a singular number, with the article: for example, the succession of the Jewish high-priests, is thus denoted in the laws concerning them; Lev. xxi. 10, 15. Numb. xxxv. 25—28. As so the succession of the Jewish kings, Dent. xvi. 14. 1 Sam. ii. 11. From these examples, therefore, it is plain that the uses, man of sin, son of perdition, lawless one, although in a singular number, and with the article prefixed, may, according to the Scripture idiom, denote a multitude, and even succession of persons, arising one after another.

The facts and circumstances mentioned in these prophecies, are, for the most part, so peculiarly marked, that they will not easily apply, except to the persons and events intended by the Spirit of God. And therefore, in every case, where several interpretations have been given of any prophecy, a proper method of ascertaining its meaning is, to compare various events to which it is thought to relate, with the words of the prophecy; and to adopt that as the event intended, which most exactly agrees in all its parts to the prophetic description.

According to this rule, though many different interpretations have been given of the prophecy under consideration, at in my opinion, will appear the best founded, which takes its prediction of the corruptions of Christianity, which can be introduced into the church in the apostle's days, did wrought secretly all the time the heathen magistrates reigned the Christians; but which showed themselves openly after the empire received the faith of Christ, D. 312, and by a gradual progress, ended in the monstrous and usurpations of the bishops of Rome, when the reigning power of the emperors was taken out of the way by incursions of the barbarous nations, and the breaking of the empire into the ten kingdoms, prefigured by the ten horns Daniel's fourth beast. Now, to be convinced of this, we need only compare the rise and progress of the Papal tyranny, with the descriptions of the man of sin, and of the mystery of iniquity, given in the writings of Daniel and Paul.

And first, we have shown, in note 1, on ver. 7. that the mystery of iniquity, or the corrupt doctrines which ended in errors and usurpations of the see of Rome, were working early in the apostle's day, as he affirms, ver. 7. and that the war of the Roman emperors, and of the magistrates under them, was that, which then, and during the succeeding ages, strained the mystery of iniquity in its working, and the man of sin from revealing himself. For, while the power of a state continued in the hands of the heathen rulers, and while they employed that power in persecuting the Christians, corrupt doctrines and practices introduced by the false church did not spread so fast as otherwise they would have done. At least they were not produced to public view as the commands of heaven, to which all men were bound to pay implicit obedience. But, after the heathen magistrates were taken out of the way, by the conversion of Constantine, and after he and his successors called the Christian bishops to sit in general councils, and enforced their assumption of vice authority by the civil power: then did they, in these councils, arrogate to themselves the right of establishing what rules of faith and discipline they thought proper; and of anathematizing all who rejected their decrees: a claim, which, in after times, the bishops of Rome transferred from general councils to themselves. It was in this period that the worship of saints and angels was introduced; celibacy was praised as the highest piety; meats of certain kinds were prohibited; and a variety of superstitious mortifications of the body were enjoined, by the decrees of councils, in opposition to the express laws of God. In this period, likewise, idolatry and superstition were recommended to the people by false miracles, and every deceit which wickedness could suggest; such as the miraculous cures pretended to be performed by the bones, and other relics of the martyrs, in order to induce the ignorant vulgar to worship them as mediators; the feigned visions of angels, who they said had appeared to this or that hermit, to recommend celibacy, fastings, mortifications of the body, and living in solitude; the apparitions of souls from purgatory, who begged that certain superstitions might be practised, for delivering them from that confinement; by all which, these assemblies of ecclesiastics, who by their decrees enjoined these practices, showed themselves to be the man of sin, and lawless one, in his first form, whose coming was to be with all power, and signs, and miracles of falsehood: and who opposed every one that is called God, or that is worshipped. For these general councils, by introducing the worship of saints and angels, robbed God of the worship due to him; and, by substituting saints and angels, as mediators, in the place of Christ, they degraded Him from his office as Mediator, or rendered it altogether useless. However, though they thus opposed God and Christ, by their unrighteous decrees, yet did they not arise themselves above every one who is called God, or an object of worship, neither did they sit yet in the temple of God as God, and openly show themselves to be God. These blasphemous extravagances were to be acted in after times, by a number of particular persons in succession, I mean by the bishops of Rome, after the power of the Christian Roman emperors, and of the magistrates under them, was taken out of the way. For the bishops of that see, having very early obtained from the Christian emperors decrees in their own favour, soon raised themselves above all other bishops; and, by a variety of artifices, made the authority and influence of the whole body of the clergy centre in themselves; and claimed that infallible authority, which was formerly exercised by general councils, of making articles of faith, and of establishing rules of discipline for the whole Christian community; and of determining, in the last resort, all differences among the clergy; and of anathematizing every one who did not submit to their unrighteous decisions. In this manner did the bishops of Rome establish, in their own persons, a spiritual dominion over the whole Christian world. But not content with this height of power, by dexterously employing the credit and influence which the ecclesiastics, now devoted to their will, had over the laity, in all the countries where they lived; they interfered in many civil matters also, till at length they reared that intolerable fabric of spiritual and civil tyranny conjoined, whereby the understandings, the persons, and the properties, not of the laity only, but also of the clergy themselves, have, for a long time, been most grievously enthralled, in all the countries where Christianity was professed.

This height, however, of spiritual and civil tyranny united, the bishops of Rome did not attain, till, as the apostle foretold, that which restrained was taken out of the way; or, till an end was put to the authority of the Roman emperors in the west, by the incursions of the barbarous nations; and, more especially, till the western empire was broken into the ten kingdoms, prefigured in Daniel's visions, by the ten horns of the fourth beast. For then it was, that the bishops of Rome made themselves the sovereigns of Rome, and of its territory; and so became the little horn which Daniel beheld coming up among the ten horns, and which had the eyes of a man, and a mouth speaking great things; to show, that its dominion was founded on the deepest policy; and that its strength consisted in the bulls, excommunications, and anathemas, which, with intolerable audacity, it uttered against all who opposed its usurpations. And, in process of time, the bishops of Rome, having got possession of three of the kingdoms into which the western empire was broken, signified by three of the horns of Daniel's fourth beast, being plucked up by the roots before the little horn, they called themselves the vicars of Christ, on pretence that Christ had transferred His whole authority to them. They also thought to change times and laws, as Daniel foretold: for, as the vicars of Christ, they assumed the power of saving and damning men at their own pleasure; and altered the terms of salvation, making it depend, not on faith and holiness, but on the superstitious practices which they had established; and sold the pardon of sins past, and even the liberty of sinning for the future, for money. Moreover, they openly made war with the saints, who resisted their corrupt doctrines and practices, and prevailed against them, and wore out the saints of the Most High; for, by the cruel and bloody persecutions which they obliged the princes who acknowledged their authority, to carry on against those who adhered to the pure doctrines and worship of Christ, they destroyed incredible numbers of them. Nay, by the terror of their excommunications and interdicts, they forced even the most powerful sovereigns to bend to their yoke: thus, with their mouth did they speak very great things. At length they assumed the right of conferring kingdoms, and of deposing princes; and actually deposed some, with the help of the potentates of their communion, who put their mandates in execution. Lastly, to render this exercise of their tyranny the more effectual, they arrogated the power of loosing subjects from their oath of allegiance; whereby they made void the most sacred of all moral obligations, the obligation of allegiance. But this impious scheme of false doctrine, and the spiritual tyranny built upon it, agreeably to the predictions of the prophet Daniel, and of the apostle Paul, began at the Reformation to be consumed by the breath of the Lord's mouth; that is, by the Scriptures put into the hands of the laity, and by the preaching of true doctrine out of the Scriptures.

"Upon the whole, I think every impartial person, who attentively considers the foregoing sketch, must be sensible that, in the bishops of Rome, all the characters and actions ascribed by Daniel to the little horn, and by Paul to the man of sin, and the lawless one, are clearly united. For, according to the strong workings of Satan, with all power, and signs, and miracles of falsehood, they have opposed Christ, and exalted themselves above all that is called God, or an object of worship; and have long sat in the temple of God, as God, showing themselves that they are God: that is, they exercise the power and prerogatives of God. And seeing, in the acquisition and exercise of their spiritual tyranny, they have trumped upon all laws, human and divine; and have encouraged their votaries in the most enormous acts of wickedness, the Spirit of God has, with the greatest propriety, given them the appellations of the man of sin, the son of perdition, and the lawless one. Farther, as it is said, the man of sin was to be revealed in his season, there can be little doubt that the dark ages, in which all learning was overturned by the irruption of the northern barbarians, were the season allotted to the man of sin, for revealing himself. Accordingly, we know, that, in these ages, the corruptions of Christianity, and the usurpations of the clergy, were carried to the greatest height. In short, the annals of the world cannot produce persons and events to which the things written in this passage can be applied with so much fitness as to the bishops of Rome. Why then should we be in any doubt concerning the interpretation and application of this famous prophecy?

"At the conclusion of our explication of the prophecy concerning the man of sin, it may be proper to observe, that the events foretold in it, being such as never took place in the world before, and, in all probability, never will take place in it again; the foregoing knowledge of them was certainly a matter out of the reach of human conjecture, or foresight. It is evident, therefore, that this prophecy, which from the beginning has stood on record, taken in conjunction with the accomplishment of it verified by the concurrent testimony of history, affords an illustrious proof of the Divine original of that revelation of which it makes a part, and of the inspiration of

With all this evidence before him, the intelligent reader will now be enabled to judge for himself, and to adopt for his own, that opinion which appears to be the best supported by circumstances and facts. The labours of the above learned men have certainly narrowed the principal subjects of inquiry; and we may now safely state that, in this very obscure prophecy, the Spirit of God had in view either the Jewish, or an apostate Christian church, possessing great spiritual and secular influence and jurisdiction. That the words appear to apply best to the conduct of many of the popes, and the corruptions of the Romish church, need no proof; but in which of these churches, or to what other church or system we should apply them, some men, as eminent for their piety as for their learning, hesitate to declare: yet I must acknowledge, that the most pointed part of the evidence here adduced, tends to fix the whole on the Romish church, and on no other.

Whatever may be intended here by the words mystery of iniquity, we may safely assert, that it is a mystery of iniquity to deny the use of the Sacred Scriptures to the common people: and that the church that does so, is afraid to come to the light. Nothing can be more preposterous and monstrous, than to call people to embrace the doctrines of Christianity, and refuse them the opportunity of consulting the book in which they are contained. Persons who are denied the use of the Sacred Writings, may be manufactured into different forms and modes; and be mechanically led to believe certain dogmas, and perform certain religious acts; but, without the aid of the Scriptures, they never can be intelligent Christians: they do not search the Scriptures, and therefore they cannot know Him of whom these Scriptures testify. The mystery of iniquity contained in this prohibition, works now, and has worked long; but did it work in the apostles' times?—Did it work in the church at Thessalonica?—Is it possible that the present crop should have been produced from so remote a seed? What does that most solemn adjuration of the apostle, 1 Thess. v. 27. mean I charge you by the Lord, that this epistle be read unto ALL the holy brethren. Why was such a charge necessary?—Why should it be given in so awful a manner? Does it not absolutely imply, that there would be attempts made to keep all the holy brethren from seeing the epistle? And can we conceive that less was referred to in the delivery of this very awful adjuration? This mystery of iniquity did work then, in the Christian church: even then, attempts were made to hide the Scriptures from the common people. And does not this one consideration serve more to identify the prophecy than any thing else? Let him that readeth understand.—See the notes on 1 Thess. v. 27. and at the end of that chapter.

CHAPTER III.

The apostle recommends himself and his brethren to the prayers of the church, that their preaching might be successful, and that they might be delivered from unreasonable and wicked men, 1, 2. Expresses his confidence in God, and them; and prays that they may patiently wait for the coming of Christ, 3-5. Gives them directions concerning strict discipline in the church; and shows how he and his fellow-labourers had behaved among them; not awaiting themselves of their own power and authority, 6-9. Shows them how to treat disorderly and idle people; and not to get weary in well-doing, 10-12. Directs them not to associate with those who obey not the orders contained in this epistle, 14, 15. Prays that they may have increasing peace, 16. And concludes with his salutation and benediction, 17, 18. [A. M. cir. 4055. A. D. cir. 51. A. U. C. 805. An. Claudii Cæsar. Aug. 12.]

FINALLY, brethren, pray for us, that the word of the Lord may have free course, and be glorified, even as it is to you:

2 And we have been delivered from unreasonable and wicked men; for all men have not faith.

3 But the Lord is faithful, who shall establish you, and keep you from evil.

4 And we have confidence in the Lord touching you, that you both do and will do the things which we command you.

NOTES.—Verse 1. Finally, brethren [The words rois and do do not mean finally, but farthermore—to come to a conclusion—what remains is this—I shall only add—any of these phrases expresses the sense of the original.

Pray for us] God, in the order of His grace and providence, has made even the success of His Gospel dependent, in a certain measure, on the prayers of His followers. Why He should do so, we cannot tell; but that He has done so, we know: and they are not a little criminal who neglect to make fervent applications for the prosperity of the cause of God.

May have free course] They were to pray that the doctrine of the Lord, b logos rov kopios, might run, roxya, an allusion to the races in the Olympic games: that, as it had already got into the stadium, or race-course, and had started fairly, so it might run on, get to the goal, and be glorified, i. e. gain the crown, appointed for him that should get first to the end of the course.

2. Unreasonable and wicked men, The word arrosos, which we translate unreasonable, signifies rather disorderly, unmanageable, persons out of their place: under no discipline; regardless of law and restraint; and ever acting agreeably to the disorderly and unreasonable impulse of their own minds.

For all men have not faith] The word wis

5 And the Lord direct your hearts into the love of God, and into the patient waiting for Christ.

6 Now we command you, brethren, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that ye withdraw yourselves from every brother that walketh disorderly, and not after the tradition which he received of us.

7 For yourselves know how ye ought to follow us: for we behaved not ourselves disorderly among you;

8 Neither did we eat any man's bread for naught; but b Or, the patience of Christ. 1 Thess. 1.3.—Rom. 16.17. Verses 11, 12, 14, 15.—c 1 Cor. 16.—d 1 Cor. 5.11.—e 1 Thess. 4.11, & 5.14. Verses 11, 12, 14.—f Ch. 2. 2.—g 1 Cor. 4.16 & 11.1. 1 Thess. 1.6, 7.—i 1 Thess. 2.10.

doubt, to be taken here for fidelity, or trustworthiness, and not for faith; and this is agreeable to the meaning given to it in the very next verse: but the Lord is faithful, who will establish you, and keep you from every evil to which you may be exposed by these or such like persons.

There are many even of those who have received a measure of the Divine light, in whom we cannot confide; they are irregular, disorderly, and cannot be brought under regular discipline: to these we cannot trust, either ourselves, or any thing that concerns the cause of God. But the Lord is worthy of your whole confidences; doubt Him not: He will establish you, and keep you from any evil to which you may be exposed by these or such like persons.

3. From evil] aro rov kopios, may be translated from the devil, or from the evil one. They had disorderly men, wicked men, and the evil one, or the devil, to contend with: God alone could support and give them the victory: He had ordained to do it, and He might ever be confided in as being invariably faithful.

4. And we have confidence] We have no doubt of God's kindness towards you; He loves you, and will support you; and we can confide in you, that ye are now acting as we have desired you, and will continue so to do.

5. The Lord direct your hearts into the love of God] The love of God is the grand motive and principle of obedience wrought with labour and travail night and day, that we might not be chargeable to any of you :

9 Not because we have not power, but to make ourselves an example unto you to follow us.

10 For even when we were with you, this we commanded you, that if any would not work, neither should he eat.

11 For we hear that there are some which walk among you disorderly, working not at all, but are busy-bodies.

12 Now them that are such, we command and exhort by our Lord Jesus Christ, that with quietness they work, and eat their own bread.

13 But ye, brethren, be not weary in well doing.

14 And if any man obey not our word by this epistle, note that man, and have no company with him, that he may be ashamed.

15 Yet count him not as an enemy, but admonish him as a brother.

16 Now the Lord of peace himself give you peace always by all means. The Lord be with you all.

17 The salutation of Paul with mine own hand, which is the token in every epistle : so I write.

18 The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen.

this must occupy our hearts : the heart is irregular in all its workings ; God alone, by His Spirit, can direct it into His love, and keep it right ; καταδύναμι, give a proper direction to all its passions ; and keep them in order, regularly, and purely.

The patience of Christ.] Such patience, under all your sufferings and persecutions, as Christ manifested under His. He bore meekly the contradiction of sinners against Himself ; and, when He was reviled, He reviled not again.

6. That ye withdraw yourselves.] Have no fellowship with those who will not submit to proper discipline : who do not keep their place ; ατακτους, such as are out of their rank, and act according to their own wills and caprices ; and particularly such as were idle and busy-bodies. These he had ordered, 1 Thess. iv. 11, 12, that they should study to be quiet, and their own business, and work with their hands ; but it appears that they had paid no attention to this order ; and now he desires the church to exclude such from their communion.

And not after the tradition.] This evidently refers to the orders contained in the first epistle ; and that first epistle was the tradition, which they had received from him. It was, therefore, no unwritten word ; no uncertain saying, handed down from one to another ; but a part of the revelation which God had given, and which they found in the body of his epistle. These are the only traditions which the church of God is called to regard.

7. We behaved not ourselves disorderly.] Our πραξιαυτων, we did not go out of our rank ; we kept our place, and discharged all its duties.

8. Neither did we eat any man's bread for naught.] We did for what we bought ; and worked with our hands that we might have money to buy what was necessary.

Labour and travail night and day.] We were incessantly employed ; either in preaching the Gospel, visiting from house to house, or working at our calling. As it is very evident that we were in the church at Thessalonica as very pious, and most affectionately attached to the apostle, they must have been very poor, seeing he was obliged to work hard, to gain himself the necessities of life. Had they been able to support him, he could not have worked with labour and travail, night and day, that he might not be burthensome to them : and as we at present presume that they were very poor, he could not have got support among them without adding to their burthens. To us, his generous mind could not submit : it is no wonder, therefore, that he is so severe against those who would not work, but were a burthen to the poor followers of God.

9. Not because we have not power.] We have the power, ωτις, the right to be maintained by those in whose behalf we labour. The labourer is worthy of his hire, is a maxim universally acknowledged and respected ; and they who preach the Gospel, should live by the Gospel : the apostle did not in his privilege, but laboured for his own support, that he might be an example to those whom he found otherwise distressed ; and that he might spare the poor. See 1 Cor. ix. 7.

1. If any would not work, neither should he eat.] This is the maxim ; and universal nature inculcates it to man. If a man will not work, he may eat ; if he do not work, he neither can, nor should he eat. The maxim is founded on these words of the Lord, In the sweat of thy brow thou shalt eat bread. Industry is crowned with God's blessing ; idleness is punished with His curse. This maxim was a proverb among Jews. Men who can work, and will rather support themselves by begging, should not get one morsel of bread. It is a minister to necessities that are merely artificial.

For we hear that there are some.] It is very likely that we had kept up some sort of correspondence with the Thessalonian church ; for he had heard every thing that concerned the state, and it was from this information that he wrote his second epistle.

king not at all.] Either lounging at home, or becoming his own master ; υπερσπακουστων, doing nothing : — αυτοβωδιατοι επισηπυακουστων, doing every thing they will, and not doing ; impertinent meddlers with other people's business ; prying into other people's circumstances, and doing offices ; magnifying, or minimizing ; mistaking, or using every thing ; newsmongers and tale-tales ; an abominable race, the curse of every neighbourhood where they find a post to religious society. There is a fine para-that man, and have no company with him, that he may be ashamed.

15 Yet count him not as an enemy, but admonish him as a brother.

16 Now the Lord of peace himself give you peace always by all means. The Lord be with you all.

17 The salutation of Paul with mine own hand, which is the token in every epistle : so I write.

18 The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen.

nomasia in the above words, and evidently intended by the apostle.

12. With quietness they work.] Μετα ησυχιας, with silence, leaving their tale-bearing, and officious intermeddling. Less noise and more work !

That—they work and eat their own bread.] Their own bread, because earned by their own honest industry. What a degrading title to live on the bounty or mercy of another, while a man is able to acquire his own livelihood ! He who can submit to this, has lost the spirit of independence, and has in him a beggar's heart ; and is capable of nothing but base and beggarly actions. The apostle's command is a cure for such ; and the church of God should discountenance such, and disown them.

13. Be not weary in well-doing.] While ye stretch out no hand of relief to the indolent and lazy, do not forget the real poor ; the genuine representatives of an impoverished Christ ; and rather relieve a hundred undeserving objects, than pass by one who is a real object of charity.

14. If any man obey not.] They had disobeyed his word in the first epistle, and the church still continued to bear with them ; now he tells the church, if they still continue to disregard what is said to them, and particularly his word, by this second epistle, they are to mark them as being totally incorrigible, and have no fellowship with them.

Some construe the words δια της επιστολης, with τοισις επιστολησι, give me information of that man by a letter : let me hear of his continued obstinacy ; and send me his name. This was probably in order to excommunicate him, and deliver him over to Satan, for the destruction of the body, that the spirit might be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus. The words of the original will bear either construction ; that in the text, or that given above.

15. Count him not as an enemy.] Consider him still, more an enemy to himself, than to you ; and admonish him as a brother, though you have ceased to hold religious communion with him. His soul is still of infinite value ; labour to get it saved.

16. The Lord of peace.] Jesus Christ, who is called our peace, Ephes. ii. 14, and the Prince of peace, Isa. ix. 6. May He give you peace, for he is the fountain and dispenser of it.

Always.] Both in your consciences, and among yourselves. By all means] Παντι τροποι ; by all means, methods, occasions, instruments, and occurrences : peace or prosperity in every form, and shape.

Instead of εν παντι τροποι, in every way, &c. εν παντι τοιω, in every place : is the reading of A'D'FG, some others ; with the Vulgate and Itala. Chrysostom, Ambrosiaster, Augustin, and others, have the same reading : May God grant you prosperity always, and every where.

The Lord be with you all.] This is agreeable to the promise of our Lord, Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world, Matt. xxviii. 20. May the Lord who has promised to be always with His true disciples, be with you. Christians are the temple of God ; and the temple of God has the Divine presence in it. May you ever continue to be His church, that the Lord God may dwell among you !

17. The salutation of Paul with mine own hand.] It is very likely that Paul employed an amanuensis generally, either to write what he dictated, or to make a fair copy of what he wrote. In either case, the apostle always subscribed it ; and wrote the salutation and benediction with his own hand : and this was what authenticated all his epistles. A measure of this kind would be very necessary, if forged epistles were carried about in those times.—See the note on 1 Cor. xvi. 21. and see Coloss. iv. 16.

18. The grace.] The favour, blessing, and influence, of our Lord Jesus Christ, be with you all ; be your constant companion. May you ever feel His presence, and enjoy His benediction !

Amen.] So let it be ! God grant it ! This word, in this place, has more evidence in favour of its genuineness, than it has in most other places ; and was probably added here by the apostle himself, or by the church of the Thessalonians.

 That the epistle was neither written at Athens, Laodicea, nor Rome, has been sufficiently proved: and that it was written, as well as the first, at Corinth, is extremely probable. See the Preface; and what has been said on the preceding epistle. I have often had occasion to observe, that the subscriptions at the end of the Sacred Books are not of Divine origin: they are generally false; and yet some have quoted them as making a part of the Sacred text; and have adduced them in support of some favourite opinions!

PREFACE TO THE FIRST EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE TO TIMOTHY.

In order to find out who this person was, it will be necessary to consult the Acts of the Apostles, where the first mention is made of him; and by collating what is there said, with certain passages in the epistle, we shall find who he was, and the probable time in which the epistle was addressed to him.

Paul and Barnabas, in the course of their first apostolic journey among the Gentiles, came to Lystra, a city of Lycaonia, where they preached the Gospel for some time; and, though persecuted, with considerable success.—See Acts xiv. 5, 6. It is very likely that here they converted to the Christian faith a Jewess named Lois, with her daughter Eunice, who had married a Gentile, by whom she had Timothy, and whose father was probably at this time dead; the grandmother, daughter, and son, living together.—Compare Acts xvi. 1—3. with 2 Tim. i. 5. It is likely that Timothy was the only child; and it appears that he had been brought up in the fear of God, and carefully instructed in the Jewish religion, by means of the holy Scriptures.—Compare 2 Tim. i. 5. with 2 Tim. iii. 15. It appears also, that this young man drank into the apostle's spirit; became a thorough convert to the Christian faith; and that a very tender intimacy subsisted between St. Paul and him.

When the apostle came from Antioch, in Syria, the second time to Lystra, he found Timothy a member of the church, and so highly reputed and warmly recommended by the church in that place, that St. Paul took him to be his companion in his travels. Acts xvi. 1—3. From this place we learn, that although Timothy had been educated in the Jewish faith, he had not been circumcised, because his father, who was a Gentile, would not permit it. When the apostle had determined to take him with him, he found it necessary to have him circumcised, not from any supposition that circumcision was necessary to salvation; but because of the Jews, who would neither have heard him nor the apostle, had not this been done: the Gospel testimony they would not have received from Timothy, because a heathen; and they would have considered the apostle in the same light, because he associated with such.—See the notes on Acts xvi. 3.

It is pretty evident that Timothy had a special call of God to the work of an evangelist; which the elders of the church at Lystra knowing, set him solemnly apart to the work by the imposition of hands, 1 Tim. iv. 14. And they were particularly led to this, by several prophetic declarations relative to him, by which his Divine call was most clearly ascertained.—See 1 Tim. i. 18. and iii. 14. Some think, that after this appointment by the elders, the apostle himself laid his hands on him: not for the purpose of his evangelical designation; but that he might receive those extraordinary gifts of the Holy Spirit, so necessary in those primitive times, to demonstrate the truth of the Gospel.—See 2 Tim. i. 6, 7. Yet it is likely that Timothy had not two ordinations; one by the elders of Lystra, and another by the apostle; as it is most probable that St. Paul acted with that respect, or eldership, mentioned 1 Tim. iv. 14. among whom, in the imposition of hands, he would undoubtedly act as chief.

Timothy, thus prepared to be the apostle's fellow-labourer in the Gospel, accompanied him and Silas, when they visited the churches of Phrygia, and delivered to them the decrees of the apostles and elders at Jerusalem, freeing the Gentiles from the law of Moses, as a term of salvation. Having gone through these countries they at length came to Troas, where Luke joined them, as appears from the phraseology of his history, Acts xvi. 10, 11, &c. In Troas a vision appeared to Paul, directing them to go into Macedonia. Leaving therefore from Troas, they all passed over to Neapolis; and from thence went to Philippi, where they converted many, and planted a Christian Church. From Philippi they went to Thessalonica, leaving Luke at Philippi; as appears from his changing the phraseology of his history at verse 40. We may therefore suppose, that at their departing, they committed the converted at Philippi to Luke's care. In Thessalonica they were opposed by the unbelieving Jews, and obliged to flee to Beræa, whither the Jews from Thessalonica followed them. To elude their rage, Paul, who was most obnoxious to them, departed from Beræa by night, to go to Athens, leaving Silas and Timothy at Beræa. At Athens, Timothy came to the apostle, and gave him such an account of the afflicted state of the Thessalonian brethren, as induced him to send Timothy back to comfort them. After that Paul preached at Athens; but with so little success, that he judged it proper to leave Athens, and go forward to Corinth, where Silas and Timothy came to him, and assisted in converting the Corinthians. And when he left Corinth they accompanied him, first to Ephesus, then to Jerusalem, and after that, to Antioch, in Syria. Having spent some time in Antioch, Paul set out with Timothy on his third apostolic journey; in which, after visiting all the churches of Galatia and Phrygia, in the order in which they had been planted, they came to Ephesus the second time, and there abode for a considerable time. In short, from the time Timothy first joined the apostle, as his assistant, he never left him, except when sent by him on some special errand. And by his officious fidelity, and zeal, he so recommended himself to all the disciples, and acquired such authority over them, that Paul inserted his name in the inscription of several of the letters which he wrote to the churches, to show that their doctrine was one and the same. His esteem and affection for Timothy, the apostle expressed still more conspicuously, by writing to him these excellent letters in the canon, which bear his name; and which have been of the greatest use to the ministers of the Gospel ever since their publication; by directing them to discharge all the duties of their function in a proper manner.

The date of this epistle has been a subject of much controversy, some assigning it to the year 56, which is the common opinion; and others to 64 or 65. A great balance of probability appears to be in favour of this latter date; and it appears to me that the arguments of Dr. Macknight and Palmer are decisive in favour of the later date. The former, in his Preface, gives a very clear view of the question.

In the third verse of the first chapter of this epistle, the apostle says—As I entreated thee to abide in Ephesus, when going into Macedonia, so do; that thou mayest charge some not to teach differently. From this it is plain, 1. That Timothy was in Ephesus when the apostle wrote his first letter to him. 2. That he had been left there by the apostle, who at parting with him entreated him to abide at Ephesus. 3. That this happened when Paul was going from Ephesus to Macedonia; and 4. That he had entreated Timothy to abide in Ephesus, for the purpose of charging some teachers in that church not to teach differently from the apostles. In the history of the Acts of the Apostles, there is no mention of Paul's going from Ephesus to Macedonia, but once; viz. after the riot of Demetrius, Acts xx. 1. for which reason Theodore, among the ancient, and among the moderns, Estius, Baronius, Capellus, Grotius, Lightsfoot, Selmasius, Hanmond, Witsius, Lardner, Peacock, and others, have given it as their opinion, that the apostle speaks of that journey in his First Epistle to Timothy. Yet, it is not mistaken, the following circumstance will show that opinion to be ill-founded:—

1. When the apostle went from Ephesus to Macedonia, as related Acts xx. 1. Timothy was not in Ephesus, having gone from that city into Macedonia with Erastus by the apostle's direction. Acts xix. 22. And in the First Epistle to the Corinthians, which was written after Timothy's departure from Ephesus, we are informed that he was to go from Macedonia to Corinth. 1 Cor. iv. 7. I have sent to you Timothy (1 Cor. xvi. 10) if Timothy be come, take care that he be among you as without fear. Ver. 11. Send him forward in peace; that he may come to me, for I expect him with the brethren. But before Timothy returned from Corinth, the apostle left Ephesus, and went into Macedonia, where the brethren above-mentioned met him, 2 Cor. ii. 12, 13. having Timothy in their company; as is plain from his joining the apostle, in his Second Epistle to the Corinthians, which all agree was written from Macedonia, immediately after the brethren from Corinth got to the apostle as account of the success of his first letter. Wherefore, since Timothy was not in Ephesus when the apostle left the city, after the riot, it could not be the occasion on which the apostle said to him, As I entreated thee to abide in Ephesus, when going into Macedonia, so do. But the journey to Macedonia, of which he speaks, must have been some other, not mentioned in the Acts. To resolve this question, we are told that Timothy returned from Corinth to Ephesus, before his departure from Ephesus, and that he was in Ephesus after the riot; but that something happened in Ephesus, which

him to follow the apostle into Macedonia; that there he joined him in writing his Second Epistle to the Corinthians; and having finished his business in Macedonia, he returned to Ephesus and abode there, agreeably to the apostle's request. But as these suppositions are not warranted by the history of the Acts, Timothy's joining the apostle in his Second Epistle to the Corinthians may still be urged as a proof that he came with the brethren directly from Corinth to Macedonia. Farther, that Timothy did not go from Macedonia to Ephesus, after joining the apostle in his Second Epistle to the Corinthians, but returned with him to Corinth to receive the collections, is, I think, plain, from Acts xx. 4. where he is mentioned as one of those who accompanied Paul from Corinth to Jerusalem with the collections.

2. When the apostle wrote his First Epistle to Timothy, "he hoped to come to him soon;" chap. iii. 14. but from the history of the Acts it is certain, that in no letter written to Timothy, after the riot, till his first confinement in Rome, could the apostle say, "that he hoped to come to him soon." He could not say so in any letter written from Troas, the first place he stopped at after leaving Ephesus. For, at that time he was going into Macedonia and Achaia, to receive the collections from the churches in these provinces. Neither could he say so after writing his second to the Corinthians from Macedonia. For, in that epistle he told the Corinthians he was coming to them with the Macedonian brethren, who were commissioned to attend him in his voyage to Jerusalem, with the collections, 2 Cor. ix. 4. and that he meant to sail directly from Corinth to Judea, 2 Cor. i. 16. As little could he write to Timothy, that "he hoped to come to him soon," when he altered his resolution, on occasion of the lying in wait of the Jews, and returned into Macedonia, Acts xx. 3. For he was then in such haste to be in Jerusalem on the day of Pentecost, that, when he came to Miletus, instead of going to Ephesus, he sent for the elders of that church to come to him, Acts xx. 16, 17. When he arrived in Judea, he could not write that "he hoped to come to Ephesus soon;" for he was imprisoned "a few days after he went up to Jerusalem; and having continued two years in prison at Caesarea, he was sent bound to Rome, where, likewise being confined, he could not, till towards the conclusion of that confinement, write to Timothy, that "he hoped to come to him soon." And even then, he did not write his First Epistle to Timothy; for Timothy was with him at the conclusion of his confinement, Phil. ii. 19, 22.

Intricate questions, and strifes about some words in the law; perverse disputings of men of corrupt minds, who reckoned that which produced most gain, to be the best kind of skillness; and, 4. Oppositions of knowledge, falsely so named. In these errors had not taken place in the Ephesian church, before the apostle's departure; for, in his charge to the Ephesian elders at Miletus, he foretold that the false teachers were to enter in among them after his departing. Acts xx. 29. "I now that after my departing, shall grievous wolves enter in among you, not sparing the flock. 30. Also of your own lives, shall men arise, speaking perverse things to draw way disciples after them." The same thing appears from the two epistles which the apostle wrote to the Corinthians; one from Ephesus, before the riot of Demetrius, the other from Macedonia, after that event; and, from the epistle which he wrote to the Ephesians themselves, from Rome, during his confinement there. For in none of these letters is there any notice taken of the above-mentioned errors, as subsisting among the Ephesians at the time they were written; which must be accounted for, on supposition that they were prevalent in Ephesus when the apostle went into Macedonia, after the riot. I am, therefore, of opinion, that the first to Timothy, which the apostle desired him to abide in Ephesus, for the purpose of opposing the Judaizers and their errors, could not have been written either from Troas or from Macedonia, after the riot, to those who contend for the early date of the epistle, suppose; but it must have been written some time after the apostle's release from confinement in Rome, when, no doubt, he visited the church at Ephesus, and found the Judaizing teachers there busily employed in spreading their pernicious errors.

4. In the First Epistle to Timothy, the same sort of persons, doctrines, and practices, are reprobated, which are condemned in the second. Compare 1 Tim. iv. 1-6, with 2 Tim. iii. 1-5; 4 1 Tim. vi. 20, with 2 Tim. ii. 14; and 1 Tim. vi. 4, with 2 Tim. ii. 16. The same commands, instructions, and encouragements, are given to Timothy, in the first epistle, as in the second. Compare 1 Tim. vi. 13, 14, with 2 Tim. iv. 1-5. The same remedies for the corruptions, which had taken place among the Ephesians, are prescribed in the first epistle, as in the second. Compare 1 Tim. iv. 14, with 2 Tim. i. 6, 7, and, in the second epistle, so in the first, every thing is addressed to Timothy, as superintendent both of the teachers and of the laity, in the church at Ephesus; all which, I think, imply that the state of things among the Ephesians was the same when the two epistles were written: consequently, that the first epistle was written only a few months before the second; and not long before the apostle's death.

These arguments appeared so convincing to Pearson, Le Clerc, L'Enfant, Cave, Fabricius, Mill, Whitby, and others, that they were unanimously of opinion, Timothy was left by the apostle in Ephesus, as he went into Macedonia, not after the riot of Demetrius, but after he was released from his first confinement at Rome. And from that circumstance, they infer that he did not write his first epistle till some time in the end of the year 64, or in the beginning of 65.—I think it was written from Nicopolis.

To the late date of this first epistle, there are three plausible objections which must not be overlooked:

1. It is thought that, if the First Epistle to Timothy was written after the apostle's release, he could not, with any propriety, have said to Timothy, ch. iv. 12. "Let no man despise thy youth;" but it is replied, that Servius Tullius, in classing the Roman people, as Aulus Gellius relates, lib. x. c. 28. divided their age into three periods: childhood, he limited to the age of seventeen; youth, from that to forty-six; and old age, from that to the end of life. Now, supposing Timothy to have been eighteen years old A. D. 50, when he became Paul's assistant, he would be no more than 32 A. D. 64, two years after the apostle's release; when, it is supposed, this epistle was written. Wherefore, being then in the period of life, which, by the Greeks, as well as the Romans, was considered as youth, the apostle, with propriety, might say to him, "Let no man despise thy youth."

2. When the apostle touched at Miletus, in his voyage to Jerusalem with the collections, the church at Ephesus had a number of elders; that is, of bishops and deacons, who came to him at Miletus, Acts xx. 17. It is therefore asked, What occasion was there, in an epistle written after the apostle's release, to give Timothy directions concerning the ordination of bishops and deacons, in a church where there were so many elders already? The answer is, the elders who came to the apostle at Miletus, in the year 53, may have been too few for the church at Ephesus, in her increased state, in the year 64. Besides, false teachers had then entered, to oppose whom, more bishops and deacons might be needed than were necessary in the year 53; not to mention that some of the first elders having died, others were wanted to supply their places.

3. Because the apostle wrote to Timothy, that "he hoped to come to him soon," 1 Tim. iii. 14, it is argued that the letter in which this is said, must have been written before the apostle said to the Ephesian elders, Acts xx. 25. "I know that all ye, among whom I have gone preaching the kingdom of God, shall see my face no more." But if, by this, the First Epistle to Timothy is proved to have been written before the apostle's interview with the elders at Miletus, his epistles to the Philippians, to the Hebrews, and to Philemon, in which he promised to visit them, must likewise have been written before the interview; in regard, his declaration respected the Philippians, the Hebrews, and Philemon, as well as the Ephesians; for they certainly were persons among whom the apostle had gone preaching the kingdom of God. Yet no commentator ever thought the epistles above mentioned were written to them before the apostle's interview with the Ephesian elders; on the contrary, it is universally acknowledged that these epistles were written four years after the interview; namely, during the apostle's first imprisonment at Rome. Wherefore, when he told the Ephesian elders, that they, and his other converts, among whom he had gone preaching the kingdom of God, should see his face no more, as it was no point, either of faith or practice, which he spoke, he may well be supposed to have declared nothing but his own opinion, resulting from his fears. He had lately escaped the rage of the Jews, who laid wait for him in Cenchrea, to kill him, Acts xx. 3. This, with their fury on former occasions, filled him with such anxiety, that in writing to the Romans from Corinth, he requested them, "to strive together with him in their prayers, that he might be delivered from the unbelieving in Judea." Rom. xv. 30, 31. Farther, that in his own speech to the Ephesian elders, the apostle only declared his own persuasion dictated by his fears, and not any suggestion of the Spirit, I think plain from what he had said immediately before, verse 22. "Behold, I go bound in the spirit to Jerusalem, not knowing the things that shall befall me there—23. Save that the Holy Ghost witnesseth in every city, saying, that bonds and afflictions abide me." Wherefore, although his fears were happily disappointed, and he actually visited the Ephesians after his release; his character, as an inspired apostle, is not hurt in the least; if, in saying "he knew they should see his face no more," he declared, as I have said, his own persuasion only, and no dictate of the Holy Ghost.

Dr. Paley's arguments are the same in substance; but he does not mention Dr. Macknight, who wrote before him, and whose work he must have seen.

The principal difficulty in this opinion is, that it necessarily implies that St. Paul visited Ephesus after his liberation at Rome; which appears so contrary to what he said to the Ephesian church, "that they should see his face no more." Dr. Paley, however, finds some farther presumptive evidences, that the apostle must have visited Ephesus. The epistles to the Philippians and to Philemon, were written while the apostle was a prisoner at Rome: to the former, he says, "I trust in the Lord, that I also myself shall come shortly;"

and to the latter, who was a Colossian, he gives this direction, "But withal, prepare me also a lodging, for I trust that through your prayers, I shall be given unto you." An inspection of the map will show us, that Colosse was a city of Asia Minor, lying eastward, and at no great distance from Ephesus: Philippi was on the other, i. e. the western side of the Egean Sea. Now, if the apostle executed his purpose, and came to Philemon at Colosse, soon after his liberation, it cannot be supposed that he would omit to visit Ephesus, which lay so near it; and where he had spent three years of his ministry. As he was also under a promise to visit the church at Philippi shortly, if he passed from Colosse to Philippi, he could hardly avoid taking Ephesus in his way. See Paley's Horæ Paulinæ, pag. 293. This, taken in connexion with the preceding arguments, can leave little doubt that the date of this epistle must be referred to a time subsequent to St. Paul's liberation from Rome, and consequently, to the end of the year 64, or the beginning of the year 65.

THE FIRST EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE TO TIMOTHY.

For Chronological Eras, see at the end of the Acts.

Dr. Lardner and others suppose this epistle to have been written in A. D. 66. See the preceding Preface, where this point is largely considered, and also the General Observations prefixed to the Acts of the Apostles.

CHAPTER I.

Paul's salvation to Timothy, 1, 2. For what purpose he had left him at Ephesus, 3. What the false apostles taught in opposition to the truth, 4-7. The true use of the law, 8-11. He thanks God for his own conversion, and describes his former state, 12-17. Exhorts Timothy to hold fast faith and a good conscience, and speaks of Hymeneus and Alexander who had made shipwreck of their faith, 18-20. [A. M. cir. 4069. A. D. 64 or 65. A. U. C. 818. An. Imp. NOTES.—Verse 1. Paul, an apostle—by the commandment of God] We have already seen that the term apostolos, apostle, literally signifies a person sent from one to another, without implying any particular dignity in the person; or importance in the message. But it is differently used in the New Testament, being applied to those who were sent expressly from God Almighty, with the message of salvation to mankind. It is, therefore, the highest character any human being can have; and the message is the most important which even God himself can send to his intelligent creatures. It was by the express command of God that St. Paul went to the Gentiles, preaching the doctrine of salvation by faith in Christ Jesus.

Jesus Christ—our hope] Without Jesus, the world was hopeless: the expectation of being saved, can only come to mankind by His Gospel. He is called our hope, as He is called our life, our peace, our righteousness, &c. because from Him hope, life, peace, righteousness, and all other blessings, proceed.

2. My own son in the faith] Brought to salvation through Christ by my ministry alone. Probably, the apostle speaks here according to this Jewish maxim, כל חסדך כן הרצון חסדך, כל חסדך כן הרצון חסדך; He who teaches the law to his neighbour's son, is considered by the Scripture as if he had begotten him. Sanhedrim, fol. xix. 2. And they quote Nunn. iii. l. as proving it; These are the generations of Aaron, and Moses—and these are the names of the sons of Aaron.—"Aaron, say they, begot them, but Moses instructed them; therefore they are called by his name." See Schoettgen.

But my beloved son, may mean my beloved son, for in this sense το υγιον is not infrequently used.

In the faith] The word πίστις, faith, is taken here for the whole of the Christian religion; faith in Christ, being its essential characteristic.

Grace, mercy, and peace] GRACE, the favour and approbation of God. MERCY, springing from that grace, pardoning, purifying, and supporting. PEACE, the consequence of this manifested mercy: peace of conscience, and peace with God; producing internal happiness, quietness, and assurance.

3. I besought thee] The apostle had seen that a bad seed had been sown in the church; and, as he was obliged to go then into Macedonia, he wished Timothy, on whose prudence, piety, and soundness in the faith, he could depend, to stay behind, and prevent the spreading of a doctrine that would have been pernicious to the people's souls. I have already supposed that this epistle was written after Paul had been delivered from his first imprisonment at Rome; about the end of the year 64, or the beginning of 65.—See the Preface. When, therefore, the apostle came from Rome into Asia, he no doubt visited Ephesus, where, ten years before, he had planted a Christian church; and as he had not time to tarry there, he left Timothy to correct abuses.

That thou mightest charge some] He does not name any persons; and the Judaizing teachers, are generally supposed to be those intended: and the term riot, some, certain persons, which he uses, is expressive of high disapprobation, and at the same time, of delicacy; they were not apostles nor apostolic men; but they were undoubtedly members of the church at Ephesus, and might yet be reclaimed.

4. Neither give heed to fables] Idle fancies, things of no moment; doctrines and opinions unauthenticated; silly legends, of which no people ever possessed a greater stock than the Jews. Their Talmud abounds with them; and the English reader may find them in abundance, in Steklis's Jewish Traditions, 2 vols. 8vo.

Endless genealogies] I suppose the apostle to mean those genealogies which were uncertain that never could be traced out, either in the ascending or descending line; and principally such as referred to the great promises of the Messiah, and to the priesthood. The Jews had scrupulously preserved their genealogical tables, till the advent of Christ; and the evangelists had recourse to them, and appealed to them as a reference to our Lord's descent from the house of David.—Matthew taking this genealogy in the descending, Luke in the ascending line. And whatever difficulties we may now find in these genealogies, they were certainly clear to the Jews; nor did the most determined enemies of the Gospel attempt to raise one objection to it from the appeal which the evangelists had made to their own public and accredited tables.

As we then certain: but we are told that Herod destroyed the public registers: he, being an Idumean, was jealous of the noble origin of the Jews; and that none might be able to reproach him with his descent, he ordered the genealogical tables, which were kept among the archives in the temple, to be burnt.—See Euseb. H. E. lib. l. cap. 8. From this time the Jews could refer to their genealogies only from memory, or from those imperfect tables which had been preserved in private hands; and to make out any regular line from these, must have been endless and uncertain. It is probably to this that the apostle refers; I mean the endless and useless labour which the attempts to make out these genealogies, must produce; the authentic tables being destroyed. This, were all other proofs wanting, would be an irresistible argument against the Jews, that the Messiah is come; for their own prophets had distinctly marked out the line by which he was to come; the genealogies are now all lost; nor is there a Jew in the universe, that can show from what tribe he is descended. There can, therefore, be no Messiah to come, as none could show, but him have what other pretensions he might, that he was sprung from the house of David. The Jews do not at present, pretend to have any such tables; and, far from being able to prove the Messiah from his descent, they are now obliged to say, that when the Messiah comes, he will restore the genealogies by the Holy Spirit that shall rest upon him. For, says Maximides, "In the days of the Messiah, when His kingdom shall be established, all the Israelites shall be gathered together unto Him; and all shall be classed in their genealogies by His mouth, through the Holy Spirit that shall rest upon Him, as it is written, Malac. iii. 3. He shall sit as a refiner and purifier of silver, and He shall purify the sons of Levi: first, he will purify the Levites, and shall say, 'This man is a descendant from the priests; and this, of the stock of the Levites;' and He shall cast out those who are not of the stock of Israel; for behold it is said, Ezra ii. 63. And the Tyritidha said—they should not eat of the most holy things, till there stood up a priest with Urin and Thumim." Thus, by the Holy Spirit, the genealogies are to be revised." See Schoettgen.

Some learned men suppose, that the apostle alludes here to the Æons among the Gnostics and Valentinians, of whom there were endless numbers, to make up what was called their pleroma; or to the sphairak, or splendours of the Cabalists. But it is certain that these heresies had not arrived to any formidable head in the apostle's time; and it has long been a doubt with me, whether they even existed at that time; and I think it the most simple way, and most likely to be the intention of the apostle, to refer all to the Jewish genealogies, which he calls Jewish tables, Tr. i. 14. to which we know, they were strongly and even conscientiously attached; and which at this time, it must have been extremely difficult to make out.

Instead of γενεαλογίας, genealogies, some learned men have conjectured that the original word was εὐλογίας, empty words, vain speeches: but this conjecture is not supported by any MSS. or Version.

Which mislead questions? They are the foundation of endless altercations and disputes; for, being uncertain and not consecutive, every person had a right to call them in question; as we may naturally suppose, from the state in which the genealogical tables of the Jews then were, that many chaosms must be supplied in different lines, and consequently, much must be done by conjecture.

Rather than godly edifying? Such discussions as these had no tendency to promote piety. Many, no doubt, employed much of their time in inquiring, who were their ancestors, which they should have spent in obtaining that grace by which being born from above, they might have become the sons and daughters of God Almighty.

Instead of οἰκοδομῶν θεοῦ, godly edifying, or the edification of God; οἰκονομῶν θεοῦ, the economy or dispensation of God, is the reading of almost every MS. In which this part of the epistle is extant, (for some MSS. are here mutilated), and of almost all the Versions, and the chief of the Greek fathers. Of the genuineness of this reading scarcely a doubt can be formed; and though the old reading, which is supported by the Latin fathers and the Vulgate, gives a good sense, yet the connexion and spirit of the place show that the latter must be the true reading.

What had Jewish genealogies to do with the Gospel? Men were not to be saved by virtue of the privileges or piety of their ancestors. The Jews depended much on this; we have Abraham our father, imposed silence on every check of conscience, and every godly reproof which they received for their profligacy and unbelief. In the dispensation of God, FAITH in Christ Jesus, was the only means and way of salvation. These endless and uncertain genealogies, produced no faith: indeed they were intended as a substitute for it; for those who were intent on making out their genealogical descent, paid little attention to faith in Christ. This dispensation, says the apostle, is by faith, οἰκονομῶν θεοῦ ἡμῶν ἐν πίστει; it was not by natural descent, nor by works, but by faith in Christ; therefore it was necessary that the people, who were seeking salvation in any other way, should be strictly informed that all their toil and labour would be in vain.

5. Now the end of the commandment is charity? These genealogical questions lead to strife and debate; and the dispensation of God leads to love, both to God and man, through faith in Christ. These genealogical questions leave the heart under the influence of all its vile tempers and evil propensities; FAITH in Jesus purifies the heart. No inquiry of this kind can add to any thing by which the guilt of sin can be taken away; but the Gospel proclaims pardon, through the blood of the Lamb, to every believing penitent. The end, aim, and design of God, in giving this dispensation to the world, is that men may have an unfeigned faith, such as lays hold on Christ crucified, and produces a good conscience, from a sense of the pardon received; and leads on to purity of heart; LOVE to God and man being the grand issue of the grace of Christ here below; and this fully preparing the soul for eternal glory.—He whose soul is filled with love to God and man, has a pure heart, a good conscience, and unfeigned faith. But these blessings no soul can ever acquire, but according to God's dispensation of faith.

The paraphrase and note of Dr. Macknight on this verse are very proper: "Now the scope of the charge to be given by thee to these teachers, is, that instead of inclothing fables and genealogies, they inculcate love to God and man, proceeding from a pure heart, and directed by a good conscience, and nourished by unfeigned faith in the Gospel doctrine. The word καταγγελία, denotes a message or order, brought to one from another, and delivered by word of mouth. The charge here meant, is that which the apostle ordered Timothy to deliver to the teachers in Ephesus; for he said, ver. 3. I had besought thee to abide still at Ephesus, ὡς καταγγέλης; that thou mightest charge some / here he tells him what the scope of this charge was to be."

Of faith unfeigned? ΠΙΣΤΙΣ ἀναποκρίτων, a faith not hypocritical. The apostle appears to allude to the Judaizing teachers, who pretended faith in the Gospel, merely that they might have the greater opportunity to bring back to the Mosaic system, those who had embraced the doctrine of Christ crucified. This is evident from the following verse.

6. From which some having turned? From which some, though they have pretended to aim at the εὐλος, scope or mark, have missed that mark. This is the import of the original word εσθραβεις.

Turned aside into vain jangling? The original term, παραλογίας, signifying empty or vain-talking; discourses that turn to no profit; a great many words and little sense; and that sense not worth the pains of hearing. Such, indeed, is all preaching where Jesus Christ is not held forth.

7. Teachers of the law? To be esteemed or celebrated as rabbins; to be reputed cunning in solving knotty questions and enigmas, which answered no end to true religion. Of such the rabbinical teaching was full.

Understanding neither what they say? This is evident from almost all the Jewish comments which yet remain. Things are asserted which are either fales or dubious; words, the import of which they did not understand, were brought to illustrate them; so that it may be said, they understand not what they say, nor wherof they affirm. I will give one instance from the Jerusalem Targum, on Gen. i. 15. And God made two great lights, and they were equal in splendour twenty-one years, the six-hundred and seventy second part of an hour excepted; and afterward the moon brought a false accusation against the sun, and therefore she was lessened, and God made the sun the greater light to superintend the day, &c. I could produce a thousand of a similar complexion.

8. But we know that the law is good? The law, as given by God, is both good in itself; and has a good tendency. This is similar to what the apostle had asserted, Rom. vii. 12—16. The law is holy; and the commandment is holy, just, and good; where, see the note.

If a man use it lawfully? That is, interpret it, according to its own spirit and design; and use it for the purposes for which God has given it; for the ceremonial law was a schoolmaster to lead us unto Christ; and Christ is the end of that law for justification to every one that believes. Now, those who did not use the law in reference to these ends, did not use it lawfully; they did not construe it according to its original design and meaning.

9. The law is not made for a righteous man? There is a moral law as well as a ceremonial law: as the object of the latter is to lead us to Christ; the object of the former is to restrain crimes, and inflict punishment on those that commit them.—It was, therefore, not made for the righteous, as a restrainer of crimes, and an inflicter of punishments; for the righteous avoid sin; and, by living to the glory of God, expose not themselves to his censures. This seems to be the mind of the apostle; he does not say that the law was not made for a righteous man; but ὡς ἵκανα, it does not lie against a righteous man; because he does not transgress it: but it lies against the wicked: for, such as the apostle mentions, have broken it, and grievously too, and are condemned by it. The word κείρα, lies, refers to the custom of writing laws on boards, and hanging them up in public places, within reach of every man, that they might be read by all: thus all would see against whom the law lay.

The lawless? ἄνομος, those who will not be bound by a law, and acknowledge none; therefore have no rule of moral conduct.

Disobedient? ἄνωματοι, those who acknowledge no authority; from a, negative, and νόμος, to subject; they neither acknowledge law, nor executive authority; and consequently endeavour to live as they list; and from such dispositions, all the crimes in the following catalogue may naturally spring.

For the ungodly? ἄσεβοι, the irreligious; those who do not worship God, or have no true worship; from a, negative, and σέβο, to worship.—For sinners, ἀσυνταίς, those who

His mercy in this beginning of the Gospel, by saving me, and making me a pattern to all them that shall hereafter believe on Christ. He is βασιλευς του αιωνου, the king of eternities; the eternity a parte ante, and the eternity, a parte post; the eternity that was before time was: and the eternity that shall be when time is no more. Therefore ever living to justify and save sinners, to the end of the world.

[Immortal] Αθάρατος, incorruptible, not liable to decay, or corruption: a simple uncomounded essence; incapable, therefore, of decomposition; and consequently permanent and eternal. One MS., the letter Syriac, in the margin, the Vulgate, one copy of the Itala, and some of the Latin Fathers, read αθανατος, immortal, which our translation follows; but it is not the original reading.

[Invisible] Απειρα, one who fills all things, works every where, and yet is invisible to angels and men; the perfect reverse of false gods and idols, who are confined to one spot, work no where; and, being stocks and stones, are seen by every body.

[The only wise God] The word σοφω, wise, is omitted by AD<sup>PC</sup>. Syriac, Erpen's Arabic, Coptic, Sahidic, Ethiopic, Armenian, Vulgate, and Itala. Some of the Greek Fathers quote it sometimes, and omit at others; which shows that it was an unsettled reading, probably borrowed from Romans xvi. 27.—See the note there; Griesbach leaves it out of the text. Without it, the reading is very strong and appropriate to the only God; nothing visible or invisible being worthy of adoration but Himself.

[Be honour] All the respect and reverence that can be paid by intelligent beings; ascribing to Him, at the same time, all the glory, excellencies, and perfections, which can be possessed by an intelligent, unoriginated, independent, and eternal Being; and this, for ever and ever: through eternity.

19. This charge] See the note on ver. 5. It was a charge like the Judaizing teachers should not teach differently from that doctrine which the apostle had delivered to him. See ver. 3. According to the prophecies] This may refer to some prophecies by inspired men, relative to what Timothy should do: and he wishes him to act in all things conformably to those prophecies. It was predicted that he should have this high and noble calling: but his behaviour in that calling was a matter of contingency, as it respected the use he might make of the grace of his calling. The apostle therefore exhorts him to wear a good warfare, &c. He was now called to that estate to which the prophecies referred: and now he is to do worthily or unworthily of that calling, according as he ought or did not hold faith and a good conscience.

Some think that the προαγγελια προφητιας, the foregoing prophecies, refer to revelations which the apostle himself received concerning Timothy: while others think that the ord is to be understood of advices, directions, and exhortations, which the apostle had previously delivered to him: we now that προφητιας, signifies to speak to men, to edification, to exhortation, and to comfort.—See 1 Cor. xiv. 3. This is a very sober, and good sense of the passage.

[War a good warfare] The trials and afflictions of the followers of God, are often represented as a warfare or campaign, see Isa. xl. 2. 1 Cor. ix. 7. 2 Cor. x. 4. and see the reasons of this metaphorical form of speech in the notes on Eph. vi. 13.

19. Holding faith] All the truths of the Christian religion; firmly believing them, and fervently proclaiming them to others.

[And a good conscience] So holding the truth, as to live according to its dictates; that a good conscience may be ever preserved. As the apostle had just spoken of the Christian's warfare; so he here refers to the Christian armour, especially to the shield and breast-plate: the shield of faith, and the breast-plate of righteousness.—See on Ephes. vi. 13, &c. and 1 Thess. v. 8.

[Which some having put away] Ανωματοι; having thrust away; as a fool-hardy soldier might his shield and his breast-plate; or a mad sailor, his pilot, helm, and compass.

[Concerning faith] The great truths of the Christian religion. Have made shipwreck] Being without the faith, that only infallible system of truth; and a good conscience, that skilful pilot, that steady and commanding helm; that faithful and invariable loadstone, have been driven to and fro by every wind of doctrine; and getting among shoals, quicksands, and rocks, have been shipwrecked and ingulphed.

20. Of whom is Hymeneus and Alexander] Who had the faith, but thrust it away; who had a good conscience, through believing, but made shipwreck of it. Hence we find that: all this was not only possible, but did actually take place, though some have endeavoured to maintain the contrary; who, confounding eternity with a state of probation, have supposed that if a man once enter into the grace of God, in this life, he must necessarily continue in it to all eternity. Thousands of texts, and thousands of facts, refute this doctrine.

[Delivered unto Satan] For the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit might be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus. See what is noted on 1 Cor. v. 5. what this sort of punishment was, no man now living knows. There is nothing of the kind referred to in the Jewish writings. It seems to have been something done by mere apostolical authority, under the direction of the Spirit of God.

Hymeneus, it appears, denied the resurrection; see 2 Tim. ii. 17, 18. but whether this Alexander be the same with Alexander the copper-smith, 2 Tim. iv. 14. or the Alexander, Acts xix. 38. cannot be determined. Probably he was the same with the copper-smith. Whether they were brought back to the acknowledgment of the truth, does not appear. From what is said in the second epistle, the case seems extremely doubtful. Let him who most assuredly standeth, take heed lest he fall.

He that is self-confident is already half fallen. He who professes to believe that God will absolutely keep him from falling finally, and neglects watching unto prayer, is not in a safer state. He who lives by the moment, walks in the light, and maintains his communion with God, is in no danger of apostacy.

I exhort—that first of all] Prayer for pardon of sin, and for obtaining necessary supplies of grace, and continual protection from God, with gratitude and thanksgiving for mercies already received, are duties which strict and dependant state renders absolutely necessary; which should be chief in our view, and first of all period. It is difficult to know the precise difference between our words used here by the apostle. They are sometimes translated thus: [supplications] Δησεις, prayers for averting evils of every

It is probable that the apostle gives directions here public worship; and that the words may be thus parsed: "New I exhort, first of all, that in the public services, deprecations of evils, and supplications for such things as are necessary; and intercessions for their nation, and thanksgiving for mercies, be offered in behalf of all men; for heathens as well as for Christians; and enemies as well as for friends."—See Macknight.

[For kings] As it is a positive maxim of Christianity to for all secular governors; so it has ever been the practice of Christians. When St. Cyprian defended himself before Roman preagnal, he said, Hunc (Dowm) deprecmur—pro nobis et pro omnibus hominibus; et pro incoluntate ipsorum Imperatorum: "We pray to God, not only for ourselves, but for all mankind, and particularly for the emperors."

Tertullian in his Apology, is more particular; Oramus pro omnibus Imperatoribus, vitam illis proliam, imperium securum domum tutam, exercitus fortes, senatum fidelem, populum probum, orbem quietum, et quacunq;ue hominis, et Caesaris vota sunt. Apol. cap. 30. "We pray for all the emperors, that God may grant them long life, a secure government, a prosperous family, vigorous troops, a faithful senate, an obedient people; that the whole world may be in peace; and that God may grant both to Caesar, and to every man, the accomplishment of their just desires."

So Origen, Ευχμεθα τοις βασιλει και αρχοντας μετα της βασιλικης δυνατεις και σωφρονα τον λαοιμον εχοντας ευσεβησαι. Cont. Cels. lib. viii. "We pray for kings and rulers, that, with their royal authority, they may be found possessing a wise and prudent mind." Indeed they prayed even for those by whom they were persecuted. If the state be not in safety, the individual cannot be secure: self-preservation, therefore, should lead men to pray for the government under which they live. Rebellions and insurrections seldom terminate even in political good: and even where the government is radically bad, revolutions themselves are most precarious and hazardous. They who wish such commotions, would not be quiet under the most mild and benevolent government.

That we may lead a quiet and peaceable life] We thus pray for the government, that the public peace may be preserved. Good rulers have power to do much good; we pray that their authority may be ever preserved; and well directed. Bad rulers have power to do much evil; we pray that they may be prevented from thus using their power. So that whether the rulers be good or bad, prayer for them is the positive duty of all Christians; and the answer to their prayers, in either case, will be the means of their being enabled to lead a quiet and peaceable life in all godliness and honesty.

 3. This is good and acceptable) Prayer for all legally constituted authorities, is good in itself, because useful to ourselves and to the public at large; and it is acceptable in the sight of God, our Saviour; and this is its highest sanction, and its highest character; it is good; it is well-pleasing to God.

4. Who will have all men to be saved) Because he wills the salvation of all men; therefore he wills that all men should be prayed for. In the face of such a declaration, how can any Christian soul suppose that God ever unconditionally and eternally reprobated any man! Those who can believe so, one would suppose, can have little acquaintance either with the nature of God, or the benefits of Christ.

And come unto the knowledge of the truth) The truth, the Gospel of Christ, should be proclaimed to them: and it is the duty of all who know it, to diffuse it far and wide: and when it is made known, then it is the duty of those who hear it, to acknowledge and receive it: this is the proper import of the original word, that they may come, εις επιγνωσιν αληθειας, to the acknowledgement of the truth; that they may receive it as the truth, and make it the rule of their faith; the model and director of their life and actions.

5. There is one God) Who is the Maker, Governor, and Preserver, of all men, of every condition, and of every nation: and equally wills the salvation of all.

And one Mediator) The word Mediator, Mediator, signifies literally, a middle person, one whose office it is to reconcile two parties at enmity; and hence Suidas explains it by εἰρηνοποιος, a peace-maker. God was offended with the crimes of men: to restore them to his peace, Jesus Christ was incarnated; and being God and man, both God and men met in, and were reconciled by Him. But this reconciliation required a sacrifice on the part of the Peace-maker, or Mediator; hence what follows:-

6. Who gave himself a ransom) The word λυτρον, signifies a ransom paid for the redemption of a captive; and ἀντιλυτρον, the word used here, and applied to the death of Christ, signifies that ransom which consists in the exchange of one person for another, or the redemption of life by life; or as Schlesinger has expressed it, in his translation of these words: Qui, morte sua omnes liberavit à vitio et à vi peccati; à servitute quasi et miseris peccatorum.—"He, who by His death has redeemed all from the power and punishment of vice, from the slavery and misery of sinners." As God is the God and Father of all; for, there is but one God, ver. 5. and Jesus Christ the Mediator of all; so he gave Himself a ransom for all: i. e. for all that God made; consequently for every human soul; unless we could suppose that there are human souls of which God is not the Creator; for, the argument of the apostle is plainly this:—1. There is one God—2. This God is the Creator of all—3. He has made a revelation of his kindness to all—4. He will have all men to be saved, and come unto the knowledge of the truth; and, 5. He has provided a Mediator for all, who has given Himself a ransom for all. As surely as God has created all men, so surely has Jesus Christ died for all men. This is a truth which the nature and revelation of God unequivocally proclaim.

To be testified in due time.) The original words το μαρτυριον καιριος idioti, are not very clear, and have been understood variously. The most authentic copies of the printed Vulgate have simply, Testimonium temporibus suis; which CALDER translates, vendant ainski temoignage au tems marque;—"Thus rendering testimony at the appointed time." Dr. HACKETT thus, Of which the testimony is in its proper season. WAREFIELD thus, "That testimony reserved to its proper time." ROSSMULLER, Hoc est doctrina, temporibus suis reservata.—"This is the doctrine, which is reserved for its own times;" that is, aside he, quæ suo tempore in omni terrarum orbe tradatur; "the doctrine which in its own time shall be delivered to all the inhabitants of the earth." Here he translates μαρτυριον, doctrine; and contends that this, not testimony, is its meaning; not only in this passage, but in 1 Cor. 1. 6. li. 1. &c. Instead of μαρτυριον, testimony, one MS. Cod. Kk. vi. 4. in the public library, Cambridge, has πορνισια, mystery; but this is not acknowledged by any other MS. nor by any Version. In D'FG the whole clause is read thus, το μαρτυριον καιριος idioti εδοθη. The testimony of which was given in its own times. This is nearly the reading which was adopted in the first printed copy of the Vulgate. One of them now before me reads the passage thus, Cæsus testimonium temporibus suis confirmatum est. "The testimony of which is confirmed in its own times." This reading was adopted by Pope Sixtus V. in the former edition published by him; but was corrected to the reading above, by Pope Clement VIII. And this was rendered literally by our first translator, Cæsus testimonium in confirmatum in suis temporibus. This appears to be the apostle's meaning: Christ gave Himself a ransom for all. This, in the times which seemed best to the Divine wisdom, was to be testified to every nation, and people, and tongue. The apostles had begun this testimony; and, in the course of the Divine economy, it has ever since been gradually promulgated; and at present runs with a more rapid course than ever.

7. I am ordained a preacher) I am set apart, rite, appointed. The word does not imply any imposition of hands, by either bishop or presbytery, as is vulgarly supposed.

I speak the truth in Christ) As I have received my commission from Him; so I testify His truth. I did not run before I was sent: and I speak nothing but what I have received. A teacher of the Gentiles) Being especially commissioned to preach the Gospel; not to the Jews, but to the saviors of the world.

In faith and verity) Faithfully and truly: preaching the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth; and this fervently, affectionately, and perseveringly.

Instead of εν πιστι, in faith, the Cod. Alexandrine has a πνευματι, in spirit. "A teacher of the Gentiles in spirit and truth."

8. I will therefore.) Seeing the apostle had his authority from Christ, and spoke nothing but what he received from Him, his βουλησιν, I will, is equal to I command.

That men pray) That is, for the blessings promised in this testimony of God. For, although God has provided them, yet He will not give them to such as will not pray. See the note on verse the first, the subject of which is here resumed.

Every where) Ev παντι τοπω, in every place. The God should always have a praying heart; and this will ever find a praying place. This may refer to a Jewish superstition. They thought, at first, that no prayer could be acceptable that was not offered at the temple at Jerusalem; afterward, this was extended to the Holy Land; but when they became dispersed among the nations, they built oratories, or places of prayer, principally by rivers, and by the sea side. And in these they were obliged to allow that public prayer might be legally offered, but nowhere else: in opposition to this, the apostle of the authority of Christ, commands men to pray every where; that all places belong to God's dominions; and as he likewise place, in every place he may be worshipped and glorified. As to ejaculatory prayer, they allowed that this might be performed standing, sitting, leaning, lying, walking by the way, and during their labour. Berraceth, fol. xi. l. And yet in some other places they teach differently.—See Schuetzer.

Lifting up holy hands) It was a common custom, not only among the Jews, but also among the Heathens, to lift up or spread out their arms and hands in prayer. It is properly the action of entreaty and request; and seems to be an effort to embrace the assistance requested. But the apostle probably alludes to the Jewish custom of laying their hands on the head of the animal which they brought for a sin-offering, confessing their sins, and then giving up the life of the animal as an expiation for the sins thus confessed. And the very notion is conveyed in the original term εὐχεσθαι, from εὐχομαι to lift up, and εν, upon, or over. This shows us how Christians should pray. They should come to the altar; not God before their eyes; humble themselves for their sins; bring as a sacrifice the Lamb of God; lay their hands on that sacrifice; and by faith offer it to God in their souls' behalf, expecting salvation through His meritorious death alone.

Without wrath) Having no vindictive feeling against any person; harbouring no unforgiving spirit, while they are imploring pardon for their own offences.

The holy hands refer to the Jewish custom of washing their hands before prayer: this was done to signify that they had put away all sin, and purposed to live a holy life.

And doubting) Διαλογισμος, or δαδολογησιν, in our MSS., reasoning, dialogues, or dialogues, such as are seen in the treatise penitentiæ, and timid beliefs, such as are seen in the life appearing to hold a disputation and combat with their own passions; in the issue of which subduing triumphs. The apostle therefore wills those to pray, relying on the promises of God, and the satisfaction of Jesus Christ.

9. In like manner also) That is, in like manner as the men follow; as he had commanded. That women adorn themselves) That women adorn themselves οὐκ ἄνευον. The apostle seems to refer here to different sorts of the Grecian and Roman dress. The στολή, stola, seems to have been originally very simple. It was a long piece of cloth doubled in the middle, and sewed up on both sides, leaving room only for the arms: at the top, a piece was cut out, or a slit made, through which the head passed. It hung down to the feet, both before and behind; and was laced with the zona round the body, just under the breasts. It was sometimes made with, sometimes without sleeves; and that it might sit the better, it was gathered on each shoulder, with a band or buckle. Some of the Greek women wore them open on each side, from the bottom up above the knee, so as to discover a part of the thigh. These were termed γαιμωμίδες, gaimomides (discoverers) of the thigh: but it was, in general, only young girls, or immodest women, who wore them thus.

The σταυροί, seems to have been the same as the pallium or mantle, which was made nearly in the form of the stola; hung down to the waist, both in back and front; was gathered in the shoulder with a band or buckle; had a hole or slit at the top for the head to pass through; and hung loosely over the stola, without being confined by the zona or girdle. Representations of these dresses may be seen in Lax's Costume des Peuples de l'Antiquité, fig. 11, 12, 13, and 16. A more modest and becoming dress than the Grecian, was never invented: it was, in a great measure, revived in England, about the year 1815; and in it, simplicity, decency, and elegance, were united: but it soon gave place to another mode, in which rippity and nonsense once more prevailed. It was too rational to last long; and too much like religious simplicity to be offered in a land of shadows, and a world of painted outsiders.

With shamefacedness and sobriety) The stola, catastola, irdle, &c. though simple in themselves, were often highly ornamented both with gold and precious stones; and, both among the Grecian and Roman women, the hair was often ripped and curled in the most variegated and complex manner. To this the apostle alludes, when he says, ἡ κεφαλή σου, ἡ κεφαλή σου μαργαρίταις, ἡ κεφαλή σου περλίοις. Not with lusted hair, or gold, or pearls, or costly raiment. The costly siment might refer to the materials, out of which the raiment was made, and to the workmanship: the gold and pearls to the ornaments on the raiment.

With shamefacedness—Or modesty, περὶ αἰδώς; this would add them to avoid every thing unbecoming or meretricious in the mode or fashion of their dress.

With sobriety—Μετὰ σωφροσύνης. Moderation would lead us to avoid all unnecessary expense. They might follow the custom or costume of the country, as to the dress itself; or nothing was ever more becoming than the Grecian stola, catastola, and zona; but they must not imitate the extravagance of those who, through impurity or littleness of mind, decked themselves merely to attract the eye of admiration, or it in lying action the tongue of flattery. Woman has been vividly defined, an animal fond of dress. How long will they permit themselves to be thus degraded?

Those beautiful lines of Homer, in which he speaks of the path of Euphorbus, who was slain by Menelaus, show how identically the Grecians plaited and adorned their hair: Ἀντίτροπος δ' ἀπλοῖοι δὲ ἄνευρος ἠλυσθ' ἀκούη Δασπύων δὲ πύων, ἀραβήσι δὲ τρυχὴ ἐπ' ἀσφύ. Ἀλπίσι δὲ δέντρον κομῆι, Χαριτῶν ἠσθεία, Πλάχρη δ', οἱ χρυσοῦ τε καὶ ἀργύρου σφηνῶντο.

Il. xvii. ver. 49. Wide through the neck appears the ghastly wound: Frome sinks the warrior, and his arms rebound. The shining circlets of his golden hair, COVETSE. The extravagance to which the Grecian and Asiatic women set in their ornaments, might well be a reason for the apostle's command.

Εἴπω, however, denies that any particular article of dress intended here; and that σταυροί is to be understood as meaning from στερεώματα, to restrain, repress; and he refers to that government of the mind, or moderation which women should exercise over their dress and demeanour in general; and every thing that may fall under the observation of a senses. All this, undoubtedly, the apostle had in view. When either women or men spend much time, cost, and motion, on decorating their persons, it affords a painful proof, that within there is little excellence; and that they are deavouring to supply the want of mind and moral good by a feeble and silly slide of dress and ornament. Were religion out of the question, common sense would say in all these things, Be decent; but be moderate and modest.

10. But which becometh, &c.] That is, good works are the only ornaments with which women professing Christianity should seek to be adorned. The Jewish matrons were accustomed to cry to the bride, "There is no need of paint, no need of antimony, no need of braided hair; she herself is most beautiful." The eastern women use a preparation of antimony, which they apply both to the eyes and eyelids; and by which the eye itself acquires a wonderful lustre.

11. Let the women learn in silence) This is generally supposed to be a prohibition of women's preaching. I have already said what I judge necessary on this subject in the notes on 1 Cor. xi. 5, &c. and xiv. 34, 35. to which places I beg leave to refer the reader.

12. Nor to usurp authority) A woman should attempt nothing, either in public or private, that belongs to man, as his peculiar function. This was prohibited by the Roman laws—In multis juris nostri articulis deterior est conditio feminae quam masculinum, l. 9. PAR. LIB. 31. QUAM. Feminae ab omnibus officiis civibus vel publicis remotae sunt; et ideo nec iudices esse possunt, nec magistratum gerere, nec postulare, nec pro alio intervenire, nec procuratores existere, l. 2. de Reg. Juris. Ulp. LIB. 1. AD. SACR.—Vid. FOR. Pand. Justin. Vol. 1. p. 12.

"In our laws, the condition of women is, in many respects, worse than that of men: women are precluded from all public offices; therefore, they cannot be judges, nor execute the function of magistrates; they cannot sue, plead, nor act in any case as practices." They were under many other disabilities, which may be seen in different places of the Pandects.

But to be in silence.) It was lawful for men in public assemblies, to ask questions, or even interrupt the speaker, when there was any matter in his speech which they did not understand; but this liberty was not granted to women.—See the note on 1 Cor. xiv. 34, 35.

13. For Adam was first formed, then Eve.) And by this very act God designed that he should have the pre-eminence. God fitted man, by the robust construction of his body, to live a public life, to contend with difficulties, and to be capable of great exertions. The structure of woman's body plainly proves that she was never designed for those exertions required in public life. In this, the chief part of the natural inferiority of woman is to be sought.

14. Adam was not deceived) It does not appear that Satan attempted the man: the woman said, The serpent beguiled me, and I did eat. Adam received the fruit from the hand of his wife; he knew he was transgressing; he was not deceived; however, she led the way, and in consequence of this, she was subjected to the domination of her husband. Thy desire shall be to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee, Gen. iii. 16. There is a Greek verse, but it is not English law, that speaks a language nearly similar to that above.

Γυναίκα δ' ἄρχησιν εν ὀδωσιν ἡ φύσις. For nature suffers not a woman's rule.

God has not expressly rendered her unfit for it, but he has subjected her, (expressly,) to the government of the man.

15. She shall be saved in child-bearing) Σωθήσεται δε δε της τεκνοποιας, she shall be saved through child-bearing: she shall be saved by means, or through the instrumentality of child-bearing, or of bringing forth a child. Amidst the different opinions given of the meaning of this very singular text, that of Dr. Macknight appears to me the most probable, which I shall give in his paraphrase and notes.

"However, though Eve was first in the transgression, and brought death on herself, her husband, and all her posterity, the female sex shall be saved (equally with the male,) through child-bearing; through bringing forth the Saviour: if they live in faith, and love, and chastity, with that sobriety which I have been recommending."

"The word σωθήσεται, saved, in this verse, refers to ἡ γυν, the woman, in the foregoing verse, which is certainly Eva. But the apostle did not mean to say, that she alone was to be saved through child-bearing, but that all her posterity, whether male or female, are to be saved through the child-bearing of a woman; as it is evident, from his adding, If they live in faith, and love, and holiness, with sobriety. For safety in child-bearing does not depend on that condition at all, since many pious women die in child-bearing; while others of a contrary character, are preserved. The salvation of the human race, through child-bearing, was intimated in the sentence passed on the serpent, Gen. iii. 15. I will put enmity between thee and the woman; and between thy seed and her seed. I shall bruise thy head. Accordingly, the Saviour being conceived in the womb of His mother, by the power of the Holy Ghost, He is truly the seed of the woman, who was to bruise the head of the serpent; and a woman, by bringing Him forth, has been the occasion of our salvation." This is the most consistent sense; for, in the way in which it is commonly understood, it does not apply. There are innumerable instances of women dying in child-bed, who have lived in faith and charity, and holiness with sobriety; and equally numerous instances of worthless women, slaves to different kinds of vices, who have not only been saved in child-bearing, but have passed through their travail with comparatively little pain: hence, that is not the sense in which we should understand the apostle. Yet, it must be a matter of great consolation and support, to all pious women, labouring of child, to consider that, by the Holy Virgin's child-bearing, salvation is provided for them, and the whole human race; and that, whether they die or live, though their own child-bearing can contribute nothing to their salvation; yet He who was born of a woman has purchased them, and the whole human race, by His blood.

If they continue] Eav μωστωρ, is rightly translated, if they live; for so it signifies in other passages, particularly Phil. i. 25. The change in the number of the verb from the singular to the plural, which is introduced here, was designed by the apostle to show that he does not speak of Eve, nor of any particular woman, but of the whole sex. See Macknight.

Without faith, it is impossible to please God, or to be saved; and without love, it will be impossible to obey. Faith and love are essentially necessary to holiness and sobriety; and, unless both men and women live in these, they cannot, scripturally, expect to dwell with God for ever. Some foolish women have supposed, from this verse, that the very act of bringing forth children, shall entitle them to salvation; and that all who die in child-bed infallibly go to glory! Nothing can be more unfounded than this: faith, love, holiness, and sobriety, are as absolutely requisite for the salvation of every daughter of Eve, as they are for the salvation of every son of Adam. Pain and suffering neither purify nor make merit. On the mercy of God, in Christ, dispensing remission of sins and holiness, both men and woman may confidently rely for salvation; but on nothing else. Let her that readeth understand.

On the subject of dress I will conclude in the words of a late writer: What harm does it do to adorn ourselves with gold, or pearls, or costly array, suppose we can afford it? The first harm it does is, it engenders pride, and where it is already, increases it. Nothing is more natural than to think ourselves better, because we are dressed in better clothes. One of the old heathens was so well apprized of this, that when he had a spite to a poor man, and had a mind to turn his head, he made him a present of a suit of fine clothes.

He could not then but imagine himself to be as much better, as he was finer, than his neighbour; inferring the superior value of his person from the value of his clothes.—Reverend J. Wesley's Sermons.

CHAPTER III.

Concerning bishops, their qualifications, and work, 1—7. Of deacons, and how they should be proved, 8—10. Of their wives and children, and how they should be governed, 11—13. How Timothy should behave himself in the church, 14, 15. The great mystery of godliness, 16. [A. M. circ. 4069. A. D. 64 or 65. A. U. C. 818. An. Imp. Ner. Cæsar. Aug. 12.]

THIS is a true saying, If a man desire the office of a bishop, he desireth a good work.

A bishop then must be blameless, the husband of one wife, diligent labourer, of good behaviour, given to hospitality, apt to teach:

a Ch. 1. 13 — b Act. 20. 29. Phil. 1. 1. — c Eph. 4. 12.

NOTES.—Verse 1. This is a faithful saying] Πιστὸς ὁ λόγος, this is a true doctrine. These words are joined to the last verse of the preceding chapter, by several of the Greek Fathers; and by them referred to the doctrine there stated.

The office of a bishop] Επισκοπος, the episcopacy, overseership, or superintendency. The word οπισκοπος, which we translate desire, signifies earnest, eager, passionate desire; and επιθυμω, which we also translate desire, signifies earnestly to desire, or covet. It is strange that the episcopacy, in those times, should have been an object of intense desire to any man; when it was a place of danger, and exposure to severe labour, want, persecution, and death; without any secular emolument whatsoever! On this ground, I am led to think that the Spirit of God designed these words more for the ages that were to come, than for those which were then; and, in reference to after ages, the whole of what follows, is chiefly to be understood.

A good work] A work it then was; heavy, incessant, and painful. There were no unpraching prelates in those days; and should be none now. Episcopacy in the church of God, is of Divine appointment; and should be maintained and respected. Under God, there should be supreme government in the church, as well as in the state. The state has its monarch; the church has its bishop: one should govern according to the laws of the land; the other, according to the word of God.

What a constitutional king should be, the principles of the constitution declare; what a bishop should be, the following verses particularly show.

2. A bishop, then, must be blameless] Our term, bishop comes from the Anglo-Saxon biscep, which is a mere corruption of the Greek επισκοπος, and the Latin episcopus; the former being compounded of επι, over, and σκοπος, to look or inspect, signifies one who has the inspection or oversight of a place, persons, or business: what we commonly term a superintendent. The New Testament writers have borrowed the term from the Septuagint, it being the word by which they translate the רִבְּוּן paqid of the Hebrew text, which signifies a visitor, one that personally inspects the people or business over which he presides. It is given by St. Paul to the elders, at Ephesus, who had the oversight of Christ's flock, Acts xx. 28. and to such like persons in other places, Phil. i. 1. 1 Tim. iii. 2. the place in question, and Tit. i. 7.

Let us consider the qualifications of a Christian bishop, and then we shall soon discover who is fit for the office.

First.—This Christian bishop must be blameless, αμεμπτος, a person against whom no crim can be proved; one who is every where invulnerable; for the word is a metaphor, taken from the case of an expert and skilful pugilist, who so defends every part of his body, that it is impossible for his antagonist to give one hit. In this Christian bishop is one that has so conducted himself as to put it out of the reach of any person to prove that he is either unworthy in a single article of the Christian faith, or deficient in the fulfillment of any duty incumbent on a Christian. He must be irrepensible; for how can he reprove that in others, which they can reprove in him?

Secondly.—He must be the husband of one wife. He should be a married man; but he should be no polygamist, and have only one wife; i. e. one at a time. It does not mean, that if he have been married, and his wife die, he should never marry another. Some have most foolishly spiritualized this; and say, that by one wife the church is intended! This silly quibbling needs no refutation. The apostle's meaning appears to be this, that he should not be a man who has divorced his wife and married another; nor one that has two wives at a time. It does not appear to have been any part of the apostle's design to prohibit second marriages, of which some have made such a serious business. But it is natural for some men to tithe mint and cummin in religion, while they neglect the weightier matters of the law.

Thirdly.—He must be vigilant: νηφαλον, from νη, not, and πιω, to drink. Watchful—for one who drinks is apt to sleep; so he who abstains from it, is more likely to keep awake, and attend to his work and charge. A bishop has to watch over the church, and watch for it; and this will require all his care and circumspection. Instead of νηφαλον, many MSS. read νηφαλον; this may be the better orthography, but makes no alteration in the sense.

Fourthly.—He must be sober; σοφρον, prudent, or, according to the etymology of the word, from σως, sound, and φρον, mind, a man of a sound mind; having a good understanding, and the complete government of all his passions.

A bishop should be a man of learning, of an extensive and well cultivated mind; dispassionate, prudent, and sedate. Fifthly.—He must be of good behaviour; επισημος, orderly, decent, grave, and correct, in the whole of his appearance, carriage, and conduct. The preceding term επισημος, refers to the mind; this latter, superior, to the external manner. A clownish, rude, or boorish man, should never have the role of the church of God: the sour, the sullen, and the boisterous should never be invested with a dignity, which they would most infallibly disgrace.

Sixthly.—He must be given to hospitality; φιλοξενος, literally a lover of strangers; one who is ready to receive into his house, and relieve, every necessitous stranger: Hospitality in those primitive times, was a great and necessary virtue; then, there were few inns, or places of public entertainment to those who were noted for benevolence, the necessitous stranger had recourse. A Christian bishop, professing love to God, and all mankind; preaching a religion, one half of the morality of which was included in, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself, would naturally be sought to by those who were in distress, and destitute of friends. To enable them to entertain such, the church over which they preside must have furnished them with the means. Such a bishop as St. Paul who was often obliged to labour with his hands for his own support, could have little to give away. But there is a considerable difference between an apostolical bishop, and an ecclesiastical bishop; the one was generally itinerant, the other comparatively local: the former had neither home nor home: the latter had both. The apostolical bishop had charge of the church of Christ universally; the ecclesiastical bishop, of the churches in a particular district. Such should be additional hospitality, or works of charity, especially in these modern times, in which, besides the spiritualities, they possess the temporalities of the church.

Seventhly.—He should be apt to teach; διδασκειν, one capable of teaching; not only wise himself, but ready to communicate his wisdom to others. One whose delight is to instruct the ignorant, and those who are out of the way. He must be a preacher; an able, zealous, fervent, and assiduous preacher. He is no bishop who has health and strength, and yet seldom or never preaches.

In former times, bishops wrote much, and preached much.

12 Let the deacons be the husbands of one wife, ruling their church and their own houses well.

13 For, they that have used the office of a deacon well, purchase to themselves a good degree, and great boldness in the faith which is in Christ Jesus.

14 These things write I unto thee, hoping to come unto thee shortly.

W See Matt. 23, 21. — x Or, minister. — y Eph. 2, 21, 22. 2 Tim 2, 25. — Or, stay. — a John 1, 14. — b John 1, 2. — c Or, manifested. — d Matt. 3, 16. John 1, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100.

Not double tongued] Speaking one thing to one person, and another thing to another, on the same subject. This is hypocrisy and deceit. This word might also be translated fiara.

Not given to much wine] Neither a drunkard, tippler, nor what is called a jovial companion. All this would be incon- sistent with gravity.

Not greedy of filthy lucre] See on ver. 4.

9. Holding the mystery of the faith] Instead of της πιστης, the faith, one MS. (the readings of which are found in the margin of a copy of Mill's Greek text, in the Bodleian library, and is marked 61. in Orisbach), reads αναστασης, of the resurrection. This reading, like many others in this MS. is found nowhere else; and is worthy of little regard, but as ex- pressing what appeared to the writer to be the apostle's mean- ing. One of the greatest mysteries of the faith was, undoubt- edly, the resurrection of the dead; and this was held in a pure conscience, when the person so exercised himself, as to have a conscience void of offence towards God and towards men.—See Acts xxiv. 16. What has been since called Anti- nomianism, that is, making void the moral law, by a pre- tended faith in the righteousness of Christ, is that which the apostle has here particularly in view.

10. Let these—be proved] Let them not be young converts, or persons lately brought to the knowledge of the truth. This is the same spirit with what is required of the bishops, ver. 6.

Let no man be put into an office in the church, till he has given full proof of his sincerity and steadiness, by having been for a considerable time, a consistent private member of the church.

Being found blameless] Ανεπιβλητοι οντες, being irreproch- able; persons against whom no evil can be proved. The same as in ver. 2. though a different word is used; see the note there.

11. Even so must their wives be grave] I believe the apos- tle does not mean here the wives either of the bishops or deacons in particular; but the Christian women in general. The original is, simply, Γυναικας ουσαντας ευμους, Let the women likewise be grave. Whatever is spoken here becomes women in general; but if the apostle had those termed deaconesses in his eye, which is quite possible, the words are peculiarly suit- able to them. That there was such an order in the apostolic and primitive church, and that they were appointed to their office by the imposition of hands, has already been noticed on Rom. xvi. 1. Possibly, therefore, the apostle may have had this order of deaconesses in view, to whom it was as necessary to give counsels and cautions, as to the deacons themselves: and to prescribe their qualifications, lest improper persons should insinuate themselves into that office.

Not slanderers] Μη διαβολοις, literally, not devils.—See on ver. 7. This may be properly enough translated slanderers, backbiters, talebearers, &c. for, all these are of their father the devil, and his lusts they will do. Let all such, with the vast tribe of communicators and dealers in scandal, remem- ber, that the apostle ranks them all with malicious, fallen spirits: a consideration, which one would suppose, might be sufficient to deter them from their injurious and abominable conduct.

Sober] See on ver. 2. Faithful in all things.] The deaconesses had much to do among the poor; and especially among poor women, in dis- pensing the bounty of the church. They were not only faith- fully to expend all they had got, and for the purpose for which they got it; but they must do this with impartiality; show- ing no respect of persons; the degree of distress being the only rule by which the distribution was to be regulated.

12. Let the deacons be the husbands of one wife] This is the same that is required of the bishop.—See on ver. 2. and 4, 5.

13. That have used the office of a deacon well] They who, having been tried or proved, ver. 10, have shown, by their steadiness, activity, and zeal, that they might be raised to a higher office, are here said to have purchased to themselves a good degree, βαθρον ευλογον, for instead of having to minister to the bodies, and bodily wants of the poor, the faithful deacons were raised to minister in holy things; and instead of ministering the bread that periseth, they were raised to the presbyterate or episcopate, to minister the bread of life to im- mortal souls. And hence the apostle adds, and great boldness in the faith; πολλην καρρηνην, great liberty of speech, i. e. in teaching the doctrines of Christianity; and in expounding the Scriptures and preaching. It seems to have been a practice dictated by common sense, that the most grave and steady of the believers should be employed as deacons: the most expe- rienced and zealous of the deacons, should be raised to the rank of elders; and the most able and pious of the elders, be consecrated bishops. As to a bishop of bishops, that age did not know such. The Pope of Rome was the first who took this title. The same office, but not with the same powers nor

15 But if I tarry long, that thou mayest know how thou oughtest to behave thyself in the house of God, which is the church of the living God, the pillar, and ground of the truth.

16 And without controversy, great is the mystery of godliness: God was manifest in the flesh, justified in the Spirit, seen of angels, preached unto the Gentiles, believed on in the world, received up into glory.

d Matt. 21, 2. Mark 16, 5. Luke 2, 13, 14, 21, 4. John 9, 12. Eph. 2, 21. 1 Pet. 1, 18. — e Acts 10, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100.

Col. is, found in the patriarchs of the Greek church, and the archbishop of the Protestant church. As the deacons had many private members under his care: so the presbyter or elder had several deacons under his care; the bishop several pres- byters; and the archbishop several bishops. But I speak now, more of the modern than of the ancient church. The distinction in some of these offices is not so apparent in ancient times: and some of the offices themselves are modern, or comparatively so. But deacon, presbyter, and bishop, existed in the apostolic church; and may therefore be considered of Divine origin.

14. These things write I] That is, I write only these things, because I hope to come unto thee shortly.

15. But if I tarry long] That is, notwithstanding I hope to come to thee shortly, and therefore do not feel the necessity of writing at large; yet, lest I should be delayed, I write what I judge necessary to direct thy conduct in the church of God

The house of God] This is spoken in allusion to the ancient tabernacle, which was God's house, and in which the symbol of the Divine Majesty dwelt. So the Christian church is God's house; and every believer is a habitation of God through the Spirit.

The church of the living God] The assembly in which God lives and works; each member of which is a living stone; all of whom, properly united among themselves, grow up into a holy temple in the Lord.

The pillar and ground of the truth.] Never was there greater variety of opinions on any portion of the Sacred Scrip- ture than has been on this and the following verse. Commen- tators and critics have given sense and meanings till there is no meaning to be seen. It would be almost impossible, after reading all that has been said on this passage, for any man to make up his own mind. To what, or to whom, does the pillar and ground of the truth refer?

1. Some say to Timothy, who is called the pillar, &c. be- cause left there to support and defend the truth of God against false doctrines, and false teachers; and is so called for the same reason that Peter, James, and John, are said to be pillars; i. e. supporters of the truth of God. Gal. ii. 9.

2. Others suppose, that the pillar and ground of the truth, is spoken of God; and that ος, who is, should be supplied as referring immediately to ος, God, just before. By this mode of interpretation, the passage will read thus:—That thou mayest know how thou oughtest to behave thyself in the house of God, which is the church of the living God, was ος (ος ος), the pillar and ground of the truth. How God may be fitly termed the pillar and ground of truth, requires ex- planation.

3. Others think that the words should be understood of the church of the living God; and in this case the feminine relative η η η, which is, must be repeated immediately after εκλησιας, the church. The house of God is the church of the living God; η η η (η η η) in the pillar and ground of the truth. That is, the full revelation of God's truth is in the Christian church. The great doctrines of that church are the truth, without error, metaphor, or figure. Formerly, the truth was but partially revealed; much of it being shadowed with types, ceremonies, and comparatively dark prophecies; but now, all is plain, and the full revelation given: and the foundation on which this truth rests, are the grand facts de- tailed in the Gospel, especially those which concern the in- carnation, miracles, passion, death, and resurrection of Christ; and the mission of the Holy Spirit.

4. Lastly, others refer the whole to ος ος ος, ος, the mystery of godliness; and translate the clause thus: The mystery of godliness is the pillar and ground of the truth; and, without controversy, a great thing. This gives a very good sense, but is not much favoured by the arrangement of the words in the original.

16. And without controversy] Και ομολογησασθαι, and confessedly; by general consent: it is a thing which no man can, or ought to dispute: any phrase of this kind ex- presses the meaning of the original.

God was manifest in the flesh.] If we take in the whole of the 14th, 15th, and 16th verses, we may make a consistent translation in the following manner; and the whole paragraph will stand thus— Hoping to see thee shortly; but should I tarry long, these things I now write unto thee, that thou mayest know how thou oughtest to behave thyself in the house of God, which is the church of the living God. The mystery of godliness, which is the pillar and ground of the truth, is without controversy, a great thing. And then he proceedeth to show what this mystery of godliness is; which he sums up in the six following particulars.—1. God was manifest in the flesh.—2. Justified in the Spirit.—3. Seen of angels.—4. Preach- ed unto the Gentiles.—5. Believed on in the world.—6. Re- ceived up into glory.

Though all this makes a very plain and consistent sense; yet we are perplexed by various readings on the first clause, Θεός, εἰσαρχομένη ἐν σαρκί, God was manifested in the flesh; for, instead of God, God, several MSS., Versions, and Fathers, have ἡ, or ἡ, which, or who. And this is generally referred to the word myster; Great is the mystery of godliness, which was manifested in the flesh.

The insertion of Θεός for εἰ, or εἰς for Θεός, may be easily accounted for. In ancient times, the Greek was all written in capitals; for the common Greek character is, comparatively, of modern date. In these early times, words of frequent recurrence were written contractedly; thus for  $\tau\alpha\rho\alpha, \tau\tau$ ;

Θεός, ἡ; Κεῖνος, ἡ; Ἰησοῦς, ἡ, &c. This is very frequent in the oldest MSS. and is continually recurring in the Codex Bezae, and Codex Alexandrinus. If, therefore, the middle stroke of the Θ in Θ, happened to be faint, or obliterated, and the dash above not very apparent, both of which I have observed in ancient MSS. then Θ, the contraction for Θεός, God, might be mistaken for ἡ, which, or who, and vice versa. This appears to have been the case in the Codex Alexandrinus, in this passage. To me, there is ample reason to believe, that the Codex Alexandrinus originally read Θ God, in this place; but the stroke, becoming faint by length of time, and injudicious handling, of which the MS. in this place has had a large proportion, some person has supplied the place, most reprehensibly, with a thick black line. This has destroyed the evidence of this MS. as, now, it can neither be quoted pro or con; though it is very likely that the person, who supplied the ink line, did it from a conscientious conviction that Θ was the original reading of this MS. I examined this manuscript about thirty years ago, and this was the conviction that then rested on my mind. I have seen the MS. several times since, and have not changed my opinion. The enemies of the Deity of Christ have been at as much pains to destroy the evidence afforded by the common reading, in support of this doctrine, as if this text were the only one, by which it can be supported; they must be aware that John I. 1. and 14. proclaim the same truth; and that in those verses, there is no authority to doubt the genuineness of the reading. We read, therefore, God was manifested in the flesh; and I cannot see what good sense can be taken out of the coram. was manifested in the flesh; or, the mystery of godliness was manifested in the flesh. After seriously considering this subject, in every point of light, I hold with the reading in the commonly received text.

Justified in the Spirit] By the miracles which were wrought by the apostle in and through the name of Jesus, as well as by his resurrection from the dead, through the energy of the Holy Ghost, by which he was proved to be the Son of God with power. Christ was justified from all the calumnies of the Jews, who crucified him as an impostor. All these miracles being wrought by the power of God were a full proof of His innocence; for, had He not been what He professed to be, God would not have borne such a decisive testimony to His messiahship.

Seen of angels] By ἀγγελοι, here, some understand not those celestial or infernal beings commonly called angels; but apostles, and other persons who became messengers, to carry far and wide, and attest the truth of His resurrection from the dead. If, however, we take the word seen, in its Jewish acceptation; for made known, we may here retain the term angels in its common acceptation; for it is certain that, previously to our Lord's ascension to heaven, these holy beings could have little knowledge of the necessity, reasons, and economy, of human salvation; nor of the nature of Christ as God and man. St. Peter informs us, that the angels desired to look into these things, 1 Pet. I. 12. And St. Paul says the same thing, Ephes. iii. 9, 10, when speaking of the revelation of the Gospel-plan of salvation, which he calls The mystery which, from the beginning of the world, had been hid in God; and which was now published, that unto the PRINCIPALITIES and POWERS in heavenly places, might be made known by the church the manifold wisdom of God. Even those angelic beings have got an accession to their blessedness, by an increase of knowledge in the things which concern Jesus Christ, and the whole scheme of human salvation, through His incarnation, passion, death, resurrection, ascension, and glorification.

Preached unto the Gentiles] This was one grand part of the mystery which had been hidden in God, that the Gentiles should be made fellow-heirs with the Jews, and be admitted into the kingdom of God. To the Gentiles, therefore, he was proclaimed as having pulled down the middle wall of partition between them and the Jews; that through him, God had granted unto them repentance unto life: and that they also might have redemption in His blood, the forgiveness of sins.

Believed on in the world] Was received by mankind as the promised Messiah, the Anointed of God; and the only Saviour of fallen man. This is a most striking part of the mystery of godliness, that one who was crucified as a malefactor, and whose kingdom is not of this world, and whose doctrines are opposed to all the sinful propensities of the human heart; should, wherever His Gospel is preached, be acknowledged as the only Saviour of sinners: and the Judge of quick and dead! But some would restrict the meaning to the Jews, whose economy is often denominated the Jewish economy, this world; and which words, both our Lord and the apostles, often use in the same sense. Notwithstanding their prejudices, many even of the Jews believed on him: and a great company of the priests themselves, who were His crucifiers, became obedient to the faith, Acts vi. 7. This was an additional proof of Christ's innocence.

Received up into glory] Even that human nature which he took of the Virgin Mary, was raised, not only from the grave, but taken up into glory; and this in the most visible and palpable manner. This is a part of the mystery of godliness, which, while we have every reasonable evidence to believe, we have not powers to comprehend. His reception into glory, is of the utmost consequence to the Christian faith; as in consequence, Jesus Christ, in His human nature, ever appears before the Throne as our Sacrifice, and as our Mediator.

1. The directions given in this chapter concerning bishops and deacons should be carefully weighed by every branch of the Christian church. Not only the Offices which are of Divine appointment, such as bishop, presbyter, and deacon, should be most religiously preserved in the church; but that they may have their full effect, the persons exercising these should be such as the apostle prescribes. Religion will surely suffer, when religious order is either contemned or neglected; and even the words of God will be treated with contempt if ministered by unholty persons. Let order, therefore, be duly observed; and let those who fill these orders, be not only wholly irreprehensible in their conduct, but also able ministers of the new covenant. A schismatic can never have, nor communicate, authority to dispense heavenly mysteries: and a fast, or a bookishness, can never teach others the way of salvation. The highest abilities are not too great for a preacher of the Gospel: nor is it possible that he can have too much human learning. But all is nothing, unless he can bring the grace and spirit of God into all his ministrations; and these will never accompany him, unless he live in the spirit of prayer and humility; fearing and loving God, and having covetousness.

2. It is well known, that almost every church supposes itself to be the true church; and some consider themselves the only church; and deny salvation to all who are not of their communion. To such a church the two last verses in this chapter have been consistently self-applied, as being the pillar and ground of the truth; the possessor and dispenser of all the mysteries of God. But supposing that the words in ver. 16. are spoken of the church, it is of the Christian church, as defined under article the third above, that must be meant; and we may see from this the vanity of applying the words to any particular church, as if it had all the truth without error, and none else could pretend either to truth or ecclesiastical authority. The Christian church is a widely diffused thing; it is the whole system of Christianity, as laid down in the New Testament; it is built on the great foundation of prophets and apostles, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner stone. It is composed of all who hold the doctrines of Christianity; who acknowledge Jesus as their Teacher, Redeemer, and only Advocate; of all who love God with all their heart, soul, mind, and strength; and their neighbour as themselves; or who are labouring after this conformity to the mind and command of their Creator. It is not known by any particular name; it is not distinguished by any particular form in its mode of worship; it is not exclusively here or there. It is the house of God; it is where God's Spirit dwells; where His precepts are obeyed, and where pure, unadulterated love to God and man prevails. It is not in the creed, nor religious confessions of any denomination of Christians; for, as all who hold the truth, and live a holy life, acknowledging Jesus alone, as the head of the church, and Saviour of the world, are members of his mystical body, and such may be said to be every where, and to be confined no where; i. e. in whatever place Christianity is credited and acknowledged. The wicked of all sorts, no matter what their profession may be, and all persecutors of religious people, who differ from them, are without the pale of this church. Essentially must their spirit and conduct be changed, before the living Head of this spiritual building can acknowledge them as members of the heavenly family.

This text, therefore, never will apply to the Romish church, till that church be, both in doctrine and discipline, what the Christian church should be. When it is the established religion of any country, it gives no toleration to those who differ from it; and in Protestant countries, its cry for toleration and secular authority, is loud and long. I wish its pertinacious full and free exercise of their religion, even to its superstitious and nonsense; but, how can they expect toleration, who give none? The Protestant church tolerates it fully; it persecutes the Protestants to bonds and death, when it has power;—which is the true church of Christ?

CHAPTER IV.

Apostasy from the true faith predicted: and in what that apostasy should consist, 1-5. Exhortations to Timothy to teach the truth, 6. To avoid old wives' fables; to exercise himself to godliness, 7, 8. To labour, command, and teach, 9-11. To act so that none might despise his youth, 12. To give attendance to reading and preaching, 13, 14. To give up himself wholly to the divine work, 15. And so doing, he should both save himself and them that heard him, 16. [A. M. cir. 499. A. NOW the Spirit speaketh expressly, that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines of devils; speaking lies in hypocrisy; having their conscience seared with a hot iron; forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats, which God hath created to be received with thanksgiving of them which believe and know the truth. For every creature of God is good, and nothing to be refused, if it be received with thanksgiving;

NOTES.—Verse 1. Now the Spirit speaketh expressly] Patres, manifeste, aperte. It is very likely that the apostle refers here to a prophecy then furnished by the Holy Ghost; and, probably, immediately after he had written the words in the preceding verses; and as this prophecy contains things no where else spoken of, in the Sacred Writings; and of the utmost moment to the Christian church; we cannot bear or read them with too much reverence or respect.

In the latter times] This does not necessarily imply the last ages of the world; but any times consequent to those in which the church then lived.

Depart from the faith] Αποστραφει—της πιστευσεως, they will apostatize from the faith; i. e. from Christianity: renouncing the whole system in effect, by bringing in doctrines which render its essential truths null and void: or denying and renouncing such doctrines as are essential to Christianity as a system of salvation. A man may hold all the truths of Christianity, and yet render them of none effect, by holding other doctrines which counteract their influence; or he may apostatize by denying some essential doctrine, though he bring in nothing heterodox.

Giving heed to seducing spirits] Περσυσσευσι χαιρων; many MSS. and the chief of the Fathers here, περσυσσευσι χαιρων, spirits of deceit; which is much more emphatic than the common reading. Deception has her spirits, emissaries of every kind, which she employs to darken the hearts, and destroy the souls of men. Pretenders to inspiration, and false teachers of every kind, belong to this class.

And doctrines of devils] Δαιμονιακα, demons; either meaning fallen spirits, or dead men, spectres, &c. or doctrines inspired by Satan relative to these: by which he secures his own interest, and provides for his own worship.

2. Speaking lies in hypocrisy] Persons pretending not only to Divine inspiration, but also to extraordinary degrees of holiness, self-denial, mortification, &c. in order to accredit the lies and false doctrines which they taught. Multitudes of lies were framed concerning miracles wrought by the relics of departed saints, as they were termed. For, even in this country, Thomas à Becket was deemed a saint, his relics wrought numerous miracles, and his tomb was frequented by multitudes of pilgrims! However, as he works none now, we may rest assured that he never did work any. In 1305, king Edward I. was prevailed on, by his clergy, to write to pope Clement V. to canonize Thomas de Cantelupo, bishop of Hereford, because a multitude of miracles had been wrought by his influence; in tantum, says the king, quod ipsius meritis et intercessionibus, gloriosis, lumen cæcis, surdis auditibus, verbis mutis, et groæcus claudia, et alia pleraque beneficia ipsius, patrocinium implorantibus, calcei dextræ conferuntur. "Inasmuch that by his glorious merits and intercessions, the blind receive their sight, the deaf hear, the dumb speak, and the lame walk; and many other benefits are conferred by the right hand of the Divine Being, on those who implore his patronage." And therefore he prays, that this dead bishop may be added to the calendar: that he and his kingdom may enjoy his suffrages, and merit his patronage in heaven, who had the benefit of his conversation on earth. "Næ attendentes, per Dei gratiam, fideles in Christo, neque precibus, et populis regni nostri, ejus posse suffragia aditari, et, quem familiaribus habuimus in terris, mercedum habere patronus in calis. Fœdera, Vol. i. page 976. Edit. 1816.

Having their conscience seared with a hot iron] They bear the marks of their hypocrisy as evidently and as indelibly in their conscience, in the sight of God, as those, who have been exterminated for their crimes, do in their bodies, in the sight of men. It was customary in ancient times to mark those with a hot iron who had been guilty of great crimes, such as sacrilege, &c. And the heathens supposed that even in the other world they bore such marks; and by these the infernal judges knew the quantum of their vices, and appointed the degrees of their punishment. There is a saying, much like that of the apostle, in the invective of Claudian against Rufinus, whom he supposes to be thus adorned, by Rhadamantus, one of the infernal judges:—

5 For it is sanctified by the word of God and prayer.

6 If thou put the brethren in remembrance of these things, thou shalt be a good minister of Jesus Christ, & nourished up in the words of faith and of good doctrine, whereunto thou hast attained.

7 But refuse profane and old wives' fables, and exercise thyself rather unto godliness.

8 For, bodily exercise profiteth little: but godliness is profitable unto all things, having promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come.

"Thou fool, why dost thou deny what is so manifest! Behold, the deep burnt marks deform thy conscience; the appearance of them has grown up with thy vices; neither can the crimes which thou hast committed hide themselves."

3. Forbidding to marry] These hypocritical priests pretending that a single life was much more favourable to devotion and to the perfection of the Christian life. This sentiment was held by the Essenes, a religious sect among the Jews; and we know that it is a favourite opinion among the Romanists, who oblige all their clergy to live a single life, by a vow of continency.

To abstain from meats] Both among the heathens, Jews, and Romanists, certain meats were prohibited. Some among others at particular times. This the apostle informs us was directly contrary to the original design of God: and says that those who know the truth, know this.

4. For every creature of God is good] That is, every creature which God has made for man's nourishment, is good for that purpose; and to be thankfully received whenever necessary for the support of human life; and nothing of that sort, is at any time to be refused, οσων αναπαρρω, rejected or despised. We find a saying very similar to this in Lactantius Timon. Omnia a Deo creata sunt ut non repugnent. The gifts which are from God ought not to be despised. This appears to have been a proverbial saying among the heathens.

5. For it is sanctified by the word of God] Dea loquitur Deum, by the command of God; probably referring to Gen. 1. 29. And God said, I have given you every herb—and every tree—to you it shall be for meat. And to ch. ix. 3. Every moving thing that liveth shall be meat for you; even as the green herb, have I given you all things; i. e. I have given you every animal that is proper for food; as I have given you every herb and fruit proper for nourishment. Therefore, all this we sanctified, set apart, and appropriated to this use, by the command. And when man is about to use it, he is to sanctify or set it apart to that use, by prayer to God: 1. That it may answer the end to us, for which it was designed: 2. That we may use it with gratitude and moderation. 3. That all the strength derived from it may be devoted to God, in filling up the duties of those situations in which His providence has placed us. Those who thank not God for their food, and pray not for His blessing in the use of it, are unworthy even of a morsel of bread, and of the breath they breathe. Babo Newton's opinion of this prophecy, I have reserved to the end of this chapter.

6. If thou put the brethren in remembrance of these things] Show the church that, even now, there is danger of this apostasy; put them on their guard against it; for, the forewarned are half-armed. Schoetgen supposes, from this verse, that what is spoken above refers to the Jews alone; and that there is no reference here to a church which in after ages might apostatize from, or corrupt, the true doctrine of our Lord and Saviour. Bishop Newton, and others, are of a different opinion.—See at the end of this chapter.

Nourished up in the words of faith] By acting as I command thee, thou wilt show that thou art a good minister of Jesus Christ; and that thou hast been nourished from thy youth up, in the doctrines of faith. The apostle seems to allude here to Timothy's Christian education.—See the Preface to this epistle.

Whereunto thou hast attained] Η ραπολονθησας; which thou hast thoroughly understood. For the meaning of this word, see the note on Luke 1. 3.

7. But refuse profane and old wives' fables] This seems to refer particularly to the Jews, whose Talmudical writings are stuffed with the most ridiculous and profane tales that ever disgraced the human intellect. It may with propriety be applied to the Legends of the Romish church; let any man read the Aurora Legenda; and he will find of profane and old wives' fables what may stand with propriety, column for column, with the Talmud.—See the Life of St. Patrick, for miracles without rhyme or reason.

9 This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation.
 10 For therefore we both labour and suffer reproach, because we trust in the living God, who is the Saviour of all men, especially of those that believe.
 11 These things command and teach.
 12 Let no man despise thy youth; but be thou an example of the believers, in word, in conversation, in charity, in a pure life, in faith, in purity.

on, abundantly more numerous and more stupendous than all the necessary ones wrought by Jesus Christ and his apostles. This is enough to persuade a man, that the Spirit of God used these very corruptions, and this corrupt church, particularly in view.

Exercise thyself rather unto godliness.] To understand his expression, it is necessary to know, that the apostle alludes here to the gymnastic exercises among the Greeks, which were intended as a preparation for their contests at public games. They did this in order to obtain a corruptible or fading crown, i. e. a chaplet of leaves, which was the reward of those who conquered in those games: Timothy was to exercise himself unto godliness, that he might be prepared for the kingdom of heaven; and there receive a crown that doth not away.—See the note on 1 Cor. ix. 24, &c.

For bodily exercise profiteth little ἵππος ἀλγος εἶναι ὀλίγος. Those gymnastic exercises, so highly esteemed among the Greeks, are but little worth; they are but of short duration; they refer only to this life, and to the applause of men: but godliness has the promise of this life, and the life to come; it is profitable for all things; and for both time and eternity.

But godliness is profitable unto all things By godliness we are to understand every thing that the Christian religion either promises or prescribes: the life of God in the soul of man; and the glory of God, as the object and end of that life. To receive the first, a man must renounce his sins, deny himself, take up his cross, and follow his Lord through evil and through good report. To obtain the latter, a man must labour to enter into that rest which remains for the people of God.

Having promise of the life that now is The man that sows, loves, and serves God, has God's blessing all through life. His religion saves him from all those excesses, both in enjoyment and passion, which sap the foundations of life, and render existence itself often a burthen. The peace and love of God in the heart produce a serenity and calm which cause a lamp of life to burn clear, strong, and permanent. Evil and disorderly passions obscure and stifle the vital spark. Every truly religious man extracts the uttermost good out of life itself; and, through the Divine blessing, gets the uttermost good that is in life; and, what is better than all, acquires a full reparation here below, for an eternal life of glory above. Thus godliness has the promise of, and secures the blessings of, both worlds.

9. This is a faithful saying] The truth of this doctrine one need doubt; and every man has it in his power to put it to the proof.—See on chap. i. 15.

10. For therefore we both labour] This verse was necessary to explain what he had before said: and here he shows that his meaning was not that the followers of God should enjoy worldly prosperity, and exemption from natural evils; for, said he, it is because we exercise ourselves to godliness that we have both labour and reproach; and we have these because we trust in the living God; but still we have mental happiness, and all that is necessary for our passage through life:—for, in the midst of persecutions and afflictions we have the peace of God that passeth knowledge; and have all our sorrows and sufferings so sanctified to us, that we consider them in the number of our blessings.

Who is the Saviour of all men] Who has provided salvation for the whole human race; and has freely offered it to men in His word, and by His Spirit.
Especially of those that believe.] What God intends for ALL, He actually gives to them that believe in Christ, who died for the sins of the world; and tasted death for every man. As all have been purchased by His blood, so all may believe; and consequently all may be saved. Those that perish, perish through their own fault.

11. These things command and teach.] Let it be the substance of thy preaching, that true religion is profitable for both worlds: that vice destroys both body and soul; that Christ tasted death for every man; and that He saves to uttermost all them that believe in His name.

12. Let no man despise thy youth] Act with all the gravity and decorum which become thy situation in the church. Thou art in the place of an elder, act as an elder. Boyish affectation will become a minister of the Gospel, whatever his age may be. Concerning Timothy's age, see the conclusion of the Preface to this epistle.

Be thou an example of the believers] It is natural for the flock to follow the shepherd; if he go wrong, they will go wrong also:—

"Himself a wanderer from the narrow way;
 His silly sheep, no wonder if they stray."
 hough, according to the just judgment of God, they who die their sins have brought their blood on their own head; yet, if they live either gone into sin, or continued in it through the steward's fault, their blood will God require at his hand. Our many have endeavoured to excuse their transgressions pie of the believers, in word, in conversation, in charity, in spirit, in faith, in purity.

13 Till I come, give attendance to reading, to exhortation, to doctrine.

14 Neglect not the gift that is in thee, which was given thee by prophecy, with the laying on of the hands of the presbytery.

by alleging, in vindication of their conduct, "Our minister does so; and he is more wise and learned than we." What an awful account must such have to give to the Head of the church when he appears!

In word] Ἐν λόγῳ, in doctrine; teaching nothing but the truth of God; because nothing but that will save souls.

In conversation] Ἐν ἀναστροφῇ, in the whole of thy conduct, in every department which thou fillest; in all thy domestic as well as public relations. Behave thyself well.

In charity] Ἐν ἀγάπῃ, in love to God and man; show that this is the principle and motive of all thy conduct.

In spirit] Ἐν πνεύματι, in the manner and disposition in which thou dost all things. How often is a holy or charitable work done in an unholy, uncharitable, and peevish spirit! To the doer, such work is unfruitful.

These words are wanting in ACDGFG, and several others; both the Syriac, Erpen's Arabic, Ethiopic, Armenian, Vulgate, and Itala, and many of the Fathers. Griesbach leaves them out of the text. They have in all probability been added by a later hand.

In faith] Ἐν πίστει. This word πίστις, is probably taken here for fidelity; a sense which it often bears in the New Testament. It cannot mean doctrine, for that has been referred to before. Be faithful to thy trust, to thy flock, to thy domestics, to the public, to thy God. Fidelity consists in honestly keeping, preserving, and delivering up when required, whatever is entrusted to our care; and also in improving whatever is delivered in trust, for that purpose. Lose nothing that God gives; and improve every gift that he bestows.

In purity] Ἐν ἀγιότητι, chastity of body and mind; a direction peculiarly necessary for a young minister, who has more temptations to break its rules, than perhaps any other person. "Converse sparingly with women, and especially with young women," was the advice of a very holy and experienced minister of Christ.

13. Give attendance to reading] Timothy could easily comprehend the apostle's meaning: but at present this is not so easy. What books does the apostle mean? The books of the Old Testament were probably what was intended; these testified of Jesus: and by these he could either convince or confound the Jews. But, whether was the reading of these to be public or private? Probably both. It was customary to read the law and the prophets in the synagogue; and doubtless in the assemblies of the Christians; after which there was generally an exhortation founded upon the subject of the prophecy. Hence the apostle says, give attendance to reading, to exhortation, to doctrine. Timothy was therefore to be diligent in reading the Sacred Writings at home, that he might be the better qualified to read and expound them in the public assemblies, to the Christians, and to others who came to these public meetings.

As to other books, there were not many at that time that could be of much use to a Christian minister. In those days, the great business of the preacher was to bring forward the grand facts of Christianity, to prove these, and to show that all had happened according to the prediction of the prophets; and from these, to show the work of God in the heart; and the evidence of that work in a holy life.

At present, the truth of God is not only to be proclaimed, but defended; and many customs or manners, and forms of speech, which are to us obsolete, must be explained from the writings of the ancients; and particularly from the works of those who lived about the same times, or nearest to them; and in the same or contiguous countries. This will require the knowledge of those languages in which those works have been composed; the chief of which are Hebrew and Greek, the languages in which the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments have been originally written.

Latin is certainly of the next consequence; a language in which some of the most early comments have been written; and it is worth the trouble of being learned, were it only for the sake of the works of St. Jerome, who translated and wrote a commentary on the whole of the Scriptures.

Arabic and Syriac may be added with great advantage; the latter being in effect the language in which Christ and His apostles spoke and preached in Judea; and the former being radically the same with the Hebrew; and preserving many of the roots of that language, the derivatives of which often occur in the Hebrew Bible; but the roots, never.

The works of various scholars prove, of how much consequence even the writings of heathen authors, chiefly those of Greece and Italy, are to the illustration of the Sacred Writings. And he who is best acquainted with the Sacred Records, will avail himself of such helps, with gratitude both to God and man. Though so many languages and so much reading, are not absolutely necessary to form a minister of the Gospel; for there are many eminent ministers who have not such advantages; yet they are helps of the first magnitude to those who have them.

15 Meditate upon these things; give thyself wholly to them; that thy profiting may appear * to all.

16 *Take heed unto thyself, and unto thy doctrine; continue

o Or, in all things.—Acta 20.28.—Ezek. 33.9.

14. Neglect not the gift that is in thee) The word χάρισμα, here must refer to the gifts and graces of the Divine Spirit, which Timothy received when set apart to the work of an evangelist by the imposition of St. Paul's hands, 2 Tim. i. 6. and by that of the presbytery or eldership; for it most evidently appears from this verse, and that above quoted, that he received this double imposition; not probably at different times, but on one and the same occasion. These very gifts and graces might be improved: and we have reason to believe, if not improved, would be withdrawn, by the great Head of the church.

Given thee by prophecy) It has already been conjectured, (see the Preface, and the note on ch. i. 18,) that there had been some remarkable prediction relative to the future destiny and usefulness of Timothy. And probably it was in consequence of this, that he was set apart to the office of evangelist and bishop in the church at Ephesus. When apostles laid their hands on men, they ordinarily received the Holy Spirit with this imposition. This may be what the apostle calls to the remembrance of Timothy; and tells him not to neglect what he had received; nor the purpose for which he had received it.

15. Meditate upon these things) Ταύρα μέλη; Revolve them frequently in thy mind; consider deeply their nature and importance: get them deeply fastened in thy heart; and let all thy conduct flow from this inward feeling and conviction. Let the nature, reasons, and motives, of thy ministry be ever in the view of thy heart and conscience.

Give thyself wholly to them) Εὐ τούτοις σκόπῃ, be thou in these things. Horace has a similar expression, omnis in hoc sum.—"I am absorbed in this." Occupy thyself wholly with them: make them not only thy chief, but thy sole concern. Thou art called to save thy own soul, and the souls of them that hear thee: and God has given thee the Divine gifts for this, and no other purpose. To this let all thy reading and study be directed: this is thy great business; and thou must perform it as the servant and steward of the Lord. Bengel has a good saying on this verse, which I will quote. In his, quis est, minus erit in sodalitatibus mundanis, in studiis alienis, in colligendis libris; concubis, nummis, quibus multi Pastores notabiliter otiosis partem insistentes, conterunt, "He who is wholly in these things, will be little in worldly company, in foreign studies; in collecting books, shells, and coins, in which many ministers consume a principal part of their life." Such persons are worthy of the deepest reprobation, unless all these studies, collections, &c. be formed with the express view of illustrating the Sacred Records: and to such awful drudgery, few Christian ministers are called. Many, when they have made such collections, seem to know nothing of their use: they only see them, and show them; but can never bring them to their assistance in the work of the ministry. These should be prayed for, and pitied.

That thy profiting may appear to all) By being made a universal blessing: convincing and converting sinners; and building up the church of God on its most holy faith.

15. Take heed unto thyself) See that the life of God remains, and the work of God prospers, in thine own soul. Take heed to thy doctrine; that the matter be pure and orthodox: that thou teach nothing for truth, but what God has revealed.

Continue in them) I. e. In taking heed to thyself and to thy doctrine: for this must be thy continual study. Without this, the Divine influence shall recede from thy heart; and the Divine gift from thy intellect; and, like Samson shorn of his strength, thou wilt soon become as another man: as any common man: thy power will depart from thee, and thou shalt be no longer able to persuade; the uncion shall depart from thee: and destitute of spiritual feeling thyself, thou shalt not be able to cause others to feel. Take the apostle's advice, and thou shalt save thy own soul, and the souls of them that hear thee.

In the course of the preceding notes, I have referred to Bishop Newton's opinion and application of the prophecy contained in the first five verses. Not being fully persuaded in my own mind to what church this, and the prophecy in the Epistle to the Thessalonians, should be applied, I produce an accredited author, who, for his Dissertations on the Prophecies, has a high and honoured name in the church.

"1. The first thing to be considered is, the apostacy here predicted. 'Some shall depart, or rather apostatize from the faith.' An apostacy from the faith, may be either total, or partial; either when we renounce the whole, or when we deny some principal and essential article of it. It is not every error or every heresy, that is apostacy from the faith. It is a revolt in a principal and essential article; when we worship God by any image or representation, or when we worship other beings besides God, and pray unto other mediators, besides the one Mediator between God and man, the man Christ Jesus. This is the very essence of Christian worship, to worship the one true God, through the one true Christ; and to worship any other god, or any other mediator, is apostacy and rebellion against God, and against Christ. Such is the nature of apostacy from the faith; and it is implied, that this apostacy shall be general, and affect great numbers. For though it be said, only some shall apostatize; yet by some here, many are understood. The original word frequently signifies a multitude; and there are abundant instances in Scripture where it is used in that sense, as the reader may perceive from John vi. 64—68. Rom. xi. 17. 1 Cor. x. 5. &c. This apostacy may be general and extensive, and include many, but not all.

in them: for in doing this thou shalt both * save thyself, and * them that hear thee.

"II. It is more particularly shown wherein the apostacy should consist, in the following words:—giving heed to collecting spirits and doctrines of devils; or rather, giving heed to errors, spirits and doctrines concerning demons. Spirits seem to be much the same in sense as doctrines; the latter word may be considered as explanatory of the former; and error sometimes signifying idolatry, erroneous doctrines may comprehend idolatrous, as well as false doctrines. But it is still farther added, for explanation, that these doctrines should be doctrines of devils, or of demons, where the genitive case is not to be taken actively, as if demons were the authors of these doctrines; but passively, as if demons were the subject of these doctrines. In Jer. x. 8. Acta xiii. 12. Heb. vi. 2. the genitive case is used in this manner; and by the same construction, doctrines of demons are doctrines about or concerning demons. This is, therefore, a prophecy, that the idolatrous theology of demons, professed by the Gentiles, should be revived among Christians. Demons, according to the theology of the Gentiles, were middle powers between the gods and mortal men; and were regarded as mediators and agents between the gods and men. Of these demons there were accounted two kinds: one kind were the souls of men deified or canonized after death; the other kind were such as had never been the souls of men, nor ever dwelt in mortal bodies. These latter demons may be paralleled with angels, as the former may with canonized saints: and as we Christians believe that there are good and evil angels, so do the Gentiles that there were good and evil demons. It appears, then, as if the doctrine of demons, which prevailed so long in the heathen world, were to be revived and established in the Christian church. And is not the worship of saints and angels now, in all respects, the same that the worship of demons was in former times? The name only is different; the thing is essentially the same. The heathens looked upon their demons as mediators and intercessors between God and men; and are not the saints and angels regarded in the same light by many professed Christians? The promoters of this worship were sensible that it was the same, and that the one succeeded the other; and as the worship is the same, so likewise it is performed with the same ceremonies. Nay, the very same images, the very same images, the very same altars, which once were consecrated to Jupiter, and the other demons, and now re-consecrated to the Virgin Mary and other saints. The very same titles and inscriptions are ascribed to both; the very same prodigies and miracles are related of these as of them. In short, the whole almost of paganism, is converted and applied to popery; the one is manifestly formed upon the same plan and principles as the other.

"III. Such an apostacy as this, of reviving the doctrines of demons, and worshipping the dead, was not likely to take place immediately; it should prevail and prosper in the latter days. The phrase of the latter times, or days, or the last times, or days, signifies any time yet to come; but denotes more particularly the times of Christianity. The times of Christianity may properly be called the latter times, or days; or the last times, or days; because it is the last of all God's revelations to mankind. Heb. i. 1, 2. 1 Pet. i. 20.

"IV. Another remarkable peculiarity of this prophecy is the solemn and emphatic manner in which it is delivered. The Spirit speaketh expressly. By the Spirit is meant the Holy Spirit of God, which inspired the prophets and apostles. The Spirit speaking expressly, may signify His speaking precisely and certainly, not obscurely and involuntarily, as He is wont to speak in the prophets; or it may be said, the Spirit speaketh expressly, when He speaks in express words in some place or other of Divine Writ; and the Spirit hath spoken the same thing in express words before in the prophecy of Daniel. Daniel has foretold, in express words, the worship of new demons or demi-gods. Dan. xi. 38. The wahezzuzim of Daniel are the same as the demons of St. Paul; gods protectors, or saints protectors, defenders and guardians of mankind. This, therefore, is a prophecy, not merely dictated by private suggestion and inspiration, but taken out of the written word. It is a prophecy not only of St. Paul's, but of Daniel's too; or rather of Daniel, confirmed and approved by St. Paul.

"V. The apostle proceeds, ver. 2. to describe by what means, and by what persons, this apostacy should be propagated and established in the world; speaking lies in hypocrisy, &c. or, rather, through the hypocrisy of liars, having their consciences, &c. for the preposition rendered in, frequently signifies through or by. Liars too, or speaking lies, cannot possibly be joined with the original word rendered some, and that rendered giving heed, because they are in the nominative case, and thus in in the genitive. Neither can it well be joined in construction with the word rendered devils, or demons; for how can demons, or devils, be said to speak lies in hypocrisy? and to have their vengeance seared, &c. It is plain, then, that the great apostasy of the latter times was to prevail, through the hypocrisy of heresies, &c. And has not the great idolatry of Christians, and the worship of the dead particularly, been diffused and advanced in the world, by such instruments and agents; by fabulous books, forged under the names of the apostles and saints; by fabulous legends of their lives; by fabulous miracles ascribed to their relics; by fabulous dreams and revelations; and even by fabulous saints, who never existed but in imagination?

¶ VI. 3. Forbidding to marry, &c.] This is a farther character of the promoters of this apostasy. The same hypocritical liars, who should promote the worship of demons, should also prohibit lawful marriage. The monks were the first who brought a single life into repute; they were the first also who revived and promoted the worship of demons. One of the primary and most essential laws and constitutions of all monks, was the profession of a single life: and it is equally clear that the monks had the principal share in promoting the worship of the dead. The monks then were the principal promoters of the worship of the dead in former times. And who are the great patrons and advocates of the same worship now? Are not their legitimate successors and descendants the monks, and priests, and bishops, of the church of Rome? And do not they also profess and recommend a single life, as well as the worship of saints and angels? Thus have the worship of demons, and the prohibition of marriage, constantly gone hand in hand together; and as they who maintain one, maintain the other; so it is no less remarkable, that they who disclaim the one, disclaim the other.

¶ VII. The last mark and character of these men is commanding to abstain from meats, &c. The same lying hypocrites who should promote the worship of demons, should not only prohibit lawful marriage, but likewise impose unnecessary abstinence from meats; and these, too, as indeed it is fit they should, usually go together as constituent parts of the same hypocrisy. It is as much the law of monks to abstain from meats, as from marriage. Some never eat any flesh; others only certain kinds, on certain days. Frequent fasts are the rule and boasts of their orders. So lived the monks of the ancient church; so live, with less strictness, perhaps, but with greater ostentation, the monks, and friars, of the church of Rome; and these have been the principal propagators and defenders of the worship of the dead, both in former and in latter times. The worship of the dead is, indeed, so monstrously absurd, as well as impious, that there was hardly any probability of its ever prevailing in the world, but by hypocrisy and lies. But that these particular sorts of hypocrisy—cellularity, under pretence of chastity; and abstinence, under pretence of devotion; should be employed for this purpose, the Spirit of God alone could foresee and foretell. There is no necessary connexion between the worship of the dead, and forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats; and yet it is certain, that the great advocates for this worship have, by their pretended purity and mortification, procured the greater reverence to their persons, and the readier reception to their doctrines. But this idle, popish, monkish abstinence, is as unworthy of a Christian, as it is unnatural to a man; it is preventing the purpose of nature, and commanding to abstain from meats, which God hath created to be received with thanksgiving by believers, and them who know the truth."—See Bishop Newton's Dissertations on the Prophecies; and Dr. Dodd's Notes.

Which mode of interpretation is best, I shall not attempt to say; to determine the meaning of prophecies, is a difficult task: and, in a case of this kind, I rather choose to trust to the judgment of others than to my own. It is to be deplored that all the preceding particulars apply but too well to the corruptions in the Romish Church; therefore to it, they appear peculiarly applicable. But whether God had this church alone in view, I dare not affirm.

NOTES.—Verse 1. Rebuke not an elder] That is, an elderly eron; for the word speuðerpos, is here taken in its natural use; and signifies one advanced in years. At ver. 17. it is then in what may be termed its ecclesiastical meaning, and signifies an officer in the church; what we commonly call a rector or bishop; for, sometimes these terms were conund. There are but few cases in which it at all becomes young man to reprove an old man; and especially one who a father in the church. If such a one does wrong, or gets it of the way, he should be entreated as a father, with great ation and respect. To this, at least, his age entitles him. he word ειρηλεις, signifies, do not smite; i. e. do not treat em harshly, nor with magisterial austerity.

The younger men as brethren] Showing humility and arguing nothing to thyself on account of thy office. Feel for em as thou oughtest to feel for thy own brethren. The elder women as mothers] Treating them with the spect due to their age.

The younger as sisters] Feel for every member of the arch, old and young, male and female: consider them as bers, mothers, brothers, and sisters: treat them all with geness, and labour to keep them in, not to expel them from, church.

With all purity] Ev tachy agneti, with all chastity. See the e on ch. iv. 12.

There are some who seem to take a barbarous pleasure in illing members from the church. They should be conti- d in, as long as possible; while they are in the church, nists ordinations and discipline, there is some hope that their rs may be corrected: but when once driven out again into world, that hope must necessarily become extinct. As gment is God's strange work; so excommunication should the strange, the last, and the most reluctantly performed k of every Christian minister.

Honour widows that are widows indeed] One meaning be word τιμαω, to honour, is to support, sustain, &c. Matt. 45. and here it is most obviously to be taken in this sense. vide for those widows especially which are widows indeed; ones truly destitute, being aged and helpless; and having her children nor friends to take care of them; and who are as become their destitute state. But see the note on 10.

But if any widow have children or nephews] This shows widows indeed, are those that have neither children nor first to show piety at home, and to requite their parents; for that is good and acceptable before God. Now she that is a widow indeed, and desolate, trusteth in God, and continueth in supplications and prayer night and day.

But she that liveth in pleasure is dead while she liveth.

Chap. 2.3.—71 Cor. 7.22.—g Luke 2.27. & 10. 1.—h Acts 21.7.—i James 5.5.—k Or, delicately.

nephews; i. e. no relatives that either will or can help them; or no near relatives alive.

Let them learn first to show piety at home] Let these children and nephews provide for their aged or helpless parents or relatives, and not burden the church with them, while they are able to support them. And to requite their parents] Kai apoitas avoθιδουαι τοις προγονοις. Let them learn to give benefit for benefit. Your parents supported and nourished you, when you were young and helpless: you ought, therefore, to support them, when they are old and destitute. This is called showing piety: and there is doubtless an allusion to the fifth commandment, honour thy father and thy mother; provide for them in their old age and afflictions: God commands this.

And desolate] Kai μωνωμενην, left entirely alone; having neither children nor relatives to take care of her.

Trusteth in God] Finding she has no other helper, she continues in prayer and supplication, that she may derive that from God, which, in the course of His providence, he has deprived her of among men.

But she that liveth in pleasure] *Η δε καταλωσα, she that liveth delicately; voluptuously indulging herself with dainties; it does not indicate grossly criminal pleasures; but simply means one who indulges herself in good eating and drinking; pampering her body at the expense of her mind. The word is used in reference to what we term spoiled children; and a remarkable passage is produced by Kypke, from an Epistle of Theonas to Eusebium, found in Opera Misc. Galim. page 741. where he says, "What can be done with that boy, who, if he have not food when and as he pleases, bursts out into weeping: and if he eat, must have dainties and sweetmeats. If the weather be hot, he complains of fatigue; or if it be cold, he trembles: if he be reproved, he scolds: if every thing be not provided for him, according to his wish, he is enraged. If he eats not, he breaks out into fits of anger. He basely indulges himself in pleasure; and in every respect acts voluptuously and effeminately. Knowing then, O friend, οτι τα παραλωρα τα παιδιον σταν ακαριας προς αυδας αποτροδα γινεται, τας τοιαυτας ηδονας απαιρει: that boys living thus voluptuously, when they grow up, are wont to become slaves; take away, therefore, such pleasures from them." I have introduced this long quotation, the better to fix the meaning of the apostle, and to show that the life of pleasure mentioned here, does not mean prostitution, or uncleanness of* 7 And these things give in charge, that they may be blameless.

8 But if any provide not for his own, and especially for those of his own house, he hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel.

9 Let not a widow be taken into the number under threescore years old, having been the wife of one man.

10 Well reported of for good works; if she have brought up children, if she have lodged strangers, if she have washed the saints' feet, if she have relieved the afflicted, if she have diligently followed every good work.

11 But the younger widows refuse: for when they have begun to wax wanton against Christ, they will marry; any kind, though such a life may naturally lead to dissolute manners.

Is dead while she liveth] No purpose of life is answered by the existence of such a person. Seneca, in Epist. 80, says of pleasure-takers, and those who live a voluptuous life: Nos quoque animalium hinc numeramus, nos hominum: quodam sero ne animalium quidem, sed mortuorum—mortem antecesserunt. "We rank such persons with brutes, not with men; and some of them even with brutes, but with dead carcases. They anticipate their own death." Such persons are, as the apostle says elsewhere, dead in trespasses, and dead in sin.

That they may be blameless.] Charge the whole church to attend to these things that they may be blameless. The words are not spoken of the widows only, but of the church or its officers; it cannot be restricted to the widows, for the adjective ωνιδωτας, is both of the maeculines and feminine gender.

8. But if any provide not for his own] His own people, or relatives.

Those of his own house] That is, his own family; or a poor widow or relative that lives under his roof.

Hath denied the faith] The Christian religion, which strongly inculcates love and benevolence to all mankind.

Is worse than an infidel.] For, what are called the dictates of nature lead men to feel for, and provide for, their own families. Heathen writers are full of maxims of this kind: Taurus says, Liberos cuique ac propinquos NATURA carissimos esse voluit. "Nature dictates, that to every one, his own children and relatives should be most dear." And Cicero, in Epist. ad Capitonem. Suos quisque debet tueri. "Every man should take care of his own family."

9. Taken into the number] Let her not be taken into the list of those for which the church must provide. But some think that the apostle means the list of those who were deaconesses in the church; and that no widow was to be admitted into that rank who did not answer to the following character.—See below on ver. 10.

Under threescore years] As it might be supposed that previously to this age, they might be able to do something towards their own support.—See on ver. 10.

Having been the wife of one man] Having lived in conjugal fidelity with her husband; or, having had but one husband at a time; or, according to others, having never been but once married. But the former is the opinion of some of the most eminent of the Greek fathers; and appears to be that most consistent with the scope of the place, and with truth.

10. Well reported of for good works] Numbers being able to bear testimony as the word implies, that she has not only avoided all sin; but that she has walked according to the testimony of God.

Brought up children] It was customary among the Gentiles to expose their children, when so poor that they were not able to provide for them. Pious and humane people took these up; and fed, clothed, and educated them. The words brought up may refer to the children of others who were educated in the Christian faith by pious Christian women.

Lodged strangers] If she have been given to hospitality; freely contributing to the necessitous, when she had it in her power.

Washed the saints' feet] This was an office of humanity shown to all strangers and travellers in the eastern countries; who either walking barefoot, or having only a sort of sole to defend the foot, needed washing when they came to their journey's end. Pious women generally did this act of kindness.

Relieved the afflicted] Visited and ministered to the sick. Diligently followed every good work.] In a word, that she has been altogether a Christian, living according to the precepts of the Gospel; and doing the Lord's work with all her heart, soul, and strength.

From the character given here of the widow indeed, it may be doubted whether χρησ, widow, was not, in some cases, the name of an office, which name it might have from being ordinarily filled by widows. It can hardly be supposed that any widow, unless she had considerable property, could have done the things enumerated in this verse, some of which would occasion no small expense. The widow indeed, may mean a person who was to be employed in some office in the church; and Timothy is enjoined not to take any into that office, unless she had been before remarkable for piety and humanity. Some think that the widows of whom the apostle speaks, had 12 Having damnation, because they have cast off their last faith.

13 And withal they learn to be idle, wandering about from house to house; and not only idle, but tattlers also and busy bodies, speaking things which they ought not.

14 I will therefore that the younger women marry, bear children, guide the house, give none occasion to the adversary to speak reproachfully.

15 For some are already turned aside after Satan.

16 If any man or woman that believeth have widows, let him relieve them, and let not the church be charged; that it may relieve them that are widows indeed.

17 Let the elders that rule well be counted worthy of double honour, especially they that are diligent in the word.

been deaconesses, and wished now to be taken on what might be termed the supernumerated list; and the apostle lays down rules for the admission of such; the sum of which is, Let us come on this supernumerated list, unless she be at least 60 years of age, and can bring proof of her having conscientiously discharged the office and duty of a deaconess.

But the younger widows refuse] Do not admit these into this office who are under 60 years of age. Probably those who were received into such a list, promised to abide in that widowhood. But as young, or comparatively young women, might have both occasion and temptations to remarry, and so break their engagement to Christ, they should not be admitted. Not that the apostle condemns their remarrying as a crime in itself, but because it was contrary to their engagement.—See on ver. 14.

Was wanton] Καρσπιπρωσει, from καρσ, intensive, and πρωσει, to act in a luxurious or wanton manner. The word is supposed to be derived from σπειρι, to remove, and ειν, to rein; and is a metaphor taken from a pampered horse, from whose mouth the rein has been removed; so that there is nothing to check or confine him. The metaphor is plain enough and the application easy.

12. Having damnation] In the sense in which we use the word, I am satisfied, the apostle never intended it. It is likely that he refers here to some promise or engagement which they made when taken on the list already mentioned; and now they have the guilt of having violated that promise; this is απει, or condemnation, of which the apostle speaks.

They have cast off their first faith] By pledging their fidelity to a husband, they have cast off their fidelity to Christ; at married life and their previous engagement are incompatible. Dr. Macknight translates these two verses thus:—But the younger widows reject; for when they cannot endure Christ's rein, they will marry: incurring condemnation, because they have put away their first fidelity.

13. And withal, they learn to be idle] They do not labour; and they will not work.

Wandering about from house to house] Gadding, gossiping; never contented with home; always visiting.

And not only idle] If it went no farther, this would be tolerable; but they are tattlers, talebearers, whisperers, gossips, sifting persons; all noise and no work.

Busy-bodies] Persons who meddle with the concerns of others; who mind every one's business but their own.

Speaking things which they ought not.] Lies, slanders, calumnies; backbiting their neighbours, and every way sowing the seeds of dissension.

14. I will therefore that the younger women marry] In the preceding discourse has been about the younger widows; and this is an inference from it; it is most evident that by the younger women the apostle means the young widows. Thus he considers unfit for the office of the female deaconess; and therefore wills them to marry, educate children, and give themselves wholly up to domestic affairs. Here the apostle so far from forbidding second marriages, positively enjoins at least recommends them. And what man of sense would have done otherwise, in the cases he mentions? It is not in any case, to marry, bear children, and take care of a family; but it is a sin in every case to be idle persons, gossips about, tattlers, busy-bodies, sifting out and detailing family secrets, &c. &c. The good sentiment put by an able poet, and placed divine, into the mouths of little children, cannot be so applied to multitudes of women, mothers, and grandmothers:

"See how the little busy bee
Improves each shining hour!
And gathers honey all the day
From every opening flower!
In works of labour or of skill,
We should be busy too:
For Satan finds some mischief still,
For idle hands do fall."
Dr. Watts.

The adversary] Any person, whether Jew or Gentile, who might be watching for an occasion to reproach, through the misconduct of its professors, the cause of Christianity.

15. For some are already turned aside] Some of these young widows, for as appears to be still treating of them, are turned aside to idolatry, to follow Satan instead of Christ. Slight deviations, in the first instance, from a right line, may lead at last to an infinite distance from Christ.

16. If any man or woman that believeth] If any Christian man or woman have poor widows, which are their relatives, the honour, especially they who labour in the word and doctrine.

18 For the scripture saith, Thou shalt not muzzle the ox that treadeth out the corn. And, The labourer is worthy of his reward.

19 Against an elder receive not an accusation, but before two or three witnesses.

20 Charge that sin rebuke before all, that others also may fear.

21 I thank thee before God, and the Lord Jesus Christ, and of them relieve them; provide them with the necessities of life, and not burden the church with their maintenance, that he funds may be spared for the support of those widows who are employed in its service, teaching children, visiting the sick, &c. &c. For the performing of such offices, it is very likely that some but widows were employed; and these were chosen, other things being equal, out of the most indigent of the widows, and therefore called by the apostle here and in ver. 3. τας ορφανους χηρας, widows indeed; widows desolate, without support, and without relatives. See the note on ver. 10.

17. Let the elders that rule well Elder is, probably, here the name of an ecclesiastical officer; similar to what we now term presbyter.—See on ver. 1. Dr. Macknight has remarked, that "in the first age, the name presbyteros, elder, was given to all who exercised any sacred office in the church, as is plain from Acts x. 23. where the persons are called presbyteroi, bishops, who, ver. 17. were called presbyteroi, elders. The same thing appears from Titus 1. 5. where those are called elders, who, ver. 7. are named bishops; and from 1 Tim. iv. 14. where collectively, all who held sacred offices in Lystra, are called presbyteroi, the presbytery or eldership; and are said to have concurred with St. Paul in setting Timothy apart to be ministry."

Double honour Διπλος τιμη. Almost every critic of note allows that τιμη, here, signifies reward, stipend, wages. Let him have a double, or a larger salary who rules well; and why? Because in the discharge of his office, he must be at expense, in proportion to his diligence, in visiting and relieving the sick, in lodging and providing for strangers: in a word; in his being given to hospitality, which was required of every bishop or presbyter.

Especially they who labour in the word and doctrine. Those who do not only preach publicly, but instruct privately, teach, &c. Some think this refers to distinct ecclesiastical orders; but these technical distinctions were, in my opinion, a work of later times.

18. The Scripture saith, Thou shalt not muzzle the ox [this is a manifest proof that by τιμη, honour, in the preceding verse, the apostle means salary or wages. "Let the elders that rule well be accounted worthy of double honour," a larger salary than any of the official widows mentioned before, "for the labourer is worthy of his hire." The maintenance of every man in the church should be in proportion to his own labour, and the necessities of his family. He that does no work, should have no wages. In the church of Christ here never can be a sinecure. They who minister at the altar, should live by the altar; the ox that treadeth out the corn should not be muzzled; the labourer is worthy of his hire; but the altar should not support him who does not minister at it; if the ox won't tread out the corn, let him go to be common, or be muzzled; if the man will not labour, let him have no hire.

19. Against an elder Be very cautious of receiving evil reports against those whose business it is to preach to others, and correct their vices. Do not consider an elder as guilty of any alleged crime, unless it be proved by two or three witnesses. This the law of Moses required in respect to all. Among the Romans, a plebeian might be condemned on the deposition of one credible witness; but it required two in convict a senator. The reason of this difference is evident; those whose business it is to correct others, will usually have many enemies; great caution, therefore, should be used in admitting accusations against such persons.

20. Them that sin rebuke before all That is, before the members of the church; which was the custom of the Jews in their synagogues. But if the words refer to the elders alone, then the transgressing elder is to be reproved before his fellows, and be tried by them.

That others also may fear. This is the grand object of church censure, to reclaim the transgressors; and to give warning to others.

21. I charge thee before God The apostle would have Timothy to consider that all he did should be done as in the sight of God, the Father of the spirits of all flesh; in the sight of Christ, the Saviour of sinners, who purchased the church with His own blood; and in the sight of the most holy, approved, and eminent angels, whose office it was to minister to the heirs of salvation. The word elect, elect, applied to the angels here, is supposed to distinguish those whose blood, when others fell from their first estate. The former were elect, or approved: the latter reprobate, or disapproved. This is not an unfrquent sense of the word elect, elect. Perhaps here is nothing else meant than the angels that are chosen out from among others, by the Lord himself, to be ministering servants to the church.

the elect angels, that thou observe these things, without preferring one before another, doing nothing by partiality.

22 Lay hands suddenly on no man, neither be partaker of other men's sins: keep thyself pure.

23 Drink no longer water, but use a little wine for thy stomach's sake and thine often infirmities.

24 Some men's sins are open beforehand, going before to judgment; and some men they follow after.

25 Likewise also the good works of some are manifest beforehand; and they that are otherwise cannot be hid.

Without preferring one before another) Χηρις προηρητας, without prejudice. Promote no man's cause; make not up thy mind on any case, till thou have weighed both sides, and heard both parties, with their respective witnesses; and then act impartially, as the matter may appear to be proved. Do not treat any man, in religious matters, according to the rank he holds in life; or according to any personal attachment thou mayest have for him. Every man should be dealt with in the church, as he will be dealt with at the judgment-seat of Christ. A minister of the Gospel, who, in the exercise of discipline in the church, is awayed and warped by secular considerations, will be a curse rather than a blessing to the people of God. Accepting the persons of the rich, in ecclesiastical matters, has been a source of corruption in Christianity. With some ministers, the show of piety, in a rich man, goes farther than the soundest Christian experience in the poor. What account can such persons give of their stewardship!

22. Lay hands suddenly on no man Do not hastily appoint any person to the sacred ministry; let the person be well proved, before he receives the imposition of hands. Some understand this of laying hands on the sick.

Neither be partaker of other men's sins) It is a sin for any improper person to thrust himself into the sacred office; and he partakes of that sin who introduces, helps him forward, or sanctions him in it. O what an account will rash, undiscerning, and prejudiced bishops, presbyters, and others, have to render to God for their ordinations! Their laying rash or careless hands, "on skulls that cannot teach, and will not learn;" while probably they refuse inducting others well qualified for the Christian ministry.

Keep thyself pure) From this and every other evil.

23. Drink no longer water, but use a little wine) The whole of this verse seems, to several learned critics and divines, strongly inserted in this place: it might have been, according to them, a note which the apostle inserted in the margin of his letter, on recollecting the precarious state of Timothy's health, and his great abstemiousness and self-denial. I believe the verse to be in its proper place; and, for reasons which I shall adduce, not less necessary than the directions which precede and follow it. But it may be necessary to inquire a little into the reasons of the advice itself. The priests, under the Mosaic law, while performing sacred rites, were forbidden to drink wine. Do not drink wine, nor strong drink, thou, nor thy sons with thee, when ye go into the tabernacle of the congregation, lest ye die: it shall be a statute for ever through your generations. Levit. x. 9. Ezek. xlv. 21. It was the same with the Egyptian priests. It was forbidden also among the Romans; and particularly to women and young persons. PLATO De Legibus, lib. ii. Edit. Bip. Vol. viii. page 86, speaks thus.—Αρ' ου νομοθετησαν, πρωτον, μεν τους παιδας μεχρι των οκτωκαιδεκα, τοσκαπαν οινου μη γινεσθαι;—μετα δε τουτο, οινου μεν δηλωσαντες τους μετρονς μεχρι τριακοντα στων—τετραρακοντα δε επιβαινοντα στων εν τοις υσοστοιχοις ευνοηθηντα, κ. τ. λ. "Shall we not ordain by law in the first place, that boys shall not, on any account, taste wine, till they are sixteen years old?—In the next place we should inform them that wine is to be used moderately till they are thirty years old!—But when they have attained the fortieth year, then they may attend feasts:—for Bacchus has bestowed wine upon men, as a remedy against the austerity of old age, της του γαρου ανθρωπων εδωρησαντο, τον οινον φαρμακον ωσ' ανθηρας, και ουσουνας ληθην γινεσθαι, μαλακωτερον δε ελληροτερον το της υφης οβος, καθαρην τις ηωρ σιδρον εναντιον γινεσθαι: that through this, we might acquire a second youth, forget sorrow, and the manners of the mind be rendered softer, as iron is softened by the action of fire." But wine, according to the assertions of some, was given to men as a preservative; that they might be rendered insane, β ε του λεγομενου ορ' ημου, φαρμακον εν τωσκαπαν οινου αιδου μεν υφης κτηνος τετα δεσθαι, εωσκαπαν δε υφιας τε και τεχνης; page 100. "but we have now said, that it is, on the contrary, medicine; and was given that the soul might acquire modesty, and the body health and vigour."

From Athenæus we learn that the Greeks often mingled their wine with water; sometimes one part of wine to two of water; three parts of water to one of wine; and, at other times, three parts of water to two of wine.—See his Deipnosophista, lib. ix. "Among the Locrians, if any one was found to have drunken unmixed wine, unless prescribed by a physician, he was punished with death; the laws of Zaleucus so requiring.—And among the Romans, no servant, nor free woman, ουτε των λευθερων οι εφηβοι μεχρι τριακοντα στων, nor youths of quality, drank any wine till they were thirty years of age." Theophrastus. Mb. x. c. 7. p. 499. And it was a maxim among all, that continued water-drinking injured the stomach. Thus Libanius, Epist. 1573. Πικραστόν τὰς κλίβανους ὑμῶν τὰς ἀνεπισημασμένους ἀποδοξίαις: "Our stomach is weakened by continual water-drinking."

From ch. iv. 12 we learn that Timothy was a young man: but as among the Greeks and Romans the state of youth, or adolescence, was extended to thirty years, and no respectable young men were permitted to drink wine before that time; allowing that Timothy was about twenty when Paul had him circumcised, which was, according to Calmet, in the year of our Lord 61, and that this epistle was written about A. D. 64 or 65, then Timothy must have been about thirty-five when he received this epistle; and as that was on the borders of adolescence, and as the Scripture generally calls that youth, that is not old age; Timothy might be treated as a young man by St. Paul, as in the above text, and might still feel himself under the custom of his country, relative to drinking wine, for his father was a Greek, Acts xvi. 1. and, through the influence of his Christian profession, still continue to abstain from wine, drinking water only; which must have been very prejudicial to him, his weak state of health considered; the delicacy of his stomach; and the excess of his ecclesiastical labours.

As Timothy's life was of great consequence to the church of God at Ephesus, it was not unworthy of the Spirit of God to give the direction in the text, and to mingle it immediately with what some have called more solemn and important advice.

1. It was necessary that the work should be done in the church at Ephesus, which the apostle appointed to Timothy. 2. There was no person at Ephesus fit to do this work but Timothy. 3. Timothy could not continue to do it, if he followed his present mode of abstemiousness. 4. It was necessary, therefore, that he should receive direction from Divine authority, relative to the preservation of his life, and consequently, the continuation of his usefulness; as it is not likely that a minor authority would have weighed with him.

24. Some men's sins are open [beforehand] In appointing men to sacred offices in the church, among the candidates Timothy would find—1. Some, of whom he knew nothing, but only that they professed Christianity:—Let such be tried before they are appointed. 2. Some, of whose faith and piety he had the fullest knowledge; and whose usefulness in the church was well known. 3. Some, whose lives were not at all, or but partially reformed; who were still unchanged in their hearts, and unholly in their lives. The sins of these latter were known to all; they go before to judgment; with them he could have no difficulty. With the first class he must have more difficulty: there might have been hypocrites among them, whose sins could not be known till after they were brought into the sacred office. The characters of all should be fully investigated. The sins of some, before this investigation, might be so manifest as to lead at once, or upon a condemnation. The sins of others might be found out afterwards, or in consequence of this investigation; and those that were otherwise could not be long hid from his knowledge, or the knowledge of the church. On all these accounts the examination is necessary, Lay hands suddenly on no man.

25. Libanius, also, the good works of some! Though these who are very holy, and very useful in the Church, cannot be unknown; yet there are others, not less holy, who need to be brought forward; who do much good in private; and their character and good works are not fully known, till after diligent inquiry. These are they who do not let their best best know what their right doeth.

1. After so long and minute an examination of the subject in this chapter, little remains to be said in the way of further and more satisfactory explanation. The whole account concerning the widows; who they were, and what their services, and what their occupation, and how supported, are the questions of considerable difficulty. In the notes, I have given the best account of the different subjects in my power. If the reader be satisfied and edified, I have gained my end.

2. On the subject of the imposition of hands, or what is vulgarly, but improperly called, ordination, I have said much here, having given my views of the subject elsewhere in these notes. See on chap. iii. 1, &c. I must again say my conviction, that what is said on this subject in this chapter, and indeed in the epistle, is rather to be understood prophetically; and to have been intended for a much longer use of the Christian Church. That any persons should, from impure, or secular motives, desire to be appointed to the ministerial office, at such a time, when poverty and persecution were the least they would reasonably expect, to me seems altogether inexplicable. But that many, after the Church was accredited and established, and an ample revenue assigned for its ministers by emperors and kings, should wish to go into the priesthood for its emoluments, is a melancholy truth, which every year's experience testifies. To those who have the authority from the state, to appoint ministers to the Church, this chapter reads a solemn and awful lesson. And not to them only, but to all who have the appointment of ministers, or preachers, in every sect and party. How few are there who would kindle a fire on God's altar, were there not secular emoluments attending it! I am afraid the Scottish poet spoke truth, who said,

"'Tis god's mad maks ogers feight the fiercer, Without it, preaching would be scarcer."
Gold or money, is the primum mobile, through every department of life.—Proh dolor!

CHAPTER VI.

Of the duty of servants, 1, 2. Of false teachers who suppose gain to be godliness, 3-5. Of true godliness, and contentment, 6-8. Of those, and their dangerous state, who determine to be rich; and of the love of money, 9, 10. Timothy is exhorted to fight the good fight of faith, and to keep the charge delivered to him, 11-14. A sublime description of the majesty of God, 15, 16. How the rich should behave themselves; and the use they should make of their property, 17-19. Timothy is once more exhorted to keep what was committed to his trust; and to avoid profane babblings, through which some have erred from the faith, 20, 21. [A. M. cir. 4069. A. D. 64 or 65. A. U. C. 818. An. Imp. Ner. Carac. Aug. 2.]

LET as many servants as are under the yoke, count their own masters worthy of all honour, that the name of God and his doctrine be not blasphemed.

2 And they that have believing masters, let them not despise them, because they are brethren; but rather do them service, as Eph. 6.5. Col. 3.32. Tr. 22. 1 Pet. 2.18.—b Inish. R. S. Rom. 2.29. Tr. 2. 5 & 8.—c Col. 4.1.

NOTES.—Verse 1. Let as many servants as are under the yoke] The word δούλοι, here means slaves converted to the Christian faith; and the (yoke, or yoke, is the state of slavery; and, by δεσποταί, masters, despots, we are to understand the heathen masters of those Christianized slaves. Even these, in such circumstances, and under such domination, are commanded to treat their masters with all honour and respect; that the name of God, by which they were called, and the doctrine of God, Christianity, which they had professed, might not be blasphemed; might not be evilly spoken of, in consequence of their improper conduct. Civil rights are never abolished by any communications from God's Spirit. The civil state in which a man was before his conversion, is not altered by that conversion: nor does the grace of God absolve him from any claims which either the state, or his neighbour, may have on him. All these outward things continue unaltered. See the notes on Ephes. vi. 5, &c., and 1 Cor. vii. 21, &c., and especially the observations at the end of that chapter.

2. And they that have believing masters] Who have been lately converted as well as themselves.

Let them not despise them] Supposing themselves to be their equals, because they are their brethren in Christ; and grounding their opinion on that, that in him there is neither male nor female, bond nor free; but although all are equal as to their spiritual privileges, and state; yet there still continues, in the order of God's providence, a great disparity in their station: for, the master must ever be, in this sense, superior to the servant.

But rather do them service] Obey them the more cheerfully, because they are faithful and beloved; faithful to God's grace; beloved by Him, and His true followers.

Partakers of the benefit] Τῶν εὐεργεσιῶν ἀντιλαμβάνομενοι, joint partakers of the benefit. This is generally understood as referring to the master's participation in the services of his slaves. Because those who are partakers of the benefit of your services, are faithful and beloved: or it may apply to the servants who are partakers of many benefits from their Christian masters. Others think that benefit here, refers to the grace of the Gospel; the common extraction of believing masters and slaves; but Dr. Macnaught well observes, that εὐεργεσία is no where used to denote the Gospel. One of Dr. Fenwick's MSS. has ἀγαπῶν, of the service; this reading I plainly a gloss; it is not acknowledged by any other MSS. or by any version. FG. and the Codex Augustanus & the Vaticanus; of godliness; a term by which the whole Gospel doctrine is expressed, ch. iv. 7, 8. as also in the 6th verse of this chapter.

3. If any man teach otherwise] It appears that there were teachers of a different kind in the Church, a sort of religious levelers, who preached that the converted servant had as much right to the master's service, as the master had to his Teachers of this kind have been in vogue, long since the days of Paul and Timothy.

And consent not to wholesome words] Υγιανουσας λέγοντας, healing doctrines; doctrines which give nourishment and health to the soul; which is the true character of all the doctrines taught by our Lord Jesus Christ; doctrines which are according to godliness; securing as amply the honour and glory of God, as they do the peace, happiness, and final salvation of man.

All this may refer to the general tenor of the Gospel; and not to any thing said, or supposed to have been said by our Lord, relative to the condition of slaves. With political questions, or questions relative to private rights, our Lord

6 But <sup>9</sup>godliness with contentment is great gain.

7 For<sup>10</sup> we brought nothing into this world, and it is certain we can carry nothing out.

8 And <sup>11</sup>having food and raiment, let us be therewith content.

<sup>1</sup> Or, a fool.—1 Cor. 8.2. Ch. 1.7.—1 Or, sick.—m Ch. 1.4. 2 Tim. 2.23. Th. 3.9.—

scarcely ever meddled: he taught all men to love one another, to respect each other's rights, to submit to each other; to show all fidelity, to be obedient, humble, and meek; and to know that his kingdom was not of this world.

4. He is proud! Τεραφωρα, he is blown up, or inflated, with a vain opinion of his own knowledge; whereas his knowledge is foolishness, he knows nothing.

Dotting about questions] He is sick, distempered, about these questions relative to the Mosaic law, and the traditions of the elders; for it is most evident, that the apostle has the Judaizing teachers in view, who were ever, in questions of theology, straining out a gnat, and swallowing a camel.

Strifes of words] Λυσσασχια, logomachies; verbal contentions, splitting hairs; producing Ellen against Shammai, and Shammai against Hillel, relative to the particular mode in which the punctilios of some rites should be performed. In this sort of sublime nonsense, the works of the Jewish rabbins abound.

Whereof cometh envy, strife, &c.] How little good have religious disputes ever done to mankind, or to the cause of truth! Most controvertialists have succeeded in getting their own tempers soured, and in irritating their opponents. Indeed, truth seems rarely to be the object of their pursuit; they labour to discredit their own party by abusing and defaming others; from generals, they oft descend to particulars; and then personal abuse is the order of the day. Is it not strange that Christians, either cannot, or will not, see this? Cannot any man support his own opinions, and give his own views of the religion of Christ, without abusing and calumniating his neighbour? I know not whether such controvertialists should not be deemed disturbers of the public peace, and come under the notice of the civil magistrate. Should not all Christians know that the wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of the Lord.

Perverse disputings of men of corrupt minds] Disputations that cannot be settled, because their partizans will not listen to the truth; and they will not listen to the truth, because their minds are corrupt. Both under the law, and under the Gospel, the true religion was, Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, soul, mind, and strength; and thy neighbour as thyself. Where, therefore, the love of God and man does not prevail, there is no religion. Such corrupt disputers are as destitute of the truth, as they are of love to God and man.

Supposing that gain is godliness] Professing religion only for the sake of secular profit; defending their own cause for the emoluments it produced; and having no respect to another world.

From such withdraw thyself] Have no religious fellowship with such people. But this clause is wanting in AD<sup>FC</sup>. some others; the Coptic, Sahidic, Ethiopic, Vulgate, and Itala, one copy excepted. It is probably spurious.

But godliness, with contentment, is great gain.] The word godliness, εὐσεβεια, here, and in several other places of his epistle, signifies the true religion: Christianity; and the word contentment, εὐπραγία, signifies a competency, a sufficiency; that measure or portion of secular things, which is necessary for the support of life, while the great work of regeneration is carrying on in the soul. Now what this or the other person may deem a competency, but what is necessary or the mere purposes of life, in reference to another world; sed, raiment, and lodging;—See ver. 7. So, if a man have life of God in his soul, and just a sufficiency of food and raiment to preserve, and not burden life, he has what God calls great gain; an abundant portion.

It requires but little of this world's goods to satisfy a man, who feels himself to be a citizen of another country, and knows that this is not his rest.

7. We brought nothing into this world] There are some sayings in Seneca, which are almost verbatim with this of St. Paul. Nemo nascitur dives; quisquis est in lucem jussum l' lacte et panis esse contentus, Epist. xx. "No man is born rich; every one that comes into the world, is commanded to content with food and raiment." Escutit natura redentem sicut intrantem; non licet plus auferre, quam inturam, Epist. cap. ii. "Nature, in returning, shakes off all innumbrances as in entering; thou canst not carry back more as thou broughtest in." Seneca and St. Paul were contemporary; but all the Greek and Latin poets, and especially the vic philosophers, are full of such sentiments. It is a self-evident truth; relative to it there can be no controversy.

8. Having food and raiment, let us be therewith content]

10 <sup>5</sup>For the love of money is the root of all evil: which, while some coveted after, they have <sup>6</sup>erred from the faith, and <sup>7</sup>pierced themselves through with many sorrows.

11 <sup>8</sup>But thou, O man of God, see these things; and follow after righteousness, godliness, faith, love, patience, meekness.

12 <sup>9</sup>Fight the good fight of faith, <sup>10</sup>lay hold on eternal life, whereunto thou art also called, <sup>11</sup>and hast professed a good profession before many witnesses.

Ἀπειθοῦμεθα: let us consider this a competency. And it is evident that the apostle considers this a competency: and by these words explains what he said ver. 6. The word εὐσεβεια, which we translate godliness, signifies covering in general; and here means house or lodging, as well as clothing.

9. But they that will be rich] Οἱ δε βουλομενοι πλουειν.—The words are emphatic, and refer to persons who are determined to get riches; who make this their object and aim in life: who live to get money; who get all they can, save all they can, and keep all they get; and yet are apprehensive of no danger because they seek to be rich by honest means: for it is likely that the apostle does not refer to those who wish to get rich by robbery, plunder, extortion, &c. By the term rich, it is very likely that the apostle refers to what he had said above; having food and raiment, let us therewith be content. He that has more than these, is rich in the sense in which the apostle uses the term.

Fall into temptation and a snare] Του διαβολου, of the devil, is added by D<sup>FC</sup>. Vulgata, Itala, and some of the Fathers. It is in consequence of the temptation of the devil that they have determined to be rich; this temptation once received, others quickly succeed: and when they have swallowed down the temptation to the thing, then they drink in a thousand temptations to the same; and all these lead them, εἰς ραγιδα, into an unforeseen and concealed trap. Πηλεις, signifies a net, trap, gin, snare, spring, or pit dug in the ground, filled with sharp stakes, and slightly covered over; so that when a man, or any animal, steps upon it, he tumbles in, and is taken or destroyed. Such a snare is that into which those who will be rich, must necessarily fall. But who will believe this?—See on ver. 10.

And into many foolish and hurtful lusts] The whole conduct of such a person is a tissue of folly; scraping, gathering, and heaping up riches, and scarcely affording to take the necessaries of life out of them for himself: these lusts or desires are not only foolish, but they are hurtful; the mind is debased and narrowed by them: benevolent and generous feelings become extinct; charity perishes; and selfishness, the last and lowest principle in mental degradation, absorbs the soul; for, these foolish and hurtful lusts drown men in destruction and perdition; the soul is destroyed by them here, and brought through them into a state of perdition hereafter. The apostle considers these persons like mariners in a storm; by the concurrence of winds, waves, and tides, they are violently driven among the rocks, the vessel is dashed to pieces, and in a moment they are all engulfed in the great deep! Such is the lot, and unavoidable catastrophe, of them that will be rich: even though they should strive to accomplish their desires by means the most rigidly honest.

In this place I beg leave to refer the reader to a sermon on this text, by the late Rev. John Wessley, in which the whole of this subject is treated by the hand of a master; and for usefulness, the sermon is superior to every thing of the kind ever published. It is entitled, The Danger of Riches, and is found in his Works, Vol. X. p. 101. edit. 1811.

10. The love of money is the root of all evil] Perhaps it would be better to translate εραυνην ρωζαυνην, of all these evils; i. e. the evil enumerated above: for, it cannot be true that the love of money is the root of all evil; it certainly was not the root whence the transgression of Adam sprang; but it is the root whence all the evils mentioned in the preceding verse, spring. This text has been often very incautiously quoted; for how often do we hear, "the Scripture says, Money is the root of all evil!"—No, the Scripture says no such thing. Money is the root of no evil; nor is it an evil of any kind; but the love of it, is the root of all the evils mentioned here.

While some coveted after] Οπισυμωροι, inactively desiring; Have erred from the faith] Απρησανθησαν, have totally erred; have made a most fatal and ruinous departure from the religion of Christ.

And pierced themselves through with many sorrows.] The word εσπιτιπαιρα, signifies to be transfixed in every part, and is an allusion to one of those snares, ραγιδα, mentioned ver. 9. where a hole is dug in the earth, and filled full of sharp stakes; and, being slightly covered over with turf, is not perceived; and whatever steps on it, falls in, and is pierced through and through with these sharp stakes: the εσπυρα, καλας, the many torments, mentioned by the apostle.—See on ver. 9.

11. But thou, O man of God] Thou who hast taken God for thy portion, and art seeking a city that hath foundations, whose builder is the living God, see these things! Εσραυνη

13 I give thee charge in the sight of God, who quickeneth all things, and before Christ Jesus, who before Pontius Pilate witnessed a good confession;

14 That thou keep this commandment without spot, unrebukable, until the appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ:

15 Which in his times he shall show who is the blessed and only Potentate, the King of kings, and Lord of lords;

16 Who only hath immortality, dwelling in the light which [Ch. 5. 22.—Diu. 32. 39. 1 Sam. 2. 6. John 5. 21.—Matt. 16. 27. Rev. 1. 8. 3. 14.—Or. profession.—E. Phil. 1. 6. 10. 1 Thes. 3. 12. & 5. 23.—1 Ch. 1. 11. 17.—2d Rev. 17. 14. & 19. 16.—n Ch. 1. 17.—to Exod. 36. 30. John 6. 46.—p Eph. 3. 21. Phil. 4. 20. Jude 25. Rev. 1. 6. & 4. 11. & 7. 12.

for thy life: Even thou art not out of the reach of the love of money. How many of the ministers of religion have been ruined by this! And how much has religion itself suffered by their love of money.

Follow after righteousness] Justice and uprightness in all thy dealings with men. Godliness, a thorough conformity to the image of God and mind of Christ. Faith in Jesus, and in all that He has spoken; and fidelity to the talents thou hast received: and the office with which thou art intrusted.

Love] To God and all mankind. Patience in all trials and afflictions.

Meekness] Bearing up with an even mind under all adversities and contradictions.

12. Fight the good fight of faith] "Agonize the good agony." Thou hast a contest to sustain, in which thy honour, thy life, thy soul, are at stake. Live the Gospel, and defend the cause of God. Unmask hypocrites, expel the profligate, purge and build up the church, live in the spirit of thy religion, and give thyself wholly to this work.

Lay hold on eternal life] All this is an allusion to the exercises in the public Grecian games: fight, conquer, and seize upon the prize; carry off the crown of eternal life!

Wherewith thou art also called] The allusion to the public games, is still carried on; thou hast been called into this palestra; thou hast been accepted as one proper to enter the lists with any antagonists that may offer: in the presence of many witnesses, thou hast taken the necessary engagements upon thee, and submitted to be governed by the laws of the stadium. Many eyes are upon thee, to see whether thou wilt fight manfully, and be faithful. Timothy's faith was undoubtedly tried by severe persecution. In Heb. xiii. 23. it is said, Know ye that our brother Timothy is set at liberty. Hence it appears, that he was imprisoned for the testimony of Christ; and perhaps it was then, more than at his ordination, that he made the good confession here mentioned. He risked his life and conquered. If not a martyr, he was a confessor.

13. I give thee charge] This is similar to that in ver. 21. of the preceding chapter, where see the note.

Who quickeneth all things] God, who is the fountain of life, and who is the resurrection: and who will raise thee up at the last day to a life of ineffable glory, if thou be faithful unto death. And should thy life fall a sacrifice to the performance of thy duty, all will be safe; for thy life is hid with Christ in God; and when he who is thy life shall appear, then shalt thou also appear with Him in glory! Thy kingdom is not of this world: remember that this good confession was made by thy Master before Pilate. Keep disentangled from all earthly things. Live to and for God, and all will be well.

A good confession] The confession made by Christ before Pontius Pilate, is, that he was Messiah the King; but that His kingdom was not of this world, and that hereafter, He should be seen coming in the clouds of heaven to judge the quick and dead. See John xviii. 36, 37, and Mark xiv. 61, 62.

14. That thou keep this commandment without spot] Two things are mentioned here—1. That the commandment itself, the whole doctrine of Christ, should be kept entire. 2. That his life should be agreeable to that doctrine. Keep it without spot: Let there be no blot on the Sacred Book; add nothing to it; take nothing from it; change nothing in it. Deliver down to thy successors the truth as thou hast had it from God himself.

Unrebukable] Let there be nothing in thy conduct or spirit contrary to this truth. Keep the truth, and the truth will keep thee.

Until the appearing of our Lord] Hand it down pure, and let thy conduct be a comment on it; that it may continue in the world and in the church till the coming of Christ.

15. Which in his times he shall show] Jesus will appear in the most proper time: the time which the infinite God in His wisdom has appointed for the second coming of His Son.

The blessed and only Potentate] Δυνασις, potentate, is applied to secular governors; but none of these can be styled ἡ μακαριος καὶ μονος, the happy and only One; ἡ βασιλευς των βασιλευστων, the King of kings, or the King over all kings; and Κυριος των κυριουστων, the Lord over all lords, or rulers. These are titles which could not be given to any mortals. This is made more specific by the verse following.

16. Who only hath immortality] All beings that are not eternal, must be mutable; but there can be only one eternal Being, that is God; and He only can have immortality.

Dwelling in the light which no man can approach unto] All this is said by the apostle in three words: φως οὐκ εσται προσεγγιστον, inhabiting unapproachable light. Such is the excessive glory of God, that neither angel nor man can approach it. It is indeed equally unapproachable to all created beings.

no man can approach unto; whom no man hath seen, nor can see: to whom be honour and power everlasting. Amen.

17. Charge them that are rich in this world, that they be not high-minded, who trust in riches, but in the living God, who giveth us richly all things to enjoy.

18. That they do good, that they be rich in good works, ready to distribute, willing to communicate;

19. Laying up in store for themselves a good foundation

Whom no man hath seen, nor can see] Moses himself, could only see the symbol of the Divine presence; but the face of God no man could ever see. Because He is infinite and eternal, therefore he is incomprehensible; and, if incomprehensible to the mind, consequently invisible to the eye.

To whom] As the Author of being, and the Dispenser of all good, be ascribed honour and power—the sole authority of all pervading, all superintending, all preserving, and everlasting might.

These words of St. Paul are inimitably sublime. It is a doubt whether human language can be carried much higher, even under the influence of inspiration, in a description of the Supreme Being. It is well known that St. Paul had read the Greek poets. He quotes Aratus, Epimenides, and Menander—this is allowed on all hands. But does he not quote, or refer to, Eschylus, and Sophocles, too? Scarcely any person suspects this; and yet there is such a complete similarity between the following quotations from the above poets and the apostle's words, that we are almost persuaded he had them in his eye. But, if so, he extends the thought infinitely higher, by language incomparably more exalted. I shall introduce, and compare with the text, the passages I refer to.

15. Ο μακαριος και μονος Δυνασις, ο Βασιλευς των βασιλευστων, καὶ Κυριος των κυριουστων. The Supreme Being is also styled the King of kings, and the Blessed, by Eschylus, in his tragedy of the Suppliants:

Αναξ ανακτων μακαριος
Μακαριος, και τελευσ
Τελευσταντων κρατος.

Ver. 520, Ed. Pann.

"O King of kings, most Blessed of the blessed, most Perfect of the perfect."

16. Ο μονος εστιν Δυνασις, φως οὐκ εσται προσεγγιστον. In the Antigone of Sophocles, there is a sublime address to Jove, of which the following is an extract:

Αγριος χρονος Δυνασις
Κατεχει Ολυμπος
Μαργαροσσαν αιγλαν.

Ver. 608, Ed. Bruck.

"But thou, an ever during potentate, dost inhabit the radiant splendour of Olympus!"

This passage is grand and noble; but how insignificant does it appear, when contrasted with the superior sublimity of the inspired writer! The deity of Sophocles dwells in the dazzling splendour of heaven; but the God of Paul inhabits light, so dazzling and so resplendent, that it is perfectly unapproachable!

Synecerus, in his third hymn, has a fine idea on the mode of God's existence, which very probably be borrowed from St. Paul.

Κεκαλυμμενην
Ιδιαις αυραις.

"O intellectual Being, veiled in Thine own effluence!"

And a few lines after, he says,
Συ το κρυπταμενον
Ιδιαις αυραις.

"Thou art He who art concealed by Thy splendours." All these are excellent; but they are stars of the twelfth magnitude before the apostolic sun.

17. Charge them that are rich] He had before, in ver. 9, 10, given them a very awful lesson, concerning their obtaining riches: and now he gives them one equally so, concerning their use of them.

That they be not high-minded] That they do not make themselves on account of their wealth, for this adds nothing to mind, or moral worth.

Nor trust in uncertain riches] Πλανων εδωλεται, the uncertainty of riches; things which are never at a stand, are ever changing, and seldom continue long with one proprietor; therefore, as well as on many other accounts, they are not to be trusted in. They cannot give happiness; because they are not fixed and permanent; neither can they meet the wishes of an immortal spirit, but in the living God, who is the unchangeable fountain of perfection.

Who giveth us richly all things to enjoy] Who not only has all good, but dispenses it liberally for the supply of the wants of all His creatures: and He does not give merely what is necessary; but He gives what tends to render life comfortable. The comforts of life come from God, as well as the necessities. He not only gives us a bare subsistence, but He gives us enjoyment. Were it not for the enjoyment and rapine of wicked men, every situation and station in life would be comparatively comfortable. God gives enjoyment, and provides it badly.

18. That they do good] That they be rich in good works, gainst the time to come, that they may lay hold on eternal life. O Timothy, keep that which is committed to thy trust, avoiding profane and vain babblings, and oppositions of science, falsely so called :

a Ver. 12.—b 2 Tim. 1. 14. Tit. 1. 2. Rev. 2. 2.

slow-creatures, according to the abundance which God has given them. The highest luxury a human being can enjoy on his side of the grave.

Rich in good works] That their good works may be as abundant as their riches.

Ready to distribute] Ευσπλαροδοτε εσται. That they give obting through partiality or favour; but be guided in their distribution, by the necessities of the objects presented to them; and that they confine not their charity at home, but catter it abroad.

Willing to communicate] Κοινωνικος, bringing every poor eron into a state of fellowship with themselves.

19. Laying up in store for themselves a good foundation] t. Paul seems to have borrowed this form of speech from obit.—See ch. iv. ver. 8, 9. If thou hast abundance, give us accordingly: if thou have but a little, be not afraid to use according to that little: for thou treasurest up a good ward for thyself against the day of necessity. Εθηρα παραγα- w θησαυριζεις σταντω εις ημερας αναγκης. The apostle says: w θησαυριζομαις εσταις θεμελιον, κλον, εις το μλλον, ινα κτι- w αφιωνται της αιωνιου ζωης, "treasuring up a good foundation ) them for the future, that they may lay hold on eternal life."

he sentiment is the same in both writers; the words nearly o; and the meaning is simply this, as it is judiciously para- rased by Mr. J. Wesley, in his note on this passage, "Trea- w raring up for thyself a good foundation, of an abundant ward by the free mercy of God; that they may lay hold on w rnal life. This cannot be done by almsdeeds: yet, they w me up for a memorial before God. Acts x. 4. And the w ck even of this, may be the cause why God will withhold w rce and salvation from us." Christ has said, Blessed are w e merciful, for they shall obtain mercy. They who have w been merciful according to their power, shall not obtain w rcy; they that have, shall obtain mercy; and yet the eter- w nal life which they obtain, they look for from the mercy w of God through Jesus Christ.

20. O Timothy, keep that which is committed to thy trust] his is another repetition of the apostolic charge. See chap. 5, 15, 19, iv. 6, 7, 14, 15, 16, v. 21, vi. 13. Carefully preserve w doctrine which I have delivered to thee. Nothing can be w ore solemn and affectionate than this charge.

Avoiding profane and vain babblings] See on chap. i. 4. w nd iv. 7.

And oppositions of science, falsely so called] Kai w rbithe- w tis της ψευδους γνωσης: And oppositions of knowledge, w cely so nam'd. Dr. Macknight's note here, is worthy of w such attention. "In the enumeration of the different kind w s of inspiration bestowed on the first preachers of the Gospel, w Cor. xii. 8 we find the word of knowledge mentioned: by w hich is meant, that kind of inspiration which gave to the w poetes and superior Christian prophets, the knowledge of w the true meaning of the Jewish Scriptures. This inspiration w e false teachers pretending to possess, dignified their mis- w interpretations of the ancient Scriptures with the name of w knowledge, that is, inspired knowledge; for so the word sig- w nifies, 1 Cor. xiv. 6. And as by these interpretations, they w deavoured to establish the efficacy of the Levitical atone- w ments; the apostle, very properly, termed these interpreta- w tions, oppositions of knowledge, because they were framed w to establish doctrines opposite to, and subversive of, the w Gospel. To destroy the credit of these teachers, he affirmed w that the knowledge from which they proceeded, was falsely w called inspired knowledge; for, they were not inspired with w the knowledge of the meaning of the Scriptures, but only w pretended to it." Others think that the apostle has the Gno- w stics in view. But it is not clear that these heretics, or whatev- w er they were, had any proper existence at this time. On the w whole, Dr. Macknight's interpretation seems to be the best.

21. Which some professing] Which inspired knowledge w was pretending to have, set up Levitical rites, in opposition w to the great Christian Sacrifice; and consequently, have erred w in the carrying the faith, have completely mistaken the whole w sign of the Gospel.—See chap. i. 6, 7.

Grace be with thee] May the favour and influence of God w be with thee, and preserve thee from these and all other errors! w Amen.] This word, as in former cases, is wanting in the w most ancient MSS. In a majority of cases, it appears to have w been added by different transcribers, nearly in the same w way; which we add the word FINIS, simply to indicate the w end of the work.

There is one authority in Griesbach, Mt. c. for its being w ritten from NICOPOLIS. This is the opinion also of Dr. Macknight.

That the epistle was not written from Laodicea nor Athens, w but from Macedonia, has been rendered probable by the argu- w ments produced in the Preface; to which the reader is referred w for this, and the date of the epistle itself.

In reviewing the whole of this epistle, I cannot help con- w sidering it of the first consequence to the church of God. In w it, we see more clearly than elsewhere, what the ministers w of the Gospel should be; and what is the character of the w true church. Bishops, Presbyters, and deacons, are particu- w larly described; and their qualifications so circumstantially w detailed, that it is impossible to be ignorant on this head.

What the church should be, is also particularly stated: it w is the house of the living God: the place where He lives, works, w and manifests Himself. The doctrines and discipline of the w church are not less specifically noted. All these subjects are w considered at large in the notes, and here nothing need be w added.

Should it be said, the apostle, in giving the qualifications w of a bishop, "no where insists on human learning;" it may w be answered in general, that no ignorant person, in those w times, could have possibly got admittance into the church as w a teacher of Christianity. Every person, acknowledged as a w teacher, was himself well taught in the word of God, and well w taught by the Spirit of God: and much teaching of the Divine w Spirit was then necessary, as the New Testament Scriptures w were not then completed; and if we were to allow the earlier w date of this epistle, scarcely any part of the New Testament w had then been written. The Gospels had not come as yet in- w to general circulation; and only a few of St. Paul's epistles, w viz. those to the Thessalonians, and that to the Galatians, and w the first to the Corinthians, had been written before the year w 56. At such times much must have been done by immediate w revelations, and a frequent communication of miraculous w powers.

It is natural for men to run into extremes; and there is no w subject on which they have run into wider extremes, than w that of the necessity of human learning; for, in order to a w proper understanding of the Sacred Scriptures, on one hand, w all learning has been cried down, and the necessity of the w inspiration of the Holy Spirit, as the sole interpreter, strongly w and vehemently argued. On the other, all inspiration has w been set aside, the possibility of it questioned, and all pre- w tensions to it ridiculed in a way savouring little of Christian w charity, or reverence for God. That there is a middle way, w from which these extremes are equally distant, every candid w man who believes the Bible must allow. That there is an in- w spiration of the Spirit which every conscientious Christian may w claim, and without which no man can be a Christian, is suf- w ficiently established by innumerable Scriptures; and by the w uninterrupted and universal testimony of the church of God: w this has been frequently proved in the preceding notes. If w any one, professing to be a preacher of the Gospel of Jesus de- w nial, speaks, or writes against this, he only gives awful proof w to the Christian church how utterly unqualified he is for his w sacred function. He is not sent by God, and therefore he w shall not profit the people at all. With such, human learning w is all in all; it is to be a substitute for theunction of Christ, w and the grace and influences of the Holy Spirit.

But while we flee from such sentiments, as from the influ- w ence of a pestilential vapour; shall we join with those who de- w cry learning and science! absolutely denying them to be of w any service in the work of the ministry; and often going so w far as to assert that they are dangerous, and subversive of the w truly Christian temper and spirit; engendering little besides w pride, self-sufficiency, and intolerance?

That there have been pretenders to learning, proud and in- w tolerant, we have too many proofs of the fact to doubt it: and w that there have been pretenders to Divine inspiration not w less so, we have also many facts to prove. But such are only w pretenders, for a truly learned man is ever humble and com- w placent; and one who is under the influence of the Divine w Spirit is ever meek, gentle, and easy to be entreated. The proud w and the insolent are neither Christians nor scholars. Both re- w ligious and learning disclaim them, as being a disgrace to both.

But what is that learning which may be a useful handma- w to religion, in the ministry of the Gospel? Perhaps we may find an answer to this important question in one of the qualifications which the apostle requires in a Christian minister, 1 Tim. iii. 2. He should be apt to teach; capable of teaching others.—See the note. Now, if he be capable of teaching others, he must be well instructed himself; and in order to this, he will need all the learning that, in the course of the Divine Providence, he is able to acquire. But it is not the ability merely to interpret a few Greek and Latin authors, that can constitute a man a scholar, or qualify him to teach the Gospel. Thousands have this knowledge, who are neither wise unto salvation themselves, nor capable of leading those who are astray, into the path of life. Learning is a word of extensive import; it signifies knowledge and experience; the knowledge of God and of nature in general, and of man in particular; of man in all his relations and connexions; his history in all the periods of his being, and in all the places of his existence; the means used by Divine Providence for his support; the manner in which he has been led to employ the powers and faculties assigned to him by his Maker; and the various dispensations of grace and mercy by which he has been favoured. To acquire this knowledge, an acquaintance with some languages, which have long ceased to be vernacular, is often not only highly expedient, but, in some cases, indispensably necessary. But how few of those who pretend most to learning, and who have spent both much time and much money in seats of literature, in order to obtain it, have got this knowledge?

All that many of them have gained is merely the means of acquiring it: with this they become satisfied, and in so ignorantly call it learning. These resemble persons, who carry large unlighted tapers in their hand, and boast how well qualified they are to give light to them who sit in darkness, while they neither emit light nor heat; and are incapable of kind-ling the taper they hold. Learning, in one proper sense of the word, is the means of acquiring knowledge; but multitudes who have the means seem utterly unacquainted with their use, and live and die in a learned ignorance. Human learning, properly applied, and sanctified by the Divine Spirit, is of inconceivable benefit to a Christian minister in teaching and defending the truth of God. No man possessed more of it, in his day, than St. Paul: and no man better knew its use. In this, as well as in many other excellencies, he is a most worthy pattern to all the preachers of the Gospel. By learning, a man may acquire knowledge; by knowledge, reduced to practice, experience; and from knowledge and experience, wisdom is derived. The learning that is got from books, or the study of languages, is of little use to any man, and of no estimation, unless practically applied to the purposes of life. He whose learning and knowledge have enabled him to do good among men, and who lives to promote the glory of God, and the welfare of his fellow-creatures, can alone, of all the literati, expect to hear in the great day, Well done, good and faithful servant! Enter into the joy of thy Lord.

How necessary learning is at present, to interpret the Sacred Writings, any man may see, who reads with attention; but none can be so fully convinced of this as he who undertakes to write a comment on the Bible. Those who desire helps of this kind, are to be pitied. Without them, they are, in truth, understand enough for the mere salvation of their souls: and yet, even such of this they owe, under God, to the teaching of experienced men. After all, it is not a knowledge of Latin and Greek merely that can enable any man to understand the Scriptures, or interpret them to others: if the Spirit of God take not away the veil of ignorance from the heart, and enlighten and quicken the soul with His all-pervading energy, all the learning under heaven will not make a man wise unto salvation.

PREFACE TO THE SECOND EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE TO TIMOTHY.

In the Preface to the first of these epistles, particular mention has been made of the parentage, country, and education of Timothy; his call to the evangelic office; and of his appointment to the presidency of the church at Ephesus. And for every particular of this kind, the reader is referred to that Preface. What remains to be done, in reference to the present epistle, is, to inquire into the time in which it was most probably written. The disagreement on this question, among learned men, is very great; some arguing that it was written about the year 61, others referring it to the year 66. Some asserting that it is the first, in order of time, of these two epistles; and that it was written on Paul's first imprisonment at Rome. Several of the most eminent critics are of this opinion; and they have supported their sentiments with arguments of no small weight. Hammond, Lightfoot, and Lardner, as well as several critics on the continent, contend for this earlier date. Macknight and Paley take the opposite side. Were I convinced that the weight of the argument lay with the former, I should have fixed its chronology accordingly; but the latter appearing to me to have the more direct and the most weighty evidence in their favour, I am led, from the reasons which they give, to adopt their opinion.

Dr. Paley observes, that it was the uniform tradition of the primitive church, that St. Paul visited Rome twice; and twice there suffered imprisonment; and that, at the conclusion of his second imprisonment, he was put to death; and he thinks that the opinion concerning these two journeys of St. Paul is confirmed by many hints and allusions in this epistle, compared with what St. Paul has said in other epistles, which are allowed to have been written from Rome. I shall give his principal reasons:—

"That this epistle was written while Paul was a prisoner, is distinctly marked by the 8th verse of the first chapter: 'Be not thou therefore ashamed of the testimony of our Lord, nor of me his prisoner.' And that it was written whilst he was a prisoner at Rome, is proved by the 16th and 17th verses of the same chapter. 'The Lord give mercy to the house of Onesiphorus; for he often refreshed me, and was not ashamed of my CHAIN; but when he was in Rome, he sought me out very diligently and found me.' Since it appears from the former quotation that St. Paul wrote this epistle in confinement, it will hardly admit of doubt that the word chain, in the latter quotation, refers to that confinement, the chain by which he was then bound, the custody in which he was then kept. And if the word chain designate the author's confinement at the time of writing this epistle, the next words determine it to have been written from Rome; 'he was not ashamed of my chain; but when he was at Rome he sought me out very diligently.'" Dr. Macknight thinks that Paul was now a close prisoner, very different in his circumstances, from his first imprisonment, in which he was permitted to "dwell alone in his own hired house, and receive all that came to him," and publicly to preach the Gospel, being guarded only by a single soldier. That he was in close confinement, he argues from the circumstance, that, when Onesiphorus came to Rome, beyond that Paul was no longer that well known public character which he had been while in his first imprisonment; but being closely confined, he had some difficulty to find him out: and this appears to be fully implied in the apostle's words, συνεδρεψεν ορεψος με, και ερησε: "he very diligently sought me out, and found me." ch. i. 17. And, that crimes were now laid to his charge widely different from those formerly alleged against him, appears from ch. ii. 9. καταβαλω μεχρως δε τωσδε ανων υπος: "I suffer evil even to bonds as a malefactor;" plainly implying that he was not only abridged of all liberty, but was "bound hands and feet," in a close dungeon. And this was probably on the pretence that he was one of those Christians whom Nero accused with having set Rome on fire. Hence the word malefactor, κατανομος, which may mean here that the apostle was treated as the worst of criminals.

That this epistle was not written during St. Paul's first imprisonment at Rome, or during the time in which the epistles to the Ephesians, Colossians, Philippians, and Philemon, were written, may be gathered, says Dr. Paley, with considerable evidence, from a comparison of these several epistles with the present.

I. "In the former epistles, the author confidently looks forward to his liberation from confinement, and his speedy departure from Rome. He tells the Philippians, ch. ii. 24. 'I trust in the Lord that I also myself shall come shortly.' Philemon he bids 'to prepare for him a lodging; for I trust, says he, 'that through your prayers I shall be given unto you.' ver. 22. In the epistle before us, he holds a language extremely different: 'I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand: I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith; henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me at that day,' ch. iv. 6-8."

Those who espouse the contrary opinion, suppose that these words only express the strong apprehensions and despair of life, which the apostle had when he was first imprisoned; but that afterward, finding he was treated with kindness, he altered his language, and so strongly anticipated, that he predicted, his enlargement. This reflects little honour upon the apostle's character; it shows him to be a person subject to alarms, and pressing the scaraf from every gloomy expectation. The whole of St. Paul's conduct shows him to have been the reverse of what this opinion represents him.

II. "When the former epistles were written from Rome, Timothy was with St. Paul, and is joined with him in writing to the Colossians, the Philippians, and Philemon: the present epistle implies that he was absent."

III. "In the former epistles, Demas was with St. Paul at Rome: 'Luke the beloved physician, and Demas, greet you.' In the epistle now before us, 'Demas hath forsaken me, having loved this present world: and is gone to Thessalonica.'"

IV. "In the former epistles, Mark was with St. Paul, and joins in saluting the Colossians. In the present epistle, Theo-by is ordered to bring him 'with him, for he is profitable to me for the ministry,' chap. iv. 11."

The circumstance of Demas being with St. Paul while he wrote the former epistles, which was certainly during his first imprisonment; and of his having forsaken him when he wrote this, is a strong proof of the posterior date of this epistle: nor can the feelings of the apostle, so contradictorily expressed in this and the preceding epistles, be ever cleared (on the supposition of their relating to the same time and circumstances,) from weakness and contradiction.

Lewis Capellus has suggested the following considerations, which are still more conclusive:—

1. "In ch. iv. ver. 20 St. Paul informs Timothy, that 'Erasias abode at Corinth,' Ερασος ηκειεν εν Κορινθοις: the form of expression (the verb being in the first aorist) implies that Erastus had staid behind at Corinth when St. Paul left it; but this could not be meant of any journey from Corinth which St. Paul took prior to his first imprisonment at Rome: for, when Paul departed from Corinth, as related in the xth chapter of the Acts, Timothy was with him: and this was the last time the apostle left Corinth before his coming to Rome; because he left it on his way to proceed to Jerusalem, soon after his arrival at which place he was taken into custody; and continued in that custody till he was brought to Cesar's tribunal." Erastus could be no need, therefore, to inform Timothy that Erastus staid behind at Corinth," upon this occasion; because the fact were so, it must have been known to Timothy, who was present as well as St. Paul.

2. "In the same verse our epistle also states the following riddle: 'Trophimus have I left at Miletus sick.' When St. Paul passed through Miletus, on his way to Jerusalem, as related Acts xx. Trophimus was not left behind, but accompanied him to that city. He was indeed the occasion of the uproar at Jerusalem, in consequence of which St. Paul was apprehended; 'for they had seen,' says the historian, 'before him in the city, Trophimus an Ephesian, whom they supposed that Paul had brought into the temple.' This was evidently the last time of Paul's being at Miletus before his first imprisonment; for, as has been said, after his apprehension at Jerusalem, he remained in custody till he was sent to Rome. "In these two articles we have a journey referred to, which must have taken place subsequent to the conclusion of St. Paul's history: and of course, after St. Paul's liberation from his first imprisonment. The epistle, therefore, which contains this reference, since it appears, from other parts of it, to have been written while St. Paul was a prisoner at Rome, proves that he had returned to that city again, and undergone there a second imprisonment."

"These particulars," adds Dr. Paley, "I have produced merely for the support they lend to the testimony of the Fathers, concerning St. Paul's second imprisonment, but to remark their consistency and agreement with one another.—They are all resolvable into one supposition, viz. that this epistle was not written during St. Paul's first residence at Rome, but in some future imprisonment in that city. The epistle touches upon names and circumstances connected with the date and with the history of the first imprisonment, and mentioned in letters during that imprisonment: and so touches upon them, as to leave what is said of one, consistent with what is said of others; and consistent also with what is said of them in different epistles."

From the whole, there seems the fullest evidence, 1. That this epistle was not written during St. Paul's first imprisonment at Rome. 2. That he was at Rome when he wrote this epistle. 3. That he was there, a prisoner, and in such confinement as we know, from the Acts of the Apostles, he was not in, during the time of his first imprisonment there. 4. That this must have been some subsequent imprisonment. 5. That as the general consent of all Christian antiquity, states that St. Paul was twice imprisoned at Rome, and that from his second imprisonment he was never liberated, but was at its conclusion martyred; therefore this epistle must have been written while St. Paul was in his second imprisonment at Rome; and but a short time before his martyrdom. And as the Christian church has generally agreed that this apostle's martyrdom took place on the 29th of June, A. D. 68, the second Epistle to Timothy might have been written some time towards the end of the spring, or beginning of the summer, of that year. It is supposed that St. Paul went from Crete to Rome, about the end of the year 66, on hearing of the persecution which Nero was then carrying on against the Christians, on pretence that they had set Rome on fire: for, as he knew that the church must be then in great tribulation, he judged that his presence would be necessary to comfort, support, and build it up.—Like a true soldier of Jesus Christ, he was ever at the post of danger: and in this case, he led on the Fortiori Hope.

Other matters relative to the state and circumstances of the apostle, and those of Timothy, and the church at Ephesus, will be carefully brought before the reader in the course of the notes on this epistle.

THE SECOND EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE TO TIMOTHY.

For Chronological Eras, see at the end of the Acts.

Mr. Lardner and others suppose this epistle to have been written in A. D. 56. See the Preface to the First Epistle to Timothy, where this point is largely considered, and also the General Observations prefixed to the Acts of the Apostles.

He exhorts him to stir up the gift of God that is in him, and not to be ashamed of the testimony of the Lord, 6—8. How God has avued them that believe; and how Christ has brought life and immortality to light by the Gospel, 9, 10. The apostle's call to preach it, and the persecutions which he had been obliged, in consequence, to endure, 11, 12. Timothy is exhorted to hold fast the form of sound words, 13, 14. And is informed of the apostacy of several in Asia; and particularly of Phrygellus and Hermogenes, 15. And of the great kindness of Onesiphorus to the apostle in his imprisonment, 16—18. [A. 6 * Whom I serve from my forefathers] Being born a Jew, I was carefully educated in the knowledge of the true God, and the proper manner of worshipping Him.

7 * With pure conscience] Ever aiming to please Him, even in the time when, through ignorance, I persecuted the church.

8 * Without ceasing I have remembrance of thee] The apostle thanks God that he has constant remembrance of Timothy in his prayers. It is a very rare thing now in the Christian church, that a man particularly thanks God, that he is enabled to pray for others. And yet, he that can do this most, must have an increase of that brotherly love, which the second greatest commandment of God requires: Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself. It is also a great blessing to be able to maintain the spirit of a pure friendship, especially through a considerable lapse of time and absence. He that can do so, may well thank God that he is saved from that sickness and unsteadiness of mind, which are the bane of friendships, and the reproach of many once warm-hearted friends.

NOTES.—Verse 1. Paul, an apostle] St. Paul at once shows his office, the authority on which he held it, and the end for which it was given him. He was an apostle, an extraordinary ambassador from heaven. He had this apostleship by the will of God, according to the counsel and design of God's infinite wisdom and goodness. And he was appointed, that he might proclaim that eternal life which God had in view for mankind, by the incarnation of His Son Jesus Christ: and which was the end of all the promises He had made to men, and the commandments He had delivered to all His prophets since the world began. The mention of this life was peculiarly proper in the epistle, who had now the sentence of death in himself, and who knew that he must shortly seal the truth with his blood. His life was hidden with Christ in God; and he knew that as soon as he should be absent from the body he should be present with the Lord. With these words he both comforted himself and his son Timothy.

2. To Timothy, my dearly beloved son] See the note on 1 Tim. ch. i. ver. 2.

in thee, which dwell first in thy grandmother Lois, and thy mother Eunice; and I am persuaded that in thee also.

6 Wherefore I put thee in remembrance that thou stir up the gift of God, which is in thee by the putting on of my hands.

7 For God hath not given us the spirit of fear; but of power, and of love, and of a sound mind.

8 Be not therefore ashamed of the testimony of our Lord, nor of me thy prisoner: but be thou partaker of the afflictions of the Gospel according to the power of God.

b) the affecting parting with the Epheesian church, mentioned Acts xx. 37. or to the deep impressions made on Timothy's heart when he instructed him in the doctrine of Christ crucified; or to some interview between themselves; is not certainly known. The mention of this by the apostle, is no small proof of his most affectionate regards for Timothy; whom he appears to have loved as a father loves his only son.

6. The unfeigned faith that is in thee] Timothy had given the fullest proof of the sincerity of his conversion, and of the purity of his faith.

Which dwell first in thy grandmother Lois] In Acts xvi. 1. we are informed that Paul came to Derbe and Lystra, and beheld a certain disciple was there, named Timothy, the son of a certain woman who was a Jewess and believed; but his father was a Greek. Luke, the historian, it appears, was not particularly acquainted with the family: Paul evidently was: Luke mentions the same circumstance which the apostle mentions here; but in the apostle's account, there are particulars which argue an intimate acquaintance with the family and its history. Luke says Timothy's father was a Greek, consequently we may believe him to have been then in his heathen state: Paul, in mentioning the grandmother, mother, and son, passes by the father in silence; which intimates that either the father remained in his unconverted state, or was now dead. Lois and Eunice are both Grecian, and indeed heathen names; hence we are led to conclude, that although Timothy's mother was a Jewess, according to St. Luke, yet she was a Grecian, or Hellenist by birth. Lois, the grandmother, appears to have been the first convert to Christianity; she instructed her daughter Eunice, and both brought up Timothy in the Christian faith; so that he had a general knowledge of it before he met with St. Paul at Lystra. There, it appears, the apostle was the instrument of the conversion of his heart to God: for a man may be well instructed in Divine things, have a very orthodox creed, and yet his heart not be changed. Instruction precedes conversion: conversion should follow it. To be brought up in the fear of God is a great blessing; and a truly religious education is an advantage of infinite worth.

6. Stir up the gift of God which is in thee] The gift which Timothy had received, was the Holy Spirit; and through Him, a particular power to preach and defend the truth. This gift is represented here, under the notion of a fire, which, if it be not frequently stirred up, and fresh fuel added to it, will go out. This is the precise idea which the apostle had in his mind; hence the term αναζωοποιεω, which signifies to stir up the fire; to add fresh fuel to it. From this it plainly appears, that if Timothy had not continued to be a daily worker with God, he would have received the grace of God in vain. The Latins have a similar metaphor, excitare igniculos ingenii, to stir up the sparks of genius.

By the putting on of my hands] See on 1 Tim. iv. 14.

7. God hath not given us the spirit of fear] Here is an allusion to the giving of the law on Mount Sinai. This was communicated with such terrible majesty as to engender fear in all the Israelites: even Moses, on the occasion, did exceedingly fear and tremble. The Gospel was ushered in, in a much milder manner; every thing was placed on a level with the human intellect; and within reach of every human spirit. Nothing was terrific, nothing forbidding; but all was inviting. The very spirit and genius of it was a spirit of power, of love, and of a sound mind.

Instead of δειλας, fear, some MSS. and Versions have δουλειας, servitude or bondage; God hath not given unto us the spirit of δουλας—but of power, δυναμις, to work miracles, to confound enemies, to support us in trials, and enable us to do that which is lawful and right in His sight. And of love, which enables us to hear, believe, hope, and endure all things; and is the incentive to all obedience. Of a sound mind, σωφρονισμος, of self-possession and government, according to some. But a sound mind implies much more; it means a clear understanding, a sound judgment, a rectified will, holy passions, heavenly tempers; in a word, the whole soul harmonized in all its powers and faculties; and completely regulated and influenced so as to think, speak, and act aright in all things. The apostle says, God hath given the spirit of these things; they are not factitious; they are not assumed for times and circumstances; they are radical powers and tempers; each produced by its proper principle.

8. Be not ashamed of the testimony of our Lord] The testimony of Christ is the Gospel in general, which proclaims Christ crucified, and redemption through His blood. In the sight of the world, there appeared to be reason why a man should be ashamed of this; ashamed of Him who was crucified as a malefactor; but, when this Gospel became the power of God to the salvation of every one that believed, it was a subject to exult in. Hence the apostle, Rom. i. 16. said, I am not ashamed of the Gospel of Christ; where see the note.

Nor of me his prisoner] When our friends are in power and credit, we can readily acknowledge them, and take opportunities to show that we have such and such connexions; but when the person falls into disgrace or discredit, though we cannot pretend not to know him; yet we take care not to acknowledge him. This induced Cicero, in relation to friendships, to give for a maxim—Amicus certus in re incerta curatur: "A true friend is known in adverse circumstances;" and from this we have borrowed our proverb, A friend is need, is a friend indeed.

Be thou partaker of the afflictions of the Gospel] No parent could love a child better than Paul loved Timothy; and behold! he who could wish him nothing but what was great, honourable, and good, wishes him to be a partaker of the afflictions of the Gospel! Because, to suffer for Christ, and suffer with Christ, was the highest glory to which any human being in this state could arrive. The royal way to the crown of glory, is by the cross of Christ.

According to the power of God] While thou hast no more affliction than thou hast grace to sustain thee under, thou canst have no cause to complain. And God will take care that if a faithful discharge of thy duty shall expose thee to afflictions, His power manifested in thee shall be in proportion to thy necessities. His load cannot be oppressive, was a strengthened to bear it by the power of God.

9. Who hath saved us] From sin; the spirit of bondage, and all tormenting fear. This is the design of the Gospel. And called us with a holy calling] In called us to holiness and comfort here; and to eternal glory hereafter.

Not according to our works] We have not deserved any part of the good we have received: and can never merit one moment of the exceeding great and eternal weight of glory which is promised. See the notes on the parallel passages.

Before the world began] Πρω χρονων αιωνων. Before the Mosaic dispensation took place, God pursued the salvation of the Gentiles by Christ Jesus; and the Mosaic dispensation was intended only as the introducer of the Gospel. The law was our schoolmaster unto Christ. Gal. iii. 24.—See the parallel places, and the notes there.

10. But is now made manifest] This purpose of God to save the Gentiles as well as the Jews, and call them to the same state of salvation by Jesus Christ, was, previously to the manifestation of Christ, generally hidden; and what was revealed of it, was only through the means of types and ceremonies.

Who hath abolished death] Καταργησαντες μετ τον θανατον Who has counterworked death; operated against his operations, destroyed his batteries, understruck and destroyed his mines, and rendered all his instruments and principles of attack useless. By death here, we are not to understand merely natural death, but that corruption and decomposition which take place in consequence of it; and which would be naturally endless, but for the work and energy of Christ. By Him alone, comes the resurrection of the body; and through His eternal life and glory are given to the souls of believers.

Brought life and immortality to light] The literal translation of the original is, He hath illustrated life and incorruption by the Gospel. Life eternal, or the doctrine of life eternal, even implying the resurrection of the body, was not unknown among the Jews. They expected this, for they found it in their prophets. It abounded among them long before the Incarnation; and they certainly never borrowed any notion in it, from the Christians; therefore the Gospel could not be stated as bringing to light what certainly was in the light before that time. But this doctrine was never illustrated and demonstrated before; it existed in promise, but had never been practically exhibited. Jesus Christ died, and by so doing the empire of death; He arose again from the dead, and thus illustrated the doctrine of the resurrection; He took the same human body up into heaven, in the sight of His disciples; and ever appears in the presence of God for us; and thus, has illustrated the doctrine of incorruption. In His death, resurrection, and ascension, the doctrine of eternal life and the resurrection of the human body, and its final incorruptibility, are fully illustrated by example, and established by fact.

Lord in that day ; and in how many things he ministered unto me at Ephesus, thou knowest very well.

19 Pure love feels no loads. Here was a true friend, one that sticketh closer than a brother.

20 The Lord grant—that he may find mercy of the Lord
Some think that this is a prayer to God the Father, to communicate grace to him, that he might find mercy in the great day at the hand of Jesus Christ, the Judge. It is probably only a Hebraism, for God grant that he may here be so saved by Divine grace, that in the great day he may receive the mercy of the Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life.—See a similar form of

It is impossible to read this chapter over without feeling deeply interested for this most noble and amiable of men. To what trials did God expose him ! His life was a life of perils and tribulations ; his labours were superabundant, and his success all but incredible. Wherever he went, he left a track of light and life behind him. To him, as the grand instrument of God, the Gentiles, the whole habitable world, owe their salvation. Yet, see him in his old age, neglected by his friends, apparently forsaken of God, and abandoned to the hands of ruthless men : in prison and in chains, triumphing over sufferings and death ; perfectly unshaken, unshuffled with the evils with which he is obliged to contend, having the fullest persuasion of the truth of the doctrines which he had preached ; and the strongest and most encouraging anticipation of the glory that was about to be revealed. He felt no evil, and he feared none. Sin had lost its power, and death its sting ; the grave its victory, and hell its horrors. He had the happiness which Heathenism spoke of, but could not attain, because it knew not the great Source whence it must proceed. This God he knew, feared, loved, obeyed, and was happy. Who

No murmur is heard from his heart ; he is persuaded that all things work together for good to them that love God ; the miseraable uncertainty of friendship, the defection of cowardly brethren, and the apostacy of once zealous professors, do not move him. As far as it is lawful, he courts death ; knowing that to be absent from the body, is to be present with the trated and confirmed ! The character and conduct of St. Paul must make Christianity doubly amiable to believers ; and highly respectable even to its enemies.

Asiatic, probably an Ephesian, (see below,) who had frequent business at Rome ; and when he came, sought out the apostle, who, it is supposed, had been confined in some close and private prison, (see the Preface), so that it was with great dif-

23. Hold fast the form of sound words The word trouwers, signifies the sketch, plan, or outline, of a building, lecture, &c. and here refers to the plan of salvation which the apostle had taught Timothy. No man was left to invent a edigion for his own use, and after his own mind. God alone knows that with which God can be pleased. If God did not give a revelation of Himself, the inventions of man in religious things, would be endless error, involving itself in contortions of unlimited confusion. God gives, in His mercy to man, a form of sound words or doctrines, a perfect plan and sketch of the original building ; fair and well defined outlines of very thing which concerns the present and eternal welfare of man ; and His own glory.

24. That good thing The everlasting Gospel : keep by the Holy Ghost : for without a continual spiritual energy, man can do nothing. This indwelling Spirit will make them effectual to thy own salvation ; and enable thee to preach them
; the salvation of the souls of others.

25. All they which are in Asia It seems as if the apostle must refer to the Asiatic Christians which were then at Rome, had been lately there. Finding the apostle in disgrace, and sinking it dangerous to own him or his cause, they neither visited him nor confessed Christianity. He cannot be speaking of any general defection of the Asiatic churches, but of those sisticks who had professed a particular friendship for him.

all things work together for good to them that love God ; the miseraable uncertainty of friendship, the defection of cowardly brethren, and the apostacy of once zealous professors, do not move him. As far as it is lawful, he courts death ; knowing that to be absent from the body, is to be present with the Lord. Glorious system of truth by which such an apostle was formed ! and, glorious apostle by whom this system was illustrated and confirmed ! The character and conduct of St. Paul must make Christianity doubly amiable to believers ; and highly respectable even to its enemies.

23. Hold fast the form of sound words The word trouwers, signifies the sketch, plan, or outline, of a building, lecture, &c. and here refers to the plan of salvation which the apostle had taught Timothy. No man was left to invent a edigion for his own use, and after his own mind. God alone knows that with which God can be pleased. If God did not give a revelation of Himself, the inventions of man in religious things, would be endless error, involving itself in contortions of unlimited confusion. God gives, in His mercy to man, a form of sound words or doctrines, a perfect plan and sketch of the original building ; fair and well defined outlines of very thing which concerns the present and eternal welfare of man ; and His own glory.

24. That good thing The everlasting Gospel : keep by the Holy Ghost : for without a continual spiritual energy, man can do nothing. This indwelling Spirit will make them effectual to thy own salvation ; and enable thee to preach them
; the salvation of the souls of others.

25. All they which are in Asia It seems as if the apostle must refer to the Asiatic Christians which were then at Rome, had been lately there. Finding the apostle in disgrace, and sinking it dangerous to own him or his cause, they neither visited him nor confessed Christianity. He cannot be speaking of any general defection of the Asiatic churches, but of those sisticks who had professed a particular friendship for him.

26. The Lord give mercy Onesiphorus had acknowledged him, and continued to do so ; he and his house, or family, turned away from me ; of whom are Phygellus and Hermo-gene.

the apostle gave him the proper form of sound words which he was to teach ; and now he tells him to commit those truths to faithful men in the same way that they were committed to him ; that the truth might be preserved in the church, and holy men appointed successively to preach it. These truths are still continued in the church, and still there are faithful men who proclaim them. But where is the uninterrupted apostolical succession ? Who can tell ? Probably it does not

5 And <sup>if</sup> a man also strive for mastery, yet is he not crowned, except he strive lawfully.
 6 <sup>The</sup> husbandman that laboureth must be first partaker of the fruits.
 7 Consider what I say; and the Lord give thee understanding in all things.
 8 Remember that Jesus Christ <sup>of</sup> the seed of David <sup>was</sup> raised from the dead <sup>according to</sup> my Gospel:
 9 <sup>Wherein</sup> I suffer trouble, as an evil doer, <sup>even unto</sup> bonds; <sup>but</sup> the word of God is not bound.
 10 Therefore <sup>I</sup> endure all things for the elect's sakes, <sup>that</sup> they may also obtain the salvation which is in Christ Jesus with eternal glory.
 11 <sup>It is</sup> a faithful saying: For <sup>if</sup> we be dead with Him, we shall also live with Him:

1 Cor. 9:25, 26.—1 Cor. 9:10.—Or, The husbandman, labouring first, must be partaker of the fruits.—Rom. 1:3, 4. Acts 2:32 & 13:33.—1 Cor. 15:1, 4, 20.—2 Rom. 8:16.—Acts 9:16. Th. 1:12.—Eph. 3:1. Phil. 1:7. Col. 4:3, 10.—Acts 20:31. Eph. 4:18, 20. Phil. 1:13, 14.—1 Eph. 3:13. Col. 1:24.

exist on the face of the world. All the pretensions to it by certain churches are as stupid as they are idle and futile. He who appeals to this for his authority as a Christian minister, had best sit down till he has made it out; and this will be by the next Greek Kalends.

3. Endure hardness He considers a Christian minister under the notion of a soldier, not so much for his continual conflicts with the world, the devil, and the flesh, for these are, in a certain sense, common to all Christians; but for the hardships and difficulties to which he must be exposed who faithfully preaches the Gospel of Christ.

4. No man that warreth entangleth, &c. It is well remarked by Grotius on this passage, that the legionary soldiers among the Romans were not permitted to engage in husbandry, merchandize, mechanical employments, or any thing that might be inconsistent with their calling. Many canons, at different times, have been made to prevent ecclesiastics from intermeddling with secular employments. He who will preach the Gospel thoroughly, and wishes to give full proof of his ministry, had need to have no other work. He should be wholly in this thing; that his profiting may appear unto all. There are many who sin against this direction. They love the world, and labour for it, and are regardless of the souls committed to their charge. But what are they, either in number or gullit, compared to the immense herd of men professing to be Christian ministers, who neither read nor study, and consequently never improve! These are too conscientious to meddle with secular affairs; and yet have no scruple of conscience to whitewash time, be among the chief in needless self-indulgence, and by their burdensome and monotonous ministry become an incumbrance to the church! Do you inquire, In what sort or party are these to be found? I answer, In ALL Idle drones,

Nati consumere fruges,

"Born to consume the produce of the soil," disgrace every department in the Christian church. They cannot teach; because they will not learn.

5. If a man also strive for mastery Εαν δε και αθλη τις; If a man contend in the public games, the Olympic or the Isthmian games among the Greeks, so often alluded to, and particularly explained in the notes on 1 Cor. ix. 24.—26. to which the reader is referred for a full illustration of this verse.

Is he not crowned? Though he may have conquered: except he strive lawfully, unless he enter according to the rules of the athletes, and act as these direct. No man, howsoever zealous he may have been, is to expect the Well done, good and faithful servant, from Jesus Christ, unless he have laboured in the word and doctrine; preached the truth as it is in Jesus; and built up the church upon HIM who is its only foundation.

6. The husbandman that laboureth That is, the husbandman must first till his ground, before he can expect a crop; and he must till it according to the proper rules of agriculture, else he cannot have a crop. The combatant must fight and conquer; and fight according to the laws of the agonies, before he can be crowned; so, the Christian minister must labour in the spiritual vineyard, and labour too, under the eye, and according to the direction of his Master, before he can expect that crown of righteousness that fadeth not away.

7. Consider what I say Apply my metaphors and similitudes in a proper manner.

And the Lord give thee understanding But, instead of don, may he give, ACDEFG, several others, besides Versions and Fathers, have don, he will give. Consider thou properly, and God will give thee a proper understanding of all things that concern thy own peace; and the peace and prosperity of His church. Think, as well as read.

8. Remember that Jesus Christ The apostle seems to say, Whatever tribulations or deaths may befall us, let us remember that Jesus Christ, who was slain by the Jews, rose again from the dead, and His resurrection is the proof and pledge of ours. We also shall rise again to a life of glory and blessedness.

According to my Gospel The false teaching of Hymeneus and Philetus stated that the resurrection was past already. Paul preached the resurrection from the dead; and founded his doctrine on the resurrection and promise of Christ. This was his Gospel; the other was of a different nature.

12 <sup>If</sup> we suffer we shall also reign with him: <sup>if</sup> we deny him, he also will deny us:

13 <sup>If</sup> we believe not, yet he abideth faithful: <sup>he</sup> cannot deny himself.

14 Of these things put them in remembrance, charging them before the Lord <sup>that</sup> they strive not about words to no profit, but to the subverting of the hearers.

15 Study to show thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth.

16 But <sup>shun</sup> profane and vain babblings: for they will increase unto more ungodliness.

17 And their word will eat as doth a canker: of whom is Hymeneus and Philetus;

18 Who <sup>concerning</sup> the truth have erred, saying that the resurrection is past already; and overthrow the faith of some.

9. Wherein I suffer trouble, as an evil doer This verse contains one of the proofs that this epistle was written while St. Paul was a prisoner the second time at Rome—See the Preface, where this is particularly considered.

10. For the elect's sakes For the sake of the Gentiles, elected by God's goodness, to enjoy every privilege formerly possessed by the Jews; and, in addition to these, all the blessings of the Gospel: the salvation of Christ here and eternal glory hereafter.

11. If we be dead with Him That is, as surely as Christ rose again from the dead, so surely shall we rise again. And if we die for Him, we shall surely live again with Him. This says the apostle, is επισης ο λογος, a true doctrine. This is properly the import of the word; and we need not seek, as Bishop Tillotson and many others have done, for some saying of Christ which the apostle is supposed to be here quoting, and which he learnt from tradition.

12. If we suffer—with him These are other parts of the true doctrine, which the apostle mentions above.

13. If we believe not Should we deny the faith, and apostatize, He is the same; as true to His threatenings as to His promises—he cannot deny—act contrary to Himself.

14. That they strive not about words Words, not things, have been a most fruitful source of contention in the Christian world; and among religious people, the principal cause of animosity has arisen from the different manner of apprehending the same term; while, in essence, both meant the same thing. All preachers and divines should be very careful, both in speaking and writing, to explain the terms they use; and never employ them in any sense, but that in which they have explained them.

The subverting of the hearers This is the general tendency of all polemical divinity, and controversial preaching; when angry passions are called in to support the doctrine of the Gospel.

15. Study to show thyself approved unto God Endeavour so to cultivate and improve thy heart and mind, that thou mayest not be a reproach to Him from whom thou professest to receive thy commission.

Rightly dividing the word of truth. It is generally supposed that the apostle alludes here to the care taken to divide the sacrifices under the law: the priests studied, in dividing the victim down the spine, to do it so scrupulously, that each half of the spinal marrow should be found on each side the back-bone. Probably nothing was much farther from the apostle's thoughts than this view, which is now commonly taken of the subject. Indeed this scrupulously dividing does not appear to have been any original ordinance among the Jews; much stress was laid upon it in later times; but from the beginning it was not so. The word επισημως signifies, 1. Simply to cut straight, or to rectify. 2. To walk in the right way; it is thus used by Gregory Nazianzen, who in Orat. Apol. fuga, opposes επισημως, to κατας εδους, walking in a right way, to walking in a bad way. Thus, επισημως signifies to walk in a new way; and καταρροβω, to walk in a straight way.—See Kypke. Therefore, by rightly dividing the word of truth, we are to understand his continuing in the true doctrine, and teaching that to every person; and, according to our Lord's simile, giving each his portion of seed in due season: milk to babes; strong meat to the full grown; comfort to the disconsolate; reproof to the irregular and careless: in a word, finding out the necessities of his hearers; and preaching so as to meet those necessities.

16. Shun profane and vain babblings This is the character he gives of the preaching of the false teachers. Whatever was not agreeable to the doctrine of truth, was, in the sight of God, empty and profane babbling; engendering nothing but ungodliness, and daily increasing in that.

17. Their word will eat as doth a canker Ως γαγγραινα, as a gangrene; i. e. as a mortification in the flesh, where the circulation is entirely stopped, and putrefaction takes place, which continues to corrupt all the circumference flesh, spreading more and more till death takes place, unless stopped by a timely and judicious application of medicine. Such is the influence of false doctrine; it fixes its mortal seed in the soul, which continues to corrupt and assimilate every thing to itself; till, if not prevented by a timely application of the word of life, under the direction of the heavenly Physician, 19 Nevertheless the foundation of God standeth sure, leaving this seal, The Lord knoweth them that are his. And let every one that nameth the name of Christ depart from iniquity.

20 But in a great house there are not only vessels of gold and of silver, but also of wood and of earth; and some to honour, and some to dishonour.

21 If a man therefore purge himself from these, he shall be a vessel unto honour, sanctified, and meet for the master's use, and prepared unto every good work.

22 Fee also youthful lusts: but follow righteousness, faith, love, meekness, temperance, and other such things, which will save thee and thy household.

Terminates in the bitter pains of an eternal death. To such gangrene, the apostle compares the corrupt doctrines of Tytencus and Philetus.

18. Who, concerning the truth have erred] They had the truth, but erred or wandered from it; saying the resurrection was already past, and thus denying the resurrection of the body; and, by consequence, future rewards and punishments; and this necessarily sapped the foundation of all religion; and thus the gangrene had, in reference to their unhappy votaries, a rapid and unchecked operation.

19. The foundation of God standeth sure] The word θεμελιος, signifies literally a foundation, and especially the foundation of a building; and metaphorically, the building itself. And often a noble mansion or palace. In this place the apostle compares the religion of Christ to a great or noble mansion.—See ver. 30. And as this religion is founded on the authority and power of the Almighty, it necessarily must stand sure and be permanent. This house has an inscription on it, for so σφραγίς, seal, is frequently understood; and his evidently an allusion to the ancient temples. Above the door of the temple of Delphos there was the Greek word ιθυσ art; on which Plutarch has written an express treatise. In many of the Mohammedan mosques, the walls are covered with inscriptions, which are ordinarily sentences taken from the Koran, relative to the majesty of God, or the state of His worship. And we know that there was an inscription on the mitre of the high-priest among the Jews, in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, "Holiness to the Lord." ιερον. σωφ. κδοσκη ιαυβοακ, "Holiness to the Lord." ιερον. σωφ. κδοσκη ιαυβοακ. 30.—See also Zech. xvi. 20. And this inscription may here be represented as being made with the seal of God; for He stamps this on all things belonging to Himself and His worship.

But some suppose θυμιον, here to signify a contract or covenant by which two parties are bound to fulfil certain conditions and duties, the obligation to which, each takes on him by sealing the instrument with his seal. Among the Asiatics, brass seals have scarcely ever any image or figure on them, at always some very expressive inscription. I have seen many of these, and several of them are now before me. The word of inscription, i. e. one on the seal of each party, may here alluded to: that on God's seal, is κυριος κυριος υρας αυτου. The Lord approveth of them that are his. That on the seal of his followers, is, Ανεστην αφο αδικιας τας β ποραζων το ονομα κυριου. Let every one who nameth the name of the Lord (every Christian) depart from iniquity. Thus each has his peculiar inscription.

Κυριου, Lord, instead of Χριστου, Christ, is the reading of most all the MSS. of importance; and the principal Versions.

The Lord knoweth] i. e. Approves, watches over and provides for them that are His true followers. To this His followers most cheerfully subscribe; and say, Let every one that nameth this Lord avoid every appearance of evil.

20. But in a great house] Here the apostle carries on the allusion introduced in the preceding verse. As the foundation of God refers to God's building, i. e. the whole system of Christianity; so here the great house is to be understood of the same; and the different kinds of vessels mean the different teachers, as well as the different kinds of members. In this sacred house at Ephesus, there were vessels of gold and silver, eminent, holy, sincere, and useful teachers and members; and also vessels of wood and of earth, i. e. and heretical teachers, such as Hymeneus and Philetus, and their followers. There are also in such houses vessels employed, some in a more honourable, others in a less honourable office. To these he seems also to compare the same errors.

21. If a man therefore purge himself from these] He that likes heed to his ways and to his doctrines, and walks with God, will separate himself not only from all false doctrine, but from all wicked men, and thus be sanctified and proper to be employed by the Master in every good word and work. The apostle has not made the application of these different images; and it is very difficult to tell what he means.

22. Fee also youthful lusts] Not only all irregular and sensual desires, but pride, ambition, and, above all, the lust for power; to which men will sacrifice all other propensities; their ease, pleasure, health, &c. This is the most detestable passion in the human heart. Both in church and state it is ruinous; but particularly so in the former. Timothy was now between 30 and 40 years of age; the very age in which ambition and the love of power most generally prevail. Juvenal pleasures, are the sins of youth: ambition and the charity, peace, with them that call on the Lord, out of a pure heart.

23. But foolish and unlearned questions avoid, knowing that they do gender strifes.

24. And the servant of the Lord must not strive; but be gentle unto all men, apt to teach, patient,

25. In meekness instructing those that oppose themselves, if God peradventure will give them repentance to the acknowledging of the truth;

26. And that they may recover themselves out of the snare of the devil, who are taken captive by him at his will.

love of power, the sins of middle age: covetousness and caring cares, the crimes of old age.

Follow righteousness] Flee from sin; pursue goodness. Righteousness; whatever is just, holy, and innocent. Faith, fidelity both to God and man; improving that grace by which thy soul may be saved: and faithfully discharging the duties of thy office that thou mayest save the souls of others. Charity; love to God and man. Peace among all the members of the church; and, as far as possible, with all men; but especially among those who invoke the Lord out of a pure desire to glorify His name.

23. Foolish and unlearned questions] See the notes on 1 Tim. i. 4. iv. 7. and Titus iii. 9.

24. The servant of the Lord must not strive] See on 1 Tim. iii. 2. and 3.

25. Those that oppose] Αντιδιδομενοι. This seems to refer to those who opposed the apostle's authority; and hence the propriety of the allusion to the rebellion of Korah and his company.—See above.

If God peradventure] He was to use every means which he had reason to believe God might bless; and the apostle intimates that, bad as they were, they were not out of the reach of God's mercy.

26. And that they may recover themselves] The construction of this verse is extremely difficult; though the sense given by our translation is plain enough. I shall set down the original, and the principal translations in English.

Και αναρτησων εις της του διαβολου κειρας, εξωρθησεν εις αυτου εις το κεισεν δελημα.

And the wise agent for snarers of the devil, of whom the ben holds captivity at his will.—WICKLIFF, First translation into English, 1378.

And to turne agayne from the snare of devell, which are holden in prison of him at his will.—COVERDALE, First printed English Bible, 1535.

That they may come to themselves agayne out of the snare of the devyll which dra now taken of him at hys will.—EDWARD VIth's Bible, by Becke, 1549.

And they may recover their senses to perform his will, after being rescued aive by the servant of the Lord, out of the snare of the devil.—WAKEFIELD,—who refers αυτου, him, to the servant of the Lord, ver. 24.

And being caught alive by him out of the snare of the devil, they may awake to do his will.—MACKNIGHT,—who remarks that αυτου, the relative, means the servant of the Lord; and κεισεν, the demonstrative, refers to God, mentioned ver. 15.

I leave these different translations with the reader.

I have referred in the preceding notes, to inscriptions which appear on the buildings and coins of the Asiatics: such inscriptions are, in general, very curious, and carry with them a considerable show of piety to God, in the acknowledgment of His providence and mercy: I shall quote one merely as a curiosity, without supposing it to be immediately applicable to the illustration of the text.

There is extant a gold circular coin of the Great Mogul, Shah Jehan, struck at Delhi, A. H. 1062. A. D. 1651, five inches and a half in diameter; on each side of this coin is a square, the angles of which touch the periphery; within this square, and in the segments, there are the following inscriptions:—

- 1. Within the square, on one side, The bright star of religion, Mohammed (a second Sakib Kiran) Shah Jehan, the victorious emperor. 2. In the segment, on the upper side of the square, The impression upon this coin of 200 mohurs, was struck through the favour of God. 3. On the lateral segment to the left, By the second Sakib Kiran, Shah Jehan, the Defender of the Faith. 4. On the bottom segment, May the golden countenance from the sculpture of this coin, enlighten the world. 5. On the lateral segment to the right, As long as the splendid face of the moon is illuminated by the rays of the sun! 1. On the reverse, within the square, There is no god but God; and Mohammed is the Prophet of God. Struck in the capital of Shah-Jehan-abad, A. H. 1062. 2. On the top of the square, Religion was illuminated by the truth of Abu Bekker. 3. On the left hand compartment, The faith was strengthened by the justice of Omar. 4. On the bottom compartment, Piety was refreshed by the modesty and mildness of Othman. 5. On the right hand compartment, The world was enlightened by the learning of Aly. On these inscriptions, it may be just necessary to observe, that Abu Bekker, Omar, Othman, and Aly, were the four khalifs who succeeded Mohammed. Abu Bekker was the father of Ayesha, one of Mohammed's wives. Othman, from whom the Turkish goverment is still called the Ottoman Empire, was son-in-law of Mohammed, having married his two daughters, Rakhiah and Om-al-Calthoon. And Aly, son of Abi Taleb, Mohammed's uncle, was also one of the sons-in-law of Mohammed, having married Fatima, the daughter of his favourite wife Ayasha.

Grotius and others have supposed that the apostle alludes to the custom of putting an inscription on the foundation-stone of a city or other building, giving an account of the time in which it was founded, built, &c. Sometimes, engraved stones were placed over the principal gates of cities and fortresses, particularly in the East, specifying the date of erection, repairs, &c. and containing some religious sentiment or verse from the Koran. But I do not think it likely that the apostle refers to any thing of this kind. There appears to be an allusion here to the rebellion of Korah and his company, against the authority of Moses, Num. xvi. where, ver. 5. it is said, the Lord will show who are His: here the words of the Septuagint are nearly the same that the apostle uses in this verse, εγω δ̄ θεος νεος εστας αςτες. God knoweth or approves of them that are His. And the words in ver. 26. Depart from the tents of those wicked men, are similar to those of the apostle, Let every one that nameth the name of the Lord depart from iniquity. We may therefore take it for granted, that those false teachers, the chief of whom were Hymeneus and Philetus, had risen up against the authority of St. Paul; and he, in effect, informs Timothy here, that God will deal with them as he did with Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, and that company. And as the true Israelites were to separate themselves from the tents of those wicked men: so he and the believers at Ephesus were to hold no sort of communion with those workers of iniquity. This subject he further illustrates by a contract between two parties, each of which sets his seal to the instrument, the seal bearing the motto peculiar to the party. This I conceive to be the meaning; but, the common mode of interpretation will, it is probable, be most commonly followed.

CHAPTER III.

Dangerous times in the latter days, from the apostasy and wickedness of men, of whom an affecting description is given, 1-7. It shall happen to them as to Janes and Jambres, who withstood Moses, 8, 9. The apostle speaks of his persecutions and sufferings, and shows, that all those who will live a godly life, must suffer persecution, 10-15, because evil men and seducers will wax worse and worse. Timothy is exhorted to continue in the truths he had received, being known the Scriptures from a child, 14, 15. All Scripture is given by Divine inspiration, 16, 17. [A. M. cir. 4000. A. D. 65 or 66. NOTES.—Verse 1. In the last days] This often means the days of the Messiah; and is sometimes extended in its signification to the destruction of Jerusalem, as this was properly the last days of the Jewish state. But the phrase may mean any future time, whether near or distant.

For men shall be] The description in this and the following verses, the Papists apply to the Protestants; the Protestants, in their turn, apply it to the Papists; Schoetigen to the Jews; and others to heretics in general. There have been both teachers and people in every age of the church, and in every age of the world, to whom these words may be most legitimately applied. Both Catholics and Protestants have been lovers of their own selves, &c. but it is probable that the apostle had some particular age in view, in which there should appear some very essential corruption of Christianity.

Lovers of their own selves] Φιλαυτοι, selfish, strikers of their own interest, and regardless of the welfare of an mankind.

Covetous] Φιλαργυροι, lovers of money, because of the influence which riches can procure.

Boasters] Αλαζονεις, vain-glorious, self-assuaging; valuing themselves beyond all others.

Proud] Υπερηφανοι, airy, light, trifling persons; those who love to make a show; who are all outside; from υπω, above, and φαινω, to show, or appear.

Blasphemers] Βλασφημοι; those who speak impiously of God and sacred things; and injuriously of men.

Disobedient to parents] Τοινομιον ανειδους. Headstrong children, whom their parents cannot persuade.

Unthankful] Αχαριστοι; persons without grace, or gratefulness; who think they have a right to the services of all men; yet feel no obligation, and consequently no gratitude.

Unholy] Ασεβητοι; without piety; having no heart-reverence for God.

Without natural affection] Ασεργυτοι; without that affection which parents bear to their young; and which the young bear to their parents. An affection which is common to every class of animals: consequently, men, without it, are worse than brutes.

Truce-breakers] Ασευθετοι, from α, negative, and ευθη, a libation, because in making treaties, libations both of blood and wine were poured out. The word means those who are bound by no promise; held by no engagement; obliged by no oath. Persons who readily promise any thing, because they never intend to perform.

False accusers] Διαβολοι, devils; but properly enough rendered false accusers; for this is a principal work of the devil. Slanderers; striving ever to ruin the characters of others.

Incontinent] Ακαταστατοι, from α, negative, and κατα, power. Those who, having sinned away their power of self government, want strength to govern their appetites; especially those who are slaves to uncleanness.

Fierce] Ανεμυτοι; from α, negative, and ημυτος, mild or gentle. Wild, impetuous; whatever is contrary to pliability and gentleness.

Despisers of those that are good] Αφιλωνοι; not lovers of good men. Here is a remarkable advantage of the Greek

5 Having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof: from such turn away.

7 Ever learning, and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth.

8 Now as Janes and Jambres withstood Moses, so do these also resist the truth: men of corrupt minds, reprobate concerning the faith.

over the English tongue: one word of the former, expressing five or six of the latter. Those who do not love the faith, must be radically bad themselves.

4. Traitors] Ηποδοτοι; from υπο, before, and δοτω, to deliver up. Those who deliver up to an enemy, the person who has put his life in their hands; such as the Scots of 1648, who delivered up into the hands of his enemies, their unfortunate countryman and king, Charles the First; a stain which is lapse of ages can wipe out.

Heady] Ηγεμονεις; from ηγω, forward, and ημυτος, mild; headstrong, precipitate, rash, inconsiderate.

High minded] Τερψυμενοι; from τερπος, smoke; the fruitfully aspiring; those who are full of themselves, and empty of all good.

Lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God.] This is so-berly and beautifully expressed in the Greek, φιλοσωμολον η φιλοθεου, lovers of pleasure, rather than lovers of God; i. e. pleasure, sensual gratification, is their god; and this they love and serve; God they do not.

5. Having a form of godliness] The original word πορεωσις signifies a draught, sketch, or summary, and will apply well to those who have all their religion in their creed, confession of faith, catechism, bodies of divinity, &c. while destitute of the life of God in their souls; and are not only destitute of this life, but deny that such life or power is here to be experienced or known. They have religion in their creed but none in their hearts. And perhaps to their summary they add a decent round of religious observances. From such turn away; not only do not imitate them, but have no kind of fellowship with them; they are a dangerous people; and but seldom suspected, because their outside is fair.

6. For of this sort are they] He here refers to false teachers, and their insinuating manners, practising upon weak women, who, seeing in them such a semblance of piety, entertain them with great eagerness, and at last become partakers with them in their impurities. Among the Jews there are remarkable cases of this kind on record; and not a few of them among the full-fed monks of the Romish Church. But in what sect or party have not such teachers been occasionally found?

7. Ever learning] From their false teachers; and were able to come to the knowledge of the truth; because that teaching never leads to the truth: for, although there was a form of godliness, which gave them a sort of authority to teach; yet as they denied the power of godliness, they never could bring their votaries to the knowledge of the saving power of Christianity.

There are many professors of Christianity still, who answer the above description. They hear, repeatedly hear, it may be, good sermons; but as they seldom meditate on what they hear, they derive little profit from the ordinances of God: they have no more grace now than they had several years ago, though hearing all the while; and perhaps, not wickedly departing from the Lord, they do not meditate; they do not think; they do not reduce what they hear to practice; they never, even under the preaching of an apostle, they could not become wise to salvation.

8. Now as Janes and Jambres withstood Moses] This is fers to the history of the Egyptian magicians, given in Exod. vii. where see the notes, and particularly the concluding observations at the end of that chapter, where several things are said concerning these two men.

Men of corrupt minds] It appears as if the apostle were referring still to some Judaizing teachers, who were perverting the church with their doctrines, and loudly calling in question the authority and doctrine of the apostle.

Reprobate concerning the faith.] Αδοκίμοι, undiscerning, or untried ; they are base metal, unstamped ; and should not pass current, because not standard. This metaphor is frequent in the Sacred Writing.

9. But they shall proceed no farther] Such teaching and teachers shall never be able, ultimately, to prevail against the truth ; for the foundation of God standeth sure.

Their folly shall be manifest] As the Scriptures, which are the only rule of morals and doctrine, shall ever be preserved : so, sooner or later, all false doctrines shall be tried by them : and the folly of men, setting up their wisdom against the wisdom of God, must become manifest to all.—False doctrine cannot prevail long, where the Sacred Scriptures are read and studied. Error prevails only where the book of God is withheld from the people. The religion that fears the Bible is not the religion of God. Is Popery or Protestantism this religion ?

10. Thou hast fully known my doctrine] And having long had the opportunity of knowing me, the doctrine I preached, my conduct founded on these doctrines, the object I have in view by my preaching, my fidelity to God and to my trust, my long-suffering with those who walked disorderly, and opposed themselves to the truth, and did what they could to lessen my authority, and render it suspected : my love to them and to the world in general, and my patience in all my adversities ; thou art capable of judging between me and the false teachers, and canst easily discern the difference between their doctrines, conduct, motives, temper, spirit, &c. and mine.

11. Persecutions—which came unto me at Antioch] The Antioch mentioned here was Antioch in Pisidia, to which place Paul and Barnabas came in their first apostolic progress ; and where Paul delivered that memorable discourse which is preserved in the 13th chapter of Acts, ver. 16—43. In this city it is said, the Jews stirred up the devout and honourable women, and the chief men of the city, and raised persecution against Paul and Barnabas, and expelled them out of their coasts ; but they shook off the dust of their feet against them, and came to Iconium. Acts xiii. 50—52. Here, there was an insult made both of the Gentiles and also of the Jews with their rulers, to treat them despitefully, and to stone them, and they fled unto Lystra and Derbe ; and there came thither certain Jews, who persuaded the people ; and having stoned Paul, drew him out of the city, supposing he had been dead. The historian informs us that his life was miraculously restored, and that he departed thence, and came to Derbe, and afterwards returned to Lystra, Iconium, and Antioch, where they had lately been so grievously persecuted.—See Acts xiv. 6, 19—21. These are the persecutions, &c. to which the apostle alludes ; and we find that he mentions them here precisely in the same order in which according to the relation of St. Luke, they occurred. Now, it is said here, that Timothy fully knew all these things ; and we may naturally suppose they could not be unknown to him, when it is evident he was either native of, or resided in, those parts : for, when the apostle, some time after the above, visited Derbe and Lystra, behold, a certain disciple was there, named Timothy, well reported by the brethren that were at Lystra and Iconium. Acts i. 1. As these things happened in his own neighbourhood, Timothy must have known them ; for a person who had such a religious education as he had, could not be unacquainted with these persecutions, especially as we may believe that his father and grandmother had been converts to Christianity at that time. See several useful remarks in Dr. Paley's Horæ sublimæ, on these circumstances, p. 312.

12. All that will live godly] So opposite to the spirit and service of the world is the whole of Christianity, that he who res himself entirely up to God, making the Holy Scriptures ; rule of his words and actions, will be less or more reviled & persecuted. " If religion gives no quarter to vice, the loss will give no quarter to religion and its professors. " 3. Evil men and seducers shall wax worse] They will go on, for a season, deceiving themselves and deceiving others ; but, by and by, their folly will become manifest to all.

9. The word years, which we render seducers, signifies glers, pretenders to magical arts ; probably persons dealing in false miracles ; with whom the church, in all ages, has been not a little disgraced. 14. But continue thou] No man, however well instructed in the things of God, or grounded in Divine grace, is out of the reach of temptation, apostasy, and final ruin : hence the necessity of watching unto prayer, depending upon God, continuing in the faith, and persevering unto the end.

15. From a child thou hast known the Holy Scriptures] The early religious education of Timothy, has been already sufficiently noticed, see chap. i. 5. and the Preface to the first epistle. St. Paul introduces this circumstance again here, for the confirmation of Timothy's faith. He had learned the doctrines of Christianity from a genuine apostle ; and as Christi- apity is founded on the law and the prophets, Timothy was able to compare its doctrines with all that had been typified and predicted, and consequently was assured that the Christian religion was true.

Able to make thee wise unto salvation] The apostle is here evidently speaking of the Jewish Scriptures ; and he tells us that they are able to make us wise unto salvation, provided we have faith in Jesus Christ. This is the simple use of the Old Testament. No soul of man can be made wise unto salvation by it, but as he refers all to Christ Jesus. The Jews are unsaved, though they know these Scriptures, because they believe not in Christ : for Christ is the end of the law for the justification of all that believe.

16. All scripture is given by inspiration of God] This sentence is not well translated ; the original, σαρα γραφή θεοθεν εως, ωφελιμος προς διδασκαλιαν, κ. τ. λ. should be rendered, Every writing divinely inspired, is profitable for doctrine, &c. The particle και, and, is omitted by almost all the Versions, and many of the Fathers ; and certainly does not agree well with the text. The apostle is here, beyond all controversy, speaking of the writings of the Old Testament ; which, because they came by Divine inspiration, he terms the Holy Scriptures, ver. 15. and it is of them alone that this passage is to be understood ; and although all the New Testament came by as direct an inspiration as the Old ; yet, as it was not collected at that time, nor indeed complete, the apostle could have no reference to it.

The doctrine of the inspiration of the Sacred Writings has been a subject of much discussion, and even controversial, among Christians. There are two principal opinions on the subject.—1. That every thought and word were inspired by God ; and that the writer did nothing but merely write as the Spirit dictated. 2. That God gave the whole matter, leaving the inspired writers to their own language ; and hence the great variety of style and different modes of expression. But as I have treated this subject at large in my Introduction to the Four Gospels, and Acts of the Apostles, I must refer the reader to that work.

Is profitable for doctrine] To teach the will of God, and to point out Jesus Christ till He should come.

For reproof] To convince men of the truth ; and to confound those who should deny it ; particularly the Jews.

For correction] Προς αναρθρωσιν, for restoring things to their proper uses and places : correcting false notions and mistaken views.

Instruction in righteousness] Προς παιδείαν την εν δικαιοσυνη. For communicating all initiatory religious knowledge ; for schooling mankind. All this is perfectly true of the Jewish Scriptures : and left faith in Christ Jesus be added, see ver. 15. and then all that is spoken in the following verse will be literally accomplished :

17. That the man of God] The preacher of righteousness, the minister of the Gospel ; the person who derives his commission from God ; and always appears as His herald and servant.

May be perfect] Αριος, from αρος, to fit or adapt. It properly signifies an integer, or whole number, in arithmetic ; to which nothing needs to be added to make it complete.

Thoroughly furnished] Εμπροστωτος, from ει, intensive, and αριος, complete ; see above. Not only complete in himself, as to his integrity, religious knowledge, faith in Jesus, and love to God and man ; but that he should have all those qualifications which are necessary to complete the character, and ensure the success, of a preacher of the Gospel. Timothy was to teach, reprove, correct, and instruct others ; and was to be to them a pattern of good works.

From what the apostle says here concerning the qualifications of a Christian minister, we may well exclaim, Who is capable of these things ? Is it such a person as has not intellect sufficient for a common trade or calling ? No. A preacher of the Gospel should be a man of the soundest sense, the most cultivated mind, the most extensive experience; one who is deeply taught of God; and who has deeply studied man; one who had prayed much, read much, and studied much; one who takes up his work as from God, does it as before God, and refers all to the glory of God; one who abides under the inspiration of the Almighty, and who has hidden the word of God in his heart, that he might not sin against Him. No minister formed by man, can ever be such as is required here. The school of Christ, and that alone, can ever form such a preacher.

CHAPTER IV.

The apostle solemnly charges Timothy to be diligent, incessant, and faithful in his preaching; to watch, suffer patiently, and give full proof of his ministry, 1-5. He predicts his own approaching death, and expresses the strongest confidence of being eternally happy, 6-8. Desires Timothy to come and see him; shows that several had forsaken him, that others were gone to different districts, and that he had only Luke with him, 9-12. Desires him to bring the cloak, books, and parchments, which he had left at Troas, 13. Of Alexander the copper-smith's opposition, 14, 15. Tells Timothy how he was deserted by all when obliged to make his first defence before Nero; how God supported him, and the confidence with which he was inspired, 16-18. Salutations to different persons at Ephesus; and from different persons at Rome, 19-21. The apostolical benediction, 22. [A. M. cir. 4069. A. D. 65 or 66. A. U. C. 818. An. Imp. Neronis Cons. NOTES.-Verse 1. I charge thee therefore before God] Whose herald thou art; and before the Lord Jesus Christ, whose salvation thou art to proclaim; and who is coming to judge the world; all that shall be found then alive, and all that have died from the foundation of the world;

2. Preach the word] Κηρύξον τον λογον, proclaim the doctrine, the doctrine of Christ crucified for the sins of the whole world; the doctrine that the Gentiles are invited to be fellow-heirs with the Jews; and that, for Jews and Gentiles, there is no salvation but by faith in Christ.

Be instant in season and out of season] Επισηνη ενκαιρος, ακαιρος. Be urgent, whether the times be prosperous or adverse, whenever there is an opportunity; and when there is none, strive to make one. The Judge is at the door; and to every man eternity is at hand! Wherever thou meetest a sinner, speak to him the word of reconciliation. Do not be contented with stated times and accustomed places merely; all time and place belong to God, and are proper for His work. Wherever it can be done, there it should be done. Satan will omit neither time nor place where he can destroy. Omit thou none where thou mayest be the instrument of salvation to any.

Rebuke] Ελεγξον, confute the false teachers. Rebuke] Επιτιμησον, reprove cuttingly and severely those who will not abandon their sins.

Exhort] Παρακαλεον, comfort the feeble-minded, the diffident, and the tempted.

With all long-suffering] In reference to each and all of those cases.

And doctrine] The different modes of teaching suited to each.

3. For the time will come] There is a time coming to the church when men will not hear the practical truths of the Gospel; when they will prefer speculative opinions, which either do no good to the soul, or corrupt and destroy it, to that wholesome doctrine of "Deny thyself, take up thy cross, and follow me," which Jesus Christ has left in His church.

But after their own lusts] For these they will follow, and hate those preachers, and that doctrine, by which they are opposed.

Shall they heap to themselves teachers] They will add one teacher to another, run and gad about after all, to find out those who insist, not on the necessity of bearing the cross, of being crucified to the world, and of having the mind that was in Jesus. In this disposition, interested men often find their account; they set up for teachers, "and widen and strew with flowers the way down to eternal ruin;" taking care to soothe the passions, and flatter the vices, of a trifling superficial people.

Having itching ears] Endless curiosity; an insatiable desire of variety; and they get their ears tickled with the language and accent of the person, abandoning the good and faithful preacher for the fine speaker.

4. And they shall turn away their ears from the truth] The truth strips them of their vices, sacrifices their idols, darts its lightning against their easily besetting sins, and absolutely requires a conformity to a crucified Christ; therefore they turn their ear away from it.

And shall be turned unto fables] Believe any kind of stuff and nonsense; for, as one has justly observed, "Those who reject the truth are abandoned, by the just judgment of God, to credit the most degrading nonsense." This is remarkably the case with most Deists; their creed often exhibits what is grossly absurd.

5. But watch thou in all things] It is possible to be overtaken in a fault; to neglect one's duty, and to lose one's soul. Watching unto prayer prevents all these evils.

Endure afflictions] Let no sufferings affright thee; nor let 5 But watch thou in all things, endure afflictions, as the work of an evangelist, make full proof of thy ministry.

6 For I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand.

7 I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith:

8 Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me, at that day; and not to me only, but unto all them also that love his appearing.

1 Or, fulfil. Rom. 15.18. Col. 1.25. & 4.17. - Phil. 2.17. - 1 Cor. 1.28. 2 Tim. 1.10. - 1 Cor. 2.24. 25. Phil. 3.14. 1 Tim. 6.12. Heb. 12.1. - 1 Cor. 13.3. James 1.12. 1 Pet. 5.4. Rev. 2.10. - Ch. 1.12.

the dread of them either cause thee to abandon the truth, or to relax in thy zeal for the salvation of men.

Do the work of an evangelist] That is, preach Christ crucified for the sins of the whole world; for this, and this alone, is doing the work of an evangelist, or preacher of the glad tidings of peace and salvation by Christ. An angel from God was first sent to do the work of an evangelist; and how did he do it? Behold, said he, I bring you good tidings of great joy; Ιδου γαρ, ευαγγελισθησαι υμιν χαρον μεγαλην τρις εν παντι του λαου. Behold, I evangelize unto you great joy, which shall be to all people; to you is born a Saviour. Those who do not proclaim Christ as having tasted death for every man; and who do not implicitly show that every human soul may be saved; and do not perform the work of evangelists; they, God help them! Hail the Holy One of Israel. Yet, as for us they preach the truth in sincerity, so far God acknowledge, and blesses them and their labours: they do a part of the work, but not the whole.

Make full proof of thy ministry.] Push all thy principle to their utmost power of activity; carry them on to all their consequences; and try what God will do for thee, and by thee. Neglect no part of thy sacred function; perform faithfully all the duties of which it is composed; and do God's work in His own way, and in His own Spirit.

6. For I am now ready to be offered] Ηδη ερωδωμαι, I am already poured out as a libation. - See the note on Phil. 2.17. He considers himself as on the eve of being sacrificed; and looks upon his blood as the libation which was poured on the sacrificial offering. He could not have spoken thus positively, had not the sentence of death been already passed upon him. I have fought a good fight] Every reader will perceive that the apostle, as was his very frequent custom, alludes to the contests at the Grecian games; τον αγωνα σου ελεως σπενυσαι, I have wrestled that good wrestling; I have struggled hard, and have overcome, in a most honourable cause.

I have finished my course] I have started for the prize, and have come up to the goal, outstripped all my competitors, and have gained this prize also.

I have kept the faith] As the laws of these games must be most diligently observed and kept, for though a man overcome, yet is he not crowned, except he strive lawfully, so I have kept the rules of the spiritual combat and race: and thus, having contended lawfully, and conquered in each exercise, I have a right to expect the prize.

8. Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown] This I can claim as my due; but the crown I expect is not one of fading leaves, but a crown of righteousness; the reward which God, in His kindness, has promised to them who are faithful to the grace He has bestowed upon them.

The Lord, the righteous Judge] He alludes here to the Strophæus, or umpire in the Grecian games, whose office it was to declare the victor, and to give the crown.

In that day] The day of judgment; the morning of the resurrection for the dead.

Unto all them that love his appearing] All who live in expectation of the coming of Christ; who anticipate it with joyfulness; having buried the world, and laid up all their hopes above. Here is a reward; but it is a reward not of debt but of grace: for, it is by the grace of God that even an apostle is fitted for glory. And this reward is common to the faithful. It is given not only to apostles, but to all them that love His appearing. This crown is laid up; it is in view, but not in possession. We must die first.

I have several times noted the allusions of St. Paul to the Greek poets, and such as seemed to argue that he quoted immediately from them. There is a passage in the Alkestis of Euripides, in which the very expressions used here by the Alcest. v. 644.

"Thou wouldest not, neither darest thou to die for thy son; but hast suffered this strange woman to do it, whom I justly deem to be alone my father and mother: thou wouldest have us fight a good fight hadst thou died for thy son."

The αἰών αἰῶν, good fight, was used among the Greeks to express a contest of the most honourable kind; and in this sense the apostle uses it.

9. Do thy diligence to come shortly unto me] He appears to have wished Timothy to be present at his death, that he might have his faith confirmed by seeing how a Christian could die; and, as he had but a short time to live, he begs Timothy to hasten his visit, and particularly so, as he had caringly now any companions.

10. Demas hath forsaken me] This is another proof of the inferiority of this epistle; for Demas was with the apostle in his first imprisonment, and joins in the salutations; see Coloss. v. 14 which was written when Paul was a prisoner at Rome or the first time.

Having loved this present world] Ἀγαπήσας τὸν νῦν αἰῶνα. Having preferred Judaism to Christianity; or having loved the Jews, and having sought their welfare in preference to that of the Gentiles.

The words ἡν ὄρασιν ἑσται ἡσσεῖ, which answer to the Greek τὸν νῦν αἰῶνα, are generally to be understood as signifying either the Jewish people, or the system of Judaism. It was now become doubly dangerous to be a Christian; and those who had not religion enough to enable them to burn, or in any other way to expose life for it, took refuge in that religion which was exposed to no persecution. This is a light in which the conduct of Demas may be viewed. It could not have been the love of secular gain, which had induced Demas to abandon St. Paul; he must have counted this cost before he became a Christian.—See below.

Crescens to Galatia] Whether the departure of Crescens was similar to that of Demas, as intimated above, or whether he went on an evangelizing embassy, we know not. Chastly would hope the latter; for we can hardly suppose that Titus, who is here said to have departed to Dalmatia, had abandoned his Cretan churches, his apostolical office, and especially his aged father and friend, now about to seal the ruck with his blood! It is probable that both these persons had gone on sacred missions, and perhaps had been gone some time before the apostle was brought into such imminent danger. Even for Demas, as standing in this connexion, something might be said. It is not intimated that he had denied the faith, but simply that he had left the apostle and gone into Thessalonica; for which this reason is given, that he loved the present world. Now, if ἀγαπήσας, having loved, can be applied to a desire to save the souls of the Jews, and that he went into Thessalonica, where they abounded, for this very purpose, then we shall find all three, Demas, Crescens, and Titus, one at Thessalonica, another at Galatia, and the third at Dalmatia, doing the work of evangelists, visiting the churches, and converting both Jews and Gentiles. This interpretation I leave to the charitable reader, and must own, that, with all the pre-emptive evidences against it, it has some fair show of probability. Demas has received little justice from interpreters and teachers in general. It is even fashionable to hunt him down.

11. Only Luke is with me] This was Luke the evangelist, and writer of the Acts of the Apostles, who was always much attached to St. Paul; and it is supposed continued with him even to his martyrdom.

Take Mark, and bring him with thee] This was John Mark, the sister's son of Barnabas; who, after having wandered a little at first, became a steady, zealous, and useful man. His name and conduct have been often before the reader.—See the parallel passages.

For he is profitable to me for the ministry] Εἰς διακονίαν, or service; that is, he would be very useful to the apostle, to minister to him in his present close confinement. Some think that the apostle means his preaching the Gospel; but at this time, I should suppose, there was very little, if any, public preaching at Rome.

12. Tychicus, have I sent to Ephesus.] For this person, see Acts xx. 4. Ephes. vi. 21. Coloss. iv. 7. It is rather strange that the apostle should say, I have sent Tychicus to Ephesus, if Timothy was at Ephesus at this time; but it is probable that Tychicus had been sent to Ephesus some time before this; and therefore the apostle might say, though writing now to Ephesus, Tychicus have I sent, &c.

13. The cloak that I left at Troas] Το ἄνωγόν, is by several translated bag or portmanteau; and it is most likely that it was something of this kind, in which he might carry his clothes, books, and travelling necessaries. What the books were we cannot tell; it is most likely they were his own writings; and as to the parchments, they were probably the Jewish Scriptures, and a copy of the Septuagint. These he must have had at hand at all times. The books and parchments now sent for, could not be for the apostle's own use, as he was now on the eve of his martyrdom. He had probably intended to bequeath them to the faithful; that they might be preserved for the use of the church.

14. Alexander the coppersmith] We are not to understand this of any tradesman, but of some rabbin; for it was not unusual for the Jews to apply the name of some trade as an epithet to their rabbins and literary men. He is, in all probability, the very same mentioned Acts xix. 33. where see the note: and it is not unlikely that he may have been the same whom the apostle was obliged to excommunicate, 1 Tim. 1. 20.

The Lord reward him] Ἀποδοῦναι ὁ Κύριος. But, instead of ἀποδοῦναι, which has here the power of a solemn imprecation, ἀποδοῦναι, he will reward, is the reading of the very best MSS., several of the Versions, and some of the chief Greek Fathers. This makes the sentence declaratory, The Lord will reward him according to his works. This reading is most like the spirit and temper of this heavenly man.—See ver. 16.

15. Of whom be thou ware also] It seems that this rabbin travelled about from place to place, for the purpose of opposing the Gospel; the Jews putting him forward, as it is said Acts xix. 33.

He hath greatly withstood our words] Has been a constant opposer of the Christian doctrines.

16. At my first answer] Ἐν τῇ πρώτῃ μου ἀπολογίᾳ, at my first apology: this word properly signifies a defence, or vindication. This is the meaning of what we call the apologies of the primitive fathers; they were vindications, or defences, of Christianity. It is generally allowed, that when St. Paul had been taken this second time by the Romans, he was examined immediately, and required to account for his conduct; and that, so odious was Christianity, through the tyranny of Nero, that he could procure no person to plead for him. Nero, who had himself set fire to Rome, charged it on the Christians; and they were in consequence persecuted in the most cruel manner: he caused them to be wrapped up in pitched clothes; and then, chaining them to a stake, he ordered them to be set on fire, giving light in the streets after night! Τὸρμῆναι γένουσι! To this, Jerome's appears to allude.—Sat. l. v. 155.

Pose Tygelinum, tuda lucibus in illis
 Qua stantes ardent, qui sine guttura fumant.
 "If into rogues omnipotent you rake,
 Death is your doom, impaled upon a stake;
 Smeared o'er with wax, and set on blaze to light,
 The streets, and make a dreadful fire by night."

I pray God that it may not be laid to their charge.] How much more simple, and expressive, are the apostle's own words: ἢ ἀναίσις λογισθεῖν—let it not be placed to their account! Let them not have to reckon for it with the Supreme Judge, at the great day!

17. The Lord stood with me] When all human help failed, God, in a more remarkable manner, interposed; and thus the excellency plainly appeared to be of God, and not of man.

That by me the preaching might be fully known] When called on to make his defence, he took occasion to preach the Gospel, and to show that the great God of heaven and earth had designed to illuminate the Gentile world with the rays of His light and glory. This must have endeared him to some, eth thee, and Pudens, and Linus, and Claudia, and all the brethren.

a Gal. 6. 15. Platten. 55.

while others might consider him an opposer of their gods, and be the more incensed against him.

I was delivered out of the mouth of the lion I escaped the imminent danger at that time; probably he was seized in a tumultuous manner, and expected to be torn to pieces. The words ex seque, or ex specu leonum pcedat, to be rescued from the mouth or jaws of the lion, is a proverbial form of speech for deliverance from the most imminent danger. Several writers think Nero to be intended by the lion, because of his rage and oppressive cruelty. But Helius Cassarius was at this time prefect of the city, Nero being in Greece; he was a bloody tyrant, and Nero had given him the power of life and death in his absence.—The apostle may mean him, if the words be not proverbial.

18. And the Lord shall deliver me from every evil work.] None of the evil designs formed against me, to make me unfaithful or unsteady; to cause me to save my life at the expense of faith and good conscience, shall succeed: my life may go, but He will preserve me unto His heavenly kingdom. A continuance on earth the apostle expects not, but he has glory full in view; and therefore he gives God glory for what he had done, and for what he had promised to do.

19. Salute Prisca and Aquila.] Several MSS., Versions, and Fathers, have Priscilla, instead of Prisca; they are probably the same as those mentioned Acts xviii. 26.

The household of Onesiphorus.] See chap. i. 16. Onesiphorus was probably at this time dead: his family still remained at Ephesus.

20. Erastus abode at Corinth.] He was treasurer of that city, as we learn from Rom. xvi. 23.—See the note there. The apostle had sent him and Timothy on a mission to Macedonia, Acts xix. 22, whence it is probable he returned to Corinth, and there became finally settled.

Trophimus have I left at Miletum sick.] Even the apostles could not work miracles when they pleased; that power was but rarely given, and that for very special purposes. Trophimus was an Ephesian.—See Acts xx. 4, and the note there.

Miletus was a maritime town of Ionia, not far from Ephesus; but there was another Miletus in Crete, which some learned men think to be intended here. It appears that St. Paul went from Macedonia to Corinth, where he left Erastus; from Corinth he proceeded to Troas, where he lodged with Carpus; from Troas he went to Ephesus, where he visited Timothy; from Ephesus he went to Miletus, where he left Trophimus sick; and having embarked at Miletus, he went by sea to Rome.—See Calmet. It is most likely, therefore, that the Miletus of Ionia is the place intended.

21. Come before winter.] 1. Because the apostle's time was short and uncertain. 2. Because sailing in those seas was very dangerous in winter. Whether Timothy saw the apostle before he was martyred is not known.

Eubulus.] This person is not known elsewhere mentioned in the New Testament.

Pudens] Of this person we have traditions and legends, but nothing certain. The Catholics make him bishop of Rome. Linus] He also is made by the same persons, bishop of Rome; but there is no sufficient ground for these pretensions.

Claudia.] Supposed to be the wife of Pudens. Some think she was a British lady, converted by St. Paul; and that she was the first that brought the Gospel to Britain.

All the brethren.] All the Christians, of whom there were many at Rome; though of Paul's companions in travel, only Luke remained there.

22. The Lord Jesus Christ be with thy spirit.] This is a prayer addressed to Christ by one of the most eminent of His apostles: another proof of the untruth of the assertion that prayer is never offered to Christ in the New Testament. He prays that Christ may be with his spirit; enlightening, strengthening, and confirming it to the end.

Grace be with you.] These words show that the epistle was addressed to the whole church, and that it is not to be considered of a private nature.

Amen.] Omitted by ACFG. and some others.—See the note on this word at the end of the preceding epistle.

The principal scripturists, both in the Versions and MSS. are the following:—The Second Epistle to Timothy was written from Rome.—SYRIAC.

To the man Timothy.—ÆTHIOPIAN.

Nothing in it.—VULGATE.

End of the epistle: it was written from the city of Rome, when Timothy had been constituted bishop over Ephesus; and when Paul had stood, the second time, in the presence of Nero Cæsar, the Roman Emperor. Praise to the Lord of glory; perpetual, perennial, and eternal! Amen, Amen, Amen.—ARABIC.

The Second Epistle to Timothy is ended, who was the first bishop of the church of Ephesus. It was written from Rome when Paul had stood the second time before Nero, the Roman Emperor.—PHILOXENIAN SYRIAC.

Written from Rome, and sent by Onesimus.—CORINTH.

1 The second epistle unto Timotheus, ordained the first bishop of the church of the Ephesians, was written from Rome, when Paul was brought before Nero the second time.

o Gr. Cesar Nero, or, the Emperor Nero.

The MSS. are also various:—The Second Epistle to Timothy is finished; that to Titus begins.

The Second to Timothy, written from Laodiceæ—CASS ALEXANDRINA.

The Second Epistle of Paul the Apostle to Timothy, ordained the first bishop of the church of the Ephesians, was written from Rome when Paul was brought the second time before Nero Cæsar.—COMMON GREEK TEXT.

There are other slighter differences in the MSS. but they are unworthy of note.

That the epistle was written from Rome, about the year 65 or 66, and a little before St. Paul's martyrdom, is the general opinion of learned men.—See the Preface.

The reader has already been apprized that this is most probably the last epistle the apostle ever wrote; and it is impossible to see him in a more advantageous point of view than he now appears; standing on the verge of eternity, full of God, and strongly anticipating an eternity of glory.—For further observations, see the conclusion of the first epistle.

On verse 16, I have mentioned the apologies of the Primitive Fathers, or their vindications of Christianity against the aspersions and calumnies of the Gentiles. Several of these writings are still extant; of the whole I shall here give a short account, in chronological order.

1. QUADRATUS.—St. Jerom relates, that this man was contemporary with the apostles; and one also of their disciples. There is only a fragment of his apology extant; it is preserved by Eusebius, in Hist. Eccles. lib. iv. c. 3; and was addressed to the emperor Adrian about A. D. 136, on whom it is said to have had a good effect.

2. ARISTIDES.—According to Eusebius, was an Athenian philosopher, and contemporary with Quadratus, and wrote his apology for the Christians about the same time, (A. D. 136) and addressed it to the same emperor. St. Jerom gives some remarkable particulars of him in his book of Illustrious Men. "He was," says he, "a most eloquent philosopher; and, after his conversion, he continued to wear his former habit." His apology was extant in the days of St. Jerom, but is now utterly lost.

3. JUSTIN MARTYR.—Flourished about A. D. 140, and presented his first apology for Christianity to the emperor Antoninus Pius, and the Roman senate, about A. D. 150, and his second apology was presented to Marcus Antoninus, about A. D. 162 or 166. These two very important apologies are come down to us nearly entire; and are exceedingly useful and important.

4. ATHENAGORAS.—Wrote his apology for the Christians about the year 178. He is said to have sat down to write against the Christians; and, that he might the better convince them, he read over the Scriptures, and was so thoroughly converted by what he read, that he immediately wrote an apology for them, instead of an invective against them.—This piece is still extant.

5. TERTULLIAN.—Who flourished about A. D. 200, was the earliest and one of the chief of the Latin Fathers; he was born in Carthage, and was a presbyter of the church in that city. His apology was written about A. D. 198; or according to some, 200. It appears to have been addressed to the governors of provinces, and is allowed to be a work of extraordinary eminence; and a master-piece of its kind. It is still extant.

6. MARCUS MINUCIUS FELIX.—Flourished towards the end of the reign of Septimius Severus, about A. D. 210. His apology for the Christian religion is written in the form of a dialogue, between Caecilius Natalis, a heathen, and Octavius Minucius Felix, a Christian; in which Minucius sits as judge. "This work," says Dr. Lardner, "is a monument of the author's ingenuity, learning, and eloquence; and the conversion of a man of his great natural and acquired abilities to the Christian religion, and his public and courageous defence of it, notwithstanding the many worldly temptations to the contrary, which he must have met with at that time, as they give an advantageous idea of his virtue, so they likewise afford a very agreeable argument in favour of the truth of our religion." Works, Vol. ii. p. 367.

To the above, who are properly the Christian apologists in the first 200 years, several add Tatian's book against the Gentiles; Clemens Alexandrinus's Exhortation to the Gentiles; Origen's eight books against Celsus; Cyprian's of the Vanity of Idols; Arnobius's seven books against the Gentiles; and the Institutions of Lactantius; and Julius Firmicus Maternus, of the Errors of Profane Religions. All these works contain much important information; and are well worthy the attention of the studious reader. The principal part of these writings I have analysed in my Succession of Sacred Literature; and to this, they who cannot conveniently consult the originals, may refer.

As the word apology generally signifies now, an excuse for a fault, or "something spoken rather in extenuation of guilt, than to prove innocence." it is seldom used in its primitive sense; and for some hundreds of years no defence of Christantly has borne this title till that by the bishop of Llan-tarf, intitled, An Apology for the Brama, in a series of letters addressed to THOMAS PAINE. This is a very masterly work, and a complete refutation of Paine's "Age of Reason," and of any thing that has yet appeared, or can appear, under the same form. Ever since the days of St. Paul, God has raised up able apologists for the truths of Christianity, when it has been attacked by the most powerful partisans of the kingdom of darkness; and each attack and apology has been a new triumph for the religion of Christ.

PREFACE TO THE EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE TO TITUS.

It is strange, that of a person who must have attained considerable eminence in the Christian church, and one to whom a canonical epistle has been written, by the great apostle of the Gentiles, we should know so very little. That Titus was a frequent companion of St. Paul in his journeys, we have evidence from his epistles; and, although this was the case, he is not once mentioned in the book of the Acts of the Apostles!

That he was a Greek, and brought up in Heathenism, we learn from Galat. ii. 3. "But neither Titus, who was with me, being a Greek, was compelled to be circumcised." As he was uncircumcised, he was neither a Jew nor a proselyte of justice, and probably was a mere heathen till he heard the Gospel preached by St. Paul, by whose ministry he was converted to the Christian faith, chap. i. 4. "To Titus my own son, (γεννητο υγιου μου, my genuine son,) after the common faith;" which words sufficiently indicate that St. Paul alone had the honour of his conversion. That he was very highly, and consequently deservedly, esteemed by St. Paul, is evident from the manner in which he mentions him in different places: "I had no rest in my spirit till I found Titus my brother," 2 Cor. ii. 13. "Nevertheless, God, that comforteth those who are cast down, comforted us by the coming of Titus; and not by his coming only, but by the consolation wherewith he was comforted in you: therefore, we were comforted in your comfort; yea, and exceedingly the more joyed you whilst he remembereth how with fear and trembling ye received him," 2 Cor. vii. 6, 7, 13, 15. "But thanks be to God, who put the same earnest care into the heart of Titus for you. Whether any do inquire of Titus, he is my partner and fellow-helper concerning you," viii. 16, 23. "Did Titus make a gain of you? Walked we not in the same spirit? talked we not in the same steps?" xii. 13.

Though St. Paul's preaching the Gospel in Crete is not expressly mentioned any where, yet it may be plainly inferred from chap. i. 5. "For this cause left I thee in Crete, that thou shouldst set in order the things that are wanting, and chain elders in every city." It is supposed that this was his first time in the year 62, after the apostle was released from his first imprisonment in Rome. But not being able to spend his time in that island, he left the care of the churches to Titus, and sailed into Judea in the beginning of 63, taking Timothy with him. Having spent some time in Jerusalem, he proceeded to Antioch, comforting and establishing the churches; thence he went. From Antioch he set out on his fifth of last apostolical journey, in which he and Timothy travelled through Syria and Cilicia, and came to Colosse in Phrygia, early in the year 64. On this occasion it is supposed he wrote his Epistle to Titus, in which he desires him to meet him in Nicopolis, as he had intended to spend the winter there. Tit. chap. iii. 12. From Colosse, he went with Timothy to Ephesus, where he left him to regulate and govern the church; from thence he passed into Macedonia, and pre-visited Philippi, and different churches in that province, according to his intention, Phil. ii. 24. and thence to Nicopolis, where he intended to spend the winter, and where he desired Titus to meet him.—See above.

Whether Titus ever left Crete we know not: nor how, nor ere, he died. Some traditions, on which little dependance can be placed, say he lived till he was 94 years of age, and is said to have been buried in Crete. He appears to have been a young man when entrusted with the care of the churches in the island. In such an extensive district, an aged or infirm man would have been of little service.

Crete, where Titus was resident, to whom this epistle was addressed, is the largest island in the Mediterranean Sea; it lies between 27° and 27° long. E. and between 35° and 36° lat. N. According to Strabo, it is 267 miles in length; Pliny makes it 270 miles; and, as its length is so disproportionate to its breadth, it is called, by Stephanus Byzantinus, the long island. It has the Archipelago to the north, the African Sea to the south, the Carpathian to the east, and the Ionian to the west. It is now generally computed to be about 260 miles long, 50 broad, and 600 in circumference. It was anciently divided into Aeria, Gbontia, Crete, Ida, and Macaris; but its common name was Crete. Of it Homer gives us the following description, Odys. lib. xix. v. 172—179.

Κρητη τις γαι' εστι, μεσοσσι οινοσι πανθη,
Καλλι, και τιετρα, περιβροτος ε θ' αυδουρα,
Καλλος, αυστροτος, και αυρηνοτα πελαγος.
Αλλ' ο' αλλων γλωσσα μεμνηται ο μιν Αχαιοι,
Ος θ' Επιοκρατος, μεγαλητατος, ος ες Κουδωσι,

Δωριεις τε Τρηχειας, διοι τε Πελαγοι.
Τοισι θ' ανι Κνωσος μεγαλη τοις ανθε τε Μινως
Ευρωπος βασιλευς Διος μεγαλασ εαρις.
Crete aves the circling waves, a fruitful soil;
And ninety cities crown the sea-born isle.
Mix'd with her genuine sons, adopted names
In various tongues avow their various claims.
Cidoniana, dreadful with the bended yew,
And bold Poliasgi, boast a native's due:
The Dorians plumed amidst the files of war,
Her foodful glebe, with fierce Achæans, share.
Cnosus, her capital of high command,
Whose sceptred Minos, with impartial hand,
Divided right; each ninth revolving year
By Jove received in council to confer.

Though in the above quotation Homer attributes to this island only ninety cities, εννηντα πολεις; yet in other places he gives it the epithet of εκατονταεις, hundred cities. And this number it is generally allowed to have had originally, but we must not let the term city deceive us, as, in ancient times, places were thus named which would rate with villages or hamlets only in these modern times. Few places in antiquity have been more celebrated than Crete: it was not only famous for its hundred cities, but for the arrival of Europa on a bull, or in the ship Tarasus, from Phœnicia; for the Labyrinth, the work of Dædalus, for the destruction of the Minotaur, by Theseus; for Mount Ida, where Jupiter was preserved from the jealousy of his father Saturn; for Jupiter's sepulchre; and, above all, for its king Minos, and the laws which he gave to his people; the most pure, wholesome, and equal, of which antiquity can boast.

Their lawgiver Minos is said by Homer to have held a conference every ninth year with Jupiter, from whom he is reported to have received directions for the farther improvement of his code of laws: though this be false, it probably states a fact in disguise: Minos probably revised his laws every ninth year; and, to procure due respect and obedience to them, told the people that he received these improvements from Jupiter himself. This was customary with ancient legislators, who had to deal with an ignorant and gross people, and has been practised from the days of Minos to those of Mohammed.

According to ancient authors, Crete was originally peopled from Palestine. Bochart has shown, Canaan, lib. i. c. 15, col. 420, that that part of Palestine which lies on the Mediterranean, was by the Arabs called Ceritha, and by the Syrians Creth; and the Hebrews called its inhabitants Crethim, כרתים or Crethim כרתים, which the Septuagint has translated Κρηταις. Thus Ezek. xiv. 16, we find כרתים את כרתים ועכרתים את כרתים, which we translate, "I will cut off the Cerethims," translated by the Septuagint as ελκοσω Κρηταις, "I will destroy the Crethians;" and Zeph. ii. 6, "Wo unto the inhabitants of the sea-coasts, the nations of the Cherethites;" כרתים ים כרתים, "the nation of the Crethim;" כרתים Κρηταις, Sept. "the sojourners of the Crethans." That these prophets do not speak of the island of Crete, is plain from their joining the Crethim with the Philistines, as one and the same people. "Thus saith the Lord God, Behold, I will stretch out my hand upon the Philistines, and will cut off the Cerethims, and destroy the remnant of the sea-coasts," Ezek. xx. 16. "Wo unto the inhabitants of the sea-coasts, the nation of the Cherethites; the word of the Lord is against you, O Ganaan, the land of the Philistines; I will even destroy thee," Zeph. ii. 6. Accordingly it appears that the Crethims were a part of the Philistines. The Crethim in Palestine were noted for archery; and we find that some of them were employed by David as his lifeguards, 2 Sam. viii. 18. xv. 18. xx. 23. 1 Kings i. 38. 1 Chron. xviii. 17. in all which places they are called, in our translation, Cherethites; but the Hebrew is כרתים Crethi, which the Chaldee paraphrase renders כרתים kashita, or כרתים kashitayah, archers.—See the Targum of Rab. Joseph. It is very likely that the Crethi, or Crethim, of Palestine, had their name from their successful use of their favourite instrument the bow; as by it they destroyed many, for כרתים carath, in Hebrew, signifies to destroy, or lay waste: and hence the paranomasia of the prophet, quoted above, Ezek. xxv. 16. "I will cut off the Cherethites," כרתים כרתים literally, "I will destroy the destroyers."

Idomeneus, who assisted Agamemnon in the Trojan war, was the last king of Crete. He left the regency of the island to his adopted son Leucus, who, in the absence of the king, usurped the empire: the usurper was, however, soon expelled, and Crete became one of the most celebrated republics in antiquity. The Romans at last, under Quintus Metellus, after an immense expenditure of blood and treasure, succeeded in subduing the island; on which he abolished the laws of Minoe, and introduced the code of Numa Pompilius. Crete, with the small kingdom of Cyrene, became a Roman province; this was at first governed by a proconsul, next by a questor and assistant, and lastly by a consul. Constantine the Great, in the new division he made of the provinces of the empire, separated Crete from Cyrene, and left it with Africa and Ilyria, to his third son Constantine. In the ninth century, in the reign of Michael II. it was attacked and conquered by the Saracens. About 965, the emperor Nicephorus Phocas, in the following century, defeated and expelled the Saracens, and reunited the island to the empire, after it had been under the power of the infidels upwards of 100 years. It remained with the empire until the time of Baldwin, earl of Flanders, who, being raised to the throne, rewarded the services of Boniface, marquis of Montferrat, by making him king of Thessalonica, and adding to it the island of Crete. Baldwin, preferring a sum of gold to the government of the island, sold it to the Venetians. A. D. 1194, under whose government it was called Candia, from the Arabic كنداك Kandak, a fortification, a name which the Saracens gave to the metropolis which they had built and strongly fortified. In 1645, in the midst of a profound peace, it was attacked by the Turks, with a fleet of 400 sail, which had on board an army of 60,000 men, under the command of four pashas; to oppose whom, the whole island could only muster 3500 infantry, and a small number of cavalry; yet, with these, they held out against a numerous and continually recruited army, disputing every inch of ground, so that the whole Ottoman power was employed for nearly 30 years before they got the entire dominion of the island. In this long campaign against this brave people, the Turks lost about 200,000 men! Since about the year 1675, the whole island has been under the government of the Turks.

The island of Crete is perhaps one of the most salubrious in the world. The soil is rich, and it produces no ferocious or poisonous animal. The present number of its inhabitants may amount to about 350,000 of whom about 200 are Jews, 150,000 Greeks, and 200,000 Turks. This is a large population for a place under Turkish despotism; but had it the blessings of a free government, it could support at least treble the number.

The island is divided into twelve bishops' sees, under the patriarch of Constantinople; but though the execrable Turks profess to allow the Christians the free exercise of their religion, yet they will not permit them to repair their churches. It is only by the influence of large sums of gold, paid to the pashas, that they can keep their religious houses from total dilapidation. The Mohammedans have indeed converted most of the Christian temples into mosques. In Candia, the metropolis, they have left two churches to the Greeks; one to the Armenians, and a synagogue to the Jews. Candia is about 500 miles from Constantinople. Is it not strange that the maritime powers of Europe have not driven those oppressors of the human race from this and every inch of Christian ground which they have usurped by treachery and violence; and which they continue to govern by despotism and cruelty?

Many have observed the affinity that subsists between the First Epistle to Timothy, and this to Titus. Both epistles are directed to persons left by the writer to preside in their respective churches during his absence. Both epistles are principally occupied in describing the qualifications of those who should be appointed to ecclesiastical offices; and the ingredients in this description, are nearly the same in both epistles. Timothy and Titus are both cautioned against the same prevailing corruptions. The phrases and expressions in both letters are nearly the same; and the writer accosts his two disciples with the same salutations, and passes on to the business of his epistle, with the same transition. For example, Unto Timothy "my own son in the faith—as I brought thee to abide still at Ephesus," &c. 1 Tim. chap. i. 1, 2, 3.

To Titus "my own son after the common faith—for this cause left I thee in Crete." Tit. ch. i. 4, 5.

If Timothy was not to "give heed to fables and endless genealogies which minister questions," 1 Tim. chap. i. 4.

Titus was also to "avoid foolish questions and genealogies," chap. iii. 9. "not giving heed to Jewish fables," chap. i. 14.

If Timothy was to be a "pattern" (τροπος;) 1 Tim. chap. ii. 12. so was Titus, chap. ii. 7.

If Timothy was to "let no man despise his youth," 1 Tim. ch. iv. 12. Titus was also to "let no man despise him," ch. i. 14.

This verbal consent is also observable in some very peculiar expressions, which have no relation to the particular character of Timothy or Titus.

The phrase πιστος ὁ λόγος, it is a faithful saying, occurs thrice in the First Epistle to Timothy, once in the second, and once in that to Titus; and in no other part of St. Paul's writings. These three epistles were probably written towards the close of his life; and are the only epistles written after his first imprisonment at Rome.

The same observation belongs to another singularity of expression, viz. the epithet sound, (ὀρθρος;) as applied to words or doctrine. It is thus used twice in 1 Tim. twice in the second epistle; and thrice in the epistle to Titus; beside two cognate expressions, ὀρθρολογος ἡ πίστις, sound in the faith, and λογον ὀρθρον, sound speech. And the word is not found in the same sense, in any other part of the New Testament.

The phrase, God our Saviour, stands in the same predicament. It is repeated three times in the First Epistle to Timothy; and thrice in the Epistle to Titus; and does not occur in any book of the New Testament, but once in the Epistle of Jude.

Similar terms, though intermixed with others, are repeated in the two epistles, in enumerating the qualifications required in those who should be advanced to the status of authority in the church: compare 1 Tim. chap. iii. 2-4 with Titus chap. i. 6-8.

The most natural accounts which can be given of these resemblances, is to suppose that the two epistles were written nearly at the same time; and whilst the same ideas and phrases dwelt in the writer's mind.

The journey of St. Paul to Crete, alluded to in this epistle, in which Titus was left in Crete to act in order the things which were wanting, must be carried to the period which intervened between his first and second imprisonment. For the history of the Acts, which reaches to the time of St. Paul's imprisonment, contains no account of his going to Crete, except upon his voyage as a prisoner to Rome; and that this could not be the occasion referred to in this epistle, is evident from hence, that when St. Paul wrote this epistle, he appears to have been at liberty; whereas, after that voyage, he continued at least two years in confinement.

It is agreed that St. Paul wrote his first Epistle to Timothy from Macedonia; and that he was in these parts, i. e. in the peninsula, when he wrote the Epistle to Titus, is rendered probable by his directing Titus to come to him in Nicopolis. The most noted city of that name was in Epirum, near to Actium; but the form of speaking, as well as the nature of the case, renders it probable that the writer was in the neighbourhood of this city when he dictated this direction to Titus.

Upon the whole, if we be allowed to suppose that St. Paul, after his liberation at Rome, sailed into Asia, taking Crete as his way; and that from Asia, and from Ephesus its capital, he proceeded to Macedonia, and crossing the peninsula as he progressed, came into the neighbourhood of Nicopolis: we have a route which falls in with every thing. It executes the intimation expressed by the apostle of visiting Colosse and Philippi, as soon as he should be set at liberty at Rome. It allows him to leave "Titus at Crete," and "Timothy at Ephesus," as he went into Macedonia; and he wrote to both not long after, from the peninsula of Greece, and probably the neighbourhood of Nicopolis; thus bringing together the dates of these two epistles, and thereby accounting for that affinity between them, both in subject and language, which has been above pointed out. Though the journey thus traced out for St. Paul be in a great measure hypothetical, yet it is a species of consistency which seldom belongs to falsehood to admit of an hypothesis which includes a great number of independent circumstances without contradiction.—See Paley's Horæ Paulinæ, p. 221.

NOTES.—Verse 1. Paul, a servant of God [in several places of his other epistles, St. Paul styles himself the servant of Jesus Christ; but this is the only place where he calls himself the servant of God. Some think that he did this to vindicate himself against the Jews; who supposed that he had renounced God, when he admitted the Gentiles into his Church. But if thus to vindicate himself was at all necessary, why was it not done in his epistle to the Romans, the grand object of which was to prove, that the Gentiles came legally into the Church on believing in Christ, without submitting to circumcision ; or being laid under obligation to observe the rites and ceremonies of the Jewish law ? This reason seems too fanciful. It is very likely, that in the use of the phrase, the apostle had no particular design ; for, according to him, he who is the servant of Christ, is also the servant of God ; and he who is God's servant, is also the servant of Christ.

The faith of God's elect] The Christians, who were now chosen in the place of the Jews ; who, for their obstinate rejection of the Messiah, were reprobated ; i. e. cast out of the Divine favour.

The acknowledging of the truth] For the propagation of that truth, or system of doctrines, which is calculated to promote godliness, or a holy and useful life.

2. In hope of eternal life] In expectation of a state of being and well-being, which should last through eternity, when time should be no more. This includes not only the salvation of the soul, and its eternal sanctification ; but also the resurrection of the body. This was a point but ill understood, and not very clearly revealed under the Mosaic law : but it was fully revealed under the Gospel ; and the doctrine illustrated by the resurrection and ascension of Christ.

Which God, that cannot lie, promised] We have often seen that the phrase, the foundation of the world, means the Jewish economy : and before the foundation of the world ; the times antecedent to the giving of the law. This is evidently the meaning here. — See 2 Tim. 1. 9, 10, 11.

Supposing the word aiwvov, in this verse, to signify eternal, says Dr. Macknight, the literal translation of epo xporov aiwvov, would be, before eternal times : but that being a contradiction in terms, our translators, contrary to the propriety of the Greek language, have rendered it, before the world began ; as Mr. Locke observes on Rom. xvi. 26. The true literal translation is, before the secular times, referring as to the Jewish jubilees, by which times were computed among the Hebrews, as among the Gentiles they were computed by generations of men. Hence, Coloss. 1. 26. the mystery which was kept hid, avrov aiwvov, kai avrov yevov, from the ages, and from the generations, signifies the mystery which was kept hid from the Jews and from the Gentiles.

3. But hath in due times] Kai povs idiov ; in its own times. See 1 Tim. ii. 6. Gal. iv. 4. Eph. i. 10. 11, 7. God caused the Gospel to be published in that time, in which it could be published with the greatest effect. It is impossible that God should prematurely hasten, or causelessly delay, the accomplishment of any of his works. Jesus was manifested precisely at the time in which that manifestation could best promote the glory of God, and the salvation of man.

Manifested his word] Tov logov svou, his doctrine, the doctrine of eternal life, by the incarnation, passion, death, and resurrection, of Jesus Christ.

Which is committed unto me] That is, to preach it among the Gentiles.

According to the commandment of God our Saviour] This evidently refers to the commission which he had received from Christ. — See Acts ix. 15. He is a chosen vessel unto Me, bear My name before the Gentiles. For, I have appeared to thee for this purpose, to make thee a minister and a witness of the things which thou hast seen ; and of those things the which I will appear unto thee : delivering thee from the people and from the Gentiles, unto whom now I send thee ; to open their eyes, to turn them from darkness to light, &c. Acts vi. 16, &c. This is the commandment ; and, according to it he became the apostle of the Gentiles.

God our Saviour. — As the commission was given by Jesus Christ alone ; the Person, whom he terms here God our Saviour, must be Jesus Christ only : and this is another proof, that St. Paul believed Jesus Christ to be God. This eternal God had promised in a comparatively obscure way, before the foundation of the world, the Jewish dispensation ; but when, under the Gospel, he had made it manifest ; produced it in all its brightness, illustrations, and proofs.

To Titus, mine own son] Him whom I have been the instrument of converting to the Christian faith ; and in whom, this respect, I have the same right as any man can have in his own begotten son. — See the Preface ; and see on 1 Tim. i. 2.

For this cause left I thee in Crete.] That St. Paul had been in Crete, though no where else intimated, is clear from a passage. That he could not have made such an important visit, and evangelized an island of the first consequence, without its being mentioned by his historian Luke, had it happened during the period embraced in the Acts of the Apostles, must be evident. That the journey, therefore, must have been performed after the time in which St. Luke ends his history, that is, after St. Paul's first imprisonment at Rome, seems almost certain.

Set in order the things that are wanting] It appears from this, that the apostle did not spend much time in Crete ; and that he was obliged to leave it before he had got the Church properly organised. The supplying of this defect, he tells Titus, he had confided to him, as one whose spiritual views coincided entirely with his own.

Ordain elders in every city] That thou mightest appoint, κατανοας, elders, persons well instructed in Divine things, who should be able to instruct others, and observe and enforce the discipline of the Church. It appears that those who are called elders in this place, are the same as those termed bishops in ver. 7. We have many proofs, that bishops and elders were of the same order in the apostolic Church, though afterward they became distinct. Lord Peter King, in his view of the primitive Church, has written well on this subject.

In every city — Kata tolv. This seems to intimate, that the apostle had gone over the whole of the Aecatompolis, or hundred cities, for which this island was celebrated. Indeed it is not likely, that he would leave one, in which he had not preached Christ crucified.

6. If any be blameless] See the notes on 1 Tim. iii. 2, &c.

Having faithful children] Whose family is converted to God. It would have been absurd to employ a man to govern the Church, whose children were not in subjection to himself : for, it is an apostolic maxim, that he who cannot rule his own house, cannot rule the Church of God. 1 Tim. iii. 5.

7. Not self-willed] Mh avthav ; one who is determined to have his own way in every thing ; setting up his own judgment to that of all others ; expecting all to pay homage to his understanding. Such a governor in the church of God can do little good ; and may do much mischief.

Not soon angry] Mh oppivov ; not a choleric man ; one who is irritable ; who is apt to be inflamed on every opposition ; one who has not proper command over his own temper.

8. A lover of hospitality] Φιλοξενov ; a lover of strangers. See the note on 1 Tim. iii. 2. Instead of φιλοξενov, one MS. has φιλοπρωον, a lover of the poor. That minister who neglects the poor, but is frequent in his visits to the rich, knows little of his Master's works ; and has little of his Master's Spirit.

A lover of good men] Φιλαγαθov ; a lover of goodness, or of good things in general.

Sober] Prudent in all his conduct. Just ; in all his dealings. Holy ; in his heart. Temperate ; self-denying and abstemious in his food and raiment ; not too nice on points of honour ; nor magisterially rigid in the exercise of his ecclesiastical functions. Qualifications rarely found in spiritual governors.

9. Holding fast the faithful word] Conscientiously retaining, and zealously maintaining, the true Christian doctrine, according to the instructions, or κατα την διδαχην, according to the institutions, form of sound doctrine, or confession of faith, which I have delivered to thee.

That he may be able by sound doctrine] If the doctrine be not sound, vain is the profession of it ; and vain its influence. It is good to be zealously affected in a good thing ; but zeal for what is not of God, will do no good to the souls of men ; how sincere soever that zeal may be.

To exhort] Them to hold the faith, that they may persevere. And to convince] Refute the objections, confound the sophistry, and convert the gainsayers ; and thus defend the truth.

10. There are many unruly] Persons who will not receive the sound doctrine, nor come under wholesome discipline.

Vain talkers] Empty boosters of knowledge, rights, and particular privileges ; all noise, empty parade, and no work.

Deceivers] Of the souls of men by their specious pretensions.

They of the circumcision] The Judaizing teachers, who maintained the necessity of circumcision, and of observing the rites and ceremonies of the Mosaic law, in order to the perfecting of the Gospel.

11. Whose mouths must be stopped] Unmask them at once exhibit them to the people ; make manifest their ignorance and hypocrisy, and let them be confounded before the people whom they are endeavouring to seduce.

12 One of themselves, even a prophet of their own, said, The Cretans are always liars, evil beasts, slow bellies.

13 This witness is true. Wherefore rebuke them sharply, that they may be sound in the faith;

14 Not giving heed to Jewish fables, and commandments of men, that turn from the truth.

15 Unto the pure all things are pure: but unto them that are defiled and unbelieving is nothing pure; but even their mind and conscience is defiled.

Subverti whole houses] Turn whole Christian families from the faith; attributing to the broad way, what belongs only to the strait gate; ministering to disorderly passions, and promising salvation to their proselytes, though not saved from their sins.

12 One of themselves, even a prophet of their own] This was Epimenides, who was born at Gnosus, in Crete, and was reckoned by many the seventh wise man of Greece, instead of Periander, to whom that honour was by others denied. Many fabulous things are related of this poet, which are not proper to be noticed here. He died about 638 years before the Christian era. When St. Paul calls him a prophet of their own, he only intimates that he was, by the Cretans, reputed a prophet. And, according to Pliutarch, (in Solone,) the Cretans paid him divine honours after his death. Diogenes Laertius mentions some of his prophecies: beholding the fort of Munichia, which guarded the port of Athens, he cried out, "O, ignorant men! if they but knew what slaughters this fort shall occasion, they would pull it down with their teeth!" This prophecy was fulfilled several years after, when the king Antipater put a garrison in this very fort, to keep the Athenians in subjection.—See Diog. Laert. lib. 1. page 73.

Plato, de Legibus, lib. 2. says, that on the Athenians expressing great fear of the Persians, Epimenides encouraged them by saying, "That they should not come before ten years, and that they should return after having suffered great disasters." This prediction was supposed to have been fulfilled in the defeat of the Persians in the battles of Salamis and Marathon.

He predicted to the Lacedaemonians and Cretans the captivity to which they should, one day, be reduced by the Arcadians. This took place under Euricrates, king of Crete, and Archidamus, king of Lacedaemon, vide Diog. Laert. lib. 1. page 74, edit. Meibom.

It was in consequence of these prophecies, whether true or false, that his countrymen esteemed him a prophet; that he was termed avp βιος, a divine man, by Plato: and that Cicero, De divin. lib. 1. says, he was  futura praesciens, et vaticinans per furorem. "He knew future events, and prophesied under a divine influence." These things are sufficient to justify the epithet of prophet, given him here by St. Paul. It may be also remarked, that vates and poeta, prophet and poet, were synonymous terms among the Romans.

The Cretans are always liars] The words quoted here by the apostle are, according to St. Jerom, Socrates, Nicephorus, and others, taken from a work of Epimenides, now no longer extant, entitled Ἠθη ἀπειρος; Concerning Oracles. The words form a hexameter verse:—

Κρητες αι ψευροι, κακα θηρια, γαστρις αγραυ.

The Cretans are always liars; destructive wild beasts; sluggish gluttons.

That the Cretans were reputed to be egregious liars, several of the ancients declare; inasmuch that Κρητικον, to act like a Cretan, signifies, to lie; and κρητικα απιστια, to deceive. The other Greeks reputed them liars, because they said that among them was the sepulchre of Jupiter, who was the highest object of the Greek and Roman worship. By telling this truth, which all others would have to pass for a lie, the Cretans showed that the object of their highest admiration was only a dead man.

Evil beasts] Ferocious and destructive in their manners. Slow bellies] Addicted to voluptuousness, idleness, and gluttony; sluggish or hoggish men.

13. This witness is true] What Epimenides said of them nearly 600 years before, continued still to be true.—Their original character had undergone no moral change.

Rebuke them sharply] Ανωρον; cuttingly, severely; show no indulgence to persons guilty of such crimes.

That they may be sound in the faith] That they may receive the incorrupt doctrine; and illustrate it by a holy and useful life.

14. Not giving heed to Jewish fables] See on 1 Tim. i. 4. and iv. 7.

Commandments of men] The injunctions of the scribes and Pharisees, which they added to the law of God.

That turn from the truth] For, such persons made the word of God of none effect by their traditions. Sometimes the verb αποσποδων signifies, to be averse from, slight, or despise. So here, the persons in question despised the truth, and taught others to do the same.

15. Unto the pure all things are pure] This appears to have been spoken in reference to the Jewish distinctions of clean and unclean meats. To the genuine Christian, every kind of meat, proper for human nourishment, is pure, is lawful; and may be used without scruple. This our Lord had long before decided.—See on Luke xi. 32—41.

But unto them that are defiled in their consciences; and unbelieving, απιστοι, unfaithful both to offer and receive grace; καθαροι is pure; they have no part in Christ, and the wrath of God abides upon them. Their mind is contaminated with impure and unholy images and ideas; and their conscience is defiled with the guilt of sins already committed against God.

16. They profess that they know God] He still speaks concerning the unbelieving Jews, the seducing teachers, and those who had been seduced by their bad doctrine. Note were so full of pretensions to the knowledge of the true God, as the Jews. They would not admit that any other people could have this knowledge; nor did they believe that God ever did or ever would reveal Himself to any other people; and that to give the law and the prophets to the Gentils, would be a profanation of the words of God. Hence they became both proud, uncharitable, and intolerant; and in this position, they continue till the present day.

But in works they deny him] Their profession and practice were at continual variance. Full of a pretended faith, while utterly destitute of those works by which a genuine faith is accredited and approved. Dio Cassius represents Caesar as saying of his mutinous soldiers, Ουκ εγνωσαν τον ονομα, εγω δε κατανω ομωρας. "Having the name of Romans, while they had the manners of the Gauls." How true are those words to the saying of the apostle!

Being abominable] βδελυτοι. This word sometimes refers to unnatural lusts.

And disobedient] Απειροι; unpersuadable, unbelieving; and consequently disobedient. Characters remarkably applicable to the Jews through all their generations.

Unto every good work reprobate] Αδουροι; adulterous; like bad coin, deficient both in the weight and goodness of the metal; and without the proper sterling stamp; and, consequently, not current. If they did a good work, they did not do it in the spirit in which it should be performed. They had the name of God's people; but they were counterfeit. The prophet said, Reprobate silver shall men call them.

1. Though the principal part of this chapter, and indeed of the whole epistle, may be found in nearly the same words in the first epistle to Timothy; yet there are several circumstances here, that are not so particularly noted in the other; and every minister of Christ will do well to make himself master of both; they should be carefully registered in his memory, and engraven on his heart.

2. The truth, which is according to godliness, in reference to eternal life, should be carefully regarded. The substantial knowledge of the truth must have faith for its foundation; godliness for its rule; and eternal life for its object and end. He who does not begin well, is never likely to finish his life either well or happily in time.

3. There is one subject in this chapter not sufficiently attended to by those who have the authority to appoint men to ecclesiastical offices; none should be thus appointed who is not able, by sound doctrine, both to exhort and convince the gainsayers. The powers necessary for this are partly natural, partly gracious, and partly acquired. 1. If a man have not good natural abilities, nothing but a miracle from heaven can make him a proper preacher of the Gospel; and to make a man a Christian minister, who is unqualified for any function of civil life, is sacrifice before God. 2. If the grace of God do not communicate ministerial qualifications, no natural gifts, however splendid, can be of any avail. To be a successful Christian minister, a man must feel the worth of immortal souls in such a way as God only can show it, in order to spend and be spent in the work. He who has never passed through the travail of the soul in the work of regeneration in his own heart, can never make plain the way of salvation to others. 3. He who is employed in the Christian ministry should cultivate his mind in the most diligent manner; he can neither learn nor know too much. If called of God to be a preacher, and without such a call he had better be a galley-slave, he will be able to bring all his knowledge to the assistance and increase of his ministry. If he have human learning, so much the better; if he be accredited, and appointed by those who have authority in the church, it will be to his advantage; but no human learning, no ecclesiastical appointment, no mode of ordination, whether Poppish, Episcopal, Protestant, or Presbyterian, can ever supply the Divine unction, without which he never can convert, and build up the souls of men. The purity of the flock must be faint and languishing, when it is not animated by the heavenly zeal of the pastor; they must be ignorant if he be not enlightened; and their faith must be wavering when he can neither encourage nor defend it.

4. In consequence of the appointment of men to the Christian ministry, there has been, not only a corruption of piety, but also a corruption of religion. A man who is not a Christian minister who has not grace, will never have the grace of God, it will appear in no conversation. If, to this, he add a full proof of his ministry; and if lary, he will have fruit; the souls of sinners will be converted to God through his preaching, and believers will be built up on their most holy faith. How contemptible must that man appear, in the eyes of common sense, who boasts of his clerical location, his sacerdotal order, his legitimate authority to preach, administer the Christian sacraments, &c. while his soul is benefited by his ministry! Such a person may have legal authority to take tithes, but as to an appointment from God he has none, else his word would be with power, and his preaching the means of salvation to his perishing hearers.

NOTES.-Verse 1. But speak thou the things This is a caution drawn from the preceding chapter; the Judaizing schism not only taught a false doctrine, but they led an unly life: Titus was to act directly opposite; he must teach sacred doctrine, and the things which become it; he must reclaim the truth, and illustrate that truth. The people must only be well instructed, but they must be holy in their conduct. Principle and practice must go hand in hand.

2 That the aged men be sober It is very likely that the word aged is to be taken here in its literal sense; that it refers to advanced years, and not to any office in the church; whole context seems to require this sense.

For an old man to be a drunkard, a light and trifling person, a glutton, and not to be sober, grave, and temperate, is not only blameable, but monstrous. Seneca has well said, Luxuria, adulescentia peccat; Senex insanit. "A young man licited to a life of luxury, transgresses; an old man thus licited, runs mad."

The aged women likewise I believe elderly women are, and not deaconesses.

That they be in behaviour Ev καταραται λεπορευται, that y be in their dress, gait, and general deportment, such as is holy calling requires; that they be not like the world, like the church, decent without, and adorned with holiness within.

Not false accusers Μη διαβολους, not devils; we have had some expression applied in the same way, 1 Tim. iii. 11. see the note.

Not given to much wine Μη εινω πολλω δεδουλωμενα, not intoxicated by much wine; not habitual drunkards or tipplers; it is a species of slavery. Both among the Greeks and Romans, old women were generally reputed to be fond of much wine; hence the ancient Scholast on Homer. Il. vi. speaking of women says, χειρς το σικω, η ελαττα εινω, at this age delight in wine; which words Old seems to have translated literally, Vinator atas hoc erat. It is likely, therefore, it was customary, among the elderly women, both Greeks and Romans, to drink much wine; and because it was inconsistent with that moderation which the Gospel requires, the text forbids it: doubtless it was not considered criminal then, because it was a common practice; and we know the Greek philosophers and physicians, who denied wine among persons, judged it to be necessary for the aged.-See note on 1 Tim. v. 23.

That they may teach the young women to be sober That a natural for the young to imitate the old, will be readily followed; it was therefore necessary that the old should be an ample of godly living to the young. St. Jerome, taking it for granted that drunkenness and impurity are closely connected, this serious question, Quomodo potest docere ovius adulescens castitatem, cum si ebrietatem vitulum mulieris acentibus fuerit imitata, pudica esse non possit?—How n elderly woman teach young women chastity, when, if young woman should imitate the drunkenness of the mat it would be impossible for her to be chaste?

Love their husbands The duties recommended in this he following verse are so plain as to need no comment; o absolutely necessary to the character of a wife, that no erves the name who does not live in the practice of them. Keepers at home Οικουρους. A woman who spends time in visiting, must neglect her family. The idleness, dirtiness, impudence, and profligacy, of the children, will show how deeply criminal the mother was in rejecting postle's advice. Instead of οικουρους, keepers of the e, or keepers at home, AOD' EFG. and several of the Ital, οικουρους, workers at home; not only staying in the e, and keeping the house, but working in the house. A n may keep the house very closely, and yet do little in it e support or comfort of the family.

fessors; and, if they find women professing Christianity, living an irregular life, they will not fail to censure the Christian doctrine on this account. "Behold your boasted religion! it professes to reform all things, and its very professors are no better than others! Our heathenism is as good as your Christianity." These are cutting reproaches; and much they will have to answer for, who give cause for these blasphemies.

6. Young men—exhort to be sober-minded] Reformation should begin with the old; they have the authority, and they should give the example. The young of both sexes must also give an account of themselves to God: sober-mindedness in young men is a rare qualification; and they who have it not plunge into excesses and irregularities which in general sap the foundation of their constitution, bring on premature old age, and not seldom lead to a fatal end.

7. In all things showing thyself a pattern] As the apostle had given directions relative to the conduct of old men, ver. 2. of old women, ver. 3. of young women, ver. 4. and of young men, ver. 6. the words επι ταυτα, which we translate in all things, should be rather considered in reference to the above persons, and the behaviour required in them; showing thyself a pattern of good works in all these persons: being in sobriety, gravity, temperance, what thou requirest others to be.

In doctrine showing uncorruptness] Mixing nothing with the truth; taking nothing from it; adding nothing to it; and exhibiting it in all its connexion, energy, and fulness.

8. Sound speech] Αδων σφιν; sound or healing doctrine. Human nature is in a state of disease; and the doctrine of the Gospel is calculated to remove the disease, and restore all to perfect health and soundness. All false doctrines leave men under the influence of this spiritual disease: the unadulterated doctrine of the Gospel alone can heal them.

He that is of the contrary part] Whether this may refer to the Judaizing teachers in general, or to some one, who might, by his false doctrine, have been disturbing the peace of the churches in Crete, we cannot tell.

Having no evil thing to say of you.] Against a person who is sound in his doctrine, and holy in his life, no evil can be justly alleged. He who reports evil of such a person, must be confounded when brought to the test. Instead of επι υμω, of you, επι ημω, of us, is the reading of CDEFG. and about forty others; with both the Syriac, all the Arabic, Slavonic, Vulgate, Itala, and several of the primitive fathers. This reading makes a better sense, and is undoubtedly genuine.

9. Exhort servants to be obedient] The apostle refers to those who were slaves, and the property of their masters; even these are exhorted to be obedient, ιδιαις δεσποταις, to their own despots; though they had no right over them on the ground of natural justice.

Please them well in all things] They were to endeavour to do this in all things; though they could not hope to succeed in every thing.

Not answering again] Μη αντιλεγομαι; not contradicting or gainsaying. This is no part of a servant's duty; a servant is hired to do his master's work; and this, his master has a right to appoint.

10. Not purloining] Μη ροφτομομεν. This word signifies not only stealing, but embezzling, another's property; keeping back a part of the price of any commodity sold on the master's account; neither giving away, privately selling, nor in any way wasting, the master's goods. In Acts v. 2. we translate it, to keep back part of the price; the crime of which Ananias and Sapphira were guilty. It has been remarked that among the heathens this species of fraud was very frequent; and servants were so noted for purloining and embezzling their masters' property, that fur, which signifies a thief, was commonly used to signify a servant: hence that verse in Virgil, Eclog. lib. 10.

Quid domini faciunt, eudent cum talia sumus? "What may not masters do, when servants (thieves) are so bold?"

On which Servius remarks, Pro servo furum posuit: furta enim specialiter servorum sunt. Sic Plautus de servo, Homo es trivium literarum, i. e. fur. "He puts fur, a thief, to signify a servant, because servants are commonly thieves. Thus Plautus, speaking of a servant, says, Thou art a man of three letters, i. e. f-u-r, a thief." and Terence denominates a number of servants, manipulus furum, "a bundle of thieves." Eun. 4, 7, 8. The place in Plautus, to which Servius refers, is Autul. act. 11. scene iv. in fine:—

Me vituperas? Me, etiam fur trivifurifer.
 Deat thou blame me, the most notorious of all knaves.
 Thou art a thief, and the most notorious of all knaves.
 It was necessary, therefore, that the apostle should be so very particular in his directions to servants, as they were in general thieves, almost by profession.

11. The grace of God that bringeth salvation hath appeared to all men! Εξαπαυ γὰρ ἡ χάρις τοῦ Θεοῦ ἐσπερίως ἡμῶν: literally translated, the words stands thus: For, the grace of God, that which saves, hath shone forth upon all men. Or, as it is expressed in the margin of our authorized Version, The grace of God that bringeth salvation to all men, hath appeared. As God's grace signifies God's favour, any benefit received from Him, may be termed God's grace. In this place, and in Col. 1.6, the Gospel, which points out God's infinite mercy to the world, is termed the grace of God: for, it is not only a favour of infinite worth in itself, but it announces that greatest gift of God to man, the incarnation and atoning sacrifice of Jesus Christ. Now it cannot be said, except in a very refined and spiritual sense, that this Gospel had then appeared to all men: but it may be well said, that it bringeth salvation to all men; this is its design; and it was to taste death for every man; that is its Author came into the world. There is a beauty and energy in the word shined out, that is rarely noted: it seems to be a metaphor taken from the sun. As by his rising in the east, and shining out, he enlightens, successively, the whole world; so the Lord Jesus, who is called the Sun of righteousness, Malac. iv. 2. arises on the whole human race with healing in his wings. And as the light and heat of the sun are denied to no nation nor individual; so the grace of the Lord Jesus; this also shines out upon all: and God designs that all mankind shall be as equally benefited by it in reference to their souls, as they are in respect to their bodies, by the sun that shines in the firmament of heaven. But, as all the parts of the earth are not immediately illuminated, but come into the solar light successively, not only in consequence of the earth's diurnal revolution round its own axis, but in consequence of its annual revolution round its whole orbit; so this Sun of righteousness, who has shined out, is bringing every part of the habitable globe into His divine light: that light is shining more and more to the perfect day; so that gradually and successively, He is enlightening every nation, and every man; and when His great year is filled up, every nation of the earth shall be brought into the light and heat of this unspotted, unclouded, and eternal Sun of righteousness and truth. Wherever the Gospel comes, it brings salvation: it offers deliverance from all sin to every soul that hears and reads it. As freely as the sun dispenses his genial influences to every inhabitant of the earth, so freely does Jesus Christ dispense the merits and blessings of His passion and death to every soul of man. From the influences of this spiritual Sun, no soul is reprobated, any more than from the influences of the natural sun. In both cases, only those who wilfully shut their eyes, and hide themselves in darkness, are deprived of the gracious benefit. It is no objection to this view of the subject, that while nations have not yet received the Divine light. When the earth and the sun were created, every part of the globe did not come immediately into the light: to effect this purpose fully, there must be a complete revolution, as has been marked above; and this could not be effected till the earth had not only revolved on its own axis, but passed successively through all the signs of the zodiac. When its year was completed, and it did not then, every part had its due proportion of light and heat. God may, in His infinite wisdom, have determined the times and the seasons for the full manifestation of the Gospel to the nations of the world, as he has done in reference to the solar light: and when the Jews are brought in with the fullness of the Gentiles; then, and not till then, can we say, that the grand revolution of the important year of the Sun of righteousness is completed. But in the mean time, the unenlightened parts of the earth are not left in total darkness; as there was light

ere the infant sun
 Was roll'd together, or had tried his beams Althwart the gloom profound;"

for light was created, and in a certain measure dispersed, at pearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ, 15 These things speak, and to exhort, and rebuke with all authority. Let no man despise thee.

least three whole days before the sun was formed: for his creation was a part of the fourth day's work; so, previously to the incarnation of Christ, there was spiritual light in the world: for He diffused His beams, while His orb was yet unseen. And even now, where, by the preaching of His Gospel, He is not yet manifested, He is that true light which enlightens every man coming into the world; so that the mean world is no more left to absolute darkness, where the Gospel is not yet preached, than the earth was, the four days which preceded the creation of the sun; or those parts of the world are, where the Gospel has not yet been preached. The great year is rolling on, and all the parts of the earth are coming successively, and now rapidly into the light. The vast revolution seems to be nearly completed, and the whole world is about to be filled with the light and glory of God. A banner post, apparently under the inspiration of God, for God has his witnesses every where, speaks of those glorious times in words and numbers, which nothing but the Spirit of God can equal. It gratifies myself to refer to them; and will gratify my reader to find them entered here:—

*Ultima Osmni venit jam carminis aetas,
 Magnus ab integro seculorum nascitur ordo.—
 Italia sacra sua diserunt curritur fatis
 Concordes stabili faturum nuntia Parcae.
 Appice covare nutantem pendere mundum,
 Terrasque tractusque maris calumpnia profundum;
 Appice venturo latentur ut omnia secula!—
 The last great age foretold by sacred rhymes,
 Renews its finish'd course: Saturnian times
 Roll round again, and mighty years, begun
 From their first orb, in radiant circles run.
 Majestic months, with swift but steady pace,
 Set out with him on their appointed race.—
 The Fates, when they their happy web have spun, Shall bend the clue, and bid it smoothly run:—
 See labouring nature calls thee to sustain
 The nodding frame of heaven, and earth, and main,
 See to their base restor'd, earth, seas, and air,
 And joyful ages from behind appear
 In crowding ranks.*

Hasten the time, thou God of ages! Even so. Amen. Come, Lord Jesus!

12. Teaching us that, denying, &c.] Παιδεύουσα; instructing us as children are instructed. Christ is the great teacher: and men, in order to learn, must become His disciples: must put themselves under His tuition, and learn of Him.

Denying ungodliness] Ασέβειαν; all things contrary to God; whatever would lead us to doubt His being, deny any of his essential attributes; His providence or government of the world, and His influence on the souls of men. Every thing also, which is opposed to His true worship; theoretical and practical atheism, deism, and irreligion in general.

Worldly lusts] Such desires, affections, and appetites, as men are governed by, who have their portion in this life, and live without God in the world. Gluttony, drunkenness, lasciviousness, anger, malice, and revenge; together with the immoderate love of riches, power, and fame.

We should live soberly] Having every temper, appetite, and desire, under the government of reason; and reason itself under the government of the Spirit of God.

Righteously] Rendering to every man his due; imparting as person in his body, mind, reputation, or property; doing unto all as we would they should do to us; and filling up the duties of the particular stations in which it has pleased God to fix us; committing no sin; omitting no duty.

And godly] Ευσεβίαν; just the reverse of what is implied in ungodliness.—See above.

In this present world] Not supposing that any thing will be purified in the world to come, that is not cleansed in this. The three words, above, evidently include our duty to God, to our neighbour, and to ourselves. 1. We are to live soberly, in respect to ourselves. 2. Righteously, in respect to our neighbour. And, 3. Godly, or piously, in respect to our Master.

13. Looking for that blessed hope] Expecting the grand object of our hope, eternal life. See chap. i. ver. 2. This is what the Gospel teaches us to expect; and what the grace of God prepares the human heart for. This is called a blessed hope; those who have it, are happy in the sure prospect of that glory which shall be revealed.

The glorious appearing] Κατ' ἐπιφάνειαν τῆς δόξης τῶν ἀποστόλων Θεοῦ καὶ σωτηρίας ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ. This clause literally translated, is as follows:—And the appearing of the glory of the great God, even our Saviour Jesus Christ.—On this passage, I must refer to the first page of the Observations on the Greek Article, added to the conclusion of the Epistle to the Ephesians, with the additional remarks, where both the structure and doctrine of this passage are explained at large

Some think that the blessed hope, and glorious appearing, mean the same thing; but I do not think so. The blessed hope refers simply to eternal glorification in general; the glorious appearing to the resurrection of the body: for, when Christ appears, he will change this vile body, and make it like unto his glorious body according to the working by which He is able even to subdue all things to himself.—See Philip. iii. 20, 21.

14. Who gave himself for us? Who gave His own life as a ransom price to redeem ours. This is evidently what is meant, as the words ἀγοράσας and ἀντὶ ἐπιπρωτων imply. The verb ἄγορα, signifies to redeem or ransom by paying a price, as I have often had occasion to observe; and ἑπιπρωτος; signifies such a peculiar property, as a man has in what he has purchased with his own money. Jesus gave his life for the world, and thus has purchased men unto Himself; and having purchased the slaves from their thraldom, He is represented as stripping them of their sordid vestments, cleansing and purifying them unto Himself, that they may become His own servants; and bring them out of their dishonourable and oppressive servitude, in which they had no proper motive to diligence; and could have no affection for the despot under whose authority they were employed. Thus redeemed, they now become His willing servants, and are zealous of good works, affectionately attached to that noble employment which is assigned to them by that Master, whom it is an inexpressible honour to serve. This seems to be the allusion in the above verse.

16. These things speak? That is, teach; for λαλει, speak, has the same meaning here, as διδασκει, teach; which, as being synonymous, is actually the reading of the Codex Alexandrinus.

And exhorti Παρακαλει; repeat them again and again; and urge them on their attention and consciences.

And rebukei Ελεγχει; demonstrates the importance, utility, and necessity, of them; and show them that God requires their obedience.

With all authority? Μετα παντος εταρχης; with that authority with which thy office invests thee; and which thou hast received from God.

Let no man despise thee. That is, act so that no person shall have any cause to despise thee, either for thy work, or be manner and spirit in which thou dost perform it.

1. Few portions of the New Testament excel this chapter. It may well form the creed, system of ethics, and text-book, of every Christian preacher. Does any man inquire what is the duty of a Gospel minister? Send him to the 2d chapter of the epistle to Titus for a complete answer. There, he will find what he is to believe, what he is to practise, and what he is to preach. Even his congregation is parcelled out to him. The old and the young of both sexes, and those who are in their employment, are considered to be the objects of his ministry; and a plan of teaching is referred to those different descriptions of society, is laid down before him. He finds here the doctrine which he is to preach to them; the duties which he is required to inculcate, the motives by which his exhortations are to be strengthened, and the end which both he and his people should have invariably in view.

2. The Godhead of Jesus Christ is here laid down in a most solemn and explicit manner: He is the great God our Saviour, μεγας Θεος και Σωτηρ; human language can go no higher; and the expressions are such, and are so placed, that it is impossible either to misunderstand, or to misapply them. He who is the great God, higher than the highest, is our Saviour: He who is our Saviour, is the great God: but Jesus Christ is our Saviour; and Jesus Christ is here stated to be the great God.

3. The extent of human redemption is here also pointed out. The saving grace of this great God hath shone out upon every man: none has been passed by, none left unfinished; none without the first offer of life eternal, and a sufficiency of grace to qualify him for the state.

4. The operation of Divine grace in preparing the soul for glory is next referred to. It cleanses them from all unrighteousness, it purifies them unto God, and makes us fervent and abundant in good works. This system is worthy of God, and is properly suited to the state and necessities of man. These are truths which must be preached; which are not preached enough, and which cannot be preached too often. Awake, pastors! and do not the work of the Lord carelessly.—Awake people! and believe to the saving of your souls. How shall he who is styled a minister of the Gospel, and who neither knows, feels, nor heartily inculcates these things, give an account in the great day, of himself, of his calling, and his flock, to God? And, when this Gospel is preached faithfully and zealously, how shall the people escape who neglect so great a salvation! Neglect, in such a case, is the highest contempt which man can offer to his Maker. Surely such conduct must expect judgment without mixture of mercy. Reader, lay this to heart.

Put them in mind* to be subject to principalities and powers, to obey magistrates, to be ready to every good work, 2 * To speak evil of no man, 4 to be no brawlers, but * gentle, showing all meekness unto all men.

For we ourselves.] All of us, whether Jews or Gentiles, were, before our conversion to Christ, foolish, disobedient, and deceived. There is no doubt that the apostle felt he could include himself in the above list, previously to his conversion. The manner in which he persecuted the Christians, to whose charge he could not lay one moral evil, is a sufficient proof that though he walked according to the letter of the law, as to its ordinances and ceremonies, blameless; yet his heart was in a state of great estrangement from God; from justice, holiness, mercy, and compassion.

Foolish] Ανοητος, without understanding; ignorant of God, His nature, His providence, and His grace. Disobedient] Απειθεis, unpersecuted, unbelieving, obstinate, and disobedient. Deceived] Πλανησμενοι, erring; wandering from the right way, in consequence of our ignorance, not knowing the right way; and, in consequence of our unbelief and obstinacy, not choosing to know it. It is a true saying, "There is none so blind, as those who will not see." Such persons are proof against conviction: they will not be convinced, either by God or man.

Serving divers lusts and pleasures] Αναλευστες, being in a state of continual thraldom; not served or gratified by our lusts, and pleasures; but living, as their slaves, a life of misery and wretchedness. Divers lusts—Επιθυμιας, strong and irregular appetites of every kind. Pleasures—Ηδοναις, sensual pleasures; persons intent only on the gratification of sense; living like the brutes; having no rational, no spiritual object, worthy the pursuit of an immortal being.

Living in malice and envy] Εν κακια και φθονω διαγορευτες, spending our life in wickedness and envy; not bearing to see the prosperity of others, because we feel ourselves any unually wretched.

Hateful] Εργυρους, abominable, hateful as hell. The word

2. To speak evil of no man] Μηδενα βλασφημει. To blaspheme no person; to reproach none; to speak nothing to any man's injury; but, on the contrary, bearing reproach and contentment with patience and meekness.

according to his mercy he saved us, by the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost; 6 Which he shed on us abundantly through Jesus Christ our Saviour;

7 That being justified by his grace, we should be made heirs according to the hope of eternal life.

8 This is a faithful saying, and these things I will that thou affirm constantly, that they which have believed in God might be careful to maintain good works. These things are good and profitable unto men.

comes from ἔρηξ, Styx, the infernal river by which the gods were wont to swear, and he who (according to the mythology of the heathens) violated this oath, was expelled from the assembly of the gods, and was deprived of his nectar and ambrosia for a year; hence the river was hateful to them beyond all things; and the verb στυγέω, formed from this, signifies to shiver with horror.

It may be taken actively, says Leigh, as it is read hateful; or else passively, and so may be read hated; that is, justly execrable and odious unto others, both God and man.

Mating one another. Μισήσεις; ἀλλήλους; this word is less expressive than the preceding; there was no brotherly love, consequently no kind offices; they hated each other, and self-interest alone could induce them to keep up civil society. This is the true state of all unregenerate men. The words which the apostle uses in this place give a finished picture of the carnal state of man; and they are not true merely of the Cretans and Jews, that then were, but of all mankind, in every age and country: they express the wretched state of fallen man.

Some of the Greek moralists expressed a dissolute and sensual life by nearly the same expressions as those employed by the apostle. Πλατάρχ, in Præcept. Confug. sæv., Σωματες ἐπιπόδουσι, μη δούλευσαντα τὰς ἡδονὰς αὐτοῦ, καὶ τὰς ἐπιθυμίαις; "We must take care of the body, that we may not be enslaved by its lusts and pleasures." And Josephus, speaking of Cleopatra, Antiq. lib. xv. cap. 4. says, Ἰστανικὴ γυναικὴ πλεῖστη, καὶ δούλευσσαν τὰς ἐπιθυμίαις; "She was an expensive woman, enslaved to lusts."

4. But after that the kindness and love of God] By χρηστίας, we may understand the essential goodness of the Divine nature; that which is the spring whence all kindness, mercy, and beneficence, proceed.

Love towards man—Φιλανθρωπία, philanthropy. It is to be regretted, that this attribute of the Divine nature, as it stands in relation to man, should have been entirely lost by a paraphratical translation. Philanthropy is a character which God gives here to Himself; while human nature exists, this must be a character of the Divine nature. God loves man; He delighted in the idea, when formed in His own infant mind; He formed man according to that idea, and rejoiced in the work of His hands: when man fell, the same love induced Him to devise his redemption; and God the Saviour flows from God the Philanthropist; Where love is, it will be active, and will show itself. So the philanthropy of God appeared; εὐφρανθῆ, it shone out in the incarnation of Jesus Christ, and in His giving His life for the life of the world.

6. Not by works of righteousness] Those who were foolish, disobedient, and deceived, serving divers lusts and pleasures, could not possibly have works of righteousness to plead; therefore, if saved at all, they must be saved by mercy.—See the note on Eph. ii. 8. and see a Discourse intitled, Salvation by Faith proved, 8vo. 1816, in which I have examined every system invented by man for his reformation to the Divine favour and image; and have demonstrated, by mere reason, their utter insufficiency to answer the end for which they have been invented; and have proved, that the doctrine of salvation by faith, is the only rational way of salvation.

By the washing of regeneration] Ἰσχυροῦ βαπτισμοῦ, undoubtedly the apostle here means baptism, the rite by which persons were admitted into the church; and the visible sign of the cleansing purifying influences of the Holy Spirit, which the apostle immediately subjoins. Baptism is only a sign, and therefore should never be separated from the thing signified: but it is a rite commanded by God himself, and therefore the thing signified should never be expected without it.

By the renewing of the Holy Ghost, we are to understand not only the profession of being bound to live a new life; but the grace that renews the heart, and enables us thus to live: so the renewing influences are here intended. Baptism changes nothing; the grace signified by it, cleanses and purifies. They who think baptism to be regeneration, neither know the Scriptures nor the power of God; therefore they do greatly err.

6. Which he shed on us abundantly] Ὁν ἐξέχευ, which he poured out on us: as the water was poured out on them in baptism, to which there is here a manifest allusion; but as this was sometimes only sprinkled on the person, the heavenly gift was poured out not in drops, but πλευσίως, richly, in great abundance.

Through Jesus Christ] Baptism is nothing in itself; and there had been no outpouring of the Holy Spirit, had there been no saving and atoning Christ. Through him alone all good comes to the souls of men.

9 But avoid foolish questions, and genealogies, and contentions, and strivings about the law; for they are unprofitable and vain.

7. That being justified by his grace] Being freed from sin; for the term justification is to be taken here as implying the whole work of the grace of Christ on the heart, in order to its preparation for eternal glory.

Should be made heirs] The Gospel not only gave them the hope of an endless state of glory for their souls; but also of the resurrection, and final glorification of their bodies: and they who were children of God, were to be made heirs of His glory.—See the note on Galat. iv. 6, 7.

8. This is a faithful saying] Ἦτες; ὁ λόγος; this is the true doctrine; the doctrine that cannot fail.

And these things I will] Καὶ περὶ τούτων βουλήσασθε ἐν βασιλευσθαί; And I will, or desire, thee to maintain earnestly what concerns these points. The things to which the apostle refers, are those of which he had just been writing, and may be thus summed up:—1. The ruined state of man, both in soul and body. 2. The infinite goodness of God, which devised his salvation. 3. The manifestation of this goodness, by the incarnation of Jesus Christ. 4. The justification which they who believed, received through His blood. 5. The mission of the Holy Spirit, and the purification of the heart by His influence. 6. The hope of the resurrection of the body, and the final glorification of both it and the soul through all eternity. 7. The necessity of obedience to the will of God, and of walking worthy of the vocation wherewith they had been called. 8. And all these points he wishes him to press continually on the attention of believers; and to keep constantly in view, that all good comes from God's infinite kindness, by and through Christ Jesus.

They which have believed in God] All Christians; for who can maintain good works but those who have the principle from which good works flow? for, without faith, it is impossible to please God.

These things are good and profitable] They are good in themselves; and calculated to promote the well-being of man. 9. Avoid foolish questions, and genealogies] In these the Jews particularly delighted; they abounded in the most frivolous questions; and, as they had little piety themselves, they were sollicitous to show that they had descended from judy ancestors.

Of their frivolous questions, and the answers given to them, by the wisest and most reputable of their rabbins, the following is a specimen:—

Rabbi Hillel was asked, Why have the Babylonians round heads? To which he answered, This is a difficult question, but I will tell the reason: Their heads are round because they have but little wit.

Q. Why are the eyes of the Turcomans so soft?—A. Because they inhabit a sandy country.

Q. Why have the Africans broad feet?—A. Because they inhabit a marshy country. See more in Schaetgen.

But ridiculous and trifling as these are, they are little in comparison to those solemnly proposed, and most gravely answered, by those who are called the Schoolmen. Here is a specimen, which I leave the reader to translate:—

Utrum essent excrementa in Paradiso? Utrum sancti reuerentur cum intestinis? Utrum si deipara fuerint vir, potuissent esse naturalis parens Christi?

These, with many thousands of others, of equal use to religion and common sense, may be found in their writings. See the Summa of Thom. Aquinas, passim. Might not the Spirit have these religious triflers in view, rather than the less ridiculous Jews? See the notes on 1 Tim. i. 4. 2 Tim. ii. 23.

Contentions, and strivings about the law] Of legal contentions, and different and conflicting decisions, about the meaning of particular rites and ceremonies, the Talmud is full.

10. A man that is an heretic] Generally defined one that is obstinately attached to an opinion contrary to the peace and comfort of society; and will neither submit to Scripture nor reason. Here it means a person who maintains Judaism in opposition to Christianity; or, who insists on the necessity of circumcision, &c. in order to be saved. This is obviously the meaning of the word heretic, in the only place in which it occurs in the Sacred Writings.

After the first and second admonition reject] Labour to convince him of his error; but if he will not receive instruction, if he have shut his heart against conviction, then—terra him aliena? No! even if demonstrably a heretic, in any one sense of that word, and a disturber of the peace of the church; God gives no man any other authority over him but to show him, vapores. Do him no harm in body, soul, character, or substance: hold no communion with him, but leave him to God. See the notes on Act. v. 17. and xxiv. 14. where the word heresy is particularly explained.

11. Is subverted] Is turned out of the way in which he may be saved, and consequently sinneth; enters into that way that leads to destruction.

Being condemned of himself.] This refers to the Judaizing teacher, who maintained his party and opinions for filthy here's sake. He was conscious of his own insincerity; and that he proclaimed not his system from a conscientious love of truth, but from a desire to get his livelihood. Were the church in all countries, whether established by law, or unestablished, strictly scrutinized, multitudes of heretics of this kind would be found. And, perhaps, this is the only bad sense in which the word should be understood.

12. When I shall send Artemas — or Tychicus] These were either deacons or presbyters, which the apostle intended to send to Crete, to supply the place of Titus.—Who Artemas was we know not; he is not mentioned in any other place in the New Testament. Tychicus was a native of Asia, as we learn from Acts xx. 4. who we see at the note.

Be diligent to come unto me at Nicopolis] Nicopolis was a city of Epirus, on the Gulf of Ambracia, near to Actium, which Augustus built in commemoration of his victory over Mark Antony. There was another Nicopolis in Thrace, at the entrance of Macedonia, on the river Nessus: but the former is supposed to be the place here intended.

For I have determined there to winter.] Hence the apostle was at liberty, seeing his spending the winter at this, or at any other practicable place, depended on his own determination. It was probably now pretty late in the autumn, and the apostle was now drawing near to Nicopolis; for he certainly was not yet arrived, else he would not have said, I have determined, &c. There is to winter.

13. Bring Zenas the lawyer.] This person is only mentioned in this place: whether he was a Jewish, Roman, or Greek lawyer, we cannot tell.

And Apollas] Of this person we have some valuable particulars in Acts xviii. 24. 1 Cor. i. 12. iii. 5. 6. and iv. 6. Either St. Paul had left these at Crete, when he visited that island; or he had heard that, in their evangelical itinerancy, they were about to pass through it.

On their journey diligently] Afford them the means to defray their expenses. The churches through which these evangelists passed, bore their expenses from one to the other. See 3 John, ver. 6.

14. And let ours also learn to maintain good works] There is something very remarkable in this expression. The words καλον εργον ποισαδαι, which we translate to maintain good works, occur also in ver. 8. and some think they mean, to provide for our own, and the necessities of others, by working at some honest occupation; and that this was necessary to be taught to the Cretans, let ours also learn, &c. who are naturally and practically idle gluttons. Kypke observes, that the words mean—1. To be employed in good works—2. To defend good works; and to recommend the performance of them—3. To promote and forward good works; to be always first in them.

For necessary uses] That they may be able, at all times, to help the church of God, and those that are in want.

15. All that are with me] He means his companions in the ministry.

Salute thee] Wish thee well, and desire to be affectionately remembered to thee.

Greet them that love us in the faith] All that love us for Christ's sake; and all that are genuine Christians.

Grace be with you] May the Divine favour be your portion for ever.

Some MSS. read, The grace of the Lord be with you all; others, the grace of God be with you all; and one, Grace be with thy spirit, as if the greeting was sent to Titus only, whereas the others send it to the whole church at Crete.

Amen] This is wanting in ACD. and some others.

The Subscriptions are as usual various. Those of the Vatican MSS. are the following:—

There is no subscription in the VULGATE.

The MANUSCRIPTS are also various.

To Titus, ordained the first bishop of the church of the Cretans; written from Nicopolis of Macedonia.—Common Greek Text.

To Titus, archbishop of Crete.—One of the Vienna MSS. written A. D. 1331.

There is not one of these subscriptions of any authority, and some of them are plainly ridiculous. We do not know that Titus was what we term bishop, much less that he was ordained bishop of Crete, as appointed to a particular see; and still less, that he was the first bishop there. As to his being archbishop that is the fiction of a time of deep darkness. That the epistle was written from some place near to Nicopolis of Epirus, is very probable. That it was not written at Nicopolis is evident: and that it was not Nicopolis of Macedonia is also very probable.—See the Preface to this epistle for farther information on this point. And see a treatise by old Mr. Prynne, intituled, The unbishoping of Timothy and Titus, &c. Lond. 1636 and 1660, where, among many crooked things, there are some just observations.

PREFACE TO

THE EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE TO PHILEMON.

It may be thought strange that a short letter, written entirely on a private subject, without reference to the proof or defence of any doctrine of the Gospel, should, by the general consent of the church of God, from the highest Christian antiquity, have been received into the Sacred Canon; not only as a genuine production of St. Paul, but as a piece designed by the Holy Spirit for the edification of the church. However, such is the fact: and we may add, that this very piece was held so sacred, that even the ancient heretics did not attempt to impugn its authenticity, or corrupt its matter, while making dangerously free with the four Gospels, and all the other epistles.

Philemon, the person to whom it is addressed, was undoubtedly, at the time in which this epistle was sent, an inhabitant of Colosse; concerning which city, see the Preface of the Epistle to the Colossians; and was probably a Colossian by birth, though some suppose that he was of Ephesus. It is evident, from ver. 19. of this epistle, that he was converted to the Christian faith by St. Paul; this is agreed on all hands: but, as some suppose that the apostle had not visited Colosse previously to the writing of this epistle, they think it probable that he might have met with him at Ephesus, or in some other part of Asia Minor, where he formed an acquaintance with him, and became the means of his conversion. But there is no need for this supposition, as it is most probable that the apostle had not only visited Colosse prior to this, but that the Gospel was planted in that city, as in all other parts of Phrygia, by himself. See the Preface to the Colossians; and the note on Colom. ii. 1.

That Philemon was a person of some consideration in his own city, and in the church in that place, is very evident from this epistle. He had a church in his house, ver. 2. and was so opulent as to be extensive in works of charity, and in entertaining those Christians who, from different quarters, had occasion to visit Colosse. See ver. 6—7.

Whether he had any office in the church is not clear: some think he was a bishop, others an elder or deacon: but of this there is no evidence. He was probably no more than a private member, whose house, land, and property, were consecrated to God, His church, and the poor. He, who by the good providence of God, has property and influence thus to employ, and a heart to do it, need not envy the state of the highest ecclesiastic in the church of Christ. Both the heart and the means to do secular good are possessed by few; whereas multitudes are found willing both to teach in, and govern, the church.

The occasion of writing this letter was the following: Onesimus, a slave, had, on some pretence or other, run away from his master Philemon, and came to Rome, where St. Paul was at that time in prison, though not in close confinement, for he dwelt in his own hired house, in which he assiduously preached the Gospel, being guarded only by one soldier. See Acts xxviii 16, 23.

It appears that Onesimus sought out Paul, whose public preaching, both to Jews and Gentiles, had rendered him famous in the city; and it is very likely that he was led to visit the apostle from having formerly seen him at his master's house in Colosse; and the word of life, preached by the apostle, became the means of his conversion. Being thus brought back to God, he became affectionately attached to his spiritual father, and served him zealously as his son in the Gospel. Onesimus, being thus brought to the acknowledgment of the truth, which is according to godliness, gave the apostle a full account of his elopement from his master; and, no doubt, intimated his wish to return and repair the breach which he had made. Though he was now both dear and necessary to St. Paul; yet, as justice required that reparation should be made, he resolved to send him back; and to remove all suspicion from the mind of Philemon, and to reconcile him to his once unfaithful servant, he wrote the following letter, in which, as Dr. Macknight expresses it, "with the greatest softness of expression, warmth of affection, and delicacy of address, he not only interceded for Onesimus's pardon, but urged Philemon to esteem him, and put confidence in him as a sincere Christian; and because restraints, by repairing the injury that had been done, restores the person who did it to the character he had lost; the apostle, to enable Onesimus to appear in Philemon's family with some degree of reputation, bound himself in this epistle, by his handwriting, ver. 18, 19, not only to repay all that Onesimus owed to Philemon; but to make full reparation also, for whatever injury he had done to him by running away."

It is generally thought that Onesimus had robbed his master: but there is certainly nothing in the epistle from which this can be legitimately inferred; the words, If he hath wronged thee, or oweeth thee ought, put that on mine account, ver. 18.

certainly do not prove it: they only state a possible case, that he might have wronged his master, or have been under some pecuniary obligation to him; and the apostle, by appearing to assume this, greatly strengthened his own argument; and met the last objection which Philemon could be supposed capable of making. There is neither justice nor piety in making things worse than they appear to be: or in drawing the most unfavourable conclusions from premises, which, without constraint, will afford others more consonant to the spirit of charity.

That this epistle was written about the same time with that to the Philippians and Colossians, is proved by several incidences. "As the letter to Philemon, and that to the Colossians, were written," says Dr. Paley, "at the same time, and sent by the same messenger, the one to a particularly habitant, the other to the church of Colosse, it may be expected that the same, or nearly the same persons, would be about St. Paul, and join with him, as was the practice, in both epistles. Accordingly, we find the names of brother Archippus, Marcus, Epaphras, Luke, and Demas, in both epistles. Timothy, who is joined with St. Paul in the supposition of the Epistle to the Colossians, is joined with him in the Tycheus did not salute Philemon, because he accompanied the epistle to Colosse, and would undoubtedly have saluted him. It will not be forgotten, that Onesimus, the bearer of this epistle, was one of the bearers of that sent to the Colossians: Gal. iv. 9. that when the apostle wrote that, he was in Laodicea, Gal. iv. 13, 18. which was his case also when he wrote this; (see ver. 1, 10, 13, 22.) from which and various other circumstances, we may conclude that they were written about the same time, viz. the ninth year of Nero, A. D. 62. Other particulars relative to this epistle, will be pointed out in the course of the notes; and particularly the uses which the church of God, and the private Christian, may derive from it.

NOTES.—Verse 1. Paul, a prisoner of Jesus Christ] It has already been noted in the Preface, that Paul was a prisoner at Rome, when he wrote this epistle, and those to the Colossians and Philippians. But some think that the term prisoner does not sufficiently point out the apostle's state; and that the original word δεσμιος, should be translated bound with a chain: this is certainly its meaning, and it shows us, in some measure, his circumstances; one arm was bound with a chain to the arm of the soldier to whose custody he had been delivered.

It has also been remarked that Paul does not call himself an apostle here, because the letter was a letter of friendship, and of private concern. But the MSS. are not entirely agreed on this subject. Two MSS. have δοσλος, a servant; the Codex Charesianus and the Codex Sangermanensis, both in the Greek and Latin, have αγγελος, apostle; and Caesiodorus has αγγελος δεσμιος, Paul, an imprisoned apostle of Jesus Christ. They, however, generally agree in the omission of the word αγγελος.

Unto Philemon, our dearly beloved] There is a peculiarity in the use of proper names in this epistle, which is not found in any other part of St. Paul's writings. The names to which we refer, are Apphia, Archippus, Onesimus, and Philemon.

2. APPHIA, ΑΡΡΗΙΑ. Under the word ΑΡΡΗΙΑ, Suidas says, Αδελφης και αδελφου νεοκρητιου. Apphia is the affectionate address of a brother or sister; or the diminutive of a brother and sister, used to express kindness and affection. Hence the apostle referring to the meaning of the word, says και ΑΡΡΗΙΑ ΤΗ ΑΔΕΛΦΗ ΑΓΑΠΗΤΗ, and to Apphia the beloved sister. Though αδελφη, sister, be not in our common text, it is found in AD<sup>E</sup>FG. several others, the Itala, Vulgate, Slavonic, &c. and is undoubtedly genuine.

ΑΡΧΙΠΠΟΣ, ΑΡΧΙΠΠΟΣ. The ruler or master of the horse, from αρχω, a chief, and ιππος, a horse. Names of old were, both among the Greeks and Trojans, celebrated for their skill in managing and taming the horse, and employing him in war; this frequently occurs in Homer. The import of the name of Archippus might suggest this idea to the apostle's mind, and lead him to say, Archippus, our fellow-labourer. Suidas mentions a person of this name, who was once victor at the games, in the σινητιανης Olympics.

There was one of the pupils of Pythagoras of this name, and I introduce him here, for the sake of a quotation from St. Jerome (Apol. adv. Rufin.) relative to the doctrine taught by him and his fellow-disciple Lysis: Επισημωσεν ο ανθρωπος, σοφιστας μιν τον ομοιωτος, αναλεωντας δε τα φυσικα ακολασια δε της γης, γινωσκουσας δε της τοκοτας, την δε δικαιοσυνην ουκ ηβουλησεν, ουκ ηβουλησεν ουκ ηβουλησεν τα επισημα. "By all means and methods these evils are to be shunned and set off; offensiveness from the body; insouciance from the soul; idleness from the body; audition from the city; dissonance from the house; and, in general, intemperance from all things." St. Fab. The. Erud. Schol.

ΟΝΕΣΙΜΟΣ, ΟΝΕΣΙΜΟΣ. Useful, or profitable; from ονεω, to help. The import of this name led the apostle to play upon the word thus, I beseech thee for my son Onesimus; who in time past was to thee unprofitable, but now profitable to thee and me.

ΦΙΛΗΜΟΝ, ΦΙΛΗΜΟΝ. Affectionate or beloved, from φιλοω, a kiss; this led the apostle to say, To Philemon our dearly beloved.

There is a peculiarity in this epistle, to which it would be difficult to find a parallel in any other part of the apostle's writings.

It is very probable that Apphia was the wife of Philemon and Archippus, their son, the pastor of the church at Philemon's house.

To the church in thy house] The congregations of Christians frequently assembling in Philemon's house, at that time, the Christians had neither temple, church, or synagogue.

4. I thank my God] For all the good he had done to me.

7 For we have great joy and consolation in thy love, because the bowels of the saints <sup>k</sup> are refreshed by thee, brother.
 8 Wherefore, I though I might be much bold in Christ to enjoin thee that which is convenient,
 9 Yet for love's sake I rather beseech thee, being such an one as Paul the aged, <sup>m</sup> and now also a prisoner of Jesus Christ.
 10 I beseech thee for my son <sup>n</sup> Onesimus, <sup>o</sup> whom I have begotten in my bonds:
 11 Which in time past was to thee unprofitable, but now profitable to thee and to me:
 12 Whom I have sent again: thou therefore receive him, hat is, mine own bowels:
 13 Whom I would have retained with me, <sup>p</sup> that in thy stead <sup>q</sup> I & Car. : 12. & Tim. 1. 16. Ver. 32.—1 Thess. 2. 6.—m Ver. 1.—n Col. 4. 9.—o Cor. 15. Gal. 4. 12.

you; making mention of thee always in my prayers; that thou mayest hold fast all that thou hast got: and get all thou hast more need.

5. Hearing of thy love and faith] His faith in Christ Jesus; his love to the saints. Several excellent MSS. and some versions, put faith before love, which makes a more natural reading. There is no figure of speech which would vindicate our saying faith in the saints: so that if we do not allow of the arrangement in the MSS. referred to, we shall be obliged to have recourse to the transposition; because faith must refer to Jesus Christ, and love to the saints.

6. That the communication of thy faith] The words hē κοινωνία τῆς πίστης σου, the fellowship or communication of thy faith, may be understood as referring to the work of love towards the saints, the poor Christians; which his faith in Christ enabled him to perform; faith being taken here for its effects: and indeed the word κοινωνία itself is not unfrequently used to denote liberality, aides gratias; and this is very properly remarked by Theophylact here: Κοινωνία πιστῶς ἐκείνου σου εἶναι, οὐκ ἐστὶν πίστις πᾶσις; γινώσκου. "He utters aides, giving the communication of faith, because it is the fruit of much faith."

May become effectual] Dr. Macknight understands these words thus, "That the many good offices which thou dost to he saints may become effectual in bringing others to the acknowledgment of every good disposition which is in you towards Christ Jesus; or towards His members."

Instead of εὐχαρῶν, energetic or effectual, the Vulgate and one of the Philippens, as well as several Latin MSS. have read vagans, evident. This makes a very good sense, and seems to agree best with the scope of the place.

Instead of εὐ χαι, in you, εὐ χαι, in us, is the reading of all the best MSS. as well as of several Versions and Fathers.

7. For we have great joy] This verse does not read harmoniously. The Greek authorizes the following arrangement:—For we have great joy and consolation in thy love, O brother, because the bowels of the saints are refreshed by thee. The apostle speaks here of the works of charity in which Philemon abounded towards poor Christians.

8. Wherefore, though I might be much bold] It would be better to read, Wherefore, although I have much authority through Christ, to command thee to do what is proper; yet, in account of my love to thee, I entreat thee.

The tenderness and delicacy of this epistle, says Dr. Paley, are long been admired:—"Though I might be much bold in Christ to enjoin thee that which is convenient; yet, for love's sake, I rather beseech thee, being such an one as Paul the aged, and now also a prisoner of Christ Jesus, I beseech thee for my son Onesimus, whom I have begotten in my bonds."

There is something certainly very melting and persuasive in this, and every part of the epistle. Yet, in my opinion, the character of St. Paul prevails in it throughout. The warm, eloquent, authoritative teacher is interwoven with an absent friend, for a beloved convert. He urges his suit with an earnestness, besetting perhaps not so much the occasion, as the ardour and sensibility of his own mind. Here also, as every where, he shows himself conscious of the weight and dignity of his mission; nor does he suffer Philemon, for a moment, to forget it: "I might be much bold in Christ, to enjoin thee that which is convenient." He is careful, also, to recall, though obliquely, to Philemon's memory, the sacred obligation under which he had laid him, by bringing him to the knowledge of Christ; "I do not say to thee, how thou owest to me even thine ownself besides." Without laying aside, however, the apostolic character, our author softens the imperative style of his address, by mixing with it every sentiment and consideration that could move the heart of his correspondent. Aged, and in prison, he is content to supplicate and entreat. Onesimus was rendered dear to him by his conversion and his services; the child of his affliction, and ministering unto him in the bonds of the Gospel." This ought to recommend him, whatever had been his fault, to Philemon's forgiveness: "Receive him as myself, as my own creature." Every thing, however, should be voluntary. St. Paul was determined that Philemon's compliance should flow from his own bounty: "Without thy mind would I do nothing, but thy benefit should not be as it were of necessity, but willingly;" trusting, nevertheless, in his gratitude and attachment for the performance of all that he requested; and for more: "Having confidence in thy obedience, I wrote unto thee, knowing that thou wilt also do more than I say."

St. Paul's discourse at Miletus; his speech before Agrippa;

he might have ministered unto me in the bonds of the Gospel:

14 But without thy mind would I do nothing; that thy benefit should not be as it were of necessity, but willingly.

15 For, perhaps he therefore departed for a season, that thou shouldst receive him for ever;

16 Not now as a servant, but above a servant, a brother beloved, especially to me, but how much more unto thee, both in the flesh and in the Lord?

17 If thou count me therefore a partner, receive him as myself.

18 If he hath wronged thee, or oweth thee ought, put that on mine account;

p 1 Cor. 14. 17. Phil. 2. 30.—q 2 Cor. 13. 7.—r 2 Cor. 6. 5. 6.—s Matt. 23. 2. 1 Tim. 4. 2.—t Col. 3. 22.—u 2 Cor. 8. 23.

his Epistle to the Romans; that to the Galatians, chap. iv. 11—20. to the Philippians, i. 29. ii. 2. the second to the Corinthians, vi. 1—18. and indeed some part or other of almost every epistle; exhibits examples of a similar application to the feelings and affections of the persons whom he addresses. And it is observable, that these pathetic effusions, drawn for the most part from his own sufferings and situation, usually precede a command, soften a rebuke, or mitigate the harshness of some disagreeable truth. Horæ Paulianæ, p. 334.

9. Paul the aged] If we allow St. Paul to have been about 25 years of age at the utmost, in the year 31, when he was assisting at the martyrdom of Stephen, Acts vii. 58. and as this epistle was written about A. D. 62 he could not have been at this time more than about 66 years old. This could not constitute him an aged man, in our sense of the term; yet, when the whole length of his life is taken in, being martyred about four years after this, he may not improperly be considered an aged, or elderly man; though it is generally allowed that his martyrdom took place in the 60th year of our Lord.

But the word σπῆντες, signifies not only an old man, but also an ambassador; because old or elderly men were chosen to fulfil such an office, because of their experience and solidity; and πρεσβυτέρως, for σπῆντες, is used in the same sense, and for the same reason, by the Septuagint: hence some have thought that we should translate here, Paul the ambassador. This would agree very well with the scope, and even the design, of the place.

10. I beseech thee for my son Onesimus] It is evident from this, that Onesimus was converted by St. Paul, while he was prisoner at Rome; and perhaps not long before he wrote this epistle.

11. Was to thee unprofitable] Alluding to the meaning of Onesimus's name, as has been already noted; though the apostle uses a different Greek word to express the same idea.

12. Whom I have sent again] The Christian religion never cancels any civil relations: a slave, on being converted, and becoming a free man of Christ, has no right to claim, on that ground, emancipation from the service of his master. Justice, therefore, required St. Paul to send back Onesimus to his master; and conscience obliged Onesimus to agree in the propriety of the measure: but love to the servant induced the apostle to write this conciliating letter to the master.

13. That in thy stead he might have ministered unto me] As Philemon was one of Paul's converts, he became thereby his spiritual father, and had a right to his services when in need. This was a strong argument, not only to induce Philemon to forgive his servant, but to send him back to the apostle, that he might minister to him in his master's stead.

14. That thy benefit should not be as it were of necessity] If the apostle had kept Onesimus in his service, and written to Philemon to forgive him, and permit him to stay; to this, it is probable, he would have agreed; but the benefit thus conceded might have lost much of its real worth by the consideration that, had he been at Colosse, Philemon would not have sent him to Rome; but being there, and in the apostle's service, he could not, with propriety, order him home: thus the benefit to the apostle would have appeared to have been of necessity.—The apostle, therefore, by sending him back again, gave Philemon the opportunity to do all as if self-moved to it. This is a very delicate touch.

15. He departed for a season] This is another most delicate stroke. He departed thy slave, thy unfaithful slave; he departed for a short time: but so has the mercy of God operated in his behalf, and the providence of God in thine, that he now returns, not an unfaithful slave, in whom thou couldst repose no confidence, but as a brother, a beloved brother in the Lord, to be in the same heavenly family with thee for ever. Thou hast, therefore, reason to be thankful for thee for ever; that he might be restored to thee again infinitely better than he was when he left thee. God has permitted his unfaithfulness, and overruled the whole, both to his advantage and thine. The apology for Onesimus is very similar to that made by Joseph for his brethren, Gen. xiv. 6.

16. Not now as a servant] Do not receive him merely as thy slave, nor treat him according to that condition; but as a brother; as a genuine Christian, and particularly dear to me.

Both in the flesh and in the Lord] There is no reason to believe that Onesimus was of the kindred of Philemon; and we must take the term flesh here, as referring to the right which Philemon had in him. He was a part of his property, and of his family; as a slave, this was his condition. But he now stood in a two-fold relation to Philemon—1. According to 19 I Paul have written it with mine own hand, I will repay it; albeit I do not say to thee how thou owest unto me even thine own self besides.

20 Yea, brother, let me have joy of thee in the Lord: & refresh my bowels in the Lord.

21 Having confidence in thy obedience, I wrote unto thee, knowing that thou wilt also do more than I say.

22 But without prepare me also a lodging: for I trust & Verse 7.—2 Cor. 7. 16.—Phil. 1. 25. & 2. 26.—1 Cor. 1. 11. Heb. 13. 2.—Col. 1. 7. & 4. 12.

the flesh, as above explained, he was one of his family.—2. In the Lord, he was now also a member of the heavenly family, and of the church at Philemon's house. Philemon's interest in him was now doubled, in consequence of his conversion to Christianity.

17. If thou count me therefore a partner) If thou dost consider me as a friend; if I have still the place of a friend in thy affection, receive him as myself; for, as I feel him as my own soul, in receiving him, thou receivest me.

There is a fine model of recommending a friend to the attention of a great man, in the epistle of Horace to Tiberius, in behalf of his friend Septimius; Epistolar. lib. 1. Ep. 9. which contains several strokes not unlike some of those in the Epistle to Philemon. It is written with much art; but is greatly exceeded by that of St. Paul. As it is very short, I shall insert it.

Septimius, Claudi, mirum intelligi unus, Quanti me facias; nam cum roget, et prece cogit Scilicet, ad libi as laudare, at tradere coner, Dignum mente domoque legentis honesta Noronis, Munere cum fungi propriis censet amici; Quid possim videt ac novit me vultibus ipso. Multa quidem dixi, cur excusatus ahirem; Sed timul, mea ne finisise minora putarer, Dimissum opis propriæ, mihi commodus unî. Sic ego, majoris fugiens opprobria culpe, Frontis ad urbans discedi præmia. Quid ei Deposuit laudis, ob amici jussa pudorem; Scribe tui gregis hunc, et fortin crede boumque.

“O Claudius, Septimius alone knows what value thou hast for me; for he asks, and earnestly entreats me, to commend him to thee, as a man worthy of the service and confidence of Tiberius, who is so correct a judge of merit. When he imagines that I possess the honour of being one of thy most intimate friends, he sees and knows me more particularly than I do myself. I said indeed many things to induce him to excuse me; but I feared lest I should be thought to dissemble my interest with thee; that I might reserve it all for my own advantage. Therefore, in order to shun the reproach of a greater fault, I have assumed all the consequence of a courtier; and have, at the request of my friend, laid aside becoming modesty; which, if thou canst pardon, receive this man into the list of thy domestics, and believe him to be a person of probity and worth.”

This is not only greatly outdone by St. Paul, but also by a letter of Pliny to his friend Sabinianus, in behalf of his servant; who, by some means, had incurred his master's displeasure.—See it at the conclusion of these notes.

18. If he hath wronged thee, or oweth thee ought) Had the apostle been assured that Onesimus had robbed his master, he certainly would not have spoken in this hypothetical way: he only puts a possible case, if he have wronged, or oweth thee ought, place all to my account: I will discharge all he owes thee.

19. I Paul have written it with mine own hand) It is likely that the whole of the letter was written by St. Paul himself, which was not his usual custom.—See on 2 Thess. iii. 17. But, by thus speaking, he bound Philemon to do what he requested, as an act of common civility; if he could not feel a higher motive from what he had already urged.

Albeit I do not say to thee how thou owest unto me) I ask thee to do this thing to oblige me; though I will not say how much thou owest unto me; even thine ownself, as having been the means of thy conversion.

20. Yea, brother) It is even so, that thou art thus indebted to me. Let me have joy of thee; in forgiving Onesimus, and receiving him into thy favour. In the words εγω σου ωφειλω, which we should translate let me have reason of thee, there is an evident paranomasia, or play on the name of Onesimus.—See on ver. 2 and 11.

Refresh my bowels) Gratify the earnest longing of my soul, in this. I ask neither thy money nor goods; I ask what will enrich, not impoverish, thee to give.

21. Having confidence in thy obedience) I know that it will please thee thus to oblige thy friend; and I know that thou wilt do more than I request, because thou feelest the affection of a son to thy spiritual father. Some think that the apostle hints to Philemon that he should manumit Onesimus.

22. But without prepare me also a lodging) Does not the apostle mention this as conferring an obligation on Philemon? I will begin to repay thee by taking up my abode at thy house, as soon as I shall be enlarged from prison. But some think he wished Philemon to hire him a house, that he might have a lodging of his own, when he returned to Colosse.

For I trust that through your prayers) It is very likely that this epistle was written a short time before the liberation of the apostle from his first imprisonment at Rome.—See Acts that through your prayers I shall be given unto you. 23 There salute thee Epaphras, my fellow-prisoner in Christ Jesus;

23. Epaphras, my fellow-prisoner) Epaphras was a Colossian, as we learn from Coloss. iv. 12. Epaphras, who is one of you. But there is no account there of his being in prison, though the not mentioning of it does not necessarily imply that he was not. Some time or other he had suffered imprisonment for the truth of the Gospel; and, on that account, St. Paul might, in a general way, call him his fellow-prisoner.

24. Marcus, Aristarchus, &c.) These were all acquaintances of Philemon, and probably Colossians; and may be all considered as joining here with St. Paul in his request to Onesimus. Some think that Marcus was either the evangelist, or John Mark, the nephew of Barnabas, Acts xiii. 12. & xx. 4. xvii. 2. Aristarchus was probably the same with him mentioned Acts ix. 29. xx. 4.—See Coloss. iv. 10.

Demas) Is supposed to be the same who continued in an attachment to Paul, till his last imprisonment at Rome: as which he left him for the love of the world, 2 Tim. iv. 9.

Lucas) Is supposed to be Luke the evangelist, and author of the Acts of the Apostles. On these suppositions little confidence can be placed: they may be correct; they may be otherwise.

25. The grace of our Lord Jesus be with your spirit) By using the plural, yours, your, the apostle, in effect, directs or addresses the epistle not only to Philemon, but to all the church at his house.

As some have thought it strange, that a private letter, of a particular business and friendship, should have got a place in the Sacred Canon, others have been industrious to find out the general uses which may be made of it. The following are those which seem to come most naturally from the text:—

1. In a religious point of view, all genuine Christian converts are on a level; Onesimus, the slave, on his conversion, becomes the apostle's beloved son, and Philemon's brother.
2. Christianity makes no change in men's civil affairs: even a slave did not become a free man by Christian baptism.
3. A servant should be either taken or retained from his own master, without the master's consent, ver. 13. 14.
4. We should do good unto all men; and not be above helping the meanest slave when we have the opportunity.
5. Reconciliation is due where an injury has been done, unless the injured party fully forgive, ver. 18.
6. We should do all in our power to make up quarrels and differences; and reconcile those that are at variance.
7. We should be grateful to our benefactors; and be ready to compensate one good turn with another.
8. We should forgive the penitents who have offended us; and rejoice in the opportunity of being reconciled to them.
9. Authority is not always to be used; a prudent man, who is possessed of it, will rather use a mild and obliging manner, than have recourse to the authority of his office.
10. The ministers of the Gospel should learn to know the worth of an immortal soul; and be as ready to use their talents for the conversion of slaves and the degraded, as the great and opulent; and prize the converted slave as highly as the converted lord; showing no sinful respect of persons.
11. Christianity, properly understood, and its doctrines properly applied, becomes the most powerful means of the subjection of men; the wicked and profligate, when brought under its influence, become useful members of society. It can transform a worthless slave into a pious, amiable, and useful man; and make him not only happier and better in himself, but also a blessing to the community.
12. We should never despair of reclaiming the wicked. No man is out of the reach of God's mercy, as long as he breathes. Pretending to say that such and such cases are hopeless, is only a colouring for our want of zeal, and a pretence to excuse our selfishness.
13. The

anxiety which the apostle showed for the welfare of Onesimus, in return for his affectionate services, could not fail to cherish good dispositions in the breast of Philemon. We do a man a great kindness when we even engage him in acts of mercy and benevolence. 14. From this epistle we learn what sort of man he apostle was in private life. He has here displayed qualities which are in the highest estimation among men; a noble spirit arising from a consciousness of his own dignity; consummate prudence; uncommon generosity; the warmest friendship; the most skillful address; and the greatest politeness, as well as purity of manners; qualities which are never found either in the enthusiast or impostor.—See Macknight and Dodd.

There is extant an epistle of Pliny on the very same subject, directed to his friend Sabinianus, in behalf of his manumitted slave, who had offended him, and was consequently cast out of favour. Dr. Doddridge says, that "that epistle, though penned by one who was allowed to excel in the epistolary style, and though it undoubtedly has many beauties, will be found, by persons of taste, much inferior to this animated composition of the apostle Paul."

I have already introduced an epistle of Horace, on a somewhat similar subject; but that of Pliny is so exactly parallel, and so truly excellent, that I am sure its insertion will gratify every intelligent reader; and I insert it the rather, because the works of Pliny are in but few hands; and his epistles are known to very few except the learned:—

C. PLINIUS SABINIANO SVA, S.

Libertus tuus, cui succensere tu dixeras, venit ad me voluntarius pedibus meis, tangens, tuis hasit. Flevit multum, multum rogavit, multum etiam tacuit: in summâ fecit mihi fidem penitentis. Verè credo emendatum, quia delirantem se sentit. Irascaris scio; et irascaris meriti, id quoque scio: sed tuâ præcipua mansuetudinis laus, cùm ira casuâ inaccessibilis est. Ametisti hominem; et, spero, amabis: interim reficit, ut exorari te sinas. Licetibi rursus irasci, et meruerit: quod erratae excoecatae facies.

Remitte aliquid adolescentiæ peius; remitte lachrymis; remitte indulgentiæ tuæ: ne torseris illum, ne torseris etiam te. Torqueris enim cùm tam lenis irascaris. Vereor, ne videar non rogare, sed cogere, si precibus ejus me junxero. Iungam tamen tantoplenius et effusius, quanto ipseum acris verberis equis corripui, destructis minatus, nunquam me postea rogaturum. Hoc illi, quem terri oportebat; tibi non idem. Nam fortasse iterum rogabo, impetrabo iterum: sit modo tale, et rogare me, ut præstare in decess. Vale.—Epistolæ. lib. ix. Ep. 21.

"CAIUS PLINIUS TO SABINIANS his Friend, health.
"Thy freed man, with whom thou didst inform me thou wert incensed, came to me, and threw himself at my feet; and grasped them, as if they had been thine. He wept much: earnestly entreated; and yet said more by his silence. In short, he is fully convinced me that he is a penitent. I do verily believe him reformed, because he feels his guilt. Thou art incensed against him I know; and I know that he has justly merited by displeasure; but then, clemency has its chief praise where here is the greatest cause for irritation. Thou didst once love the man, and I hope thou wilt love him again. In the meantime, permit thyself to be entreated in his behalf. Should he gain merit thy displeasure, thou wilt have the stronger excuse for indulging it, shouldst thou pardon him now. Consider his youth; consider his tears; consider thy own gentleness of disposition. Do not torment him; do not torment thyself; for, with thy mild disposition, thou must be tormented, if thou suffer thyself to be angry. I fear, were I to join my prayers to his, that I should rather seem to compel than to supplicate. Yet I will unite them; and the more largely and earnestly too, as I have sharply and severely reprovèd him; solemnly threat ening, should he offend again, never more to intercede for him. This I said to him, it being necessary that I should alarm him: but I do not say the same to thee; for probably I may entreat thee again, and command thee again, should there be a sufficient reason to induce me to request, and thee to concede. Farewell."

Nothing on the subject can be finer than this: but Paul has the advantage, because he had Christian motives to urge. If the energetic Roman had had these, we should have found it difficult to decide between his Latin, and the apostle's Greek.

It may be now asked, whether St. Paul's application in behalf of Onesimus was successful? We have no direct answer to this question; but we may fairly suppose that such pleading could not be in vain. Philemon was a Christian, and owed too much to his God and Saviour, and too much to the apostle, as the instrument of his salvation, not to concede a favour which is congenial to the very spirit of Christianity to grant.

The application of Horace, in behalf of Septimius, was successful; and both Claudius Nero and Augustus took him into their warmest confidence. But this was only a common case of recommendation, and had no difficulties in the way. But did the heathen Sabinianus yield to the entreaties of his friend, and forgive his slave? He did: and we have the record of it in another very elegant letter, in which Pliny expresses his obligation to his friend for his prompt attention to his request. I will transcribe it, and give a translation for the farther satisfaction of the reader:—

C. PLINIUS SABINIANO SVA, S.

Bene fecisti quod libertum alipando tibi carum, reducentibus epistolis meis, in domum, in animum recepisti. Juva bit hoc te: me certè juvat; primùm quod te talem video, ut in ira regi posses: deinde quod tantum mihi tributa, ut vel auctoritatè mea parcas, vel precibus indulgeas. Igitur, et laudo, et gratias ago. Simul in posterum moneo, ut te erroribus tuorum, etsi non fuerit, qui deprecatur, placabiliter præstes. Vale.—Epistolæ. lib. ix. Ep. 24.

"CAIUS PLINIUS to his friend SABINIANS, health.
"Thou hast done well, that, in compliance with my letter, thou hast received thy freed man both into thy house and to thy heart. This must be pleasing to thyself: and it is certainly pleasing to me; first, because I find thee to be a person capable of being governed in thy anger; and, secondly, because thou showest so much regard for me, as either to yield this to my authority, or concede it to my entreaties. Therefore, I both praise and return thee thanks. At the same time I admonish thee, to be always ready to forgive the errors of thy servants, although there should be no one to intercede in their behalf. Farewell."

These letters contain such excellent lessons of instruction, that it will be impossible to read them without profit. They are master pieces in their kind: and no Christian need be ashamed to be indebted to them, whether, in regulating his own conduct in respect to forgiveness of injuries, or whether, in interceding for them who have fallen under the displeasure of others. Reader, go thou and do likewise.

INTRODUCTION TO THE EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE TO THE HEBREWS.

The chief points in controversy, relative to the Epistle to the Hebrews, though discussed by many, have not, in my opinion, been treated so successfully by any writer as by Dr. Lardner; so has entered into the whole controversy, and brought his knowledge from far. I shall avail myself of his labours, as the best on the subject, and generally use his own words. "I shall," says he, "inquire—1. To whom it was written.—2. In what language.—3. By whom.—4. The time and place, & writing it."

"1.—In the first place, let us consider to whom this epistle was written."

"Dr. Lightfoot thought that this epistle was sent by Paul to the believing Jews of Judæa; a people, says he, that had been such engaged to him, for his care of their poor, getting collections for them all along in his travels. He adds, "it is not to be doubted, indeed, that he intends the discourse and matter of his epistle to the Jews throughout their dispersion. Yet does he endorse it, and send it chiefly to the Hebrews, or the Jews of Judæa, the principal part of the circumcision, as the proper centre to which to direct it, and from whence it might be best diffused in time to the whole circumference of the dispersion." Waltby, in his preface to the Epistle to the Hebrews, is of the same opinion: and argues much after the same manner as Lightfoot.

"So likewise Mill, Pearson, Lewis Cappelus, and Besa, in his preface to this epistle, and Bezausæus and L'Éfant, the editors of the French New Testament at Berlin, in their general preface to St. Paul's epistles, and in their preface to this epistle in particular.

"Of this Mr. Hallet had no doubt, who, in his Synopsis of the epistle, says, "This epistle was particularly designed for the Hebrew Christians, who dwell in one certain place, and was sent thither, as appears from the apostle's saying, chap. xiii. 19, 23. 'I beseech you the rather to do this, that I may be restored to you the sooner.—I will see you.' And what particular place can this be supposed to be but Judæa? There, the Christians were continually persecuted by the unbelieving Jews, as we read in the Acts of the Apostles; and as St. Paul takes notice, 1 Thess. ii. 14. Heb. x. 32—36. xii. 4, 5. By these persecutions, the Hebrew Christians were tempted to apostatize from Christianity, and to think there was strength in the arguments used by the persecutors in favour of Judaism. The apostle, therefore, sets himself to guard against both these dangers.

"This appears to me to be the most probable opinion: for—1. It is the opinion of the ancient Christian writers who received this epistle. It may be taken for granted, that this was the opinion of Clement of Alexandria, and Jerom, and Eusebius, who supposed this epistle to have been first written in Hebrew, and afterward translated into Greek. It may be allowed to have been also the opinion of many others, who quote this epistle to have been written to Hebrews, when they say nothing to the contrary. Nor do I recollect any of the ancients, who say it was written to Jews, living out of Judea.

Chrysostom says, that the epistle was sent to the believing Jews of Palestine; and supposes that the apostle afterward made them a visit. Theodore, in his preface to the epistle, allows it to have been sent to the same Jews; and Theophylact, in his argument of the epistle, expressly says, as Chrysostom, that it was sent to the Jews of Palestine. So that this was the general opinion of the ancients.

"11.—There are in this epistle many things especially suitable to the believers in Judea; which must lead us to think it was written to them. I shall select such passages.

"1.—Heb. 1. 2. 'Has in these last days spoken unto us by His Son.'

"2.—Chap. iv. 2. 'For unto us was the Gospel preached, as well as unto them.'

"3.—Chap. ii. 1, 4. 'Therefore we ought to give the more earnest heed to the things which we have heard; How then shall we escape if we neglect so great salvation, which at the first began to be spoken by the Lord, and was confirmed unto us by them that heard him: God also bearing them witness with signs and wonders, and with divers miracles, and gifts of the Holy Ghost.'

"Does not this exhortation, and the reason with which it is supported, peculiarly suit the believers of Judea, where Christ himself first taught, and then His disciples after him; confirming their testimony with very numerous and conspicuous miracles?

"4.—The people to whom this epistle is sent were well acquainted with our Saviour's sufferings, as they of Judea must have been. This appears in chap. i. 3. ii. 9, 18. v. 7, 8. ix. 14, 28. x. 11. xii. 2, 3. xiii. 12.

"5.—Chap. v. 12. 'For when ye ought to be teachers of others,'—and what follows, is most properly understood of Christians in Jerusalem and Judea, to whom the Gospel was first preached.

"6.—What is said ch. vi. 4—6. and x. 26, 29, is most properly applicable to apostates in Judea.

"7.—Chap. x. 32, 34. 'But call to remembrance the former days, in which, after ye were illuminated, ye endured a great fight of afflictions;' to the end of ver. 34. This leads us to the church of Jerusalem, which had suffered much, long before the writing of this epistle, even very soon after they had received the knowledge of the truth. Compare Acts viii. 1. ix. 1, 2. xi. 19. and 1 Thess. ii. 14. Grotius supposes as much.

"8.—Those exhortations, ch. xiii. 13, 14, must have been very suitable to the case of the Jews at Jerusalem, at the supposed time of writing this epistle; a few years before the war in that country broke out.

"9.—The regard shown in this epistle to the rulers of the church or churches to which it is sent, is very remarkable. They are mentioned twice or thrice, first in chap. xiii. 7. 'Remember your rulers, who have spoken unto you the word of God: whose faith imitate, concerning the end of their conversation. These were dead, as Grotius observes. And Theodore's note is to this purpose. He intends the saints that were dead, Stephen the protomartyr, James the brother of John, and James called the Just. And there were many others who were taken off by the Jewish rage. Consider these, says he; and, observing their example, imitate their faith. Then again, at ver. 17. 'Obey them that have the rule over you, and submit yourselves. For they watch for your souls.' And, once more, ver. 24. 'Salute all them that have the rule over you, and all the saints.' Upon which, Theodore says, this way of speaking intimates, that their rulers did not need such instruction; for which reason he did not write to them but to their disciples. That is a fine observation. And Whitby upon that verse says, Hence it seems evident, that this epistle was not sent to the bishops or rulers of the church, but to the whole church, or the laity; and it may deserve to be considered, whether this repeated notice of the rulers among them does not afford ground to believe, that some of the apostles were still in Judea? Whether there be sufficient reason to believe that or not, I think these notices very proper and suitable to the state of the Jewish believers in Judea: for I am persuaded, that not only James, and all the other apostles, had exactly the same doctrine with Paul, but that all the elders likewise, and all the understanding men among the Jewish believers, embraced the same doctrine. They were, as I understand, the multitude only, ἡ ἄσφοδ, plebs, or the men of lower rank among them, who were attached to the peculiarities of the Mosaic law, and the customs of their ancestors. This may be argued from what James and the elders of Jerusalem say to Paul, Acts xxi. 20—22. 'Thou seest, brother, how many thousands of Jews there are that believe. And they are all zealous of the law.—What is it therefore? The multitude must needs come together.' It is hence evident that the seal for the law, which prevailed in the minds of many, was not approved by James or the elders. That being the case, these recommendations of a regard for their rulers, whether apostles or elders, were very proper, in an epistle sent to the believers in Judea.

"For these reasons, I think that this epistle was sent to the Jewish believers, at Jerusalem, and in Judea. But there are objections which must be considered.

"Obj. 1.—Ch. vi. 10. 'God is not unrighteous to forget your work, and labour of love—in that ye have ministered to the saints, and do minister.' Upon which Dr. Wall remarks,

Here again we are put upon thinking, to what church or what Christians this is said; for as to those of Jerusalem, we read much in Paul's former letters, of their poverty, and of their being ministered to by the Gentile Christians of Galatia, Macedonia, and Corinth; and in the Acts, by the Antiochians; but no where, of their ministering to other saints. This objection, perhaps, might be strengthened from Heb. xii. 1. 'Be not forgetful to entertain strangers.' And from ver. 14. 'To do good, and to communicate, forget not.'

"Ans.—But the poverty of the Jews in Judea, and the contributions of the Gentile churches for their relief, are no reasons why such admonitions as these should not be sent to them. They are properly directed to all Christians, that they may be induced to exert themselves to the utmost. The Gentile churches, among whom St. Paul made collection for the saints in Judea, were not rich. As he says, 1 Cor. 1. 2. 'For ye know your calling, brethren—not many mighty, nor many noble, are called.' And of the churches in Macedonia, he says, 2 Cor. vii. 2. 'How that in a great trial of affliction, the abundance of their joy, and their deep poverty, had abounded unto the riches of their liberality.' In like manner, there might be instances of liberality to the distress among the believers in Judea. There is a very fine example recorded Acts xxi. 3. nor was there ever any city, or country, in the world, to whom that exhortation, 'Be not forgetful to entertain strangers,' or be not unmindful of hospitality, ἡς φιλοξενίας ἐπιμενησθε, could be more properly given, than Jerusalem and Judea. For the people there must have been much accustomed to it at their festivals, when there was a great resort thither from all countries; and the writer of an epistle to the Christian inhabitants of Jerusalem and Judea would naturally think of such an admonition: being desirous that they should set full sort of others in that respect. And we may here, not only recollect the history of St. Paul's going to Jerusalem; and how he, and his fellow travellers, were entertained at Caesarea in the house of Philip the evangelist, and at Jerusalem, in the house of Mnason, an old disciple, as related Acts xxi. 8—16.

"Obj. 2.—Upon chap. xiii. 18, 19, the same Dr. Wall says, one would think that Paul should have prayed and proposed to go any where rather than to Jerusalem, where he had been so used; and where he fell into that five years' imprisonment, from which he was but just now delivered.

"But there is not any improbability that Paul might desire to see his countrymen in Judea, if he might go there with safety, as I think he might. Almost three years had now passed since he left Judea; and his trial, or apology, had been over two years; and he was now set at liberty by the emperor himself. No man, not very presumptuous, would think a thought of disturbing him.

"Obj. 3.—St. Peter's epistles were written to the Hebrew Christians, scattered in Asia and Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, and Bithynia. St. Paul must have written an epistle to them Hebrew Christians to whom St. Peter writes his two epistles. For St. Peter, 2 Epist. iii. 15. cites to them what Paul has written unto them. No epistle of Paul was written to the Hebrews particularly, but this: so that these must be the Hebrews of the above-named countries. To which I answer, that St. Peter's epistles were not sent to the Jews, but to Gentiles, or to all Christians in general, in the places above-mentioned, as will be clearly shown hereafter. When St. Peter says, 'As Paul has written unto you,' he may intend Paul's Epistle to the Galatians, and some other epistles written to Gentiles. He refers at all to this Epistle to the Hebrews, it is comprehended under that expression, ver. 16. 'As also in all his epistles.'

"Obj. 4.—This Epistle to the Hebrews seems to have been written in Greek. But if it had been sent to the Jewish believers in Judea, it would have been written in Hebrew. To which I answer, that, allowing the epistle to have been written in Greek, it might be sent to the believers in Judea. If St. Paul wrote to the Jewish believers in Palestine, he intended the epistle for general use, for all Christians, whether of Jewish or Gentile original. Many of the Jews in Judea understood Greek; few of the Jews out of Judea understood Hebrew. The Greek language was almost universal, and therefore generally used. All St. Paul's epistles are in Greek, even that to the Romans. And are not both St. Peter's epistles in Greek? And St. John's and St. Jude's? Did not St. James likewise write in Greek, who is supposed to have resided in Jerusalem, from the time of our Lord's ascension, to the time of his own death? His epistle is inscribed to the Jewish tribes scattered abroad. But I presume that they of the several tribes who dwell in Judea, are not excluded by him, but intended. Nor could he be unwilling that his epistle should be read and understood by those who were his expected church. The epistle written by Barnabas, a Levite, or converted to him, was written in Greek: not now to mention any other ancient writers, who have used the Greek language.

"11.—Thus we are unaware brought to that question, what language this epistle was written in. For, if it had been doubt about it, among both ancient and modern times, many learned and judicious men have been of opinion, that it was written in Greek, and not Hebrew. See the learned Prolegomena to the New Testament, by the learned Spanheim, &c.

ment for this, both of Spanheim and Wetstein, is taken from the Greek paranomasias in the epistle, or the frequent occurrence of Greek words of like sound; which seems to be an argument not easy to be answered.

"Some ancient Christian writers were of opinion that the Epistle to the Hebrews was written in the Hebrew language, and translated into Greek by Luke, or Clement of Rome. Jerome, in particular, seems to have supposed that this epistle was written in Hebrew: and Origen is also sometimes reckoned among those who were of this opinion. But I think he has shown it to be probable that he thought it was written in Greek. It seems likewise that they must have been of the same opinion who considered the elegance of the Greek language of this epistle as an objection against its having been written by St. Paul; for, if the Greek epistle had been supposed to be a translation, the superior elegance of the style of this epistle, above that of the other epistles of Paul, could not have afforded no objection against his being the author of it. Indeed the ancients, as Beausobre said, formerly had no other reason to believe that St. Paul wrote in Hebrew, but that he wrote to the Hebrews. So, likewise, says Capellus. The title received them. And because it was written to Hebrews, they concluded it was written in Hebrew; for none of the ancients appear to have seen a copy of this epistle in that language.

"III.—I now proceed to the third inquiry, Who is the writer of this epistle? And many things offer in favour of the apostle Paul.

"1.—It is ascribed to him by many of the ancients. Here I think myself obliged briefly to recollect the testimonies of ancient authors: and I shall rank them under two heads:—First, the testimonies of writers who used the Greek tongue; then, the testimonies of those who lived in that part of the Roman empire, where the Latin was the vulgar language.

"There are some passages in the epistles of Ignatius, about the year 107, which may be thought, by some, to contain allusions to the Epistle to the Hebrews. This epistle seems to be referred to by Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna, in his epistle written to the Philippians, in the year 108, and in the relation of his martyrdom, written about the middle of the second century. This epistle is often quoted as Paul's, by Clement of Alexandria, about the year 194. It is received and quoted as Paul's, by Origen, about 230. It was also received as the apostle's by Dionysius, bishop of Alexandria, in 247. It is plainly referred to by Theognostus, of Alexandria, about 282. It appears to have been received by Methodius, about 292; by Pamphilus, about 294; and by Archelaus, bishop in Mesopotamia, at the beginning of the fourth century; by the Manichees in the fourth; and by the Paulicians, in the seventh century. It was received, and ascribed to Paul, by Alexander, bishop of Alexandria, in the year 313; and by the Arians, in the fourth century. Eusebius, bishop of Cæsarea, about 315, says, 'There are fourteen epistles of Paul manifest and well known; but yet there are some who reject that to the Hebrews, alleging, in behalf of their opinion, that it was not received by the church of Rome, as a writing of Paul.' It is often quoted by Eusebius himself as Paul's, and sacred Scripture. This epistle was received by Athanasius, without any hesitation.

"His enumeration of St. Paul's fourteen epistles, this is placed next after the two to the Thessalonians, and before the epistles to Timothy, Titus, and Philemon. The same order is observed in the Synopsis of Scripture, ascribed to him. This epistle is received as Paul's by Adamantius, author of a Dialogue against the Marcionites, in 390; and by Cyril of Jerusalem, in 247; by the council of Laodicea, in 363; where St. Paul's epistles are enumerated in the same order as in Athanasius's just noticed. This epistle is also received as Paul's by Epiphanius, about 368; by the apostolical constitutions, about the end of the fourth century; by Basil, about 370; by Gregory Nazianzen, in 370; by Amphilocheus also. But he says it was received by all as Paul's. It was received by Gregory Nyssa, about 370; by Didymus of Alexandria, about the same time; by Ephrem, the Syrian, in 370; and by the churches of Syria, by Diodorus of Tarsus, in 378; by Hierax, a learned presbyter, about the year 302; by Serapion, bishop of Thunna, in Egypt, about 347; by Titus, bishop of Bostra, in Arabia, about 362; by Theodore, bishop of Mopuestia, in Cilicia, about the year 394; by Chrysostom, about the year 398; by Eusebian, bishop of Gabala, in Syria, in 401; by Victor of Antioch, about 401; by Palladius, author of a Life of Chrysostom, about 408; by Isidore, of Pelusium, about 412; by Cyril, bishop of Alexandria, in 412; by Theodore, in 423; by Euthemius, bishop of Tyana, in Cappadocia, in 431; by Socrates, the ecclesiastical historian, about 440; by Euthalius, in Egypt, about 458; and probably by Dionysius, falsely called the Areopagite, by the author of the Questions et Responses, commonly ascribed to Justin Martyr, but rather written in the fifth century. It is in the Alexandrian manuscript, about the year 600; and in the Stichometrie of Nicephorus, about 806; received as Paul's by Cosmas, of Alexandria, about 636; by Constantine, of Constantinople, about 610; by John Damascene, in 700; by Photius, about 868; by Eusebius, about the year 80; and by Theophylact, in 1070. I shall not go any lower.

"I shall now rehearse such authors as lived in that part of the Roman empire, where the Latin was the vulgar language.

"Here, in the first place, offers Clement, in his Epistle to the Corinthians, written about the year 96, or, as some others say, about the year 70. For, though he wrote in Greek, we rank him among Latin authors, because he was bishop of Rome. In his epistle are many passages, generally supposed to contain allusions, or references, to the Epistle to the Hebrews. Irenæus, bishop of Lyons, about 178, as we are assured by Eusebius, alleged some passages out of this epistle, in a work now lost; nevertheless, it does not appear that he received it as St. Paul's. By Tertullian, presbyter of Carthage, about the year 200, this epistle is ascribed to Barnabas. Caius, about 212, supposed to have been presbyter in the church of Rome, reckoning up the epistles of St. Paul, mentions thirteen only, omitting that to the Hebrews. Here I place Hippolytus, who flourished about 220; but it is not certainly known where he was bishop, whether of Porto, in Italy, or at some place in the East: we have seen evidences that he did not receive the Epistle to the Hebrews as St. Paul's; and, perhaps, that may afford an argument, that, though he wrote in Greek, he lived where the Latin tongue prevailed. This epistle is not quoted by Cyprian, bishop of Carthage, about 248, and afterward; nor does it appear to have been received by Novatus, otherwise called Novation, presbyter of Rome, about 251. Nevertheless, it was in aftertimes received by his followers. It may be thought by some, that this epistle is referred to by Arnobius, about 306; and by Iactantius, about the same time. It is plainly quoted by another Arnobius, in the fifth century. It was received as Paul's by Hilary of Poitiers, about 354; and by Lucifer, bishop of Cagliari, in Sardinia, about the same time, and by his followers: it was also received as Paul's by C. M. Victorianus. Whether it was received by Optatus, of Milevi, in Africa, about 370, is doubtful. It was received as Paul's by Ambrose, bishop of Milan, about 374; by the Priscillianists, about 378. About the year 380 was published a Commentary upon thirteen epistles of Paul only, ascribed to Hilary, deacon of Rome. It was received as Paul's by Philaster, bishop of Brescia, in Italy, about 380; but he takes notice that it was not then received by all. His successor, Gaudentius, about 387, quotes this epistle as Paul's: it is also readily received as Paul's by Jerome, about 392; and he says it was generally received by the Greeks, and the Christians in the East, but not by all the Latins. It was received as Paul's, by Rufinus, in 397: it is also in the Catalogue of the third Council of Carthage, in 397. It is frequently quoted by Augustin as St. Paul's. In one place he says, 'It is of doubtful authority with some; but he was inclined to follow the opinion of the churches in the East, who received it among the canonical Scriptures.' It was received as Paul's by Chromatius, bishop of Aquileia, in Italy, about 401; by Innocent, bishop of Rome, about 402; by Paulinus, bishop of Nola, in Italy, about 403. Pelagius, about 405, wrote a Commentary upon thirteen Epistles of Paul, omitting that to the Hebrews; nevertheless, it was received by his followers. It was received by Cassian, about 424; by Prosper, of Aquitain, about 434; and by the authors of the works ascribed to him; by Eucherius, bishop of Lyons, in 434; by Sedulius, about 818; by Leo, bishop of Rome, in 440; by Salvian, presbyter of Marseilles, about 440; by Gelatius, bishop of Rome, about 496; by Fecundus, an African bishop, about 640; by Junillus, an African bishop, about 656; by Cassiodorus, in 566; by the author of the imperfect work upon St. Matthew, about 600; by Gregory, bishop of Rome, about 690; by Isidore, of Seville, about 596; and by Bede, about 701, or the beginning of the eighth century.

"Concerning the Latin writers, it is obvious to remark, that this epistle is not expressly quoted as Paul's, by any of them in the three first centuries; however, it was known by Irenæus and Tertullian, as we have seen, and possibly to others also. But it is manifest that it was received as an epistle of St. Paul, by many Latin writers, in the fourth, fifth, and following centuries.

"The reasons of doubting about the genuineness of this epistle probably were, the want of a name at the beginning, and the difference of argument or subject matter, and of the style, from the commonly received epistles, of the apostle, as is intimated by Jerome. Whether they are sufficient reasons for rejecting this epistle, will be considered in the course of our argument.

"2.—There is nothing in the epistle itself that renders it impossible, or unlikely to be his; for the epistle appears to have been written before the destruction of Jerusalem, as was of old observed by Chrysostom and Theodoret, and has been argued also by many moderns. That the temple was still standing, and sacrifices there offered, may be inferred from chap. viii. 4. 'For if he were on earth, he should not be a priest, seeing that there are priests that offer according to the law;' and from chap. xiii. 10. 'We have an altar, whereof they have no right to eat, which serve the tabernacle.' If the temple had been destroyed, and the worship there abolished, the writer would not have failed to take some notice of it, in support of his argument, and for abating the too great attachment of many to the rites of the Mosaic institution. To this purpose speaks Spanheim. It is also probable that those words, chap. iii. 13. 'While it is called to-day,' refer to the patience which God yet continued to exercise toward the Jewish nation; he seems to have had in view the approaching destruction of Jerusalem, which would put an end to that 'to-day,' and finish the time which God gave to the Jews, as a nation, to 'hear his voice.' And Lightfoot argues, from chap

xii. 4. 'Ye have not yet resisted unto blood,' that the epistle was written before the war in Judæa was begun.

"Indeed, those words have been the ground of an objection against this epistle having been sent to the believing Jews in Judæa; because there had been already several martyrdoms in that country. That difficulty I would now remove; and I have received from a learned friend the following observation, which may be of use: 'It seems to me,' says he, 'that the apostle here, as well as in the preceding context, alludes to the Grecian games, or exercises; and he signifies that they to whom he writes, had not been called out to the most dangerous combats, and had not run the immediate hazard of their lives; which, I suppose, might be said of them as a body, or church.' And I shall transfer hither M. Beausobre's note upon this place: 'There had been martyrs in Judæa, as Stephen and the two James's; but, for the most part, the Jews did not put the Christians to death, for want of power; they were imprisoned and scourged, see Acts v. 40. and here, chap. xiii. 3. And they endured reproaches, and the loss of their substance, chap. x. 32, 34. These were the sufferings which they had met with. The apostle, therefore, here, indirectly reproves the Hebrews, that though God treated them with more indulgence than He had done His people in former times, and even than His own Son; they, nevertheless, wavered in their profession of the Gospel.—See ver. 12.'

"3.—There are many exhortations in this epistle much resembling some in the epistles of St. Paul. 1. Heb. xii. 3. 'Lest ye be wearied and faint in your minds.' Gal. vi. 9. 'And let us not be weary in well-doing, for in due season we shall reap, if we faint not.' And see 2 Thess. iii. 13. and Eph. iii. 13. 2. Heb. xii. 14. 'Follow peace with all men, and holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord.' An exhortation very suitable to Paul and to the Jewish believers in Judæa; admonishing them not to impose the rituals of the law upon others; that is, the Gentile believers, and to maintain friendship with them, though they did not embrace the law. It has also a resemblance to Rom. xii. 18. but the words of the original are different. 3. Heb. xiii. 1. 'Let brotherly love continue,' and what follows to the end of ver. 3. Then, in ver. 4. 'Marriage is honourable; but fornicators and adulterers God will judge.' Here is an agreement with Eph. v. 2, 3. 'And walk in love, as Christ also has loved us; but fornication, and all uncleanness and covetousness, let it not once be named among you.' Ver. 4. 'For this ye know, that no fornicator, nor unclean person, nor covetous man, has any inheritance in the kingdom of God.' 4. Chap. xiii. 16. 'But to do good, and to communicate, forget not; for with such sacrifices God is well-pleased.' That exhortation is very suitable to Paul's doctrine, and has an agreement with what he says elsewhere: as Phil. iv. 18. 'An odour of a sweet smell; a sacrifice acceptable, well-pleasing to God.' Moreover, as is observed by Grotius upon this text, the word communicate, or communio, is found in a like sense in the Acts, and in other epistles of St. Paul. See Acts ii. 42. Rom. xv. 26. 2 Cor. viii. 4. chap. ix. 13.

"4.—In the next place, I observe some instances of agreement in the style, or phrases, of the Epistle to the Hebrews, and the acknowledged epistles of St. Paul. 1. Heb. ii. 4. 'God also bearing them witness with signs and wonders, and divers miracles and gifts of the Holy Ghost.'—'signs and wonders,' together, seldom occur in other books of the New Testament; but they are found several times in the Acts, and in St. Paul's epistles. The phrase is in Matt. xxiv. 24. and Mark xii. 22. and once, likewise, in St. John's Gospel, chap. iv. 24. but it is several times in the Acts, chap. ii. 19. iv. 30. v. 12. vi. 8. viii. 13. xiv. 3. xv. 12. The most remarkable are these where there are three different words, Acts ii. 22. 'A man approved of God among you, by miracles, and wonders, and signs.' Rom. xv. 19. 'Through mighty signs and wonders, by the power of the Spirit of God.' 2 Cor. xii. 12. 'In signs, and wonders, and mighty deeds.' 2 Thess. ii. 9. 'With all power, and signs, and lying wonders.' 2. Chap. ii. 14. 'That through death he might destroy him who had the power of death.' The word καταργησας, or καταργουσαι, is, I think, no where used in the New Testament, except in Luke xiii. 7. and St. Paul's epistles, where it is several times; and is sometimes used in a sense resembling this place, particularly 9 Tim. i. 10. 'Who has abolished death;' καταργησαντες τον θανατον; and 1 Cor. xv. 26. Compare Dr. Doddridge's Family Expositor, Vol. IV. upon 1 Cor. xv. 24. 3. Chap. iii. 1. 'Holy brethren, partakers of the heavenly calling.' Phil. iii. 4. 'The prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus.' 2 Tim. i. 9. 'Who has called us with an holy calling.' 4. Chap. v. 12. 'And are become such as have need of milk, and not of strong meat.' 1 Cor. iii. 2. 'I have fed you with milk, and not with meat.' However, in the original, there is no great agreement in the words, except that, in both places, milk is used for the first rudiments of the Christian doctrine. 5. Chap. viii. 1. 'Who is set on the right-hand of the throne of the Majesty on high.' Eph. i. 21. 'And set him at his own right-hand in the heavenly places.' 6. Chap. viii. 6. ix. 15. and xii. 24. Jesus Christ is styled Mediator. So likewise in Galat. iii. 19, 20. 1 Tim. ii. 5. and in no other books of the New Testament. 7. Chap. viii. 5. 'Who serve unto the temple and shadow of heavenly things;' και σκια των ουρανωτων. x. 1. 'For the law having a shadow of good things to come, and not the very image of the things;' Σκια εχων, των μελλοντων αγαθων, ουκ αυτων των αγαθων των πραγμων. Col. ii. 17. 'Which is a shadow of things to come; but the body is of Christ;' επι σκια των μελλοντων το δε σωμα τα Χριστου. 8. Chap. i. 3. 'While ye were made a gazing-stock, or spectacle, both by reproaches and afflictions;' ουσιδοιμοις τε και θλιψιν καταφιμωσι. 1 Cor. iv. 9. 'For we are made a spectacle unto the world;' οτι θεωρουμ εστηθημεν εν κοσμου. 9. St. Paul, in his acknowledged epistles, often alludes to the exercises and games which were then very reputable, and frequent in Greece and other parts of the Roman empire. There are many such allusions in this epistle, which have also great elegance. So, chap. vi. 18. 'Who have fled for refuge by hold of the hope set before us;' or the reward of eternal life proposed to animate and encourage us. And, chap. xii. 1. 'Wherefore, seeing we also are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses, let us lay aside every weight and the sin which does so easily beset us, and let us run with patience the race that is set before us.' Ver. 2. 'Looking unto Jesus, who, for the joy that was set before him, endured the cross.' And, ver. 3. 'Lest ye be wearied and faint in your minds.' And, ver. 12. 'Wherefore lift up the hands that hang down, and the feeble knees.' All these texts seem to contain allusions to the celebrated exercises and games of those times. And to these may be added, if I mistake not, the place before noticed, chap. xii. 4. 'Ye have not yet resisted unto death, striving against sin.' 10. Chap. xiii. 9. 'Be not carried about with divers and strange doctrines;' Διδασκαλις τινος ου εναντι μου περιφεροσθε. Eph. iv. 14. 'That we henceforth be no more children, tossed to and fro, and carried about with every wind of doctrine;' αποσους ζουσαντες, ουσ αποσους παντι ανεμου της διδασκαλιας. 11. Chap. xiii. 10. 'We have an altar whereof they have no right to eat.' 1 Cor. ix. 13. and chap. x. 18. 'Are not they which eat of the sacrifices, partakers of the altar?' 12. Chap. xiii. 20, 21. 'Now the God of peace make you perfect.' Which is a title of the Deity as where found in the New Testament, but in St. Paul's epistles; and in them it is several times, and near the conclusion; as here; so Rom. xv. 33. 'Now the God of peace be with you all.' See likewise chap. xvi. 20. and Phil. iv. 9. and 1 Thess. v. 23. 'And the very God of peace sanctify you wholly;' and 2 Cor. xiii. 11. 'And the God of love and peace shall be with you.'

"5.—The conclusion of this epistle has a remarkable agreement with the conclusions of St. Paul's epistles in several respects. 1. He here desires the Christians to whom he is writing to pray for him, chap. xiii. 18. 'Pray for us.' So Rom. xv. 30. Eph. vi. 18, 19. Col. iv. 3. 1 Thess. v. 25. 2 Tim. iii. 1. 2. It is added in the same, ver. 18. 'For we trust ye have a good conscience, in all things willing to live honestly; which may well come from Paul, some of the Jewish believers not being well affected to him, or being even offended with him. So says Theodoret upon this place, and Chrysostom in the like purpose, very largely. To which might be added, ver. 22. 'And I beseech you, brethren, to suffer the word of exhortation.' It is also observable, that St. Paul makes his profession of his sincerity in pleading against the Jews before Felix, Acts xxiv. 16. 3. Having desired the prayers of the Christians for himself, he prays for them, chap. xiii. 20. 'Now the God of peace make you perfect, through Jesus Christ: to whom be glory for ever and ever.—Amen.' So Rom. xv. 30, 32. having asked their prayers for him, he adds, ver. 33. 'Now the God of peace be with you all—Amen.' Compare Eph. vi. 19, 23. and 1 Thess. v. 23. 2 Thess. iii. 16. 4. Chap. xiii. 24. 'Salute all them that have the rule over you, and all of the saints.' 'They of Italy salute you.' The like salutations are in many of St. Paul's epistles, Rom. xvi. 1 Cor. xvi. 21. 2 Cor. xiii. 13. Phil. iv. 21, 22. not to refer to any one. 5. The calendrical benediction at the end, is that which Paul had made a token of the genuineness of his epistles. 2 Tim. iii. 15. So here, chap. xiii. 25. 'Grace be with you all—Amen.' Indeed, sometimes it is, 'The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you.' But at other times it is more contracted; as Col. iv. 18. 'Grace be with you.' 1 Tim. vi. 21. 'Grace is with thee.' See likewise, Eph. vi. 24. 2 Tim. iv. 22. Gal. vi. 16. The same observation is in Theodoret.

"6.—The circumstances of this epistle lead us to the Apostle Paul. 1. Chap. xiii. 24. 'They of Italy salute you.' The writer, therefore, was then in Italy, whither we know Paul was sent a prisoner, and where he resided two years, Acts xxvii. where also he wrote several epistles still remaining. 2. Ver. 19. He desires them 'the rather to pray for him, that he might be restored to them the sooner.' Paul had been brought from Judæa to Rome. And he was willing to go thither again, where he had been several times. And though the original words are not the same, there is an agreement between this and Philim. ver. 32. 'I trust that through your prayers I shall be given unto you.' This particular is one of the arguments of Euthalius, that this epistle is Paul's, and written to the Jews of Palestine. 3. Ver. 33. 'Know ye, that our brother Timothy is set at liberty; with whom, if he come shortly, I will see you.' Timothy was with Paul during his imprisonment at Rome, as is allowed by all: for he is expressly mentioned at the beginning of the Epistles to the Philippians, Colossians, Philemon, written when he was in bonds. He is mentioned again Philip. ii. 19. When the apostle writes to Timothy, he calls him his 'son,' or 'dearly beloved son.'

1 Tim. 1. 2 2 Tim. 1. 2. But when he mentions him to others, he calls him 'brother'; 2 Cor. i. 1. Col. i. 1. 1 Thess. iii. 2. in like manner Titus. Compare Titus 1. 4. and 2 Cor. 11. 13.

"This mention of Timothy has led many, not only moderns, but ancients likewise, to think of Paul as writer of the epistle, particularly Euthalius: and, undoubtedly, many others have been confirmed in that supposition by this circumstance.

"The original word, ἀπολλυμένον, is ambiguous, being capable of two senses: one of which is that of our translation, set at liberty, that is, from imprisonment; the other is dismissed, sent abroad on an errand. In this last sense it was understood by Euthalius, who, in the place just cited, says, 'That scarcely any one can be thought of, besides Paul, who would send Timothy abroad, upon any service of the Gospel.' And indeed this passage does put us in mind of what Paul says to the Philippian, chap. ii. 19. 'But I trust in the Lord even to send Timothy shortly unto you, that I also may be of good comfort, when I know your state. Him, therefore, I hope to send presently, so soon as I shall see how it will go with me; but I trust in the Lord, that I also myself shall come shortly,' ver. 23. 24. which induced Beausobre to say, in the preface to this epistle, 'The sacred author concludes with singing the prayers of the Hebrews, chap. xiii. 19. That he may be restored to them. These words intimate that he was till prisoner, but that he hoped to be set at liberty: therefore, he adds, in ver. 23. that he intended to come and see them, with Timothy, as soon as he should be returned. If his explication be right, this epistle was written at Rome, some time after the Epistle to the Philippians, and since the capture of Timothy for Macedonia.

"All these considerations just mentioned, added to the testimony of many ancient writers, make out an argument of great weight, (though not decisive and demonstrative,) that the apostle Paul is the writer of this epistle. An objection against his epistle being St. Paul's is, that it is supposed to have in it a elegance superior to that of his other writings. This has been judged, by Grotius and Le Clerc, sufficient to show that his was not written by Paul.

"The opinion of Origen, in his homilies upon this epistle, is cited by Eusebius, and by us from him, is, 'That the style of the Epistle to the Hebrews has not the apostle's openness of speech; but as to the texture of it, is elegant Greek, as every one will allow who is able to judge of the differences of style.' Again, he says, 'The sentiments of the epistle are admirable, and not inferior to the acknowledged writings of the apostle. This will be assented to by every one who reads the writings of the apostle with attention.' Steward also adds, 'If I were to speak my opinion, I should say, that the sentiments are the apostle's, but the language and composition another's, who committed to writing the apostle's sense, and, as it were, reduced into commentaries the things spoken by his master,' &c.

"Eusebius himself, speaking of Clement's epistle to the Corinthians, says, 'Paul having written to the Hebrews in his own language, some think that the evangelist Luke, here, that this very Clement himself, translated it into Greek: which last is most likely, there being a great resemblance between the style of the epistle of Clement and the epistle to the Hebrews: nor are the sentiments of those two writings very different.' This passage has been already twice cited by us; once in the chapter of Clement, bishop of Rome, and again in that of Eusebius.

"Philaster, bishop of Breccia, about 330, says, 'There are some who do not allow the Epistle to the Hebrews to be Paul's; it say it is either an epistle of the apostle Barnabas, or of Clement, bishop of Rome; but some say it is an epistle of the evangelist: moreover, some reject it as more elegant than the apostle's other writings.'

"Jerom, about 392, in his article of St. Paul, in the book of Illustrious Men, says, 'The Epistle called to the Hebrews, is thought to be his, because of the difference of the argument and style; but either Barnabas's, as Tertullian thought; the evangelist Luke's, according to some others; or Clement's, bishop of Rome; who, as some think, being much like him, clothed and adorned Paul's sense in his own language.' Moreover, he wrote as a Hebrew to the Hebrews, in the Hebrew, it being his own language; whence it came to us as that, being translated, it has more elegance in the Greek in his other epistles.'

"Some learned men of late times, as Grotius and Le Clerc, thought this to be an insuperable objection. Of this opinion also, was likewise Jacob Tolling; who, in his notes on Longinus, of the sublime, has celebrated the sublimity of this epistle, and particularly the elegance of the beginning of it; which alone he thinks sufficient to show that it was not Paul's.

"It remains, therefore, it seems to me, that if the epistle be Paul's, and was originally written in Greek, as we suppose, the style must have had some assistance in composing it: so that we are led to the judgment of Origen which appears to be as ingenious and probable as any. 'The sentiments are the apostle's, but the language and composition of some one else, who committed to writing the apostle's sense, and, as it were, reduced into commentaries the things spoken by his master.' According to this account the epistle is St. Paul's, as to the sense and matter; but the words are another's.

"Jerom, as may be remembered, says, 'He wrote as a Hebrew to Hebrews, pure Hebrew; it being his own language, whence it came to pass, that being translated, it has more elegance in the Greek than his other epistles.' My conjecture, which is not very different, if I may be allowed to mention it, is, that St. Paul dictated the epistle in Hebrew, and another, who was a great master of the Greek language, immediately wrote down the apostle's sentiments in his own elegant Greek. But who this assistant of the apostle was, is altogether unknown.

"The ancients, besides Paul, have mentioned Barnabas, Luke, and Clement, as writers or translators of this epistle: but I do not know that there is any remarkable agreement between the style of the Epistle to the Hebrews, and the style of the epistle commonly ascribed to Barnabas. The style of Clement, in his Epistle to the Corinthians, is verbose and prolix. St. Luke may have some words which are in the Epistle to the Hebrews; but that does not make out the same style. This epistle, as Origen said, as to the texture of the style, is elegant Greek; but that kind of texture appears not in Luke, so far as I can perceive: there may be more art and labour in the writings of Luke, than in those of the other evangelists, but not much more elegance that I can discern. This Epistle to the Hebrews is bright and elegant from the beginning to the end; and surpasses as much the style of St. Luke as it does the style of St. Paul in his acknowledged epistles. In short, this is an admirable epistle, both singular in sentiments and language; somewhat different in both respects from all the other writings of the New Testament: and whose is the language seems to me altogether unknown; whether that of Zenas, or Apollon, or some other of the apostle Paul's assistants and fellow labourers.

"There still remains one objection more against this epistle being written by St. Paul, which is, the want of his name; for to all the thirteen epistles, received as his, he prefixes his name, and generally calls himself apostle. This objection has been obvious in all ages; and the omission has been differently accounted for by the ancients, who received this epistle as a genuine writing of St. Paul.

"Clement of Alexandria, in his Institutions, speaks to this purpose. 'The Epistle to the Hebrews,' he says, 'is Paul's, but he did not make use of that inscription, Paul the Apostle: for which he assigns this reason—Writing to the Hebrews, who had conceived a prejudice against him, and were suspicious of him, he wisely declined setting his name at the beginning, lest he should offend them.' He also mentions this tradition: 'forasmuch as the Lord was sent, as the apostle of Almighty God, to the Hebrews, Paul, out of modesty, does not style himself the apostle to the Hebrews, both out of respect to the Lord, and that, being preacher and apostle of the Gentiles, he over and above wrote to the Hebrews.'

"Jerom also speaks to this purpose: 'that Paul might decline putting his name in the inscription, on account of the Hebrews being offended with him;' so in the article of St. Paul, in his book of Illustrious Men. In his Commentary in the beginning of his Epistle to the Galatians, he assigns another reason, 'That Paul declined to style himself apostle at the beginning of the Epistle to the Hebrews, because he should afterward call Christ the High-priest and Apostle of our profession,' chap. iii. 1.

"Theodoret says, that Paul was especially the apostle of the Gentiles; for which he alleges, Gal. ii. 9. and Rom. xi. 13.

"Therefore writing to the Hebrews, who were not entrusted to his care, he barely delivered the doctrine of the Gospel, without assuming any character of authority; for they were the charge of the other apostles.'

"Lightfoot says, 'Paul's not affixing his name to this, as he had done to his other epistles, does no more deny it to be his than the First Epistle of John is denied to be John's on that account.'

"Tillemont says, 'Possibly Paul considered it to be a book rather than a letter, since he makes an excuse for its brevity, chap. xiii. 22. for indeed it is short for a book, but long for a letter.'

"It is, I think, observable, that there is not at the beginning of this epistle any salutation. As there is no name of the writer, so neither is there any description of the people to whom it is sent. It appears from the conclusion, that it was sent to some people at a certain place; and undoubtedly they to whom it was sent, and by whom it was received, knew very well from whom it came: nevertheless, there might be reasons for omitting an inscription and a salutation at the beginning. This might arise from the circumstances of things; there might be danger of offence at sending at that time a long letter to Jews in Judea; and this omission might be in part owing to a regard for the bearer, who too is not named. The only person named throughout the epistle is Timothy; nor was he then present with the writer. Indeed, I imagine, that the two great objections against this being an epistle of St. Paul, the elegance of the style, and the want of a name and inscription, are both owing to some particular circumstance of the writer, and the people to whom it was sent. The people to whom it was sent are plainly Jews, in Judea; and the writer very probably is St. Paul, whose circumstances at the breaking up of his confinement at Rome, and his setting out upon a new journey, might be attended with some peculiar embarrassments, which obliged him to act differently from his usual method.

"IV. Thus we are brought to the fourth and last part of our inquiry concerning this epistle, the time and place of writing it. Mill was of opinion that this epistle was written by Paul, in the year 63, in some part of Italy, soon after he had been released from his imprisonment at Rome. Mr. Weistain appears to have been of the same opinion. Tillemont likewise places this epistle in 63, immediately after the apostle's being set at liberty; who, as he says, was still at Rome, or at least in Italy. Beausobre speaks of this epistle at the year 61, and supposes it to be written during the apostle's imprisonment; for he afterward speaks of the Epistle to the Ephesians, and says, it was the last letter the apostle wrote during the time of his bonds. L'Enfant and Beausobre, in their general preface to St. Paul's epistles, observe, 'That in the subscription at the end of the epistle, it is said to have been written from Italy, the only ground of which, as they add, is, what is said chap. xiii. 24. 'They of Italy salute you.' This has made some think that the apostle wrote to the Hebrews after he had been set at liberty, and when he had got in that part of Italy which borders upon Sicily, and in ancient times was called Italy. Nevertheless, there is reason to doubt of this. When he requests the prayers of the Hebrews, 'that he might be restored to them the sooner,' he intimates that he was not yet set at liberty.—Accordingly, they place this epistle in the year 62.

"There is not any great difference in any of these opinions concerning the time or place of this epistle, all supposing that it was written by the apostle either at Rome or Italy, near the end of his imprisonment at Rome, or soon after it was over, before he removed to any other country.

"I cannot perceive why it may not be allowed to have been written at Rome. St. Paul's first epistle to the Corinthians was written at Ephesus; nevertheless he says, chap. xvi. 19. 'The churches of Asia salute you.' So now he might send salutations from the Christians of Italy, not excluding, but including, those at Rome, together with the rest throughout that country. The argument of L'Enfant and Beausobre, that Paul was not yet set at liberty, because he requested the prayers of the 'Hebrews that he might be restored to them the sooner,' appears to me not of any weight. Though Paul was no longer a prisoner, he might request the prayers of those to whom he was writing, that he might have a prosperous journey to them, whom he was desirous to visit; and that all impediments of his intended journey might be removed: and many such there might be, though he was no longer under confinement. Paul was not a prisoner when he wrote his Epistle to the Romans; yet he was very fervent in his prayers to God, that he might have a prosperous journey, and come to them, chap. i. 10.

"For determining the time of this epistle, it may be observed that when the apostle wrote the Epistle to the Philippians, the Colossians, and Philemon, he had hopes of deliverance. At the writing of all these epistles, Timothy was present with him; but now he was absent, as plainly appears from chap. xiii. 23. This leads us to think that this epistle was written after them. And it is not unlikely that the apostle had now obtained that liberty which he expected when they were written.

"Moreover, in the Epistle to the Philippians, he speaks of sending Timothy to them, chap. ii. 19, 23. 'But I trust in the Lord Jesus, to send Timothy shortly unto you, that I also may be of good comfort, when I know your state.' Timothy, therefore, if sent, was to come back to the apostle. 'Him, therefore, I hope to send presently, so soon as I shall see how it will go with me.'

"It is probable that Timothy did go to the Philippians, soon after writing the above-mentioned epistles, the apostle having gained good assurance of being quite released from his confinement. And this Epistle to the Hebrews was written during the time of that absence; for, it is said, Heb. xiii. 23. 'Know ye that our brother Timothy is set at liberty,' or has been sent abroad. The word is capable of that meaning; and it is a better and more likely meaning, because it suits the coherence. And I suppose that Timothy did soon come to the apostle, and that they both sailed to Judea, and after that went to Ephesus, where Timothy was left to reside with his peculiar charge.

"Thus this epistle was written at Rome, or in Italy, soon after that Paul had been released from his confinement at Rome, in the beginning of the year 63. And I suppose it to be the last written of all St. Paul's epistles which have come down to us, or of which we have any knowledge."

Dr. Lardner's Works, Vol. VI. p. 381.

After this able and most circumstantial investigation, I think it would be a mere actum agere to enter farther into this discussion; all that the ancients, both Grecian and Roman, and all that the most intelligent of the moderns have produced, both for and against the argument stated above, has been both judiciously and candidly stated by Dr. Lardner; and it is not going too far to say, that few readers will be found who will draw conclusions different from those of Dr. Lardner, from the same premises.

As all the epistles of St. Paul have an evident object and occasion, it is natural to look for these in the Epistle to the Hebrews, as well as in those to other churches. We have already seen that it was most probably written to the converted Jews in Judea, who were then in a state of poverty, affliction, and persecution; and who, it appears, had been assailed by the strongest arguments to apostatize from the faith, and turn back to the poor elementary teaching furnished by the basic rites and ceremonies. That, in such circumstances, they might begin to halt and sever, will not appear strange to any considerate person: and that the apostle should wish to guard them against apostacy, by showing them that the religious system which they had embraced, was the completion and perfection of all those which had preceded it, and particularly of the Mosaic, is what might be naturally expected. This he has done in the most effectual and masterly manner; and has furnished them with arguments against their opponents which must have given them a complete triumph.

His arguments against backsliding or apostacy, are the most awful and powerful that can well be conceived; and are as applicable now to guard Christian believers against falling from grace, as they were in the apostolic times; and, from the general larisly in which most professors of religion hold their tenets, not less necessary.

A late sensible writer, Mr. Thomas Olivers, in a Discourse on chap. ii. 3. of this epistle, has considered this subject at large, and treated it with great cogency of reasoning, I shall borrow his Analysis of the different chapters, and a few of his concluding remarks; a perusal of the whole work will amply repay the serious reader. After one hundred and thirty six pages of previous discussion, he goes on thus:—

"I shall," says he, "sum up all that has been said upon the head, by giving a brief account of the occasion and manner of this epistle; and of the apostle's manner of reasoning thereon."

"The Christian religion being so contrary to the corrupt principles and practices of the world, those who embraced and propagated it, were on those accounts, rendered very often wherever they came. The consequence of this was, that heavy persecutions were raised against them in most places. The converted Hebrews, because they had turned their backs to the law of Moses, and embraced the religion of that Law whom their rulers had crucified, were exceedingly persecuted by their countrymen. Sometimes the unconverted Hebrews persecuted their converted brethren themselves; and at other times they stirred up the heathen who were round about them. By these means the believing Hebrews had a great light of afflictions, chap. x. 32. and were made gazing-stones by reproaches and afflictions, ver. 33. and experienced the spoiling of their goods, which for awhile they too loved, ver. 34. But this was not all: for, as the Christian religion was then a new thing in the world, it is natural to expect that the new converts had a great many scruples and reasonings in themselves concerning the lawfulness of what they had done in embracing it: and what added to these scruples, was the constant endeavour of the Judaizing teachers to lay stumbling-blocks in the way of these Hebrews, which they treated as offences, by means of their diverse and strange doctrines mentioned ch. xiii. 9. The consequence of this opposition, both from within and without, was, that great numbers of the Hebrews apostatized from Christ and his Gospel, and went back to the law of Moses; while the fluctuating state of the net gave the apostles too much reason to fear a general, if not a universal apostacy. Now this apparent danger was the occasion of this epistle; and the design of it was to prevent the threatened evil if possible.

"That this account is true, will fully appear from a more particular survey of the contents of the whole epistle:—

"Chap. i.—The apostle shows that all former dispensations were delivered to the world by men and angels, who were only servants in what they did; but that the Gospel salvation was delivered by Christ, who is the Son of God, and the Heir of all things. How naturally does he then infer the superiority of the Gospel over the law; and of consequence, the great absurdity of leaving the former for the sake of the latter.

"Chap. ii.—He obviates an objection which might be made to the superior excellency of Christ, on account of His humiliation. To this end he shows that this humiliation was necessary; that it was intended for many important purposes, viz. that we might be sanctified, ver. 11. that, through His death we might be delivered from death, ver. 14, 15. and that Christ, by experiencing our infirmities in His own person, might become a faithful and merciful High-priest, ver. 17, 18. The inference then is, that His taking our nature upon him, and dying therein, is no argument of His inferiority either to the prophets or to the angels; and therefore it is no excuse for those who apostatize from the Gospel for the sake of the law.

"Chap. iii.—Here Christ is particularly compared with Moses, and shown to be superior to him in many respects, viz. 1. Christ is shown to be the Great Builder of that house of which Moses is only a small part, ver. 3, 4. 2. Christ is set Son in His own house; but Moses was only as a servant in his Master's house, ver. 5. Therefore, Christ and his servants are superior to Moses and his law, and ought not to be neglected on account of that which is inferior to it. From ver. 7. of this chapter, to ver. 14. of chap. iv. the apostle shows the great danger of apostatizing from Christ, by the service which was passed on those who rebelled against Moses, and apostatized from his law.

"Chap. v.—Christ is compared to Aaron, and preferred to him on several accounts. As 1. Aaron offered for his own sake as well as for the sins of the people; but Christ offered only for the sins of others; having none of his own to offer for, ver. 3. 2. Christ was not a priest after the order of Aaron, out after the order of Melchisedeck, which was a superior order, ver. 10. Concerning Melchisedeck and Christ, the apostle observed, that, through the dulness of the Hebrews, here were some things which they could not easily understand, ver. 11—14.

“He therefore calls on them, chap. vi. to labour for a more perfect acquaintance therewith; withal promising them his ardent assistance, ver. 1—3. The necessity of their doing his, of their thus going on unto perfection, he enforced by the following consideration, that, if they did not go forward, they would be in danger of apostatizing in such manner as would be irrecoverable, ver. 7. 8. From thence to the end of the chapter, he encourages them to patience and perseverance, by the consideration of the love, oath, and faithfulness of God, and also by the example of their father Abraham.

“Chap. vii.—The apostle resumes the parallel between Melchisedeck and Christ, and shows they agree in title and descent, ver. 1—3, and then, from instances wherein the priesthood of Melchisedeck was preferable to the priesthood of Aaron, he infers the superiority of Christ's priesthood over that of Aaron, ver. 4—17. From thence to the end of the chapter, he shows that the priesthood of Aaron was only sub-ervient to the priesthood of Christ, in which it was consummated and abolished: and of consequence, that all those legal obligations were thereby abolished. How naturally then did he apostle infer the absurdity of apostatizing from the Gospel to the law, seeing they who did this not only left the greater for the lesser, but also left that which remained in full force, for the sake of that which was disannulled.

“Chap. viii.—Is employed partly in recapitulating what had been demonstrated before concerning the superior dignity of our great High-priest, ver. 1—5, and partly in showing the superior excellency of the new covenant, as established in Christ, and as containing better promises; ver. 6. to the end of the chapter. From this last consideration, the impropriety of going from the new covenant to the old is as naturally inferred as from any other of the aforementioned considerations.

“With the same view, the apostle, chap. ix. compares Christ and His priesthood, to the tabernacle of old, and to that the high-priest did therein, on the great day of atonement; in all things giving Christ the preference, from ver. 1 to the end.

“Chap. x.—The apostle sets down the difference between the legal sacrifices and the sacrifice of Christ; the legal sacrifices were weak, and could not put away sin, ver. 1—4; but the sacrifice of Christ was powerful, doing that which he other could not do, ver. 5—10.

“The next point of difference was between the legal priests who offered these sacrifices, and the High-priest of our profession. And, first, the legal priests were many; ours, is one. Secondly, they stood when they presented their offerings to God; Christ sits at the right-hand of His Father. Thirdly, they offered often; but Christ once for all. Fourthly, they, with all their offerings, could not put away the smallest sin; but Christ, by His one offering, put away all sin, ver. 11—18. Now, from all these considerations, the apostle infers the great superiority of the Gospel over the law: and, consequently, he impropriety of leaving the former for the latter.

“The next thing that the apostle does, is to improve his doctrine; this he does by showing that, for the reasons above given, the Hebrews ought to cleave to Christ, to hold fast their profession, and not to forsake the assembling themselves together, ver. 19—25. And, as a farther inducement to cleave to Christ, and to persevere unto the end, he urges the consideration of the difficulties which they had already overcome; and also of the love which they had formerly shown towards Christ and His Gospel, ver. 32—34. He also encouraged them not to cast away their confidence, seeing it had a great recompense of reward, which they should enjoy if they persevered unto the end, ver. 35—37. Another consideration which he urged was, that they ought not to depart from faith to the works of the law; because it is by faith that a just man liveth, and not by the works of the law; because God has no pleasure in those who draw back from faith in Him; and because every one who does this, exposes himself to eternal perdition, ver. 38—39.

“Another inducement which he laid before them, to continue to expect salvation by faith and patience, was the consideration of the powerful effects of these graces, as exemplified in the patriarchs of old, and the rest of the ancient worthies, chap. xi. throughout. This chapter; according to Mr. Terkins, depends on the former, thus; we may read in the former chapter, that many Jews, having received the faith, did give their names to Christ, did afterward fall away; therefore, towards the end of the chapter, there is a notable exhortation, tending to persuade the Hebrews to persevere in faith unto the end. Now, in this chapter, he continues the same exhortation; and the whole chapter, (as I take it) is nothing else, in substance, but one reason to urge the former exhortation to perseverance in faith; and the reason is drawn from the excellency of it; for this chapter, in divers ways, sets down what an excellent gift of God faith is; his whole scope, therefore, is manifest, to be nothing else but to urge them to persevere and continue in that faith, proved at large to be so excellent a thing.

he adds the example of Christ, chap. xii. 1—3; and, as to the afflictions they met with, on the Gospel's account, he tells them they ought not to be discouraged, and driven away from Christ, on their account, seeing they were signs of the Divine favour, and permitted to come upon them, merely for their good, ver. 4, 11. He then exhorts them to encourage one another to persevere in well-doing, ver. 12—14. To watch over one another, lest any of them fall from the grace of God, ver. 15—18. And seeing they were then in possession of privileges, Gospel privileges, such as the law of Moses could not give, he exhorts them to hold fast the graces they had, that thereby they might serve God, in such a manner as the great obligation they were under required, which alone would be acceptable to Him; and this they ought to do, the rather, because, if they did not, they would find God to be as much more severe to them, as His Gospel is superior to the law, ver. 19. to the end of the chapter.

“Chap. xiii.—He exhorts them, instead of apostatizing, to continue their brotherly affection one for another, ver. 1—3. To continue their purity of behaviour, their dependance on God, and their regard for their teachers, ver. 4—5. He exhorts them not to suffer themselves to be carried about, (from Christ and His Gospel,) by diverse and strange doctrines, but rather to strive to be established in grace; which they would find to be of more service to them, than running about after Jewish ceremonies, ver. 9. Again, he exhorts them to close up, and to follow Jesus without the camp, and continually to give praise to God, through Him, ver. 9—16. And, instead of turning away after seducers, that they might avoid persecution, and the scandal of the cross, he exhorts them to submit to, and obey, their own Christian teachers, and to pray for their success and welfare, ver. 17—19. Concluding the whole with some salutations, and a solemn benediction, from ver. 20, to the end.

“For, 1. As great temptations to prefer the law of Moses to the Gospel of Christ, was one circumstance which exposed them to the danger of apostasy, nothing could be more to the purpose than to show them, that the Gospel is superior to the law. Now we have seen how largely this argument is prosecuted in chap. i. ii. iii. v. vii. viii. ix. x. If we reduce it to form, it runs as follows:—No one ought to prefer that which is less excellent, to that which is more so. But the law is less excellent than the Gospel: therefore, none ought to prefer the law to the Gospel, by apostatizing from the latter to the former.

“2. Another argument, equally proper on such an occasion, is that taken from the consideration of the punishment, which all apostates are exposed to. This argument is urged chap. ii. 2, 3. iii. 7. to the end; iv. 1—14; vi. 4—8; x. 26—31; xii. 26, 28, 29. In most of these places, the apostle compares the punishment which will be inflicted on apostates from Christ and His Gospel, to that which was inflicted on the apostate Israelites of old; and he frequently shows, that the former will be far greater than the latter. This argument is as follows:—You ought not to do that which will expose you to as great, and greater punishment, than that which God inflicted on the rebellious Israelites of old: but total and final apostasy from Christ will expose you to this; therefore, you ought not to apostatize from Christ.

“3. Another argument proper on such an occasion, is that taken from the consideration of the great reward which God has promised to perseverance. This the apostle urges, chap. iii. 6—14; iv. 1—9; v. 9; vi. 9, 11; ix. 25; x. 35—39. This argument runs thus:—You ought to be careful to do that which God has promised greatly to reward; but He has promised you this, on condition of your perseverance in the Gospel of His Son; therefore, you ought to be careful to persevere therein.

“4. A fourth argument which must operate powerfully on such an occasion, is taken from the consideration of losing their present privileges by apostatizing. This argument is insisted on, chap. ii. 11, to the end; iii. 1; iv. 3—14; vi. 11; vii. 18—20; vii. 19; viii. 10, 12; ix. 14, 15; x. 14, 22; xi. 24, 28; xiii. 10, 14. This argument runs thus:—You ought not to do that, for which you will lose the Gospel's privileges you now enjoy; but if you apostatize from Christ and His Gospel, you will lose them; therefore, you ought not to apostatize from Christ, and His Gospel.

“5. A fifth argument, very proper in such a work, is taken from the consideration of their former zeal and diligence in cleaving to Christ, and in professing his religion. This argument is handled chap. vi. 10. x. 32—34. The argument here, is:—Those who have formerly been zealous in well-doing, ought not to grow weary, but rather to be steadfast therein unto the end. But you have formerly been zealous in your adherence to Christ, and in professing His religion; therefore, you ought not to grow weary of adhering to Christ, or of professing His religion.

“6. Another argument proper on such an occasion, is taken from the example of such persons as are held in very high esteem. Now this argument is urged, chap. vi. 12—15. xi. throughout, xii. 1—3. Here the argument is:—Whatever you esteem as an excellency in the example of holy men of old, you ought to imitate: but you esteem as an excellency in their example, that they were steadfast, and did not apostatize from which he reproves the ignorance and negligence of the Hebrews, in their mode of treating the Sacred Scriptures.—See ch. v. 11. and chap. vi.

The application of this part contains the following exhortations:—

1. That they should carefully retain their faith in Christ as the true Messiah, ch. x. 19—23.
2. That they should be careful to live a godly life, ver. 24, 25.
3. That they should take care not to incur the punishment of disobedience, ver. 32—37. and ch. xii. 3—12.
4. That they should place their whole confidence in God, live by faith, and not turn back to perdition, ch. x. 38—xii. 2.
5. That they should consider and imitate the faith and obedience of their eminent ancestors, ch. xi. 6. That they should take courage, and not be remiss in the practice of the true religion, ch. xii. 12—24.
7. That they should take heed not to despise the Messiah, now speaking to them from heaven, ch. xii. 25—29.

III. Practical and miscellaneous exhortations relative to sundry duties, ch. xiii.

All these subjects (whether immediately designed by the apostle himself, in this particular epistle; or in the whole of which the superiority of Christ, His Gospel, His priesthood, and His sacrifice, over Moses, the law, the Aaronic priesthood, and the various sacrifices prescribed by the law, is most clearly and convincingly shown.

Different writers have taken different views of the order in which these subjects are proposed; but most commentators have produced the same results.

For other matters relative to the author of the epistle, the persons to whom it was sent, the language in which it was composed, and the time and place in which it was written, the reader is referred to the Introduction, where these matters are treated in sufficient detail.

NOTES.—Verse 1. God, who at sundry times, and in divers manners We can scarcely conceive any thing more dignified than the opening of this epistle: the sentiments are exceedingly elevated, and the language harmony itself. The infinite God is at once produced to view, not in any of those attributes which are essential to the Divine nature; but in the manifestations of His love to the world, by giving a revelation of His will relative to the salvation of mankind; and thus preparing the way, through a long train of years, for the introduction of that most glorious Being, His own Son. This Son, in the fulness of time, was manifested in the flesh, that He might complete all vision and prophecy, supply all that was wanting to perfect the great scheme of revelation, for the instruction of the world; and then die to put away sin, by the sacrifice of Himself. The description which he gives of this glorious Personage, is elevated beyond all comparison. Even in His Humiliation, His suffering of death excepted, He is infinitely exalted above all the angelic host; is the object of their unceasing adoration; is permanent on His eternal throne, at the right hand of the Father; and from Him they all receive their commands to minister to those whom He has redeemed by His blood. In short, this first chapter, which may be considered the introduction to the whole epistle, is, for importance of subject, dignity of expression, harmony and energy of language, compression, and yet distinctness of ideas, equal, if not superior, to any other part of the New Testament.

Sundry times Πολυμερως, from πολυς, many, and μερος, a part; giving portions of revelation at different times.

Divers manners Πολυτροπως, from πολυς, many, and τροπος, a manner, turns, or form of speech; hence trope, a figure in rhetoric. Lambert Bae, supposes these words to refer to that part of music, which is denominated harmony; i. e. that general consent, or union of musical sounds, which is made up of different parts; and, understood in this way, it may signify the agreement, or harmony, of all the Old Testament writers; who, with one consent, gave testimony to Jesus Christ, and the work of redemption by Him. To him gave the prophets witness, that, through his name, whosoever believeth in Him, shall receive remission of sins, Acts x. 43. But it is better to consider with Kypke, that the words are either intended to point out the imperfect state of Divine revelation under the Old Testament: it was not complete; nor in it without the New, be considered a sufficiently ample discovery of the Divine will. Under the Old Testament, relations were made, πολυμερως και πολυτροπως, at various times, by various persons, in various laws and forms of teaching, with various degrees of clearness, under various shades, types, and figures; and with various modes of revelation, such as by angels, visions, dreams, mental impressions, &c.—See Numb. xii. 6, 7.—But, under the New Testament, it is done, απλως, simply, by one Person, I. e. Jesus, who has fulfilled the prophets, and completed prophecy: who is the xy, the truth, and the life; and the founder, mediator, and vernor, of His own kingdom.

One great object of the apostle is, to put the simplicity of a Christian system in opposition to the complex nature of a Jewish economy; and also to show, that what the law he hath appointed heir of all things, *by whom also he made the worlds;

3 Who being the brightness of His glory, and the express image of His substance, who upholds all things by the word of His power, could not do, because it was weak through the flesh, Jesus has accomplished by the merit of His death, and the energy of His Spirit.

Maximus Tyrinus, Diss. l. p. 7. has a passage where the very words employed by the apostle are found; and evidently used nearly in the same sense;—τη του ανθρωπου ψυχη ουσ οργανων οντων προς συσσει, του μεν πηλου, δι καλουμεν νουν, του δε πικιλου και πολυμεροδς και πολυτροποσ εσθσησσις καλουμεν. "The soul of man has two organs of intelligence, one simple, which we call mind; the other diversified, and acting in various modes, and various ways, which we term sense."

A similar form of expression the same writer employs in Diss. 16. pag. 171. "The city which is governed by the mob, is πολυφωνον τε ειναι και πολυμερη και πολυπαθη; full of noise, and is divided by various factions and various passions." The excellence of the Gospel above the law is here set down in three points:—1. God spake unto the faithful under the Old Testament by Moses and the prophets, worthy servants, yet servants: now the Son is much better than a servant, ver. 4. 2. Whereas the body of the Old Testament was long in compiling, being about a thousand years from Moses to Malachi; and God spake unto the Fathers by piecemeal, one while raising up one prophet, another while another; now sending them one parcel of prophecy or history, then another: but when Christ came, all was brought to perfection in one age. The apostles and evangelists were alive, some of them, when every part of the New Testament was completely finished. 3. The Old Testament was delivered by God in divers manners, both in utterance and manifestation; but the delivery of the Gospel was in a more simple manner; for, although there are various penmen, yet the subject is the same, and treated with nearly the same phraseology throughout, James, Jude, and the Apocalypse excepted.—See Leigh.

2. Last days) The Gospel dispensation, called the last days and the last time, because not to be followed by any other dispensation: or the conclusion of the Jewish church and state, now at their termination.

By his Son) It is very remarkable that the pronoun αυτου, his, is not found in the text; nor is it found in any MS. or Version. We should not, therefore, supply the pronoun as our translators have done; but simply read εν Υιω, by A Son, or εν υιω Son, whom he hath appointed heir of all things. God has many sons and daughters; for he is the Father of the spirits of all flesh; and He has many heirs; for, if sons, then heirs, heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Jesus Christ: but He has no Son who is heir of all things, none by whom He made the worlds, none in whom He speaks, and by whom He has delivered a complete revelation to mankind, but Jesus the Christ.

The apostle begins with the lowest state in which Christ has appeared. 1. His being a Son, born of a woman, and made under the law: he then ascends—2. To His being an Heir, and an Heir of all things. 3. He then describes Him as the Creator of all worlds. 4. As the Brightness of the Divine glory. 5. As the express Image of His person; or Character of the Divine substance. 6. As sustaining the immense are addressed by God the Father unto God the Son. Our translators have accordingly rendered the passage thus: "Thy throne, O God, is for ever." Those who deny the divinity of Christ, being eager to get rid of such a testimony against themselves, contend that ὁ Θεός is here the nominative, and that he means in, "God thy throne for ever." Now, it is somewhat strange, that none of them has had critical acumen enough to discover, that the words cannot possibly admit of this signification. It is a rule in the Greek language, that when a substantive noun is the subject of a sentence, and something is predicated of it; the article, if used at all, is prefixed to the subject, but omitted before the predicate. The Greek translators of the Old, and the authors of the New Testament, write agreeably to this rule. I shall first give some examples from the latter:

Θεός ἢ Ἄγγελος.—"The Word was God." John i. 1. Ὁ Λόγος ἠρξῆς ἐγένετο.—"The Word became flesh." John i. 14. Ὁ Θεός ἀγάπη ἐστίν.—"God is love." 1 John iv. 8. Ὁ Θεός ἰσὺς ἐστίν.—"God is light." 1 John i. 5.

If we examine the Septuagint Version of the Psalms, we shall find, that in such instances the author sometimes places the article before the subject, but that his usual mode is, to omit it altogether. A few examples will suffice:—

Ὁ Θεός ἡμῶν καταφυγή καὶ δύναμις.—"God is our refuge and strength." Psa. xli. 1. Κυρίως βοηθός μου.—"The Lord is my helper." Psa. xxviii. 7. Κυρίως γέγραμα μου, καὶ καταφυγή μου.—"The Lord is my firm support, and my refuge." Psa. viii. 2. Θεός μέγας Κύριος.—"The Lord is a great God." Psa. xcv. 3.

We see what is the established phraseology of the Septuagint, when a substantive noun has something predicated of it in the same sentence. Surely, then, we may be convinced, that if in Psa. xlv. ver. 6. the meaning which they who deny our Lord's Divinity affix, had been intended, it would rather have been written Θρόνος ἐν, ὁ Θεός, ἢ Θρόνος ἐν, Θεός. This our conviction will, if possible, be increased, when we examine the very next clause of this sentence; where we shall find, that the article is prefixed to the subject, but omitted before the predicate.

But it may be doubted, whether Θεός with the article affixed be ever used in the vocative case. Your doubt will be solved by reading the following examples, which are taken, not promiscuously from the Septuagint, but all of them from the Psalms.

Κρίνον ἄνους, ὁ Θεός.—"Judge them, O God." Psa. v. 10. Ὁ Θεός, ὁ Θεός μου.—"O God, my God." Psa. xxii. 1. Σεὶ ὁ Θεός, ὁ Θεός μου.—"Unto thee will I sing, O my God." Psa. ix. 17. Υψιστὸς εἶ, ὁ Θεός, μου.—"I will exalt thee, O my God." Psa. cxlv. 1. Κυρίε, ὁ Θεός μου.—"O Lord, my God." Psa. cty. 1.

I have now removed the only objection which can, I think, be started. It remains, that the Son of Mary is here addressed as the God, whose throne endures for ever.

If you should meet with any passage in the Psalms, where substantive nouns has a predicate in the same sentence, and the article is prefixed to both; then, indeed, my argument will be good for nothing. I know that a pronoun sometimes occurs with the article prefixed to its predicate; but I speak only of nouns substantive. H. S. BOVN.

The preceding remarks are original, and will be duly respected by every scholar.

2. I have showed my reasons in the note on Luke i. 35. why cannot close in with the common view of what is called the eternal Sonship of Christ. I am inclined to think that from his tenet Arianism had its origin. I shall here produce my authority for this opinion. Arius, the father of what is called Arianism, and who flourished in A. D. 300. was a presbyter of the church of Alexandria, a man of great learning and eloquence; and of deeply mortified manners; and he continued eddily the church by his teaching and example till the circumstance took place which produced that unhappy change in his religious sentiments, which afterwards gave rise to so much distraction and division in the Christian church. The circumstance to which I refer is related by Socrates Scholasticus, in his Supplement to the History of Eusebius, lib. l. c. 5. and is in substance as follows:—Alexander having succeeded chilian in the bishopric of Alexandria, self-confidently philosophizing one day in the presence of his presbyters and the rest of his clergy concerning the Holy Trinity, among other things asserted that there was a Monad in the Triad, ἰδιότητα πρὸς τὴν τῆς ἁγίας Τριάδος, ἐν Τριάδι Μονάδα εἶναι φιλοσοφῶν ἀδόλογοι. What he said on the derived nature or eternal Sonship of Christ is not related. Arius, one of his presbyters, a man of considerable skill in the science of logic, ἀπαρξὲ ἀρούρης τῆς διαλεκτικῆς λέχης, supposing that the bishop designed to introduce the dogmas of Sabellius, the Libyan, who deified the personality of the Godhead, and consequently the Trinity, sharply opposed the bishop, arguing thus: "If the Father begot the Son, He who was thus begotten had a signification of his existence: and from this it is manifest, that there was a time in which the Son was not. Whence it necessarily follows, that He has His subsistence from what exists not." The words which Socrates quotes are the following, of which the above is as close a translation as the different idioms will allow: Εἰ ὁ Πάτερ ἐγέννησε τὸν Υἱόν, ἀρχὴ ἤρξθη ἔσθαι ἐκ τῆς γένεσός: καὶ ἐὰν τούτῳ ὀλογοί, οἷσι μὴ ὄντι οὐκ

ἢ ὁ υἱός: ἀκολουθεῖ τε ἐξ ἀναγκῆς, ἐξ οὗ οὐκ ὄντων ἐχέει οὐκ ἔτι τὴν πνεύματι. Now, it does not appear that this had been previously the doctrine of Arius; but that it was the consequence which he logically drew from the doctrine laid down by the bishop; and although Socrates does not tell us what the bishop stated, yet, from the conclusions drawn, we may at once see what the premises were; and these must have been some incautious assertions concerning the Sonship of the Divine nature of Christ: and I have shown elsewhere that these are fair deductions from such premises. "But is not God called Father; and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ?" Most certainly. That God graciously assumes the name of Father, and acts in that character towards mankind, the whole Scripture proves: and that the title is given to Him as signifying Author, Cause, Fountain, and Creator, is also sufficiently manifest from the same Scriptures. In this sense He is said to be the Father of the rain, Job xxxviii. 28. and hence also it is said, He is the Father of spirits, Heb. xij. 9. and He is the Father of men, because He created them; and Adam, the first man, is particularly called His son, Luke iii. 38. But He is the Father of the human nature of our blessed Lord, in a peculiar sense, because by His energy this was produced in the womb of the virgin, Luke i. 35. The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee; THEREFORE also that HOLY THING WHICH SHALL BE BORN OF THEE shall be called THE SON OF GOD. It is in consequence of this that our blessed Lord is so frequently termed the Son of God, and that God is called His Father. But I know not any Scripture, fairly interpreted, that states the Divine nature of our Lord to be begotten of God, or to be the Son of God. Nor can I see it possible, that He could be begotten of the Father, in this sense, and be eternal; and if not eternal, he is not God. But numerous scriptures give Him every attribute of Godhead: His own works demonstrate it; and the whole scheme of salvation requires this. I hope I may say that I have demonstrated His supreme, absolute, and unoriginated Godhead, both in my note on Coloss. i. 16, 17. and in my Discourse on Salvation by Faith. And having seen that the doctrine of the eternal Sonship produced Arianism, and Arianism produced Socinianism, and Socinianism produces a kind of general infidelity, or disrespect to the Sacred Writings, so that several parts of them are rejected as being uncanonical, and the inspiration of a major part of the New Testament strongly suspected; I find it necessary to be doubly on my watch to avoid every thing that may, even in the remotest way, tend to so deplorable a catastrophe.

It may be said, "Is not God called the eternal Father? And if so, there can be no eternal Father, if there be no eternal Son." I answer, God is not called in any part of Scripture, as far as I can recollect, either the eternal or everlasting Father, in reference to our blessed Lord; nor indeed in reference to any thing else: but this very title, strange to tell, is given to Jesus Christ himself; His name shall be called the EVERLASTING FATHER, Isa. ix. 6. and we may on this account, with more propriety, look for an eternal filiation proceeding from Him, than from any other Person of the most Holy Trinity.

Should it be asked, "Was there no Trinity of Persons in the Godhead before the incarnation?" I answer, that a Trinity of Persons appears to me to belong essentially to the Eternal Godhead, neither of which was before, after, or produced from, another; and of this the Old Testament is full; but the distinction was not fully evident till the incarnation; and particularly till the baptism in Jordan, when on Him, in whom dwelt all the fulness of the Godhead, the Holy Ghost descended, in a bodily shape, like a dove: and a voice from heaven proclaimed that baptized Person God's beloved Son: in which transaction there were three Persons occupying distinct places; as the Person of Christ in the water; the Holy Spirit in a bodily shape; and the voice from heaven, sufficiently prove; and to each of these Persons various scriptures give all the essential attributes of God.

On the doctrine of the eternal Sonship of the Divine nature of Christ, I once had the privilege of conversing with the late reverend John Wesley, about three years before his death: he read, from a book in which I had written it, the argument against this doctrine, which now stands in the note on Luke i. 35. He did not attempt to reply to it; but allowed that, on the ground on which I had taken it, the argument was conclusive. I observed, that the proper essential Divinity of Jesus Christ appeared to me to be so absolutely necessary to the whole Christian scheme, and to the faith both of penitent sinners and saints, that it was of the utmost importance to set it in the clearest and strongest point of view: and that, with my present light, I could not credit it, if I must receive the common doctrine of the Sonship of the Divine nature of our Lord. He mentioned two eminent divines who were of the same opinion; and added, that the eternal Sonship of Christ had been a doctrine very generally received in the Christian church: and he believed no one had ever expressed it better than his brother Samuel had done in the following lines:—

"From Thee in one eternal now,
"Thy Son, Thy offspring flow'd;
And everlasting Father thou,
As everlasting God."

He added not one word more on the subject, nor ever after mentioned it to me, though after that we had many interviews. But it is necessary to mention his own note on the text, that has given rise to these observations; which shows that he held 12 Saying, "I will declare thy name unto my brethren, in the midst of the church will I sing praise unto thee.

13 And again, "I will put my trust in him, And again, "Behold I and the children which God hath given me.

14 Forasmuch then as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, I will declare thy name in the midst of the church will I praise thee.

15 For it became him, &c.—"Such has been the conduct of God in the great affair of our redemption; and the beauty and harmony of it will be apparent in proportion to the degree in which it is examined. For though the Jews dream of a temporal Messiah, as a scheme conducive to the Divine glory, it was expedient that in order to act worthy of Himself, He should take this method: He, for whom are all things, and by whom are all things; that glorious Being who is the first cause, and last end, of all; in pursuit of the great and important design He had formed, of conducting many, whom He is pleased to adopt as His sons, to the possession of that inheritance of glory intended for them: to make and constitute Jesus, His first-begotten and well-beloved Son, the Leader and Prince of their salvation; and to make Him perfect, or completely fit for the full execution of His office, by a long train of various and extreme sufferings, whereby He was, as it were, solemnly consecrated to it. Verse 11. Now, in consequence of this appointment, Jesus, the great Sanctifier, who engages and consecrates men to the service of God; and they who are sanctified, (i. e. consecrated and introduced to God with such acceptance,) are all of one family, all the descendants of Adam, and in a sense, the seed of Abraham; for which cause He is not ashamed to call them, whom he thus redeems, and presents to the Divine favour, His brethren. Verse 12. Saying, in the person of David, who represented the Messiah in His sufferings and exaltation, I will declare thy name to my brethren; in the midst of the church will I praise thee. Verse 13. And again, speaking as a mortal man, exposed to such exercises of faith in trials and difficulties as others were, He says in a Psalm which sets forth His triumph over His enemies, I will trust in Him, as other good men have done in all ages; and again, elsewhere in the person of Isaiah, Behold I, and the children which my God hath given me, are for signs and for wonders. Verse 14. Seeing then those whom He represents in one place and another, as the children of the same family with Himself, were partakers of flesh and blood, He himself in like manner participated of them, that thereby becoming capable of those sufferings, to which, without such an union with flesh, this Divine Sanctifier could not have been obnoxious, He might, by His own voluntary and meritorious death, abolish and depose him, who, by Divine permission, had the empire of death, and led it in his train when he made the first invasion on mankind; that is the devil, the great artificer of mischief and destruction; and at the beginning the murderer of the human race; who still seems to triumph in the spread of mortality, which is his work, and who may often, by God's permission, be the executioner of it. Verse 15. But Christ the great Prince of mercy and life, graciously interposed, that He might deliver those miserable captives of Satan, mankind in general, and the dark and idolatrous Gentiles in particular, who through fear of death, were, or justly might have been, all their lifetime obnoxious to bondage; having nothing to expect in consequence of it, if they rightly understood their state, but future misery; whereas now, changing their Lord, they have happily changed their condition; and are, as many as have believed in Him, the heirs of eternal life."

11. For, both he who sanctifies [flesh] The word εγιαζω does not merely signify one who sanctifies or makes holy, but one who makes atonement or reconciliation to God, and answers to the Hebrew כפר, caphar, to expiate: see Exod. xxix. 33—36. He that sanctifies is He that makes atonement; and they who are sanctified are they who receive that atonement; and being reconciled unto God, become His children by adoption, through grace.

In this sense our Lord uses the word, John xvii. 19. For their sakes I sanctify myself: υπερω αυτων εγιαζω εμαυτον, in their account I consecrate myself to be a sacrifice. This is the sense in which this word is used generally through this epistle.

Are all of one? ΕΙ εως νυν. What this one means has given rise to various conjectures; father, family, blood, seed, race, nature, have all been substituted: nature seems to be that intended, see ver. 14, and the conclusion of this verse confirms it. Both the Sanctifier and the sanctified, both Christ and His followers, are all of the same nature; for as the children were partakers of flesh and blood, i. e. of human nature, He partook of the same; and thus He was qualified to become a sacrifice for man.

He is not ashamed to call them brethren. Though as to His Godhead, He is infinitely raised above men and angels; yet as he has become incarnate notwithstanding his dignity, He blushes not to acknowledge all his true followers as His brethren.

12. I will declare thy name. See Psa. xxii. 22. The apostle certainly quotes this Psalm as referring to Jesus Christ; and those words as spoken by Christ unto the Father, in reference to His incarnation; as if he had said, "When I shall be incarnate, I will declare thy perfections to mankind; and among My disciples I will give glory to Thee for Thy mercy to the children of men." See the fulfilment of this, John 1. 18. No man hath seen God at any time; the only begotten Son, which is in the bosom of the Father, He hath declared Him. Nor were the perfections of God ever properly known or declared till the manifestation of Christ. Hear another scripture, Luke x. 21 and 22. In that hour Jesus rejoiced in spirit, and said, I thank Thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, that thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes, &c. Thus He gave praise to God.

13. I will put my trust in him. It is not clear to what express place of Scripture the apostle refers: words to this effect frequently occur; but the place most probably is Psa. xvii. 2, several parts of which Psalm, seem to belong to the Messiah.

Behold I and the children which God hath given me. This is taken from Isa. viii. 18. The apostle does not intend to say that the portions which he has quoted have any particular reference, taken by themselves, to the subject in question; they are only catch-words of whole paragraphs, which, taken together, are full to the point; because they are prophecies of the Messiah, and are fulfilled in Him. This is evident from the last quotation, behold I and the children whom the Lord hath given me are for signs and for wonders in Israel. Jesus and His disciples wrought multitude of the most stupendous signs and wonders in Israel. The expression also may include all genuine Christians: they are for signs and wonders throughout the earth. And as to the xviii. Psalm, the principal part of it seems to refer to Christ's sufferings; but the miracles which were wrought at his crucifixion, the destruction of the Jewish state and polity, the calling of the Gentiles, and the establishment of the Christian church, appear also to be intended. See among others the following passages:—SCRYMGEUR—The sorrows of death compassed me—in my distress I called upon the Lord. MIRACLES at the crucifixion—The earth shook and trembled—and darkness was under his feet. DASTARDLY of the Jewish state—I have pursued mine enemies and overtaken them: they are fallen under my feet. CALLING of the Gentiles—Thou hast made me head of the heathen; a people whom I have never known shall serve me; as soon as they hear of me they shall obey me, &c. &c. principal design of the apostle is to show that such scriptures are prophecies of the Messiah; that they plainly refer to His appearing in the flesh in Israel; and that they have all been fulfilled in Jesus Christ, and the calling of the Gentiles to the privileges of the Gospel. To establish these points was of great importance.

14. The children are partakers of flesh and blood. Since those children of God, who have fallen and are to be redeemed, are human beings; in order to be qualified to redeem them, by suffering and dying in their stead, He himself likewise took part of the same; He became incarnate: and thus, He who was God with God, became man with men. By the children here we are to understand not only the disciples, and all genuine Christians, as in ver. 13, but also the whole human race: all Jews and all Gentiles: so John xi. 51, 52. He prophesied that Jesus should die for that nation; and not for that nation only, but also that he should gather together in one, the children of God that were scattered abroad: meaning, probably, all the Jews in every part of the earth. But collect this with 1 John ii. 2. where the evangelist explains the former words, He is the propitiation for our sins, (the Jews) and not for ours only, but for the sins of the whole world. As the apostle was writing to the Hebrews only, he in general uses a Jewish phraseology, pointing out to them their own privileges; and rarely introduces the Gentiles, or what the Messiah has done for the other nations of the earth.

That through death. That by the merit of His own death, which making atonement for sin, and procuring the almighty energy of the Holy Spirit, should counterwork, cancel, or, as render useless and ineffectual, all the operations of Him who had the power, sparus, or influence, to bring death into the world: so that death, which was intended by him who was a murderer from the beginning, to be the final ruin of mankind, becomes the instrument of their exaltation and endless glory; and thus the death, brought in by Satan, is counterworked, and rendered ineffectual by the death of Christ.

Him that had the power of death. This is spoken in conformity to an opinion prevalent among the Jews, that there was a certain fallen angel who was called ruach yehonai hamaveth, the angel of death, i. e. one who had the power of separating the soul from the body, when God decreed that the person should die. There were two of these, according to some of the Jewish writers; one was the angel of death to the Gentiles, the other to the Jews. Thus Tbb Saecrete, fol. 31. "There are two angels which preside over death; one is over those who die out of the land of Israel, and his name is Samael: the other is he who presides over those who die in the land of Israel, and this is Gabriel." Samael is a common name for the devil among the Jews; and there is a tradition among them, delivered by the author of Pesikta rabbeisha in Yalcut Simoni, par. 2. f. 56. that the angel of death should be destroyed by the Messiah! "Satan said to the holy blessed God, Lord of the world show me the Messiah. The Lord answered, Come and see Him. And when he had seen Him, he was terrified, and his countenance fell, and he said, Most certainly this is the Messiah, who shall cast me and all the nations into hell, as it is written, Isa. xxv. 8. The Lord shall swallow up death for ever." This is a very remarkable saying, and the apostle shows that it is true; for the Messiah came to destroy him who had the power of death. Dr. Owen has made some collections on this head from other Jewish writers, which tend to illustrate this verse: they may be seen in his Comment, Vol. 1. pag. 456. 5vo edition.

17 Wherefore in all things it behoved him to be made like unto his brethren, that he might be a merciful and faithful

h. Or. he taketh not hold of angels, but of the seed of Abraham he taketh hold.

15. And deliver them who through fear of death] It is very likely that the apostle has the Gentiles here principally in view. As they had no revelation, and no certainty of immortality, they were continually in bondage to the fear of death. They preferred life in any state, with the most grievous evils, to death, because they had no hope beyond the grave. But it is also true, that all men naturally fear death: even those that have the fullest persuasion and certainty of a future state, dread it; genuine Christians, who know that if the earthly house of their tabernacle were dissolved, they have a house not made with hands, a building framed of God, eternal in the heavens; only they fear it not. In the assurance they have of God's love, the fear of death is removed: and by the purification of their hearts through faith, the sting of death is extracted. The people who know not God, are in continual torment through the fear of death; and they fear death because they fear something beyond death. They are conscious to themselves that they are wicked; and they are afraid of God, and terrified at the thought of eternity. By these fears, thousands of sinful, miserable creatures are prevented from hurrying themselves into the unknown world. This is finely expressed by the poet:—

— "To die,—to sleep,—

No more:—and, by a sleep, to say we end
The heart-ache, and the thousand natural shocks
That flesh is heir to,—'tis a consummation
Devoutly to be wished. To die,—to sleep,—
To sleep!—perchance to dream!—aye, there's the rub;
For in that sleep of death what dreams may come,
When we have shuffled off this mortal coil,
Must give us pause:—There's the respect
That makes calamity of so long life:
For who would bear the whips and scorns of time,
The oppressor's wrong, the proud man's contumely,
The pangs of despised love, the law's delay,
The insolence of office, and the spurns
That patient merit of the unworthy takes,
When he himself might his quietus make
With a bare bodkin? Who would fardels bear,
To grunt and sweat under a weary life;
But, that the dread of something after death,—
The undiscovered country from whose boorne
No traveller returns,—puzzles the will;
And makes us rather bear those ills we have,
Than fly to others that we know not of?
This conscience does make cowards of us all;
And thus the native hue of resolution
Is sicklied o'er with the pale cast of thought;
And enterprises of great pith and moment,
With this regard, their currents turn awry,
And lose the name of action."

I give this long quotation from a poet who was well acquainted with all the workings of the human heart; and one who could not have described scenes of distress and anguish of mind so well, had he not passed through them.

16. For verily he took not on him the nature of angels] Ον γαρ ουπωσιν αγγελων επιλαβενται, αλλα εσσημαρος Αβρααμ επιλαβενται. Moreover, he doth not at all take hold of angels; but of the seed of Abraham he taketh hold. This is the marginal reading, and is greatly to be preferred to that in the text. Jesus Christ intending not to redeem angels, but to redeem man, did not assume the angelic nature, but was made man, coming directly by the seed or posterity of Abraham, with whom the original covenant was made, that in his seed all the nations of the earth should be blessed; and it is on this account, that the apostle mentions the seed of Abraham, and not the seed of Adam; and it is strange that so many commentators should have missed so obvious a sense. The word high priest in things pertaining to God, to make reconciliation for the sins of the people.

18 For, in that he himself hath suffered being tempted, he is able to succour them that are tempted.

1 Phil. 2. 7.—on Ch. 4. 15 & 5. 1, 2.—on Ch. 4. 15, 16 & 5. 2 & 7. 25.

Itself signifies not only to take hold of, but to help, succour, save from sinking, &c. The rebel angels, who signed and fell from God, were permitted to fall down, alle donee, as one of our old writers expresses it, till they fell into perdition—man sinned and fell, and was falling down, alle donee; but Jesus laid hold on them, and prevented them from falling into endless perdition. Thus he seized on the falling human creature, and prevented him from falling into the bottomless pit: but he did not seize on the falling angels, and they fell down into outer darkness. By assuming the nature of man, he prevented this final and irrecoverable fall of man: and by making an atonement in human nature, he made a provision for its restoration to its forfeited blessedness. This is a fine thought of the apostle, and is beautifully expressed. Man was falling from heaven: and Jesus caught hold of the falling creature, and prevented his endless ruin. In this respect he prefers men to angels; and probably for this simple reason, that the human nature was more excellent than the angelic: and it is suitable to the wisdom of the Divine Being to regard all the works of His Hands in proportion to the dignity or excellence with which he has endowed them.

17. Wherefore in all things] Because He thus laid hold on man, in order to redeem him; it was necessary that He should in all things become like to man, that He might suffer in his stead, and make an atonement in his nature.

That he might be a merciful and faithful high-priest. Ίνα ελεημων γυνται; that he might be merciful; that He might be affected with a feeling of our infirmities; that partaking of our nature, with all its innocent infirmities and afflictions, He might know how to compassionate poor, afflicted, suffering man. And that He might be a faithful high-priest in those things which relate to God, whose justice requires the punishment of the transgressors, or a suitable expiation to be made for the sins of the people. The proper meaning of λαοσποστας ρας απαριτας, is, to make propitiation or atonement for sins, by sacrifice.—See the note on this word, Luke xviii. 13. where it is particularly explained. Christ is the Great High-priest of mankind; 1. He exercises Himself in the things pertaining to God, taking heed that God's honour be properly secured, His worship properly regulated, His laws properly enforced; and both His justice and mercy magnified. Again, 2. He exercises Himself in things pertaining to men, that He may make an atonement for them, apply this atonement to them, and liberate them thereby from the curse of a broken law, from the guilt and power of sin, from its in-being and nature, and from all the evils to which they were exposed through it. And, lastly, that He might open their way into the holiest by His own blood: and He has mercifully and faithfully accomplished all that He has undertaken.

18. For in that he himself hath suffered] The maxim on which this verse is founded, is the following: a state of suffering disposes persons to be compassionate; and those who endure most afflictions are they who feel most for others. The apostle argues that, among other causes, it was necessary that Jesus Christ should partake of human nature, exposed to trials, persecutions, and various sufferings; that He might the better feel for, and be led to succour those who are afflicted and sorely tried. This sentiment is well expressed by a Roman poet:—

Me quoque per multas similis fortuna labores
Jactatam hac demum sensit consolator terra:
Nunc ignara mali, miseris succurrere disco.
Vna. Æn. I. v. 632

"For I myself, like you, have been distressed,
Till heaven afforded me this place of rest:
Like you, an alien, in a land unknown,
I learn to pity woes so like my own."—DRAKE.

"There are three things, says Dr. Owen, of which tempted believers do stand in need;—1. Strength to withstand their temptations. 2. Consolation to support their spirits under them. 3. Reasonable deliverance from them. Unto these is the succour afforded by our High-priest suited; and it is variously administered to them:—1. By His word or promises; and, 2. By His Spirit: (and that, 1. By communicating to them supplies of grace, or spiritual strength: 2. Strong consolation: 3. By rebuking their tempters and temptations;) and, 3. By His providence disposing of all things to their good and advantage in the issue." Those who are peculiarly tempted, and severely tried, have an especial interest in, and claim upon Christ. They, particularly, may go with boldness to the throne of grace, where they shall assuredly obtain mercy, and find grace to help in time of need. Were the rest of the Scripture silent on this subject, this verse might be an ample support for every tempted soul.

CHAPTER III.

Jesus is the High-priest of our profession, 1. And is counted worthy of more honour than Moses, as the Son is more worthy than the servant, 2-4. We should not harden our hearts against the voice of God, as the Israelites did, and were excluded from the earthly rest in Canaan, 7-11. We should be on our guard against unbelief, 12. And eschew each other, lest we be hardened through the deceitfulness of sin; and should hold fast the beginning of our confidence to the end, and not provoke God as the Israelites did, and who were destroyed in the wilderness, 13-17. They were promised the earthly rest, but did not enter because of unbelief, 18, 19. [A. M. cir. 4067. A. D. cir. 63. An. Olymp. cir. CCL. 3 A. U. C. cir. 816.]

WHEREFORE, holy brethren, partakers of <sup>a</sup> the heavenly calling, consider <sup>b</sup> the Apostle and high-priest of our profession, Christ Jesus;
 2 Who was faithful to him that <sup>c</sup> appointed him, as also <sup>d</sup> Moses was faithful in all his house.

NOTES.—Verse 1. Holy brethren] Persons consecrated to God, as the word literally implies; and called, in consequence, to be holy in heart, holy in life, and useful in the world. The Israelites are often called a holy people, saints, &c. because consecrated to God; and because they were bound by their profession to be holy; and yet these appellations are given to them in numberless instances, where they were very unholy. The not attending to this circumstance, and the not discerning between actual positive holiness, and the call to it, as the consecration of the persons, has led many commentators and preachers into destructive mistakes. Antinomianism has had its origin here: and as it was found that many persons were called saints, who, in many respects, were miserable sinners, hence it has been inferred that they were called saints in reference to a holiness which they had in another: and hence the Antinomian imputation of Christ's righteousness to unholty believers, whose hearts were abominable before God: and whose lives were a scandal to the Gospel. Let, therefore, a due distinction be made between persons, by their profession holy, i. e. consecrated to God: and persons who are faithful to that profession, and are both inwardly and outwardly holy. They are not all Israel who are of Israel; a man, by a literal circumcision, may be a Jew outwardly: but the circumcision of the heart, by the Spirit, makes a man a Jew inwardly. A man may be a Christian in profession, and not such in heart: and those who pretend, that although they are unholy in themselves, they are reputed holy in Christ, because His righteousness is imputed to them, most awfully deceive their own souls.

Dr. Owen has spoken well on the necessity of personal holiness against the Antinomians of his day. "If a man be not made holy, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God. It is this that makes them meet for the inheritance of the saints in light; as without it, they are not meet for their duty, so are they not capable of their reward. Yea, heaven itself, in the true light and notion of it, is undesirable to an un sanctified person. Such an one neither can, nor would, enjoy God if he might. In a word, there is no one thing required of the sons of God, that an un sanctified person can do, and no one thing promised unto them that he can enjoy."

"There is surely then a woful mistake in the world. If Christ sanctify all whom he saves, many will appear to have been mistaken in their expectations at another day. It is grown amongst us almost an abhorrence to all flesh to say, The church of God is to be holy. What! though God has promised that it should be so; that Christ has undertaken to make it so? What! if it is required to be so? What! if all the duties of it be rejected of God, if it be not so? It is all one: if men be baptized, whether they will or not, and outwardly profess the name of Christ, though not one of them be truly sanctified, yet they are, as it is said, the church of Christ. Why, then, let them be so; but what are they the better for? Are their persons or their services, therefore, accepted with God? Are they related, or united to Christ? Are they under His conduct unto glory? Are they meet for the inheritance of the saints in light? Not at all: not all, nor any of these things do they obtain thereby. What is it, then, that they get by the furious contest, which they make for the reputation of this privilege? Only this; that, satisfying their minds by it, resting, if not priding themselves in it, they obtain many advantages to stifle all convictions of their condition, and so perish unavoidably. A sad success, sad for ever to be bewailed! Yet is there nothing at all at this day more contended for, in this world, than that Christ might be thought to be a Captain of salvation to them unto whom He is not a sanctifier; that He may have an unholy church, a dead body. These things tend neither to the glory of Christ, nor to the good of the souls of men. Let none, then, deceive themselves; sanctification is a qualification indispensably necessary to them who will be under the conduct of the Lord Christ unto salvation: He leads none to heaven but whom He sanctifies on earth. The Holy God will not receive unholy persons. This living Head will not admit of dead members; nor bring men into possession of a glory which they neither love nor like."

Heavenly calling] The Israelites had an earthly calling; they were called out of Egypt to go into the Promised Land: Christians have a heavenly calling; they are invited to leave the bondage of sin, and go to the kingdom of God. These were made partakers of this calling: they had already embraced the Gospel, and were brought into a state of salvation.

Apostle and High-priest of our profession] Among the Jews, the high-priest was considered to be also the speaker of God; and it is in conformity to this notion that the apostle speaks. And he exhorts the Hebrews to consider Jesus Christ to be both their High-priest and Apostle; and to expect these offices to be henceforth fulfilled by Him, and by Him alone. This was the fullest intimation that the Mosaic economy was at an end; and the priesthood changed. By τὴν ἀποστολίαν αὐτοῦ, our profession, or that confession of ours, the apostle undoubtedly means the Christian religion. Jesus was the Apostle of the Father, and has given to mankind the New Covenant: and we are to consider the whole system of Christianity as coming immediately from Him. Every system of religion must have a priest and a prophet; the one to declare the will of God, the other to minister in holy things. Moses was the apostle under the Old Testament, and Aaron the priest. When Moses was removed, the prophets succeeded him, and the sons of Aaron were the priests after the death of their father. This system is now annulled; and Jesus is the Prophet who declares the Father's will; and He is the Priest who ministers in the things pertaining to God; see chap. 8. 17. as He makes atonement for the sins of the people, and is the Mediator between God and man.

2 Who was faithful to him] In Numb. xli. 7. God gives this testimony to Moses, My servant Moses—i. e. faithful in all my house; and to this testimony the apostle alludes. House not only means the place where a family dwells, but also the family itself. The whole congregation of Israel was the house, or family of God, and God is represented as dwelling among them; and Moses was his steward, and was faithful in the discharge of his office; strictly enforcing the Divine rights; zealously maintaining God's honour; carefully delivering the mind and will of God to the people; proclaiming His promises, and denouncing His judgments, with the most inflexible integrity, though often at the risk of his life. Jesus Christ has His house; the whole great family of mankind; for all of whom He offered His sacrificial blood to God: and the Christian church, which is especially His see household, is composed of His own children and servants; among and in whom He lives and constantly resides. He has been faithful to the trust reposed in Him, as the Apostle of God; He has faithfully proclaimed the will of the Most High; vindicated the Divine honour against the corruption of God's worship; testified against them at the continual hazard of His life; and at last not only died as a victim to cancel sin, but also as a martyr to His faithfulness. Christ's faithfulness, says Leigh, consists in this: "That he has fully revealed unto us the doctrine of the Gospel, as Moses did that of the law; and that He hath faithfully performed and fulfilled all the types of Himself, and all the things signified by Moses's ceremonies, as Moses hath faithfully and distinctly set them down."

But there is a sense given to the word מוֹדֵעַ wise man, Numb. xli. 7. which we translate faithful, by several of the Jewish writers, which is well worthy of note: it signifies, say they, "One to whom secrets are confided, and the utmost confidence of their being safely and conscientiously kept." The secret of God was with Moses; but all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge were in Christ. Life and immortality were, comparatively, secrets, till Christ revealed and illustrated them; and even the Divine Nature was but little known, and especially the Divine philanthropy, till Jesus Christ came: and it was Jesus alone who declared that God whom no man had ever seen. Moses received the secrets of God, and faithfully taught them to the people: Jesus revealed the whole will of God to mankind. Moses was thus faithful to a small part of mankind; viz. the Jewish people: but, in this sense, Jesus was faithful to all mankind; for he was the light to enlighten the Gentiles, and the glory of his people Israel.

3 For this man was counted] As Jesus Christ, in the character of Apostle and High-priest, is here intended, the word apostle, or this Person, or Personage, should have been supplied, if any, instead of man. Indeed the pronoun he should have been translated this person, and this would have referred immediately to Jesus Christ, ver. 1.

More glory than Moses] We have already seen that the apostle's design is to prove that Jesus Christ is higher than the angels, higher than Moses, and higher than Aaron. That

5 And Moses verily was faithful in all his house, as a servant; for a testimony of those things which were to be spoken after;

6 But Christ as a son over his own house; whose house we are, if we hold fast the confidence and the rejoicing of hope firm unto the end.

as Ver. 5.—Exod. 14. 31. Num. 12. 7. Deut. 2. 24. Josh. 1. 2. & 2. 31.—Deut. 18. 18. 19.—2. Cor. 1. 1.—1. Cor. 2. 16. & 6. 19. 2. Cor. 9. 18. Eph. 2. 8. & 1. Tim. 3. 16. Ps. 8. 6.

He is higher than the angels, has been already proved: that He is higher than Moses, He is now proving. He who hath builded the house;—there can be no doubt that man who builds a house for his own accommodation, is more honourable than the house itself; but the house here intended is the church of God. This church, here called a house or family, is built by Christ; He is the Head, Governor, Soul, and Life of it; He must, therefore, be greater than Moses, who was only a member and officer in that church; who never put a stone in this spiritual building, but was even himself put in it by the great Architect. Moses was in this house, and faithful in this house; but the house was the house of God, and builded and governed by Christ.

4. For every house is builded by some man. The literal sense is plain enough: "Every structure plainly implies an architect, and an end for which it was formed. The architect may be employed by him for whose use the house is intended; but the efficient cause of the erection is that which is here to be regarded." The word house, here, is still taken in a metaphorical sense as above, it signifies family, or church. Now, the general meaning of the words, taken in this sense is, "Every family has an author, and a head or governor. Man may found families, civil and religious communities, and be the head of these; but God alone is the Head, Author, and Governor, of all the families of the earth; He is the Governor of the universe. But the apostle has a more restricted meaning in the words ra savra, all these things; and as he is here treating of the Jewish and Christian churches, so it appears to have them in view here. Who could found the Jewish and Christian church but God? Who could support, govern, influence, and defend them, but Himself? Communities, or societies, whether religious or civil, may be founded by man; but God alone can build His own church. Now, as all these things could be builded only by God; so He must be he who has built all these things. But as Jesus is the Founder of the church, and the Head of it, the word God seems here to be applied to Him; and several eminent scholars and critics bring this very text as a proof of the Supreme Deity of Christ; and the apostle's argument seems to require this; or, as he is proving that Christ is preferred before Moses, because He built this house, which Moses could not do; were it to be understood as intimating that this house was built by another, viz. the Father, his whole argument would fall to the ground; and for all this, Moses might be equal, yes, superior to Christ. On this ground Dr. Owen properly concludes:—This, then, is that which the apostle intends to declare; namely, the ground and reason whence it is that the house was, or could be, in that glorious manner, built by Christ, even because He is God, and so able to effect it; and by this effect of His power, He is manifested as so to be."

5. As a servant. The fidelity of Moses was the fidelity of a servant; he was not the framer of that church or house; he was employed under God to arrange and order it; he was toward to the Builder and Owner.

For a testimony of those things. Every ordinance under the law was typical; every thing bore a testimony to the things which were to be spoken after; i. e. to Jesus Christ, His suffering, death, and the glory which should follow; and His Gospel in all its parts. The faithfulness of Moses consisted in His scrupulous attention to every ordinance of God; in framing every thing according to the pattern showed him by the Lord; and His referring all to that Christ of whom he spoke as the Prophet, who should come after him, and should be raised up from among themselves; whom they should attentively hear and obey, on pain of being cut off from being the people of the Lord. Hence our Lord told the Jews, John

46. If ye had believed Moses, ye would have believed me, for he wrote of me; "namely," says Dr. Macknight, "in the figures, but especially in the prophecies of the Law, here the Gospel dispensation, the coming of its Author, and its character as Messiah, are all described, with a precision which adds the greatest lustre of evidence to Jesus, and to His Gospel."

6. But Christ as a son over his own house. Moses was faithful as a servant in the house; Jesus was faithful as the first-born Son, over the house of which He is the Head and Governor. Here, then, is the conclusion of the argument in reference to Christ's superiority over Moses.—Moses did not found the house or family; Christ did: Moses was but in the house, or one of the family; Christ was over the house as its ruler: Moses was but servant in the house; Christ was the owner and Head: Moses was in the house of Another; Christ in His own house.

It is well known to every learned reader, that the pronoun αυτου, without an aspirate, signifies His, simply; and that with the aspirate, αυτου, it signifies his own: the word being, in this form, a contraction, not uncommon, of αυτου. If we read αυτου without the aspirate, then his must refer to God, ver. 4.

7 Wherefore, (as the Holy Ghost saith, To-day if ye will hear his voice,

8 Harden not your hearts, as in the provocation, in the day of temptation in the wilderness;

9 When your fathers tempted me, proved me, and saw my works forty years as Ver. 14. Mat. 10. 26. & 24. 12. Rom. 2. 2. Col. 1. 22. Ch. 2. 11. & 10. 25.—2. Tim. 2. 2. Acts 1. 16.—1. Ver. 15. Psalms 78. 7.—Deut. 4. 15. & 10. 16. 1—4. Deut. 11. 8. 5. & 28. 6.

But Christ as a son over his—(that is, God's) house: if we read αυτου with the aspirate, as some editions do, then what is spoken refers to Christ; and the words above convey the same sense as those words, Acts xx. 28. Feed the church of God, which he has purchased with his own blood. Some editions read the word thus; and it is evident that the edition which our translators used had the word αυτου his own; and not αυτου his. The Spanish and London Polyglots have the same reading. From the most ancient MSS. we can get no help to determine which is to be preferred, as they are generally written without accents. The two first editions of the Greek Testament, that of Complutum, 1514, and that of Brunswe, 1516, have αυτου his; and they are followed by most other editions; but the celebrated edition of Robert Stephens, 1650, has αυτου his own. The reading is certainly important; but it belongs to one of those difficulties in criticism which, if the context or collateral evidence do not satisfactorily solve, it must remain in doubt; and every reader is at liberty to adopt which reading he thinks best.

Whose house are we? We Christians are His church and family: He is our Father, Governor, and Head.

If we hold fast the confidence. We are now His church; and shall continue to be such, and be acknowledged by Him, if we maintain our Christian profession, την σπουδαίαν, that liberty of access to God, which we now have; and the rejoicing of the hope, i. e. of eternal life, which we shall receive at the resurrection of the dead. The word σπουδαίαν, which is here translated confidence, and which signifies freedom of speech, liberty of access, &c. seems to be used here to distinguish an important Christian privilege. Under the Old Testament no man was permitted to approach to God: even the very mountain on which God published His laws, must not be touched by man nor beast; and only the high-priest was permitted to enter the holy of holies; and that only once a year, on the great day of atonement; and even then he must have the blood of the victim to propitiate the Divine justice. Under the Christian dispensation the way to the holiest is now laid open; and we have, σπουδαίαν, liberty of access, even to the holiest, by the blood of Jesus. Having such access unto God, by such a Mediator, we may obtain all that grace which is necessary to fit us for eternal glory; and, having the witness of His Spirit in our heart, we have a well-grounded hope of endless felicity, and exult in the enjoyment of that hope. But if we retain not the grace, we shall not inherit the glory.

7. Wherefore, (as the Holy Ghost saith, To-day) These words are quoted from Psa. xcv. 7. and as they were written by David, and attributed here to the Holy Ghost, it proves that David wrote by the inspiration of God's Holy Spirit. As these words were originally a warning to the Israelites not to provoke God, lest they should be excluded from that rest which He had promised them; so the apostle uses them here, to persuade the Christians in Palestine to hold fast their religious privileges, and the grace they had received, lest they should come short of that state of future glory which Christ had prepared for them. The words strongly imply, as indeed does the whole epistle, the possibility of falling from the grace of God, and perishing everlastingly; and without this supposition, these words, and all such like, which make more than two thirds of the whole of Divine Revelation, would have neither sense nor meaning. Why should God entreat man to receive His mercy, if He have rendered this impossible? Why should he exhort a believer to persevere, if it be impossible for him to fall away? What contemptible quibbling have men used to maintain a false and dangerous tenet, against the whole tenor of the word of God! Angels fell—Adam fell—Solomon fell—and multitudes of believers have fallen, and, for aught we know, rose no more; and yet we are told that we cannot finally lose the benefits of our conversion! Satan preached this doctrine to our first parents: they believed him—sinned—and fell; and brought a whole world to ruin!

8. Harden not your hearts. Which ye will infallibly do, if ye will not hear His voice.

Provocation. Παραπικρασις, from παπα, signifying intensity, and πικρασις, to make bitter; the exasperation, or bitter provocation. "The Israelites provoked God, first in the wilderness of Sin, (Pelusium,) when they murmured for want of bread, and had the manna given them, Exod. xvi. 4. From the wilderness of Sin, they journeyed to Rephidim, where they provoked God a second time, for want of water, and insolently saying, Is the Lord among us or not? Exod. xvii. 2—9. on which account the place was called Massah and Meribah.—See 1 Cor. x. 4. Note 1. From Rephidim they went into the wilderness of Sinai, where they received the law, in the beginning of the third year from their coming out of Egypt. Here they provoked God again, by making the golden calf, Exod. xxxii. 10. After the law was given, they were commanded to go directly to Canaan, and take possession of the Promised Land, Deut. 1. 6. God spake unto us in Merab, ay be read with one interrogation: But who were those arers that did bitterly provoke, but all those who came out Egypt by Moses? This mode of reading is followed by my editions, and by Chrysostom and Theodoret, and by several learned moderns.—It is more likely that this is the true reading, as all that follows, to the end of the 18th verse, is a series of interrogations.

Should it be said, that all did not provoke, for Joshua and Caleb expressly excepted, I answer, that the term all may with great propriety used, when, out of many hundreds thousands, only two persons were found who continued faithful. To these also we may add the priests and the whole tribe of Levi, who, it is very likely, did not provoke; for, as Macknight very properly remarks, they were not of the number of those who wore to fight their way into Canaan; being entirely devoted to the service of the sanctuary.—See ver. 1, 3, 45, and 49. And therefore what remained of them forty years, no doubt entered Canaan: for it appears in Numb. xxiv. 17, and Josh. xxiv. 33, that Eleazar the son Aaron, was one of those who did take possession of Canaan, which it be still said, our version appears to be most proper, cause all did not provoke; it may be answered that the noun reading rest, some, is one contracted in its meaning comprehend the hundreds of thousands who did rebel.

17. But with whom was he grieved forty years? I believe was Balaamites who first observed, that "the apostle, in the tenth forty years, elegantly alludes to the space of time which had elapsed since the ascension of our Lord, till the time in which this epistle was written, which was about forty years." But this does not exactly agree with what appears to be the exact date of this epistle. However, God had been a long time provoked by that race rejecting the promised Messiah, as He was by the conduct of their forefathers in the wilderness: and as that provocation was punished by a very signal judgment, so they might expect this to be punished also. The analogy was perfect in the crimes: it might reasonably be expected to be so in the punishments. And was not the destruction of Jerusalem a proof of the heinous nature of their crimes, and of the justice of God's poured wrath?

Whose carcasses fell? ὄντα τα κτλα σπέρν; whose members; for τα κτλα properly signifies the members of the body; I here may be an allusion to the scattered bleached bones this people that were a long time apparent in the wilderness; continuing there as a proof of their crimes, and of the merits of God.

8. To whom were he God never acts by any kind of cace: whenever He pours out His judgments, there are the positive reasons to vindicate His conduct.

those whose carcasses fell in the wilderness were they who sinned. And those who did not enter into his rest, were those who believed not. God is represented here as swearing that y should not enter in: in order to show the determinate will of this purpose, the reason on which it was founded, the height of the aggravation which occasioned it.

9. So we see that they could not enter in? It was no decree God that prevented them; it was no want of necessary exert to enable them, it was through no deficiency of Divine counsel to instruct them; all these they had in abundance: but they chose to sin, and would not believe. Unbelief produced disobedience, and disobedience produced hardness of heart and blindness of mind: and all these drew down the judgments of God, and wrath came upon them to utterance.

This whole chapter, as the epistle in general, reads a most full lesson against backsliders, triflers, and loiterers in the way of salvation. Every believer in Christ is in danger of apostacy, while any remains of the evil heart of unbelief are found in him. God has promised to purify the heart; and the blood of Christ cleanses from all sin. It is, therefore, the highest wisdom of genuine Christians to look to God for the complete purification of their souls; this they cannot have too soon; and for this they cannot be too much in earnest.

2. No man should defer his salvation to any future time.—If God speaks to-day, it is to-day that He should be heard and obeyed. To defer reconciliation to God, to any future period, is the most reprehensible and destructive presumption. It supposes that God will indulge us in our sensual propensities; and cause His mercy to tarry for us, till we have consummated our iniquitous purposes. It shows, that we prefer at least for the present, the devil to Christ; sin to holiness; and earth to heaven. And can we suppose that God will be thus mocked? Can we suppose that it can at all consist with His mercy to extend forgiveness to such abominable provocation? What a man sows, that shall he reap. If he sows to the flesh, he shall of the flesh reap corruption. Reader, it is a dreadful thing to fall into the hands of the living God.

3. Unbelief has generally been considered the most damning of all sins. I wish those who make this assertion would condescend to explain themselves. What is this unbelief that damns and ruins mankind? Their not permitting their minds to be persuaded of the truths which God speaks.—Απιστία, from α, negative, and πιστις, faith, signifies faithless, or to be without faith. And this is an effect from another cause. In chap. iv. 11. these very people are said to have fallen through unbelief: but there the word is ἀσπίστια, from α, negative, and πιστω, to persuade. They heard the Divine instructions; they saw God's stupendous miracles; but they would not suffer themselves to be persuaded, that he who said and did such things, would perform those other things which he had either threatened or promised; hence they had no faith, because they were unpersuaded; and their unbelief was the effect of their unpersuaded or unpersuadable mind. And their minds were not persuaded of God's truth, because they had ears open only to the dictates of the flesh. See on chap. iv. 2. Here then is the damning sin, the not inferring from what God has said and done, that He will do those other things, which He has either threatened or promised. And how few are there, who are not committing this sin daily! Reader, dost thou, in this state, dream of heaven! Awake out of sleep!

4. Where there are so many snares and dangers, it is impossible to be too watchful and circumspect. Satan, as a roaring lion, as a subtle serpent, or in the guise of an angel of light, is momentarily going about, seeking whom he may deceive, blind, and devour; and, when it is considered that the human heart, till entirely renewed, is on his side, it is a miracle of mercy that any soul escapes perdition: no man is safe any longer than he maintains the spirit of watchfulness and prayer; and to maintain such a spirit, he has need of all the means of grace. He who neglects any of them which the mercy of God has placed in His power, tempts the devil to tempt him. As a preventative of backsliding and apostacy, the apostle recommends mutual exhortation. No Christian should live for himself alone; he should consider his fellow Christian as a member of the same body, and feel for him accordingly: and love, succour, and protect him. When this is carefully attended to in religious society, Satan finds it very difficult to make an inroad on the church; but when coldness, distance, and a want of brotherly love, take place, Satan can attack each singly; and by successive victories over individuals, soon make an easy conquest of the whole.

CHAPTER IV.

the Christian rest is to be obtained by faith, we should beware of unbelief, lest we lose it as the Hebrews did theirs, 1. The reason why they were not brought into the rest promised to them, 2. The rest promised to the Hebrews was a type of that promised to Christians, 3-10. Into this rest we should earnestly labour to enter, 11. A description of the word of God, 12, 13. OTES.—Verse 1. Let us therefore fear! Seeing the Israelites lost the rest of Canaan, through obstinacy and unbelief, let us be afraid lest we come short of the heavenly rest, through the same cause.

Should seem to come short of it? Lest any of us should actually come short of it; i. e. miss it.—See the note on the verb to seem, Luke viii. 18. What the apostle had said before, relative to the Rest, might be considered as an allegory; he explains and applies that allegory, showing that Canaan was a type of the grand privileges of the Gospel of Christ, and of the glorious eternity to which they lead.

ome short? The verb εσπειν, is applied here metaphorically; it is an allusion, of which there are many in this epistle, to races in the Grecian games! he that came short, was he who was any distance, no matter how small, behind the winner.

Will it avail any of us how near we go to heaven, if the race be shut before we arrive? How dreadful the thought, to only miss being eternally saved! To run well: and yet to permit the devil, the world, or the flesh, to hinder, in the few last steps! Reader, watch and be sober.

2. For unto us was the Gospel preached? Καὶ γὰρ εὐαγγελισθημεν, For we also have received good tidings; as well as they. They had a gracious promise of entering into an earthly rest; we have a gracious promise of entering into a heavenly rest. God gave them every requisite advantage; He has done the same to us. Moses and the elders spoke the word of God plainly and forcibly to them; Christ and His apostles have done the same to us. They might have persevered; so may we: they disobeyed, disobeyed, and fell; and so may we.

But the word preached did not profit them? Ἄλλ' οὐκ ἐπέληθεν ὁ λόγος τῆς ἀκοῆς αὐτοῖς; but the word of hearing did not profit them. The word and promise to which the apostle most probably refers, is that in Deut. i. 20, 21. Ye are come unto the mountain of the Amorites, which the Lord your God doth give unto us. Behold, the Lord thy God hath set the land

3 For we which have believed do enter into rest, as he said, 'As I have sworn in my wrath, if they shall enter into my rest: although the works were finished from the foundation of the world.

4 For, he spake in a certain place of the seventh day on this wise, 'And God did rest the seventh day from all his works.

5 And in this place again, 'If they shall enter into my rest.

6 Seeing therefore it remaineth that some must enter therein, & Ch. 3. 14.—Psalm 115. 11. Ch. 2. 11.—Gen. 2. 2. Exodus 35. 11. & 31. 17.—1 Ch. 2. 19.

before thee; go up and possess it as the Lord God of thy fathers hath said unto thee.—Fear not. Many exhortations they had to the following effect—Arise, that we may go up against them; for we have seen the land, and beheld it is very good: and are ye still? Be not slothful to go and to enter to possess the land; for God hath given it into your hands: a place where there is no want of any thing that is in the earth, Judges xviii. 9, 10. But instead of attending to the word of the Lord by Moses, the whole congregation murmured against him and Aaron, and said one to another, Let us make a captain, and let us return unto Egypt, Num. xiv. 2, 4. But they were dastardly through all their generations. They spoke evil of the pleasant land, and did not give credence to His word. Their minds had been debased by their Egyptian bondage, and they scarcely ever arose to a state of mental nobility.

Not being mixed with faith in them that heard? There are several various readings in this verse, and some of them important. The principal are on the word mixed; which, in the common text, refers to ἄμεικτος, the word mixed; but in ABCD, and several others, it is ἁμιγνόμενος, referring to, and agreeing with εὐαγγέλιον, and may be thus translated, The word of hearing did not profit them, they not being mixed with those who heard it by faith. That is, they were not of the same spirit with Joshua and Caleb.—There are other variations, but of less importance; but the common text seems the best.

The word ἁμιγνόμενος, mixed, is peculiarly expressive; it is a metaphor taken from the nutrition of the human body by mixing the aliment taken into the stomach with the saliva and gastric juice; in consequence of which it is concocted, digested, reduced into chyle; which, absorbed by the lacteal vessels, and thrown into the blood, becomes the means of increasing and supporting the body; all the solids and fluids being thus generated: so that on this process, properly performed, depend (under God) strength, health, and life itself. Should the most nutritive aliment be received into the stomach, if not mixed with the above juices, it would be rather the means of death than of life; or, in the words of the apostle, it would not profit, because not thus mixed. Faith, in the word preached, in reference to that God who sent it, is the grand means of its becoming the power of God to the salvation of the soul. It is not likely that he who does not credit a threatening when he comes to hear it, will be deterred by it from repeating the sin against which it is levelled; nor can he derive comfort from a promise, who does not believe it as a pledge of God's veracity and goodness. Faith, therefore, must be mixed with all that we hear, in order to make the word of God effectual to our salvation.

This very use of the word, and its explanation, we may find in Maximus Tyrius, in his description of Health, Dissect. x. pag. 101. "Health," says he, "is a certain disposition, ἄμεικτος ἐστὶν ἡμετέρας καὶ ψυχῶν καὶ θερμῶν ὀργανῶν, ἢ τοῦ τεχνῆς συνεραθεῖσθαι τῶν κρύων, ἢ τοῦ φθόνου ἀρμόστῶν τεχνῆων, which consists in a proper mixture together of the wet and the dry, the cold and the hot, either by an artificial process, or by the skilful economy of nature."

3. For we which have believed do enter into rest? The great spiritual blessings, the fore-runners of eternal glory, which were all typified by that earthly rest or felicity promised to the ancient Israelites, we, Christians, do, by believing in Christ Jesus, actually possess. We have peace of conscience, and joy in the Holy Ghost: are saved from the guilt and power of sin; and thus enjoy an inward rest.

But this is a rest differing from the seventh day's rest, or sabbath, which was the original type of Canaan, the blessings of the Gospel, and eternal glory; seeing God said concerning the unbelieving Israelites in the wilderness, I have sworn in my wrath that they shall not enter into my rest, notwithstanding the works of creation were finished, and the seventh day's rest was instituted, from the foundation of the world; consequently the Israelites had entered into that rest, before the oath was sworn.—See Macknight.

We who believe, Οἱ πιστεύοντες, is omitted by Chrysostom, and some few MSS. And instead of εἰσερχομεθα yap, for we do enter; A.C. several others, with the Vulgate and Coptic, read εἰσερχομεθα οὖν, therefore let us enter; and thus it answers to φωβηθῶμεν οὖν, therefore let us fear, ver. 1. but this reading cannot well stand, unless ἠπιστεύοντες be omitted, which is acknowledged to be genuine by every MS. and Version of note and importance. The meaning appears to be this: we Jews, who have believed in Christ, do actually possess that rest, state of happiness in God, produced by peace of conscience and joy in the Holy Ghost; which was typified by the happiness and comfort to be enjoyed by the believing Hebrews, in the possession of the Promised Land.—See before.

From the foundation of the world.] The foundation of the world, καταβολῆς κόσμου, means the completion of the work of and they to whom it was first preached, entered not in because of unbelief:

7 (Again, he limiteth a certain day, saying in David, To-day, after so long a time; as it is said, 'To-day if ye will hear his voice, harden not your hearts.

8 For, if Jesus had given them rest, then would he not afterward have spoken of another day.

9 There remaineth therefore a rest to the people of God. Or, the Gospel was first preached.—1 Pet. 2. 7. Ch. 2. 7.—That a Joshua—1 Or, keeping of a Sabbath.

creation in six days. In those days was the world, i. e. the whole system of mundane things, begun and perfected; and this appears to be the sense of the expression in this place.

4. For he spake in a certain place.] This certain place, or somewhere, ἄλλο, is probably Gen. ii. 2. and refers to the completion of the work of creation, and the setting apart the seventh day as a day of rest for man; and a type of everlasting felicity.—See the notes on Gen. ii. 1, &c.

5. And in this place again.] In the ninety-fifth Psalm, already quoted, ver. 3.—This was a second rest which the Lord promised to the believing obedient seed of Abraham; and as it was spoken of in the days of David, when the Jews actually possessed this long-promised Canaan, therefore it is evident that that was not the rest which God intended, as the next verse shows.

6. It remaineth that some must enter therein.] Why our translators put in the word must here, I cannot even conjecture: I hope it was not to serve a system, as some have since used it: "some must go to heaven, for so is the doctrine of the decree; and there must be certain persons selected brought thither; as a reward to Christ for His sufferings; and in this the will of man, and free agency, can have no part." &c. &c. Now, supposing even that all this was true, yet it does not exist either positively or by implication in the text. The words εἰς οὐρανὸν ἀποδιδόντες τὴν ψυχάν σου, literally translated, are as follows, Giving then it remaineth for some to enter into it; or, Whereas therefore it remaineth that some enter into it, which is Dr. Owen's translation; and they to whom it was first preached, ἵνα σπέρμας εὐαγγελιστῆρας, they to whom the promise was given; they who first received the good tidings; i. e. the Israelites, to whom the promise was made of entering into the rest of Canaan, did not enter in, because of their unbelief; and the promise still continued to be repeated even in the days of David; therefore some other rest must be intended.

7. He limiteth a certain day.] The term day signifies not only time in general, but also present time, and a particular space. Day, here, seems to have the same meaning as rest, in some other parts of this verse. The day, or time of rest relative to the ancient Jews, being over and past, and a long time having elapsed between God's displeasure shown to the disobedient Jews in the wilderness, and the days of David; and the true rest was not enjoyed, God in His mercy has instituted another day; has given another dispensation of mercy and goodness by Christ Jesus; and now it may be said, as formerly, To-day if ye will hear His voice, harden not your hearts. God speaks now as He spoke before; His voice is in the Gospel, as it was in the law. Believe, love, obey, and ye shall enter into this rest.

8. For if Jesus had given them rest.] It is truly surprising that our translators should have rendered the ἵνα of the text Jesus, and not Joshua, which is most clearly intended. They must have known that the ἵνα Yahshua of the Hebrew, which we write Joshua, is every where rendered Jesus, Jesus, by the Septuagint; and it is their reading which the apostle follows. It is true the Septuagint generally write Ἰησοῦς; Navv, or Ἰωσ Νάβ, Jesus Navv, or Jesus, son of Navv; for it is thus they translate בן נון יהושע Yahshua ben Nun, Joshua the son of Nun; and this is sufficient to distinguish it from Jesus, son of David. But as Joshua, the captain-general of Israel, is above intended, the word should have been written Joshua, and not Jesus. One MS. nearly to prevent the wrong application of the name, has Ἰησοῦς ἰω Νάβ, Jesus the son of Navv. Theodoret has the same in his Comment; and one Syriac Version has it in the text. It is Joshua in Coverdale's Testament, 1535, in Tindale's, 1541, in that edited by Edmund Beck, 1549, in Richard Cawdrey's, Rouen, 1565; several modern translators, Wesley, Macknight, Wakefield, &c. read Joshua, as does our own in the margin. What a pity it had not been in the text, as all the smaller Bibles have no marginal readings; and many simple people are bewildered with the expression.

The apostle shows that, although Joshua did bring the children of Israel into the Promised Land, yet this could not be the intended rest; because, long after this time, the Holy Spirit, by David, speaks of this rest: the apostle, therefore, concludes—

9. There remaineth therefore a rest to the people of God.] It was not, 1. The rest of the sabbath; it was not, 2. The rest in the Promised Land, for the Psalmist wrote long after the days of Joshua: therefore there is another rest, a state of blessedness, for the people of God; and this is the Gospel, the blessings it procures and communicates, and the eternal glory which it prepares for, and has promised to genuine believers.

There are two words in this chapter which we indifferently translate rest; κατάπαυσις, and σαββατισμός; the first signifying a cessation from labour, so that the weary body is raised

10 For he that is entered into his rest, he also hath ceased from his own works, as God did from his.
11 Let us labour therefore to enter into that rest, lest any man fall after the same example of unbelief.

in Ch. 3. 12, 15, 18.—a Or, disobedience.—b Isa. 49. 2. Jer. 23. 23. 2 Cor. 10. 18, 19. 1 Pet. 1. 23.

and refreshed: the second meaning not only a rest from labour, but a religious rest; a rest of a sacred kind, of which both soul and body partake. This is true, whether we understand the rest as referring to Gospel blessings, or to eternal felicity, or to both.

10. For he that is entered into his rest! The man who has believed in Christ Jesus, has entered into His rest; the state of happiness which He has provided, and which is the forerunner of eternal glory.

Hath ceased from his own works! No longer depends on the observance of Mosaic rites and ceremonies for his justification and final happiness. He rests from all these works of the law as fully as God has rested from His works of creation.

Those who restrain the word rest to the signification of eternal glory say, that ceasing from our own works means the sufferings, tribulations, afflictions, &c. of this life; as in Lev. xiv. 13. I understand it as including both.

In speaking of the sabbath, as typifying a state of blessedness in the other world, the apostle follows the opinions of the Jews of his own and after times. The phrase שבת שבתה שבתה shabbath shalach, or shabbath tithah; the sabbath above, and the sabbath below, is common among the Jewish writers; and they think that where the plural number is used, as in Lev. xiv. 30. Ye shall keep my sabbaths, that the lower and higher sabbaths are intended; and that the one is prescribed by the other.—See many examples in Schoetgen.

11. Let us labour therefore! The word εὐσχομεσθαι implies every exertion of body and mind which can be made, a reference to the subject. Rebus actis omissis, hoc agamus; all things else omitted, this one thing we do. We receive grace, improve grace, retain grace, that we may obtain eternal glory.

Lest any man fall! Lest he fall off from the grace of God, from the Gospel and its blessings; and perish everlastingly. This is the meaning of the apostle, who never supposed that man might not make final shipwreck of faith, and of a good conscience, as long as he was in a state of probation.

12. For the word of God is quick and powerful! Commentators are greatly divided concerning the meaning of the phrase εἰς ἑαυτοῦ ῥοήσας ὁ λόγος, the word of God; some supposing he whose of Divine Revelation to be intended; others, the doctrine of the Gospel faithfully preached; others, the mind of God, or the Divine intellect; and others, the Lord Jesus Christ, who is thus denominated, in John 1. 1, &c. and Rev. ix. 13. the only places in which He is thus incontestably characterized in the New Testament. The disputed text, John v. 7. I leave at present out of the question. In the introduction to this epistle I have produced sufficient evidence to make it very probable that St. Paul was the author of this epistle. In this sentiment the most eminent scholars and critics are now agreed. That Jesus Christ, the eternal uncreated Word, is not meant here, is more than probable, from this consideration, that St. Paul, in no part of his thirteen acknowledged epistles, ever thus denominates our blessed Lord: nor is he thus denominated by any other of the New Testament writers except St. John. Dr. Owen has endeavoured to prove the contrary, but believe, to no man's conviction who was able to examine and judge of the subject. He has not been able to find more than two texts, which even appeared to look his way: the first is Act. 1. 2. Us—which were eye-witnesses and ministers, or ἑαυτοῦ, of the word; where it is evident the whole of our Lord's ministry is intended. The second is Acts xx. 32. I commend you to God, and the word of his grace, where nothing but the gracious doctrine of salvation by faith, the influence of the Divine Spirit, &c. &c. can be meant; nor is there any legitimate mode of construction with which I am acquainted, by which the words, in either place, can be personally applied to our Lord. That the phrase was applied to designate the second substance in the glorious Trinity, by the late and rabbinical writers, I have already proved in my notes on John 1. where such observations are alone applicable. Calwest, who had read all that either the ancients or moderns have said on this subject, and who does not think that Jesus Christ is here intended, speaks thus: "None of the properties mentioned here can be denied to the Son of God, the Eternal Word; He sees all things, knows all things, penetrates all things, and can do all things. He is the Ruler of the heart, and can turn it when he pleases. He enlightens the soul, and calls it gently and efficaciously, when and how He will. Finally, He punishes in the most exemplary manner the iniquity covered to his Father and to Himself, by Infidels, unbelievers, and the wicked in general. But it does not appear that the Divine Logos is here intended.—1. Because St. Paul can not use that term to express the Son of God. 2. Because on comparison yes, for, shows that this verse is an inference from the preceding, where the subject in question is concerning the eternal rest, and the manner by which it is to be obtained. It therefore, more natural to explain the term the word of God, and will of God; for the Hebrews represent the verbum of God as an active being, living, all-wise, all-merciful, illumined, executing vengeance, discerning and

12 For the word of God is quick, and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit, and of the joints and marrow; and is a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart.

penetrating all things." Thus Wind. xvi. 26. "Thy child, O Lord, know that it is not the giving of fruits that nourisheth man; but that it is Thy word that preserveth them that put their trust in Thee."—See Deut. viii. 3. That is, the Sacred Scriptures point out and appoint all the means of life. Again, speaking of the Hebrews, who were bitten by the fiery serpents, the same writer says, ver. 12. 'For it was neither herb nor mollifying plaster that restored them to health, but Thy Word, O Lord, which healeth all things; i. e. which describes and prescribes the means of healing. And, it is very likely, that the purpose of God, sending the destroying angel to slay the first-born in Egypt, is intended by the same expression, Wind. xviii. 15, 16. 'Thine Almighty word leaped down from heaven out of thy royal throne, as a fierce man of war into a land of destruction; and brought Thine unfeigned commandment as a sharp sword; and, standing up, slew all things with death.' This, however, may be applied to the eternal Logos, or uncreated Word.

"And this mode of speech is exactly conformable to that of the prophet Isaiah, lv. 10, 11. where to the word of God spoken by His prophets, the same kind of powers are attributed as those mentioned here by the apostle.—For as the rain cometh down and the snow from heaven, and returneth not thither, but watereth the earth, and maketh it bring forth and bud, that it may give seed to the sower, and bread to the eater: so shall my word be as that which sows forth out of my mouth; it shall not return unto me void; but it shall accomplish that which I please, and it shall prosper in the thing whereto I sent it. The centurion seems to speak a similar language, Luke vii. 7. But say in a word, εἰς ἅρα εὐρε λόγος, speak to thy word, and my servant shall be healed." This is the sum of what this very able commentator says on this subject.

"The word of God, which promises to the faithful an entrance into God's rest, in David's time, and now to us, is not a thing which died, or was forgotten as soon as it was uttered, but it continues, one and the same to all generations. It is con, quick, or living. So Isaiah says, The word of our God shall stand for ever, chap. xl. 8. compare chap. li. 6. lv. 11. 1 Esdras iv. 33. John iii. 24. 1 Pet. 1. 23. And powerful, εὐργός, efficacious, active; sufficient, if it be not actually hindered, to produce its effects.—affectual, Philon. 6. See 2 Cor. x. 4. 1 Thes. ii. 13. And sharper than any two-edged sword, penetrates deeper into a man than any sword; it enters into the soul and spirit; into all our sensations, passions, appetites; nay, to our very thoughts; and sits us judge of the most secret intentions, contrivances, and sentiments of the heart. Phocylides has an expression very similar to our author, where he says of reason, 'that it is a weapon which penetrates deeper into a man than a sword.'—See also Isa. xl. 4. Eph. vi. 17. Rev. 1. 16. 16.

"Piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit. When the soul is thus distinguished from the spirit, by the former is meant that inferior faculty by which we think of, and desire, what concerns our present being and welfare. By spirit is meant a superior power, by which we prefer future things to present; by which we are directed to pursue truth and right above all things; and even to despise what is agreeable to our present state, if it stand in competition with, or is prejudicial to, our future happiness.—See 1 Thes. v. 23. Some have thought that by the expression before us is implied that the word of God is able to bring death; as in the case of Ananias and Sapphira; for, say they, if the soul and spirit, or the joints and marrow, are separated one from another, it is impossible that life can remain. But perhaps the meaning of the latter clause may rather be, 'It can divide the joints, and divide the marrow;' i. e. enter irresistibly into the soul, and produce some sentiment which perhaps it would not willingly have received; and sometimes discover and punish secret, as well as open, wickedness." Mr. Pierce observes, "that our author has been evidently arguing from a tremendous judgment of God upon the ancient Israelites, the ancestors of those to whom this epistle is directed; and, in this verse, to press upon them that care and diligence he had been recommending, he sets before them the efficacy and virtue of the word of God, connecting this verse with the former by a for in the beginning of it; and, therefore, it is natural to suppose that what he says of the word of God may have a relation to somewhat remarkable in that sore punishment of which he had been speaking, particularly to the destruction of the people by lightning, or fire from heaven.—See Lev. x. 1—5. Numb. xl. 1—5. xvi. 36. Psa. lxxviii. 21. All the expressions, in this view, will receive an additional force; for nothing is more quick and living, more powerful and irresistible, sharp and piercing, than lightning. If this idea be admitted, the meaning of the last clause in this verse will be, 'The word of God is a judge to condemn and punish the evil thoughts and intents of the heart.' And this brings the matter home to the exhortation with which our author began, ch. iii. 12, 13. for under whatever disguise they might conceal 13 * Neither is there any creature that is not manifest in his sight: but all things are naked and opened unto the eyes of him with whom we have to do.

themselves; yet, from such tremendous judgments as God executed upon their fathers, they might learn to judge as Moses did, Numb. xxxii. 23. *If ye will not do so, ye have sinned against the Lord: and be sure your sin will find you out.—See Hammond, Whitby, Sykes, and Pierce.**

Mr. Wesley's note on this verse is expressed with his usual precision and accuracy:

"For the word of God—preached, ver. 2. and armed with threatenings, ver. 3. is living and powerful; attended with the power of the living God, and conveying either life or death to the hearers; sharper than any two-edged sword; penetrating through, and laying open, the soul and spirits, joints and marrow—the inmost recesses of the mind, which the apostle beautifully and strongly expresses by this heap of figurative words: and is a discernor—not only of the thoughts—but also of the intentions."

The law, and the word of God in general, is repeatedly compared to a two-edged sword among the Jewish writers, חרב שמים חרב שמים חרב שמים, the sword with the two mouths. By this sword, the man himself lives; and by it, he destroys his enemies. This is implied in its two edges.—See also Schoettgen.

In a discernor of the thoughts) Καὶ εἰρησὶν ἐνθυμησῶν καὶ ἐπινοῶν καρδίας, is a critic of the propensities and suggestions of the heart. How many have felt this property of God's word, where it has been faithfully preached! How often has it happened that a man has seen the whole of his own character, and some of the most private transactions of his life, held up as it were to public view, by the preacher; and yet the parties absolutely unknown to each other! Some, thus exhibited, have even supposed that their neighbours must have privately informed the preacher of their character and conduct: but it was the word of God, which, by the direction and energy of the Divine Spirit, thus searched them out, was a critical examiner of the propensities and suggestions of their hearts; and had pursued them through all their public haunts and private ways. Every genuine minister of the Gospel has witnessed such effects as these under his ministry, in repeated instances.

But while this effect of the word or true doctrine of God is acknowledged, let it not be supposed that it, of itself, can produce such effects. The word of God is compared to a hammer that breaks the rock in pieces, Jer. xxiii. 29.—but will a hammer break a stone unless it is applied by the skill and strength of some powerful agent? It is here compared to a two-edged sword;—but will a sword cut or pierce to the dividing of joints and marrow, or separation of soul and spirit, unless some hand push and direct it? Surely, no. Nor can even the words and doctrine of God produce any effect but as directed by the experienced teacher, and applied by the spirit of God. It is an instrument the most apt for the accomplishing of its work; but it will do nothing, can do nothing, but as used by the heavenly Workman. To this is the reference in the next verse.

13. Neither is there any creature that is not manifest) God, from whom this word comes, and by whom it has all its efficacy, is infinitely wise. He well know how to construct His word, so as to suit it to the state of all hearts; and he has given that infinite fineness of meaning, so as to suit it to all cases. And so infinite is He in His knowledge, and so omnipresent in He, that the whole creation is constantly exposed to His view; nor is there a creature of the affections, mind, or imagination, that is not constantly under His eye: He marks every rising thought; every budding desire; and such as these are supposed to be the creatures to which the apostle particularly refers; and which are called, in the preceding verse, the propensities and suggestions of the heart.

But all things are naked and opened) Πάντα ἄνεκα καὶ ἀνεκάλυπτα. It has been supposed that the phraseology here is sacrificial; the apostle referring to the case of slaying and preparing a victim to be offered to God. First, it is slain; 2. It is flayed—so it is naked; 3. It is cut open, so that all the intestines are exposed to view: 4. It is carefully inspected by the priest, to see that all is sound, before any part is offered to Him who has prohibited all imperfect and diseased offerings; and, 5. It is divided exactly into two equal parts, by being split down the chine, from the nose to the rump; and so exactly was this performed, that the spinal marrow was cloven down the centre, one half lying in the divided cavity of each side of the back-bone. This is probably the metaphor in 2 Tim. ii. 15. where see the note.

But there is reason to suspect that this is not the metaphor here: the verb ἀνεκάλυπτα, from which the apostle's ἀνεκάλυπτα comes, signifies to have the neck bent back, so as to expose the face to full view, that every feature might be seen; and this was often done with criminals, in order that they might be the better recognized and ascertained. To this custom Pliny refers in the very elegant and important panegyric which he delivered to the emperor Trajan, about A. D. 103, when the emperor had made him consul; where, speaking of the great attention which Trajan paid to the public morals, 14 Seeing then that we have a great High Priest that is passed into the heavens, Jesus the Son of God, let us hold fast our profession.

and the care he took to extirpate informers, &c. he says, Nihil tamen gratiæ, nihil sæculis dignitatis, quam quod cessit depuer interi delaturo supra ora, retinensque cervicem. Agnoscebamus et fruebatur, cum velut pœnitentia publica sollicitudinis victimæ, supra sanguines martirum ad lenta supplicia gravioreque pœnas decerneretur. Plin. Paneg. cap. 34. "There is nothing, however, in this act, which affects us more pleasingly, nothing more deservedly, than to behold from above the supine faces and reverted necks of the informers. We thus knew them; and were gratified, when, as expiatory victims of the public disquietude, they were led away to lingering punishments and suffering more terrible than even the blood of the guilty."

The term was also used to describe the notion of avengers, who, when they could, got their hand under the chin of their antagonists, and thus, by bending both the head and neck, could the more easily give them a fall. This stratagem is sometimes seen in ancient monuments; but some suppose that it refers to the custom of dragging them by the ear Diogenes, the philosopher, observing one who had been victor in the Olympic games, often fixing his eyes upon a certain man, said, in allusion to this custom, Ἐγὼν ἀπεκρίσθη ἐξ ἐμοῦ τοῦ ἄρχοντος ἀποκρίσθη ῥαχνηλίστρα. "See how this mighty champion (martial ram) is drawn by the neck by a common girl."—See Stanley, pag. 305.

With whom we have to do.) Πρὸς τὸν ἵπτον ὁ λόγος; to whom we must give an account. He is our Judge, and is well qualified to be so, as all our hearts and actions are naked and open to Him.

This is the true meaning of λόγος in this place; and it is used in precisely the same meaning in Matt. xii. 26. xliii. 21. Luke xvi. 2. Rom. xiv. 12. so then, every one of us, ἵνα δώσῃ, shall give an account of himself to God. And Heb. xliii. 17. They watch for your souls, ὡς λόγος ἀντιδωσούσιν, as those who must give account. We translate the word with whom we have to do; which, though the phraseology is obsolete, yet the meaning is nearly the same. Ἐξ ἵπτον ἄνεκα καὶ ἀνεκάλυπτα is the rendering of my old MS. and Wink of whom we speak, is the Version of our other MS. translators.

14. Seeing then that we have a great High-priest) It is extended, and very properly, that the participle οὗ, which we translate seeing, as if what followed was an immediate inference from what the apostle had been speaking, should be translated whom; as the apostle, though he had before mentioned Christ as the High-priest of our profession, chap. ii. 1. and as the High-priest who made reconciliation for iniquities of the people, chap. ii. 17. yet does not attempt to press this in any of the preceding chapters; but now he comes upon that point, and discusses it at great length to the end of chap. x.

As all, it is possible that this may be a resumption of the discourse, from chap. iii. 6. the rest of that chapter, and preceding thirteen verses of this, being considered as a parenthesis. These parts left out, the discourse runs on with perfect connexion. It is very likely that the words here are spoken to meet an objection of those Jews who wished the Christians of Palestine to apostatize: "You have no temples—no temple—no high-priest—no sacrifice for sin. Whether these there can be no religion; return, therefore, to us, we have the perfect temple service appointed by God." To these he answers, We have a High-priest who is passed into the heavens, Jesus, the Son of God; therefore let us hold fast our profession.—See on chap. iii. 1. to which this verse seems immediately to refer.

Three things the apostle professes to prove in this epistle—1. That Christ is greater than the angels. 2. That He is greater than Moses. 3. That He is greater than Aaron, and all high-priests.

The two former arguments, with their applications and illustrations, he has already despatched; and now he enters on the third.—See the Preface to this epistle.

The apostle states—1. That we have a High-priest. 2. That this High-priest is Jesus, the Son of God; not a son or descendant of Aaron, nor coming in that way, but in a more transcendent line. 3. Aaron and his successors, could only pass into the holy of holies; and that once a year; but our High-priest has passed into the heavens, of which that was only the type. There is an allusion here to the high-priest going into the holy of holies, on the great day of atonement.—1. He left the congregation of the people. 2. He passed through the veil into the holy place, and was not seen even by the priests. 3. He entered through the second veil into the holy of holies, where was the symbol of the Majesty of God. Jesus, our High-priest—1. Left the people at large. 2. He left his disciples by ascending up through the visible heavens, the clouds, as a veil, screening Him from their sight. 3. Having passed through those veils, He went immediately to be our intercessor: thus He passed, εἰς οὐρανόν, the visible or earthly heavens, into the presence of the Divine Majesty; through the heavens, ἀνεκάλυπτα τὸν οὐρανόν, and the company, or heaven of heavens.

15 For we have not a high priest which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities; but was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin.

16 Let us therefore come boldly unto the throne of grace that we may obtain mercy, and find grace to help in time of need.

16 Let us therefore come boldly unto the throne of grace that we may obtain mercy, and find grace to help in time of need.

16 Let us therefore come boldly unto the throne of grace that we may obtain mercy, and find grace to help in time of need.

15. For we have not a high-priest. To the objection:—Your high-priest, if entered into the heavens, can have no participation with you, and no sympathy for you, because out of the reach of human feelings and infirmities," he answers, ἵνα γὰρ ἕωθεν ἀρχιερεὺς μὴ ἀναγινώσκων συμπαθεῖν ταῖς ἀσθενείαις ἡμῶν. We have not a high-priest who cannot sympathize with our weaknesses. Though He be the Son of God, as to His human nature, and equal in His Divine nature with God; yet, aving partaken of human nature, and having submitted to all a trials and distresses, and being in all points tempted like we are, without feeling or consenting to sin: he is able to accour them that are tempted.—See chap. ii. 18. and the note here.

The words ἕωθεν πάντα καθ' ὁμοιότητα might be translated in all points according to the likeness: i. e. as far as His human nature could bear affinity to ours: for, though He had a perfect human body, and human soul, yet that body was perfectly unpermed; it was free from all morbid action, and, consequently, from all irregular movements. His mind, or human soul, being free from all sin, being every way perfect, could not be irregular temper, nothing that was inconsistent with divine purity. In all these respects He was different from us; and cannot, as man, sympathize with us in any feelings of this kind; but, as God, He has provided support for the only under all its trials and infirmities; and for the soul. He as provided an atonement and purifying sacrifice: so that is cleansed the heart from all unrighteousness, and fills the soul with His holy Spirit, and makes it His own temple and continual habitation. He took our flesh and blood, a human body and a human soul; and lived a human life. Here was so likeness of sinful flesh, Rom. viii. 5. and, by thus assuming human nature, He was completely qualified to make an atonement for the sins of the world.

16. Let us therefore come boldly unto the throne of grace) be allusion to the high-priest and his office on the day of atonement, is here kept up. The approach mentioned here is the ἁγία κathedρα, θυσιαστήριον, the propitiatory, or mercy-seat. This was the covering of the ark of the testimony, or present, at each end of which was a cherub, and between them the shekinah, or symbol of the Divine Majesty, which appeared to, and conversed with, the high-priest. Here the psalm shows the great superiority of the privileges of the new Testament above those of the Old; for, there the high-priest only, and he with fear and trembling, was permitted to approach; and that not without the blood of the victim; and, in any thing he transgressed, he might expect to be struck with death. The throne of grace in heaven answers to this propitiatory; but to this all may approach who feel their need of salvation; and they may approach, ἡμῶν ἁμαρτιῶν, with freedom, confidence, liberty of speech, in opposition to the fear and trembling of the Jewish high-priest. Here, nothing is to be feared, provided the heart be right with God, truly sincere, and trusting alone in the sacrificial Blood.

That we may obtain mercy) ἵνα λαβόμεν ἄφεσιν, that we may take mercy; that we may receive the pardon of all our sins; there is mercy for the taking. As Jesus Christ tasted death for every man: so every man may go to that propitiatory, and take the mercy that is suited to his degree of guilt.

And find grace) Mercy refers to the pardon of sin, and being brought into the favour of God. Grace is that by which the soul is supported after it has received this mercy; and by which it is purified from all unrighteousness, and upheld in all trials and difficulties; and enabled to prove faithful unto death.

To help in time of need.) Εἰς καιροὺς βοηθείας, for a reasonable support: that is, support when necessary, and as necessary; and in due proportion to the necessity. The word βοηθεία is properly rendered assistance, help, or support: but it is an assistance in consequence of the earnest cry of the person in distress; for the word signifies to run at the cry, θεῖς εἰς βοήν, or εἰς βοήν θεῖς. So, even at the throne of grace, or great propitiatory, no help can be expected where there is no cry: and where there is no cry, there is no felt necessity, for he that feels he is perishing will cry aloud for help; and to such a cry the compassionate High-priest will run. And the time of need is the time in which God will show mercy; nor will He ever delay it when it is necessary. We are not to cry to-day to be helped to-morrow, or at some indefinite time, or at the hour of death. We are to call for mercy and grace when we need them; and we are to expect to receive them when we call. This is a part of our liberty or boldness: we come up to the throne, and we call aloud for mercy; and God hears and dispenses the blessing we need.

That this exhortation of the apostle may not be lost on us, let us consider:—

1. That there is a throne of grace, i. e. a propitiatory, the place where God and man are to meet.
2. That this propitiatory, or mercy-seat, is sprinkled with the atoning blood of that Lamb of God, who taketh away the sin of the world.
3. That we must come up, ἁποστήσειμεθα, to this throne: and this implies faith in the efficacy of the sacrifice.
4. That we must call aloud on God for His mercy, if we expect Him to run to our assistance.
5. That we must feel our spiritual necessities, in order to our calling with fervency and earnestness.
6. That calling thus, we shall infallibly get what we want; for, in Christ Jesus, as a sacrificial offering, God is ever well pleased: and He is also well pleased with all who take refuge in the atonement which He has made.
7. That thus coming, feeling, and calling, we may have the utmost confidence: for, we have boldness, liberty of access, freedom of speech; may plead with our Maker without fear, and expect all that heaven has to bestow; because Jesus, who died, sitteth upon the throne! Hallelujah! the Lord God Omnipotent reigneth.
8. All these are reasons why we should persevere.

CHAPTER V.

The nature of the high-priesthood of Christ; His pre-eminence, qualifications, and order, 1—10. Imperfect state of the believing Hebrews, and the necessity of spiritual improvement, 11—14. [A. M. cir. 4067. A. D. cir. 63. An. Olymp. cir. CCX. 3. A. U. C. cir. 816.]

NOR every high priest taken from among men is ordained for men in things pertaining to God, but he may offer oblations and sacrifices for sins:

Who can have compassion on the ignorant, and on them that are out of the way; for that he himself also is compassed with infirmity.

1. For every high priest taken from among men is ordained for men in things pertaining to God, but he may offer oblations and sacrifices for sins:

Who can have compassion on the ignorant, and on them that are out of the way; for that he himself also is compassed with infirmity.

NOTES.—Verse 1. For every high priest taken from among men) This seems to refer to Levit. xli. 10. where it is intimated that the high-priest shall be taken ἄνωθεν μοσχαίου, from its brethren; i. e. he shall be of the tribe of Levi, and of the family of Aaron.

Ordained for men) ἵνα ἁποστήσειν καθίσταται τὰ ἔργα ἡμῶν, is appointed to preside over the Divine worship in those things which relate to man's salvation.

That he may offer both gifts and sacrifices for sins) God never appeared to all His followers in two points of view:—As the Author and Dispenser of all temporal good. 2. As our Lawgiver and Judge. In reference to this two-fold view of the Divine Being, His worship was composed of two different parts:—1. Offerings, or gifts.—2. Sacrifices. 1. As the creator and Dispenser of all good, He had offerings by which His bounty and providence were acknowledged. 2. As the avenger and Judge, against whose injunctions offences had been committed, He had sacrifices offered to Him, to make atonement for sin. The doxa, or gifts, mentioned here by the psalmist, included every kind of eucharistical offering. The victims, sacrifices, including victims of every sort; or animals whose lives were to be offered in sacrifice, and their blood poured out before God, as an atonement for sin. The high-priest was the mediator between God and the people; and it was his office, when the people had brought these gifts and sacrifices, to offer them to God in their behalf. The people could not legitimately offer their own offerings: they must be brought to the priest, and he alone could present them to

God. As we have a High-priest over the house of God, to offer for us our gifts, and His own sacrifice, therefore we may come with boldness to the throne of grace.—See before.

Verse 2. Who can have compassion on the ignorant) The word συμπάθειν signifies not merely to have compassion, but to act with moderation; and to bear with each in proportion to his ignorance, weakness, and untoward circumstances, all taken into consideration with the offences he has committed; in a word, to pity, feel for, and excuse, as far as possible; and when the provocation is at the highest, to moderate one's passion towards the culprit, and be ready to pardon; and when punishment must be administered, to do it in the gentlest manner.

Instead of ἄγνωστον, the ignorant, one MS. only, but that of high repute, has ἀδύνατον, the weak. Most men sin much through ignorance; but, this does not excuse them if they have within reach the means of instruction. And the great majority of the human race sin through weakness. The principle of evil is strong in them; the occasions of sin are many; through their fall from God they are become exceeding weak; and what the apostle calls, chap. xii. 1. that ἄκρατος ἁμαρτίας, the wall circumstanced sin, often occurs to every man. But, as in the above case, weakness itself is no excuse, when the means of strength and succour were always at hand. However, all these are circumstances which the Jewish high-priest took into consideration; and they are certainly notices attended to by the High-priest of our profession.

The reason given why the high-priest should be slow to

3 And * by reason hereof he ought, as for the people, so also for himself, to offer for sins.

4 * And no man taketh this honour unto himself, but he that is called of God, as was Aaron.

5 * So also Christ glorified not himself to be made a high priest; but he that called him to that office.

punish, and prone to forgive, is, that he himself is also compassed with weakness; ὑπερβαλλὸν ἀδυναμία, weakness lies all around him; it is his clothing; and as he feels his clothing, so should he feel it; and as he feels it, so he should deplore it, and compassionate others.

3. And by reason hereof] As he is also a transgressor of the commands of God, and unable to observe the law in its spirituality, he must offer sacrifices for sin, not only for the people, but for himself also: this must teach him to have a fellow-feeling for others.

4. This honour] ἡ τιμή undoubtedly signifies, here, the office; which is the meaning of the word in the best Greek writers. It is here an honourable office, because the man is the high-priest of God, and is appointed by God Himself to that office.

But he that is called of God as was Aaron] God Himself appointed the tribe and family, out of which the high-priest was to be taken: and Aaron and his sons were expressly chosen by God to fill the office of the high-priesthood. As God alone had the right to appoint His own priest for the Jewish nation, and man had no authority here; so God alone could provide and appoint a High-priest for the whole human race. Aaron was thus appointed for the Jewish people; Christ for all mankind.

Some make this "an argument for the uninterrupted succession of popes and their bishops in the church, who alone have the authority to ordain for the sacerdotal office: and whosoever is not thus appointed, is with them illegitimate." It is idle to employ time in proving that there is no such thing as an uninterrupted succession of this kind: it does not exist: it never did exist: it is a silly fable, invented by ecclesiastical tyrants, and supported by clerical coxcombs. But were it even true, it has nothing to do with the text. It speaks merely of the appointment of a high-priest, the succession to be preserved in the tribe of Levi, and in the family of Aaron. But even this succession was interrupted and broken, and the office itself was to cease on the coming of Christ, after whom there could be no high-priest; nor can Christ have any successor: and therefore He is said to be a Priest for ever; for he ever liveth the Intercessor and Sacrifice for mankind. The verse, therefore, has nothing to do with the clerical office; with preaching God's holy word, or administering the sacraments; and those who quote it in this way, show how little they understand the Scriptures, and how ignorant they are of the nature of their own office.

5. Christ glorified not himself] The man Jesus Christ, was also appointed by God to this most awful, yet glorious office, of being the High-priest of the whole human race. The Jewish High-priest represented this by the sacrifices of beasts which he offered; the Christian High-priest must offer His own life; Jesus Christ did so; and rising from the dead, He ascended to heaven, and there ever appeareth in the presence of God for us. Thus He has renounced the sacerdotal office: and because He never dies, He can never have a successor. He can have no vicars either in heaven or upon earth: those who pretend to be such are impostors, and are worthy neither of respect nor credit.

Thou art my Son] See on chap. 1. 5. and the observations at the end of that chapter. And thus it appears that God can have no high-priest but His Son; and to that office none can now pretend without blasphemy; for the Son of God is still the High-priest in His temple.

6. He saith also in another place] That is, in Psa. cx. 4. a Psalm of extraordinary importance, containing a very striking prediction of the birth, preaching, suffering, death, and conquest, of the Messiah.—See the notes there. For the mode of quotation here, see the note on chap. ii. 6.

Thou art a priest for ever] As long as the sun and moon endure, Jesus will continue to be High-priest to all the successive generations of men; as he was the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world. If he be a Priest for ever, there can be no succession of priests: and if He have all power in heaven and in earth; and if He be present wherever two or three are gathered together in His name, He can have no vicars; nor can the church need one to act in His place, when He, from the necessity of His nature fills all places, and is every where present. This one consideration nullifies all the pretensions of the Romish pontiff; and proves the whole to be a tissue of imposture.

After the order of Melchisedec] Who this person was, must still remain a secret. We know nothing more of him than is written in Gen. xiv. 18, &c. where see the notes, and particularly the observations at the end of that chapter, in which this very mysterious person is represented as a type of Christ.

7. Who in the days of his flesh] The time of His incarnation, during which He took all the infirmities of human nature upon Him; and was afflicted in His body and human soul just as other men are: irregular and sinful passions excepted.

Offered up prayers and supplications] This is one of the most difficult places in this epistle, if not in the whole of the priest; but he that said unto him, "Thou art my Son, to-day have I begotten thee.

6 As he saith also in another place, "Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec.

7 Who in the days of his flesh, when he had offered up prayers and supplications, with strong crying and tears, unto him that was able to save him from death, ver. 7."

New Testament. The labours of learned men upon it have been prodigious; and even in their sayings it is hard to find the meaning.

I shall take a general view of this and the two following verses, and then examine the particular expressions.

It is probable that the apostle refers to something in the agony of our Lord, which the evangelists have not distinctly marked. The Redeemer of the world appears here as simply man; but He is the representative of the whole human race. He must make expiation for sin by suffering; and He can suffer only as man. Suffering was as necessary as death; for man, because he has sinned, must suffer; and because he has broken the law, should die. Jesus took upon Himself the nature of man, subject to all the trials and distresses of human nature. He is now making atonement; and He begins with sufferings, as sufferings commence with human life; and He terminates with death, as that is the end of human existence in this world. Though he was the Son of God, conceived and born without sin, or any thing that could render him liable to suffering or death, and only suffered and died through infinite condescension; yet, to constitute Him a complete Saviour, He must submit to whatever the law required, and therefore He is stated to have learned obedience by the things which he suffered, ver. 8. that is, submission to all the requisitions of the law; and being made perfect, that is, having finished the whole by dying, He, by these means, became the author of eternal salvation to all them who obey Him, ver. 9. to them who, according to His own command, repent and believe the Gospel; and, under the influence of His Spirit, walk in holiness of life. "But he appears to be under the most dreadful apprehension of death; for, he offered up prayers and supplications, with strong crying and tears, unto him that was able to save him from death, ver. 7." I shall consider this first in the common point of view, and refer to the subsequent notes. This fear of death was in Christ a widely different thing from what it is in man: they fear death because of what lies beyond the grave; they have sinned, and they are afraid to meet their Judge. Jesus could have no fear of these grounds; He was now suffering for man, and He felt as their expiatory victim: and God only can tell, and perhaps neither men nor angels can conceive, how great the suffering and agony must be, which, in the sight of infinite Justice, was requisite to make this atonement. Death, temporal and eternal, was the portion of man: and now Christ is to destroy death by agonizing and dying? The tortures and torments necessary to effect this destruction, Jesus Christ alone could feel; Jesus Christ alone could sustain; Jesus Christ alone can comprehend. We are referred to them in this most solemn verse: but the apostle himself only drops hints, he does not attempt to explain them; He said and He wept, with strong crying and tears, and He was heard in reference to that which He offered up prayers, as our Mediator, were answered; and His sufferings and death were complete and effectual as our Sacrifice. This is the glorious sum of what the apostle here states: and it is enough. We may hear it with awe and respect, and adore Him with silence, whose grief had nothing common in it to that of other men; and is not to be estimated according to the measures of human miseries.—It was

A weight of us, more than whole worlds could bear.

I shall now make some remarks on particular expressions, and endeavour to show that the words may be understood with a shade of difference from the common acceptation.

Prayers and supplications, &c.] There may be an allusion here to the manner in which the Jews speak of prayer, &c. "Rabbi Jehudah said all human things depend on repentance, and the prayers which men make to the holy blessed God; especially if tears be poured out with the prayers. There is no gate which tears will not pass through." Sohar, Exod. fol. 5.

"There are three degrees of prayer, each surpassing the other in sublimity; prayer, crying, and tears; prayer is made in silence; crying, with a loud voice; but tears surpass all." Synops. Sohar. p. 33.

The apostle shows that Christ used every species of prayer, and those especially by which they allowed a man must be successful with His Maker.

The word ἱκετικῆς, which we translate supplications, exists in no other part of the New Testament: ἱκετικῆς signifies a supplicant, from ἱκεταί, I come, or approach: it is used in this connexion by the purest Greek writers. Nearly the same words are found in Isocrates, De Pace, ἱκετικῆς τολμῆς ἐστὶν ἀποδοῦναι ποικίλων, making many supplications and prayers. ἱκετικῆς, says Suides, καλεῖται εὐχῆς καλῶς ἐπιμαρτυροῦναι οἱ δόμοισι κατατίθεναι ποικίλα χεῖρα ἐχούσιν. ἱκετικῆς is a branch of olive, rolled round with wool, which suppliants were accustomed to deposit in some place, or to carry in their hands." And ἱκετικῆς, ἱκετες, he declines to be, ὁ δὲ δουλοπρεπὴς παρακαλῶν, καὶ δόμοισι περὶ τινος ἐρωτῶν. "He who in the most humble and servile manner entreats and begs any thing from another." In reference to this custom, the Latins used the phrase velamenta pretendera, "to hold forth these covered branches," when they made supplication; and Herodian calls them Isarrapins Ballous, "branches of supplication." Livy mentions the custom frequently; see lib. xxv. cap. 25. lib. xxix. c. 16. lib. xxxv. c. 34. lib. xxxvi. c. 20. The place in lib. xxix. c. 16. is much to the point, and shows us the full force of the word and nature of the custom. "Decem legati Loecrenium, obstiti aequalore et scordibus, in comitio sedentibus, conculibus velamenta supplicium, ramos oleæ, (ut Gracius moe est) porrigentes, ante tribu- wal cum fœdibus vocationibus humi proceubant." "Ten delegates from the Locrians, squalid and covered with rags, came into the hall where the consuls were sitting, holding out in their hands olive-branches covered with wool, according to the custom of the Greeks; and prostrated themselves on the ground before the tribunal, with weeping and loud lamentation." This is a remarkable case, and may well illustrate our Lord's situation and conduct. The Locrians, pillaged, oppressed, and ruined, by the consul Q. Plœmnius, send their delegates to the Roman government to implore protection and redress. They, the better to represent their situation, and that of their oppressed fellow-citizens, take the hæceteria, or olive-branch wrapped round with wool, and present themselves before the consuls in open court; and, with wailings and loud outcries make known their situation; the senate heard, arrested Plœmnius, loaded him with chains, and he expired in a dungeon. Jesus Christ, the representative of, and delegate from, the whole human race oppressed and ruined by Satan and sin, with the hæceteria, or ensign of a most distressed suppliant, presents Himself before the throne of God, with strong crying and tears; and prays against death and his ravages, in behalf of those whose representative He was: and He was heard in that he feared; the evils were removed, and the oppressor cast down. Satan was bound; he was spoiled of his dominion; and is reserved in chains of darkness to the judgment of the great day.

Every scholar will see that the words of the Roman historian answer exactly to those of the apostle; and the allusion in both is to the same custom. I do not approve of allegorizing, or spiritualizing; but the allusion and similarity of the expressions led me to make this application. Many others would make more of this circumstance, as the allusion in the text is so pointed to this custom. Should it appear to any of my readers, that I should, after the example of great names, have gone into this house of Rimmon, and bowed myself there, they will pardon their servant in this thing.

To save him from death I have already observed, that Jesus Christ was the representative of the human race; and have made some observations on the peculiarity of His sufferings, following the common acceptance of the words in the text; which things are true, howsoever the text may be interpreted. But here we may consider the pronoun avrov, him, as implying the collective body of mankind; the children who were partakers of flesh and blood, chap. ii. 14. The seed of Abraham, ver. 16. who, through fear of death, were all their life subject to bondage. So He made supplication with strong crying, and tears, to Him who was able to save THEM from death; for I consider the rovrov, them, of chap. ii. 15. the same, or implying the same thing, as avrov, him, in this verse: and, thus understood, all the difficulty vanishes away. On this interpretation, I shall give a paraphrase of the whole verse:—Jesus Christ in the days of his flesh, for He was incarnated that he might redeem the seed of Abraham, the fallen race of man, and in His expiatory sufferings, when representing the whole human race, He offered up prayers and supplications, with strong crying and tears, to Him who was able to save THEM from death; the intercession was prevalent, the passion and sacrifice were accepted, the sting of death was extracted, and Satan was dethroned.

If it should be objected, that this interpretation occasions a very unnatural change of person in these verses, I may reply, that the change made by my construction, is not greater than that made between verses 6 and 7, in the first of which, the apostle speaks of Melchisedec, who, at the conclusion of the verse, appears to be antecedent to the relative who, in ver. 7. and yet, from the nature of the subject, we must understand Christ to be meant. And I consider, ver. 8. Though he were a Son, yet learned he obedience by the things which he suffered, as belonging not only to Christ, considered in His human nature, but also to Him in His collective capacity: i. e. belonging to all the sons and daughters of God, who, by means of suffering, and various chastisements, learn submission, obedience, and righteousness: and this very subject the apostle treats in considerable detail in chap. xii. 2—11. to which the reader will do well to refer.

finished all; having died and risen again: τελειωθῆναι, signifies to have obtained the goal, to have ended one's labour, and enjoyed the fruits of it, chap. xii. 23.

The spirits of just men made perfect, πνεύματα δικαίων τελειωµένων, means the souls of those who have gained the goal, and obtained the prize. So, when Christ had finished His course of tremendous sufferings, and consummated the whole by His death and resurrection, He became αριστος σωτηριᾶς αἰωνίου, the cause of eternal salvation unto all them who obey him. He was consecrated both High-priest and Sacrifice, by His offering upon the cross.

In this verse, says Dr. Macknight, "three things are clearly stated:—1. That obedience to Christ is equally necessary to salvation with believing on Him. 2. That He was made perfect as a High-priest, by offering Himself a sacrifice for sin, chap. viii. 3. 3. That by the merit of that sacrifice, He hath obtained pardon and eternal life for them who obey Him." He tasted death for every man; but He is the Author and Cause of eternal salvation only to them who obey Him. It is not merely believers, but obedient believers, that shall be finally saved. Therefore, this text is an absolute, unimpeachable evidence, that it is not the imputed obedience of Christ that saves any man. Christ has bought men by His blood; and, by the infinite merit of His death, He has purchased for them an endless glory: but, in order to be prepared for it, the sinner must, through that grace which He withholds from no man, repent, turn from sin, believe on Jesus as being a sufficient ransom and sacrifice for his soul, receive the gift of the Holy Ghost, be a worker together with Him, walk in a conformity to the Divine will, through this Divine aid, and continue faithful unto death through Him, out of whose fulness he may receive grace upon grace.

10. Called of God a High-priest ἱεροσυνεβῆς, being constituted, raised, and acknowledged, to be a High-priest. In Hesychius, we find συνεβῆς, which he translates αεταῖρας; hence we learn, that one meaning of this word is to salute: as, when a man was constituted, or anointed king, those who accented him would say, Hail, king! On this verse, Dr. Macknight has the following note, with the insertion of which, the reader will not be displeas'd:—"As our Lord, in His conversation with the Pharisees, recorded Matt. xxii. 43. spake of it as a thing certain of itself, and universally known and acknowledged by the Jews, that David wrote the CXth Psalm by inspiration, concerning the Christ, or Messiah; the apostle was well-founded in applying the whole of that Psalm to Jesus. Wherefore, having quoted the fourth verse, Thou art a Priest for ever, after the order of Melchisedec, as directed to Messiah, David's Lord, he justly termed that speech of the Deity, a salutation of Jesus, according to the true import of the word συνεβῆς, which properly signifies to address one by his name, or title, or office: accordingly, Hesychius explains συνεβῆς, by αεταῖρας. Now, that the deep meaning of this salutation, may be understood, I observe, First, that, by the testimony of the inspired writers, Jesus sat down at the right-hand of God, when He returned to heaven, after having finished His ministry upon earth, Mark xvi. 19; Acts vii. 56. Heb. i. 3. viii. 1; 1 Pet. iii. 22. Not, however, immediately, but after that He had offered the sacrifice of Himself in heaven, by presenting His crucified body before the presence of God, Heb. i. 3. x. 10. Secondly, I observe, that God's saluting Messiah, a priest after the order of Melchisedec, being mentioned in the Psalm, after God is said to have invited Him to sit at his right hand, is as reasonable to think, the salutation was given Him after He had offered the sacrifice of Himself, and had taken His seat at God's right hand. Considered in this order, the salutation of Jesus as a Priest, after the order of Melchisedec, was a public declaration, on the part of God, that He accepted the sacrifice of Himself, which Jesus then offered, as a sufficient atonement for the sin of the world, and approved of the whole of His ministrations on earth, and confirmed all the effects of that meritorious sacrifice. And whereas we are informed in the Psalm, that, after God had invited His Son, in the human nature, to sit at His right hand, as Governor of the world, and foretold the blessed fruits of His government, He published the oath by which He made Him a Priest for ever, before He sent Him into the world to accomplish the salvation of mankind; and declared that He would never repent of that oath: The Lord hath sworn, and will not repent it; Thou art a Priest for ever, after the similitude of Melchisedec: it was, in effect, a solemn publication of the method in which God would pardon sinners; and a promise, that the effects of His Son's government, as a King, and of His ministrations as a Priest, shall be eternal: see chap. vi. 20. Moreover, as this solemn declaration of the dignity of the Son of God, as a King and a Priest for ever in the human nature, was made in the hearing of the angelical hosts, it was designed for this instruction, that they might understand their subordination to God's Son, and pay Him the, homage that is due to Him as Governor of the world, and as Saviour of the human race.—Phil. ii. 9, 10. Heb. i. 6. The above explanation of the import of God's saluting Jesus a Priest for ever, is founded on the apostle's reasonings in the seventh and following chapters, where he enters into the deep meaning of the oath, by which that salvation was conferred.

11. Of whom we have many things to say! The words επι, which we translate of whom, are variously applied:—1. To Melchisedec. 2. To Christ. 3. To the endless Priesthood. Those who understand the place of Melchisedec, suppose that it is in reference to this that the apostle resumes the subject in the seventh chapter, where much more is said on this subject, though not very difficult of comprehension: and, indeed, it is not to be supposed, that the Hebrews could be more capable of understanding the subject, when the apostle wrote the seventh chapter, than they were, when a few hours before he had written the σftk. It is more likely, therefore, that the words are to be understood as meaning Jesus, or that endless Priesthood of which he was a little before speaking; and which is a subject that carnal Christians cannot easily comprehend.

Hard to be uttered] Ανεπισημωτος, difficult to be interpreted; because Melchisedec was a typical person. Or, if it refer to the Priesthood of Christ, that is still more difficult to be explained, as it implies not only His being constituted a Priest, after this typical order, but His paying down the ransom for the sins of the whole world, and His satisfying the Divine justice by this sacrifice; but, also, thereby opening the kingdom of heaven to all believers, and giving the whole world an entrance to the holy of holies by His blood.

Dull of hearing] Νωθοι και εξαοισι. Your souls do not keep pace with the doctrines and exhortations delivered to you. As νωθος, signifies a person who walks heavily, and makes little speed; it is here elegantly applied to those who are called to the Christian race, have the road laid down plain before them, how to proceed specified, and the blessings to be obtained enumerated; and yet make no exertions to get on, but are always learning, and never able to come to the full knowledge of the truth.

12. For when for the time] They had heard the Gospel for many years, and had professed to be Christians for a long time; on these accounts, they might reasonably have been expected to be well instructed in Divine things, so as to be able to instruct others.

Which be the first principles] Τισι τα στοιχεια, certain first principles, or elements. The word τις, is not the nominative plural, as our translators have supposed, but the accusative case, governed by ιδουσι; and therefore the literal translation of the passage is this:—Ye have need that one teach you a second time (καλις) certain elements of the doctrines of Christ, or oracles of God; i. e. the notices which the prophets gave concerning the Priesthood of Jesus Christ: such as are found in Psa. cx. and in Isa. chap. llii. By the Oracles of God, the writings of the Old Testament are undoubtedly meant.

And are become such] The words seem to intimate, that they had once been better instructed, and had now forgotten that teaching: and this was occasioned by their being dull of hearing; either they had not continued to hear, or they had heard so carelessly, that they were not profited by what they heard. They had probably totally omitted the preaching of the Gospel; and, consequently, forgotten all that they had learnt. Indeed, it was to reclaim these Hebrews from backsliding, and preserve them from total apostacy, that this epistle was written.

Such as have need of milk] Milk is a metaphor by which many authors, both sacred and profane, express the first principles of religion and science; and they apply sucking to learning; and every student, in his novitiate, or commencement of his studies, being likened to an infant that derives all its nourishment from the breast of its mother; not being able to digest any other kind of food. On the contrary, those who had well learnt all the first principles of religion and science, and knew how to apply them, were considered as adults, who were capable of receiving, εσπρας τροφης, solid food; i. e. the more difficult and sublime doctrines. The rabbins abound with this figure; it occurs frequently in Philo, and in the Greek ethic writers also. In the famous Arabic Poem called Asfard al Bordah, written by Abi Abdallah Mohammed ben Saïd ben Hamad Albusiric, in praise of Mohammed and his religion, every couplet of which ends with the letter p, the first letter in Mohammed's name, we meet with a couplet that contains a similar sentiment to that of the apostle:—
والله اعلم انى كان
والله اعلم انى كان
والله اعلم انى كان
والله اعلم انى كان

"The soul is like to a young infant, whom, if permitted, will grow up to manhood in the love of sucking; but if thou take it from the breast, it will feel itself weaned."

Dr. Owen observes, that there are two sorts of hearers of the Gospel, which are here expressed:—1. By an elegant metaphor or similitude: this consists in the conformity that is between bodily food and the Gospel as preached. 2. In the variety of natural food, as suited to the various states of them that feed on it; answered by the truths of the Gospel, which are of various kinds: and, in the exemplification of this metaphor, natural food is reduced to two kinds: 1. Milk. 2. Strong or solid meat:—and those who feed on these are reduced to two sorts:—1. Children. 2. Men of ripe age. Both which are applied to hearers of the Gospel.

1. Some there are who are νωθοι, babes or infants: and some are τελειοι, perfect or full grown.
2. These babes are described by a double property:—1. They are dull of hearing. 2. They are unskilful in the word of righteousness.

In opposition to this, those who are spiritually adult are, 1. They who are capable of instruction. 2. Such as have their senses exercised to discern both good and evil. 3. The different means to be applied to those different sorts, for their good, according to their respective conditions, are expressed in the terms of the metaphor: to the first, γαλα, milk: to the other, εσπρας τροφης, strong meat. All these are comprised in the following scheme:—

- The hearers of the Gospel are,
I. Νωθοι: BABES OR INFANTS.
Who are
1. Νωθοι ταις ακοις, dull of hearing.
2. Απειροι λεγου δικαιοσυνης, inexperienced in the doctrine of righteousness.
These have need
Γαλακτος: of milk.
II. Τελειοι. ΠΕΡΕΤΟΙ OR ADULT.
Who are
1. Θρονμοι: wise and prudent.
2. Τα αισθητηρια γεγυμνασμενα εχοντες and have their senses properly exercised.
These have need
Εσπρας τροφης: of solid food.

But all these are to derive their nourishment or spiritual instruction, εκ των λεγων τσ θεου, from the oracles of God. The word ορακλι, by which we translate the λεγων of the apostle, is used, by the best Greek writers, to signify a Divine speech, or answer of a deity to a question proposed. It always implied a speech or declaration purely celestial, in which man had no part: and it is thus used wherever it occurs in the New Testament. 1. It signifies the law received from God by Moses, Acts vii. 38.

2. The Old Testament in general: the holy men of old having spoken by the inspiration of the Divine Spirit, Rom. iii. 2. and in the text under consideration.

3. It signifies Divine revelation in general, because all delivered immediately from God, 1 Thess. ii. 13. 1 Pet. iv. 11. When we consider what respect was paid by the heathens to their oracles, which were supposed to be delivered by those gods which were the objects of their adoration, but which were only impostures, we may then learn what respect is due to the true oracles of God.

Among the heathens, the credit of oracles was so great, that, in all doubts and disputes, their determinations were held sacred and inviolable: whence vast numbers flocked to them for advice in the management of their affairs; and no business of any importance was undertaken, scarcely any war waged, or peace concluded, any new form of government instituted, or new laws enacted, without the advice and approbation of the oracle. Cicæus, before he durst venture to declare war against the Persians, consulted not only the most famous oracles of Greece, but sent ambassadors so far as Libya, to ask advice of Jupiter Ammon. Minas, the Athenian lawgiver, professed to receive instructions from Jupiter how to model his intended government; and Lycurgus, legislator of Sparta, made frequent visits to the Delphian Apollo, and received from him the platform of the Lacedæmonian commonwealth.—See Broughton.

What a reproach to Christians who hold the Bible to be a collection of the Oracles of God, and who not only do not consult it in the momentous concerns of either this or the future life, but go in direct opposition to it. Were every thing conducted according to these oracles, we should have neither war nor desolation in the earth; families would be well governed, and individuals universally made happy.

Those who consulted the ancient oracles, were obliged to go to enormous expences, both in sacrifices and in presents, to the priests. And when they had done so, they received oracles which were so equivocal, that howsoever the event fell out, they were capable of being interpreted that way.

13. For every one that useth milk] It is very likely that the apostle, by using this term, refers to the doctrines of the law, which were only the rudiments of religion, and were intended to lead us to Christ, that we might be justified by faith. The word of righteousness] Αγιος δικαιοσυνης: The doctrine of justification. I believe this to be the apostle's meaning. He that uses milk, rests in the ceremonies and observances of the law, is unskilful in the doctrine of justification; for this requires faith in the sacrificial death of the promised Messiah.

14. But strong meat] The high and sublime doctrines of Christianity, the atonement, justification by faith, the gift of the Holy Ghost, the fulness of Christ dwelling in the souls of men, triumph in and over death, the resurrection of the body, the glorification of both body and soul in the realms of blessedness, and an endless union with Christ in the throne of His glory. This is the strong food which the genuine Christian understands, receives, digests, and grows thereby.

By reason of use] Who, by constant hearing, believing, praying, and obedience, use all the graces of God's Spirit; and, in the faithful use of them, find every one improved; so that they duly grow in grace, and in the knowledge of Jesus Christ, our Lord.

Have their senses exercised] The word αἰσθητικὰ, signifies the different organs of sense, as the eyes, ears, tongue, and palate, nose, and finger-ends, and the nervous surface in general, through which we gain the sensations called seeing, hearing, tasting, smelling, and feeling. These organs of sense being frequently exercised, or employed, on a variety of subjects, acquire the power to discern the various objects of sense; viz. all objects of sight; difference of sounds; of tastes, or vapors; of odours, or smelling; and of hard, soft, wet, dry, cold, hot, rough, smooth, and all other tangible qualities.

There is something in the soul that answers to all these senses in the body. And as universal nature presents to the other senses their different and appropriate objects; so religion presents to these interior senses the objects which are suited to them. Hence, in Scripture, we are said, even in spiritual things, to see, hear, taste, smell, and touch, or feel. These are the means by which the soul is rendered comfortable, and through which it derives its happiness and perfection.

In the adult Christian these senses are said to be γυμνασθήσονται, exercised, a metaphor taken from the athletes, or contenders in the Grecian games, who were wont to employ all their powers, skill, and agility, in mock fights, running, wrestling, &c. that they might be the better prepared for the actual contests when they took place. So these employ and improve all their powers; and in using grace, get more grace; and thus being able to discern good from evil, they are in little danger of being imposed on by false doctrine, or by the pretensions of hypocrites; or of being deceived by the subtleties of Satan. They feel that their security depends, under God, on this exercise; on the proper use which they make of the grace already given them by God. Can any reader be so dull as not to understand this.

CHAPTER VI.

We must proceed from the first principles of the doctrine of Christ unto perfection, and not lay the foundation a second time, 1-3. Those who were once enlightened, and have been made partakers of the Holy Ghost, and the various blessings of the Gospel, if they apostatize from Christ, and finally reject Him as their Saviour, cannot be renewed again to repentance, 4-8. The double similitude of the ground blessed of God, and bearing fruit; and of that ground which is cursed of God, and bears briars and thorns, 7, 8. The apostle's confidence in them, and his exhortation to diligence and perseverance, 9-12. God's promise and oath to Abraham, by which the immutability of His counsel is shown in order to excite our hope, 13-18. Hope is the anchor of the soul, and enters within the veil, 19, 20. [A. THEFORE <sup>a</sup> leaving <sup>b</sup> the principles of the doctrine of Christ, let us go on to perfection; not laying again the foundation of repentance, from dead works, and of faith towards God, a PAULI R. II. 14. CH. 5. 12-13. Or, the word of the beginning of Christ.—c Ch. 9. 1-3. Acts 13. 4. 5.—d Acts 8. 14, 15, 16, 17. 19. 16.—e Acts 17. 31.

NOTES.—Verse 1. Therefore] Because ye have been so indolent, slow of heart; and have still so many advantages;—

Leaving the principles of the doctrine of Christ] Ceasing to continue in the state of babes, who must be fed with milk, with the lowest doctrines of the Gospel; when ye should be capable of understanding the highest.

Let us go on to perfection] Let us never rest till we are adult Christians; till we are saved from all sin, and are filled with the Spirit and power of Christ.

The words τὸν πρῶτον τὸν Χριστὸν λαλοῦν, might be translated the discourse of the beginning of Christ, as in the margin; that is, the account of His incarnation, and the different years and ceremonies in the law, by which His advent, nature, office, and miracles, were pointed out. The whole law of Moses pointed out Christ, as may be seen at large in my comment on the Pentateuch; and therefore the words of the apostle may be understood thus, Leave the law, and come to the Gospel. Cease from Moses, and come to the Messiah.

Let us go on unto perfection.] The original is very emphatic; εἰς τὴν τελειότητα δευσιμῶτα.—Let us be carried on to this perfection: God is ever ready, by the power of His Spirit, to carry us forward, to every degree of life, light, and love, necessary to prepare us for an eternal weight of glory. There is but little difficulty in attaining the end of our faith, the liberation of our souls from all sin, if God carry us forward to it: and this He will do, if we submit to be saved in His own way, and on His own terms. Many make a violent outcry against the doctrine of perfection, i. e. against the heart being cleansed from all sin in this life, and filled with love to God and man; because they judge it to be impossible! Is it so much to say of those, that they know neither the Scripture, nor the power of God!—Surely the Scripture promises us this; and the power of God can carry us on to the possession of it.

Laying again the foundation of repentance] The phrase ἀπαρτίτια, dead works, occurs but once more in the Sacred Writings, and that is in chap. ix. 14. of this epistle; and in six places it seems to signify such works as deserve death; orks of those who were dead in trespasses, and dead in sin; and dead by sentence of the law, because they had, by evil works, broken the law. Repentance may be properly fitted the foundation of the work of God in the soul of man, because by it we forsake sin, and turn to God to find mercy.

Faith towards God] is also a foundation, or fundamental principle, without which it is impossible to please God; and without which we cannot be saved. By repentance, we feel a need of God's mercy; by faith we find that mercy.

But it is very likely that the apostle refers here to the Levitical law; which, in its painful observances, and awful denunciations of Divine wrath, against every breach of that law, was well calculated to produce repentance, and make it a joyous and bitter thing to sin against God. And as to faith in God, that was essentially necessary, in order to see the end of a commandment; for, without faith in Him who was to save, all that repentance was unavailable; and all the ritual observances without profit.

2. Of the doctrine of baptism] "There were two things,"

2 <sup>d</sup> Of the doctrine of baptism, <sup>e</sup> and of laying on of hands, <sup>f</sup> and of resurrection of the dead, <sup>g</sup> and of eternal judgment.

3 And this will we do, <sup>h</sup> if God permit.

4 For <sup>i</sup> it is impossible for those <sup>k</sup> who were once enlightened, a Acts 13. 12. Rom. 8. 16.—b Acts 19. 1. 1 Cor. 4. 15.—Miss. 12. 31. Ch. 10. 45. c 1 Pet. 1. 23. d 1 John 5. 14.—Ch. 10. 32.

says Dr. Owen, "peculiar to the Gospel, the doctrine of it, and the gifts of the Holy Ghost. Doctrine is called baptism, Deut. xxii. 2. hence the people are said to be baptized to Moses, when they were initiated into his doctrines, 1 Cor. x. 62. The baptism of John was his doctrine, Acts xix. 3. and the baptism of Christ was the doctrine of Christ, wherewith He was to sprinkle many nations, Isa. lli. 15. This is the first baptism of the Gospel, even its doctrine. The other, was the communication of the gifts of the Holy Ghost, Acts i. 5. and this alone is what is intended by the laying on of hands; and then the sense will be, the foundation of Gospel baptism, namely, preaching, and the gifts of the Holy Ghost."

I am afraid, with all this great man's learning, he has not hit the meaning of the apostle. As teaching is the means by which we are to obtain the gifts of the Holy Ghost, surely the apostle never designed to separate them, but to lead men immediately through the one to the possession of the other. Nor is the word baptism mentioned in the passage in Deuteronomy which he quotes; nor, indeed, any word properly synonymous. Neither βαπτισμός, baptism, παρτίτια, sprinkling, nor any verb formed from them, is found in the Septuagint, in that place. But the other proofs are sufficiently in point, viz. that by baptism, in the other places referred to, doctrine or teaching is meant; but to call teaching one baptism, and the gifts of the Holy Ghost another baptism, and to apply this to the explanation of the difficulty here, is very far from being satisfactory.

I am inclined to think that all the terms in this verse, as well as those in the former, belong to the Levitical law; and are to be explained on that ground.

Baptisms, or immersions of the body in water, sprinklings, and washings, were frequent as religious rites among the Hebrews; and were all emblematical of that purity which a holy God requires in his worshippers; and without which they cannot be happy here, nor glorified in heaven.

Laying on of hands] Was also frequent, especially in sacrifices: the person bringing the victim laid his hands on its head, confessed his sins over it, and then gave it to the priest to be offered to God, that it might make atonement for his transgressions. This also had respect to Jesus Christ, that Lamb of God who takes away the sins of the world.

The doctrine also of the resurrection of the dead, and of eternal judgment, were both Jewish; but were only partially revealed, and then referred to the Gospel. Of the resurrection of the dead, there is a fine proof in Isa. xxvi. 19. where it is stated to be the consequence of the death and resurrection of Christ; for so I understand the words, Thy dead shall live; with my dead body shall they arise: awake and sing, ye that dwell in the dust; for thy dew is as the dew of herbs; and the earth shall cast out the dead. The valley of dry-bones, Ezek. xxxvii. 1, &c. is both an illustration and proof of it. And Daniel has taught both the resurrection, and the eternal judgment, chap. xii. 2. And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake: some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt.

Now, the foundation of all these doctrines was laid in the Old Testament; and they were variously represented under and have tasted of the heavenly gift, and were made partakers of the Holy Ghost,

5 And have tasted the good word of God, and the powers of the world to come,

1 John 4. 10. & 6. 32. Eph. 2. 5.

the law; but they were all referred to the Gospel for their proof and illustration. The apostle, therefore, wishes them to consider the Gospel as holding forth these in their full spirit and power:—1. It preaches repentance unto life. 2. Faith in God through Christ, by whom we receive the atonement. 3. The baptism by water, in the name of the Holy Trinity; and the baptism of the Holy Ghost. 4. The imposition of hands, the true sacrificial system; and by and through it the communication of the various gifts of the Holy Spirit, for the instruction of mankind, and the edification of the church. 5. The resurrection of the dead, which is both proved and illustrated by the resurrection of Christ. 6. The doctrine of the eternal or future judgment which is to take place at the bar of Christ Himself; God having committed all judgment to His Son: called here επιτα αιωνιον, eternal, or ever-during judgment, because the sentences then pronounced shall be irreversible. Some understand the whole of the initiation of persons into the church, as the candidates for admission were previously instructed in those doctrines which contained the fundamental principles of Christianity. The Hebrews had already received these:—But should they Judaize, or mingle the Gospel with the law, they would thereby exclude themselves from the Christian church; and should they be ever again admitted, they must come through the same gate, or lay a second time, ωλιθι, this foundation. But should they totally apostatize from Christ, and finally reject Him, then it would be impossible to renew them again to repentance; they could no more be received into the Christian church, nor have any right to any blessing of the Gospel dispensation: and, finally rejecting the Lord who bought them, would bring on themselves and their land swift destruction.—See the 4th and following verses; and particularly the notes on verses 8 and 9.

3. And this will we do] God being my helper, I will teach you all the sublime truths of the Gospel; and show you how all its excellencies were typified by the law; and particularly by its sacrificial system.

4. For it is impossible for those who were once enlightened] Before I proceed to explain the different terms in these verses, it is necessary to give my opinion of their design and meaning:—1. I do not consider them as having any reference to any person professing Christianity. 2. They do not belong, nor are they applicable, to backsliders of any kind. 3. They belong to apostates from Christianity; to such as reject the whole Christian system, and its Author the Lord Jesus. 4. And to those of them only who join with the blaspheming Jews, call Christ an impostor, and vindicate His murderers in having crucified Him as a malefactor; and thus they render their salvation impossible, by wilfully and maliciously rejecting the Lord that bought them. No man, believing in the Lord Jesus as the great Sacrifice for sin, and acknowledging Christianity as a Divine revelation, is here intended; though he may have unfortunately backslidden from any degree of the salvation of God.

The design of these solemn words is evidently—First, to show the Hebrews that apostacy from the highest degrees of grace was possible; and that those who were highest in the favour of God might sin against Him, lose it, and perish everlastingly. Secondly, to warn them against such an awful state of perdition, that they might not be led away, by either the persuasions or persecutions of their countrymen, from the truth of the heavenly doctrine which had been delivered to them. And, Thirdly, to point out the destruction which was shortly to come upon the Jewish nation.

Once enlightened—Thoroughly instructed in the nature and design of the Christian religion, having received the knowledge of the truth, chap. x. 32; and being convinced of sin, righteousness, and judgment, and led to Jesus the Saviour of sinners:—

Tasted of the heavenly gift] Having received the knowledge of salvation by the remission of sins, through the Day-spring which, from on high, had visited them. Such having received Christ, the heavenly Gift of God's infinite love, John iii. 16. the living Bread that came down from heaven, John vi. 51. and thus tasting that the Lord is gracious, 1 Pet. ii. 3. and witnessing the full effects of the Christian religion.

Partakers of the Holy Ghost] The Spirit Himself witnessing with their spirits that they were the children of God, and thus assuring them of God's mercy towards them, and of the efficacy of the atonement through which they had received such blessings.

5. And have tasted the good word of God] Have had this proof of the excellence of the promise of God in sending the Gospel, the Gospel being itself the good word of a good God; the reading and preaching of which they find sweet to the taste of their souls. Genuine believers have an appetite for the word of God; they taste it, and then their relish for it is the more abundantly increased. The more they get, the more they wish to have.

The powers of the world to come] Δυναμεις τι μελλουσας αιωνος. These words are understood two ways:—1. The 6 If they shall fall away, to renew them again unto repentance; seeing they crucify to themselves the Son of God afresh, and put Him to an open shame.

7 For the earth which drinketh in the rain that cometh out powers of the world to come may refer to the stupendous miracles wrought in confirmation of the Gospel: the Gospel dispensation being the world to come in the Jewish phraseology, as we have often seen; and that δυναμεις, is often taken for a mighty work, or miracle, is plain from various parts of the Gospels. The prophets had declared that the Messiah, when He came, should work many miracles, and should be as mighty in word and deed, as was Moses; see Deut. xviii. 15—19. And they particularly specify the giving sight to the blind, hearing to the deaf, strength to the lame, and speech to the dumb, Isa. xxxv. 5, 6. All these miracles Jesus Christ did in the sight of this very people: and thus they had the highest evidence they could have, that Jesus was the promised Messiah; and could have no pretence to doubt His mission, or apostatize from the Christian faith which they had received; and hence it is no wonder that the apostle denounces the most awful judgments of God against those who had apostatized from the faith which they had seen thus confirmed.

2. The words have been supposed to apply to those communications and foretastes of eternal blessedness, or of the joys of the world to come, which they who are justified through the blood of the covenant, and walk faithfully with their God, experience: and to this sense, the word γευσαμενος, have tasted, is thought more properly to apply. But γευω, to taste, signifies to experience, or have full proof of a thing. Thus, to taste death, Matt. xvi. 28. is to die, to come under the power of death; fully to experience its destructive nature, as far as the body is concerned.—See also Luke ix. 27. John viii. 52. And it is used in the same sense in chap. ii. 9. of this epistle, where Christ is said to taste death for every man; for, notwithstanding the metaphor, which the reader will see explained in the note on the above place, the word necessarily means that He did actually die, that He fully experienced death; had the fullest proof of it and of its malignity. He could have, independently of the corruption of His flesh; for, over this, death could have no power. And to taste that the Lord is gracious, 1 Pet. ii. 3. is to experience God's graciousness thoroughly, in being made living stones built up into a spiritual house, constituted holy priests to offer spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God; see ver. 5. And in this sense it is used by the purest Greek writers.—See several examples in Schleiermacher.

It seems, therefore, that the first opinion is the best founded.

6. If they shall fall away] Και παραστας, and having fallen away. I can express my own mind on this translation nearly in the words of Dr. Macknight:—"The participles παραστας, who were enlightened, γευσαμενος, have tasted, and γενησθε, were made partakers, being aorists, are properly rendered by our translators in the past time; whereas, παραστας, being an aorist, ought likewise to have been translated in the past time, was fallen away. Nevertheless, our translators, following Beza, who, without any authority from ancient MSS. has inserted in his Version, the word α, have rendered this clause, in they fall away, thus this text might not appear to contradict the doctrine of the perseverance of the saints. But as no translator should take upon him to add to, or alter the Scriptures, for the sake of any favorite doctrine; I have translated παραστας, in the past time, have fallen away, according to the true import of the word, as standing in connexion with the other aorists in the preceding verses."

Dr. Macknight was a Calvinist; and he was a thorough scholar and an honest man; but, professing to give a translation of the epistle, he consulted not his creed, but his candour. Had our translators, who were excellent and learned men, leaned less to their own peculiar creed in the present authorized Version; the church of Christ in this country would not have been so agitated and torn as it has been with polemical divinity.

It appears from this, whatever sentiment may gain or lose by it, that there is a fearful possibility of falling away from the grace of God: and if this scripture did not say so, there are many that do say so. And were there no scripture express on this subject, the nature of the present state of man, which is a state of probation or trial, must necessarily imply it. Let him who most assuredly standeth, take heed lest he fall.

To renew them again unto repentance] As repentance is the first step that a sinner must take, in order to return to God, and as sorrow for sin must be useless in itself, unless there be a proper sacrificial offering, these, having rejected the only available Sacrifice, their repentance for sin, had they any, would be nugatory, and their salvation impossible on this simple account; and this is the very reason which the apostle immediately subjoins:—

Seeing they crucify to themselves the Son of God] They reject Him on the ground that He was an impostor, and justly put to death. And thus they are said to crucify Him to themselves; to do that in their present apostacy which the Jews did: and they show thereby, that, had they been present when He was crucified, they would have joined with His murderers.

And put Him to an open shame.] Παράδειγμα γαρτων, and upon it, and bringeth forth herbs meet for them by whom it is dressed, receiveth blessing from God.

8 But that which beareth thorns and briars is rejected, and is nigh unto cursing; whose end is to be burned.

9 But, beloved, we are persuaded better things of you, and things that accompany salvation, though we thus speak.

10 For God is not unrighteous to forget your work and labour of love, which ye have showed toward his name, in that ye have ministered to the saints, and do minister.

11 And we desire that every one of you do show the same diligence to the full assurance of hope unto the end: 12 That ye be not slothful, but followers of them who through faith and patience inherit the promises.

10 For God is not unrighteous to forget your work and labour of love, which ye have showed toward his name, in that ye have ministered to the saints, and do minister. 11 And we desire that every one of you do show the same diligence to the full assurance of hope unto the end: 12 That ye be not slothful, but followers of them who through faith and patience inherit the promises.

10. God is not unrighteous] God is only bound to men by His own promise: this promise he is not obliged to make; but, when once made, His righteousness or justice requires Him to keep it: therefore, whatever He has promised, He will certainly perform. But He has promised to reward every good work and labour of love, and He will surely reward yours: God's promise is God's debt. Every good work must spring from faith in the name, being, and goodness, of God: and every work that is truly good must have love for its motive, as it has God for its end.

The word vos coram, labour, prefixed to love, is wanting in almost every MS. and Version of importance. Griesbach has left it out of the text.

Ministered to the saints] Have contributed to the support and comfort of the poor Christians who were suffering persecution in Judea. As they had thus ministered, and were still ministering, they gave full proof that they had a common cause with the others; and this was one of the things that proved them to be in a state of salvation.

11. We desire] Επιθυμουμεν, we earnestly wish that each person among you may continue, ενδουλοθει, to manifest, exhibit to full view, the same diligence. There might be reason to suspect that some, through fear of man, might not wish the good they did to be seen, lest they also should suffer persecution. This would not comport with the generous noble spirit of the Gospel: the man who is afraid to let his decided attachment to God be known, is not far from backsliding. He who is more afraid of man than he is of God Almighty, can have very little religion. As the church of Christ required all those who in these times embraced the Gospel, to be publicly baptized, those who submitted to this rite gave full proof that they were thoroughly convinced of the truths of Christianity; and they gave this as a public pledge that they would be faithful.

The same diligence] They had an active faith, and a labouring love; and the apostle wishes them to persevere in both. They were diligent, very diligent; and he desires them to continue so.

To the full assurance of hope] Προς την πληροτητα της ελπιδος. "The full assurance of faith," says Mr. Wesley, "relates to present pardon; the full assurance of hope, to future glory: the former is the highest degree of Divine evidence that God is reconciled to me in the Son of His love; the latter is the same degree of Divine evidence wrought in the soul by the same immediate inspiration of the Holy Ghost; of persevering grace, and of eternal glory. So much and no more, as faith every moment beholds with open face; so much does hope see to all eternity." But this assurance of faith and hope is not an opinion, not a bare construction of Scriptures; but is given immediately by the power of the Holy Ghost; and what none can have for another, but for himself only.

We must not misapprehend these excellent sayings of this eminent man: 1. The person who has this full assurance of hope, is he, who not only knows and feels that his sins are forgiven through Christ Jesus; but also that his heart is purified from all unrighteousness, that the whole body of sin and death is destroyed, and that he is fully made a partaker of the Divine nature. As, without holiness, complete entire holiness, no man can see God; so, without this, none can scripturally or rationally hope for eternal glory: it being a contradiction to profess to have the full assurance of hope, to enjoy a state and place for which the soul is conscious it is not prepared. 2. All that is said here must be understood as still implying the absolute necessity of continuing in the same degree of grace, from which this full assurance of hope is derived. This full assurance, therefore, does not imply, that the man will absolutely persevere to the end; but that if he do persevere in this same grace, he shall infallibly have an eternal glory. There is no unconditional perseverance in the Scripture; nor can there be such in a state of probation.

12. That ye be not slothful] This shows how the full assurance of hope is to be regulated and maintained. They must be diligent: slothfulness will deprive them both of hope and tion of Christ and his Gospel, are about to be finally rejected by God. They must meet with destruction; they have the things that are suitable to, and indicative of, a state of reprobation; the wrath of God will come upon them to the uttermost: but while they meet with destruction, you shall meet with salvation. It is worthy of remark, that no genuine Christian perished in the destruction of Jerusalem; they all, previous to the siege by Titus, escaped to Pella, in Cælogyria: and it is remarkable that not one Jew escaped! all either fell by the sword, perished by famine, or were led into captivity! According to their own imprecation, His blood be upon us and our children! God visited and avenged the innocent blood of Christ upon them and upon their posterity; and they continue to be monuments of His displeasure to the present day.

16 For men verily swear by the greater: and an oath for confirmation is to them an end of all strife.

17 Wherein God, willing more abundantly to show unto the heirs of promise the immutability of his counsel, confirmed it by an oath:

18 That by two immutable things, in which it was impossible for God to lie, we might have a strong consolation, who have fled for refuge to lay hold upon the hope set before us:

19 Which hope we have as an anchor of the soul, both sure and steadfast, and which entereth into that within the veil; 20 In which the forerunner is for us entered, even Jesus, who made an high priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec.

22 What is the meaning of by Thine own self? Rab. Eleazar answered, Thus said Moses to the holy blessed God, Lord of all the world, if thou hadst sworn to them by the heavens and the earth, then I should have said, As the heavens and the earth shall pass away, so may Thy oath pass away. But now Thou hast sworn unto them by Thy great name, which liveth, and which endureth for ever, and for ever and ever: therefore Thy oath shall endure for ever, and for ever and ever.

23 This is a good thought: if God had sworn by any thing finite, that thing might fail, and then the obligation was at an end;—but He has sworn by what is infinite, and cannot fail; therefore His oath is of eternal obligation.

24 We might have a strong consolation. There appears to be an allusion here to the cities of refuge, and to the persons who fled to them for safety. As the person who killed his neighbour unawares was sure, if he gained the city of refuge, he should be safe, and had strong consolation in the hope that he should reach it; this hope animated him in his race to the city; he ran, he fled, knowing that though in danger the most imminent of losing his life, yet, as he was now acting according to an ordinance of God, he was certain of safety provided he got to the place.

25 It is easy to apply this to the case of a truly penitent sinner. Thou hast sinned against God, and against thy own life! The avenger of blood is at thy heels! Jesus hath shed His blood for thee; He is thy Intercessor before the Throne; see to Him! Lay hold on the hope of eternal life which is offered unto thee in the Gospel! Delay not one moment! thou art never safe till thou hast redemption in His blood! God invites thee! Jesus spreads His hands to receive thee! God hath sworn that He willeth not the death of a sinner; then, He cannot will thy death: take God's oath, take His promise, credit what He hath spoken and sworn! Take encouragement! Believe on the Son of God; and thou shalt not perish, but have everlasting life!

26 Which hope we have as an anchor. The apostle here changes the allusion; he represents the state of the followers of God in this lower world, as resembling that of a vessel striving to perform her voyage through a troublesome, tempestuous, dangerous sea. At last she gets near the port; but the tempest continues, the water is shallow, broken, and dangerous, and she cannot get in: in order to prevent her being driven to sea again, she heaves out her sheet anchor, which she has been able to get within the pier head, by means of her boat, though she could not herself get in; then, swinging at the length of her cable, she rides out the storm in calmness, knowing that her anchor is sound, the ground good in which it is fastened, and the cable strong. Though agitated, she is safe; though buffeted by wind and tide, she does not drive; by and by the storm ceases, the tide flows in, her sailors take to the captain, wear the ship against the anchor, which still keeps its bite or hold, and she gets safely into port.—See on ver. 20

27 The comparison of hope to an anchor is frequent among the ancient heathen writers; who supposed it to be as necessary to the support of man in adversity, as the anchor is to the safety of the ship when about to be driven on a lee shore by a storm. "To ground hope on a false supposition," says Serenus, "is like trusting to a weak anchor."—He said farther, οὐρανὸν εὐνοίας ἀποκρίσας, οὐρανὸν εὐνοίας ἀποκρίσας ἔπαρσεν; a ship ought not to trust to one anchor, nor life to one hope. Ser. Serm. 109.

28 The hope of eternal life is here represented as the soul's anchor: the world is the boisterous, dangerous sea; the Christian course, the voyage; the port, everlasting felicity; and the veil, or inner road, the royal dock in which that anchor was cast. The storms of life continue but a short time: the anchor hope, if fixed by faith in the eternal world, will infallibly prevent all shipwreck; the soul may be strongly tossed by various temptations, but will not drive, because the anchor is sure ground, and itself is steadfast; it does not drag, and it does not break: faith, like the cable, is the connecting medium between the ship and the anchor, or the soul and its hope of heaven: faith sees the haven, hope desires and anticipates the rest; faith works and hope holds fast; and abiding, the soul enters into the haven of eternal repose.

29 Whither the forerunner. The word προδρομος, prodromos, does not merely signify one that goes or runs before another, but also one who shows the way; he who first does a particular thing; also the first-fruits. So in the Septuagint, Gen. xxviii. 4. προδρομος εὐνοίας signifies the first-fruits of the fig tree, or the first ripe figs.

30 To this meaning of the word Pliny refers, Hist. Nat. lib. xvi. c. 26. ἄνευ πατρὸς καὶ μητρὸς γεννηθείς. He had neither father nor mother; the genealogy not being reckoned. The Ethiopic: He had neither father nor mother upon earth; nor is his genealogy known.

As this passage has been obscure and troublesome to many, and I have thought it necessary to show the meaning of such phraseology by different examples, I shall, in order to give the reader full information on the subject, add a few observations from Dr. Owen.

"It is said of Melchisedec, in the first place, that he was ἀνευ πατρὸς, without father, and without mother. Whereon part of the latter clause, namely, 'without beginning of days,' doth depend. But how could a mortal man come into the world, without father or mother? 'Man that is born of a woman,' is the description of every man: what, therefore, can be intended? The next word declares, he was ἀγενεαλογητός: 'without descent,' say we. But γενεαλογία, is a generation, a descent, a pedigree, not absolutely, but rehearsed, described, recorded. Γενεαλογητός, is he whose stock and descent is entered on record. And so, on the contrary, ἀγενεαλογητός, is not he who has no descent, no genealogy; but he whose descent and pedigree is no where entered, recorded, reckoned up. Thus the apostle himself plainly expresses this word, ver. 6. ὁ μὴ γενεαλογημένος, εἰς αἰῶνα; 'whose descent is not counted,' that is, reckoned up in record. Thus was Melchisedec without father or mother, in that the Spirit of God, who so strictly and exactly recorded the genealogies of other patriarchs and types of Christ, and that for no less an end than to manifest the truth and faithfulness of God in His promises, speaks nothing to this purpose concerning him. He is introduced, as it were, one falling from heaven, appearing on a sudden, reigning at Salem, and officiating in the office of priesthood to the High God.

"2. On the same account is he said to be μὴτε ἀρχὴν ἡμερῶν, μὴτε τέλος ἡμερῶν, without beginning of days, or end of life." For, as he was a mortal man, He had both. He was assuredly born, and did no less certainly die, than other men. But neither of these are recorded concerning him. We have no more to do with him, to learn from him, nor are concerned in him, but only as he is described in the Scripture; and there is no mention therein of the beginning of his days, or the end of his life. Whatever, therefore, he might have in himself, he had none to us. Consider all the other patriarchs mentioned in the writings of Moses, and you shall find their descent recorded, who was their father, and so up to the first man; and not only so, but the time of their birth, the beginning of their days, and the end of their life, is exactly recorded. For it is constantly said of them, such an one lived so long, and begat such a son, which fixed the time of birth. Then of him so begotten, it is said he lived so many years, which determines the end of his days. These things are expressly recorded. But concerning Melchisedec, none of these things are spoken. No mention is made of father or mother; no genealogy is recorded of what stock, or progeny, he was; nor is there any account of his birth or death. So that all these things are wanting to him in this historical narration, wherein our faith and knowledge is alone concerned."

Made like unto the Son of God] Melchisedec was without father and mother, having neither beginning of days, nor end of life. His genealogy is not recorded. When he was born, and when he died, unknown. His priesthood, therefore, may be considered as perpetual. In these respects, he was like to Jesus Christ, who, as to His Godhead, had neither father nor mother, beginning of time, nor end of days; and has an everlasting Priesthood. The priesthood of Melchisedec is to abide continually on the same ground that he is said to be without father and mother; i. e. there is no record of the end of his priesthood, or life, no more than there is any account of his ancestry.

4. Consider how great this man was] There is something exceedingly mysterious in the person and character of this king of Salem; and to find out the whole is impossible. He seems to have been a sort of universal priest, having none superior to him in all that region; and confessedly superior even to Abraham himself, the father of the faithful, and source of the Jewish race. See ver. 7.

The patriarch Abraham] Ὁ πατριάρχης, either from πατήρ, a father, and ἀρχή, a chief, or head; or from πατριάρχης, ἀρχή, the head of a family. But the title is here applied, by way of eminence, to him who was the head, or chief, of all the fathers, or patriarchs of the patriarchs, and father of the faithful. The Syriac translates it Ulam and Rish Abakatha, "head of the fathers." The character and conduct of Abraham, place him as a man deservedly at the head of the human race.

5. They that are of the sons of Levi] The priests who are of the posterity of the Levites, and receive the priesthood in virtue of their descent from Aaron, have authority from the law of God to receive tithes from the people.

According to the law] That is, the Levites received a tenth

8 And here men that die receive tithes; but there he receiveth them, of whom it is witnessed that he liveth.

9 And as I may so say, Levi also, who receiveth tithes, payed tithes in Abraham.

10 For he was yet in the loins of his father, when Melchisedec met him.

11 If therefore perfection were by the Levitical priesthood, from the people. The priests received a tenth of this tenth from the Levites, who are here called their brethren, because they were of the same tribe, and employed in the same sacred work. The apostle is proceeding to show, that Melchisedec was greater even than Abraham, the head of the fathers; for to him Abraham gave tithes; and, as the Levites were the posterity of Abraham, they are represented here as paying tithes to Melchisedec, through Aim. Yet Melchisedec was not of this family, and, therefore, must be considered as having a more honourable priesthood than even Aaron himself; for he took the tenth from Abraham, not for his maintenance, for he was a king; but in virtue of his office, as universal high-priest of all that region.

6. Blessed him that had the promises.] This is a continuation of the same argument; namely, to show the superiority of Melchisedec; and, in consequence, to prove the superiority of the Priesthood of Christ beyond that of Aaron. As in the seed of Abraham all the nations of the earth were to be blessed, Abraham received a sacerdotal blessing from Melchisedec; who was the representative of the Messiah, the promised Seed; to show that it was through Him, as the High-Priest of the human race, that this blessing was to be derived on all mankind.

7. The less is blessed of the better.] That the superior blesses the inferior, is a general proposition; but Abraham was blessed of Melchisedec; therefore Melchisedec was greater than Abraham. "The blessing here spoken of," says Dr. Macknight, "is not the simple wishing of good to others, which may be done, by inferiors to superiors; but it is the action of a person authorized to declare God's intention to bestow good things on another. In this manner Isaac and Jacob blessed their children under a prophetic impulse. In this manner the priests under the law blessed the people; in this manner, likewise, Melchisedec, the priest of the Most High God, blessed Abraham."

8. Here men that die receive tithes] The apostle is speaking of the ecclesiastical constitution of the Jews, which was standing at the time this epistle was written. Under the Jewish dispensation, though the priests were successively removed by death, yet they were as duly replaced by others appointed from the same family; and the payment of tithes was never interrupted. But as there is no account of Melchisedec ceasing to be a priest, or of his dying; he is represented as still living, the better to point him out as a type of Christ, and to show his priesthood to be more excellent than that which was according to the law; as an unchanging priesthood must be more excellent than that which was continually changing.

But there he receiveth them] The οὗκ, ἕρῃ, in the first clause of this verse, refers to Mosaic institutions, as then existing the ἐκεί, ἕρῃ, in this clause, refers to the place in Genesis (chap. xiv. 20,) where it is related that Abraham gave tithes to Melchisedec, who is still considered as being alive, or without successor, because there is no account of his death, nor of any termination of his priesthood.

9. And as I may so say] Καὶ ὡς εἶπὼς αὐτῷ, And so to speak a word. This form of speech, which is very frequent among the purest Greek writers, is generally used to soften some harsh expression; or to limit the meaning when the proposition might otherwise appear to be too general. It answers fully to our so to speak—as one would say—I had almost said—in a certain sense. Many examples of its use by Aristotle, Philo, Lucian, Josephus, Demosthenes, Eschines, and Plutarch, may be seen in Raphetius and Kypke.

Payed tithes in Abraham.] The Levites, who were descendants of Abraham, payed tithes to Melchisedec, die, through Abraham, their progenitor and representative.

10. For he was yet in the loins of his father] That is, Levi was seemingly included in Abraham, his forefather.

11. If therefore perfection were by the Levitical priesthood] The word ἄνευ, as we have before said, signifies the completing or finishing of any thing, so as to leave nothing in perfect, and nothing wanting. Applied here to the Levitical priesthood, it signifies the accomplishment of that for which a priesthood is established, viz. giving the Deity an acceptable service; enlightening and instructing the people, pardonin all offences, purging the conscience from guilt, purifying the soul, and preparing it for heaven; and regulating the conduct of the people according to the precepts of the moral law. The perfection never came, and never could come, by the Levitical law;—it was the shadow of good things to come, but was in the substance. It represented a perfect system, but was in perfect in itself; it showed that there was guilt, and that there was an absolute need for a sacrificial offering to atone for sin and it typified that sacrifice; but every sacrificial act under that law most forcibly proved that it was impossible for it blood of bulls and goats to take away sin.

For under it the people received the law] That is, as we interpret this place, under the priesthood, ἡλικονομία being understood; because, on the priesthood, the whole Mosaic law and the Jewish economy, depended: but it is much better

For under it the people received the law) what farther need was there that another priest should rise after the order of Melchisedec; and not be called after the order of Aaron?

12 For, the priesthood being changed, there is made of necessity a change also of the law.

13 For he of whom these things are spoken pertaineth to another tribe, of which no man gave attendance at the altar.

14 For it is evident that our Lord sprang out of Juda; of which tribe Moses spake nothing concerning priesthood.

15 And it is yet far more evident: for that after the similitude of Melchisedec there ariseth another priest, understand our svra, on account of it, instead of under it; for it is a positive fact that the law was given before any priesthood was established; for Aaron and his sons were not called nor separated to this office till Moses came down the second time from the mount, with the tables renewed, after that he had broken them, Exod. xl. 12—14. But it was in reference to the great sacrificial system that the law was given; and on that law the priesthood was established: for, why was a priesthood necessary, but because that law was broken, and must be fulfilled?

16 Who is made, not after the law of a carnal commandment, but after the power of an endless life.

That another priest should rise) The law was given that the offence might abound, and sin appear exceeding sinful; and to show the absolute necessity of the Sacrifice and Mediation of the great Messiah: but it was neither perfect in itself, nor could it confer perfection; nor did it contain the original priesthood. Melchisedec had a priesthood more than four hundred years, (422,) before the law was given; and David prophesied, Psa. cx. 4. that another Priest should arise, after the order of Melchisedec, nearly five hundred years, (476,) after the law was given. The law, therefore, did not contain the original priesthood; this existed typically in Melchisedec, and really in Jesus Christ.

12. The priesthood being changed) That is, the order of Aaron being now abrogated, to make way for that which had succeeded it, the order of Melchisedec.

There is made of necessity a change also of the law) The very essence of the Levitical law consisting in its sacrificial offerings: and as these could not confer perfection, could not resuscitate God to man, purify the unholly heart, nor open the kingdom of heaven to the souls of men, consequently it must be abolished, according to the order of God Himself; for, He said, Sacrifice and offering, and burnt-offering, and sacrifice for sin, he would not; see Psal. xl. 6, 7. compared with Heb. x. 5—10. and with Psal. cx. 4. where it is evident God designed to change both the law, and the priesthood; and to introduce Jesus as the only Priest and Sacrifice; and to substitute the Gospel system for that of the Levitical institutions. The priesthood, therefore, being changed, Jesus coming in the place of Aaron, the law of ordinances and ceremonies, which served only to point out the Messiah, must of necessity be changed also.

12. For he of whom these things are spoken) That is, Jesus the Messiah, spoken of in Psa. cx. 4. who came from the tribe of Judah, not from the tribe of Levi, of which tribe no priest ever ministered at a Jewish altar, nor could minister, according to the law.

14. For it is evident) As the apostle speaks here with so much confidence, it follows that our Lord's descent from the tribe of Judah was incontrovertible. The genealogical tables, both in Matthew and Luke, establish this point; and whatever difficulties we may find in them now, there were none apprehended in those days: else the enemies of the Gospel would have urged this as a chief and unanswerable argument against Christ and His Gospel.

15. And it is yet far more evident) Kai nepiotepepon eri aretalon svra, and besides it is more abundantly strikingly manifest. It is very difficult to translate these words; but the apostle's meaning is plain, viz. that God designed the Levitical priesthood to be changed, because of the oath in Psal. cx. where, addressing the Messiah, He says, Thou art a Priest for ever, after the order, or omoivnra, similitude, of Melchisedec; who was not only a priest, but also a king. None of the Levitical priests sustained this double office; but they both, with that of prophet, appear and were exercised in the Person of our Lord, who is the Priest to which the apostle alludes.

16. Who is made) Appointed to this high office by God Himself; not succeeding one that was disabled or dead, according to that law, or ordinance, directed to weak and perishing men, who could not continue by reason of death.

This is probably all that the apostle intends by the words carnal commandment, svra svaviv; for carnal does not always mean sinful or corrupt; but feeble, frail, or what may be said of or concerning man, in his present dying condition.

But after the power of an endless life) Not dying, or ceasing through weakness, to be a priest; but properly immortal Himself, and having the power to confer life and immortality on others. His ever living as Priest, to make intercession for men; and they who believe on Him shall never perish, but have everlasting life.

17. For he testifieth) That is, either the Scripture in the place so often quoted, or God, by that Scripture.

17 For he testifieth, "Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec."

18 For there is verily a disannulling of the commandment going before for the weakness and unprofitableness thereof.

19 For the law made nothing perfect, but the bringing in of a better hope did; by the which we draw nigh unto God.

20 And inasmuch as not without an oath he was made priest;

21 (For those priests were made without an oath; but this with an oath by him that said unto him, "The Lord swears and will not repent, Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec;")

22 By so much "was Jesus made a surety of a better testament."

p. Or, but it was the bringing in. Gal. 2. 20.—c. Ch. 4. 15. & 6. 6.— Rom. 5. 2. Eph. 2. 15. & 3. 12. Ch. 4. 15. & 10. 19.—c. Or, without swearing of an oath.— Psalm 110. 4.— Ch. 8. 6. & 9. 15. & 12. 9.

Thou art a priest for ever) This is the proof that He was not appointed according to the carnal commandment; but according to the power of an endless life, because He is a Priest for ever; i. e. one that never dies, and is never disabled from performing the important functions of His office; for, if He be a Priest for ever, He ever lives.

18. For there is verily a disannulling) There is a total abrogation, πρωγονος εντολης, of the former law, relative to the Levitical priesthood.—See ver. 19.

For the weakness) It had no energy; it communicated none; it had no Spirit to minister; it required perfect obedience, but furnished no assistance to those who were under it.

And unprofitableness) No man was benefited by the mere observance of its precepts; it pardoned no sin, changed no heart, reformed no life; it found men dead in trespasses and sins, and it consigned them to eternal death. It was, therefore, weak in itself, and unprofitable to men.

The Jews, who still cleave to it, are a proof that it is both weak and unprofitable; for there is not a more miserable, distressed, and profligate class of men on the face of the earth.

19. For the law made nothing perfect) It completed nothing; it was only the outline of a great plan, the shadow of a glorious substance; see on ver. 11. It neither pardoned sin, nor purified the heart: nor gave strength to obey the moral precepts.—Οσδεν, nothing, is put here for Οσδεν, no person.

But the bringing in of a better hope) The original is very emphatic, εισαγωγην, the super introduction, or the after introduction; and this seems to be put in opposition to the πρωγονος εντολης, the preceding commandment, or former Levitical law of ver. 15. This went before to prepare the way of the Lord; to show the exceeding sinfulness of sin, and the strict justice of God. The better hope, which referred not to earthly, but to spiritual good, not to temporal, but eternal felicity, founded on the Priesthood and atonement of Christ, was afterward introduced for the purpose of doing what the law could not do; and giving privileges and advantages which the law would not afford. One of these privileges immediately follows:—

By the which we draw nigh unto God.) This is a sacerdotal phrase: the high-priest alone could approach to the Divine presence in the holy of holies; but not without the blood of the sacrifice; and that only once in the year. But through Christ, as our High-priest, all believers in Him have an entrance to the holiest by His blood; and through Him perform acceptable service to God. The better hope means in this place Jesus Christ, who is the Author and Object of the hope of eternal life, which all His genuine followers possess. He is called our hope, 1 Tim. i. 1. Col. i. 27.

20. Not without an oath) "The apostle's reasoning here is founded on this; that God never interposed His oath, except to show the certainty and immutability of the thing sworn, Thus He swore to Abraham, Gen. xxii. 16—18. That in his seed all the nations of the earth should be blessed: and to the rebellious Israelites, Deut. i. 34, 35. That they should not enter into his rest:—and to Moses, Deut. iv. 21. That he should not go into Canaan:—and to David, Psal. lxxxix. 4. That his seed should endure for ever, and his throne unto all generations. Wherefore, since Christ was made a Priest, not without an oath, that He should be a priest for ever, after the similitude of Melchisedec; that circumstance showed God's immutable resolution never to change or abolish His Priesthood; nor to change or abolish the covenant, which was established on His Priesthood: whereas the Levitical priesthood, and the law of Moses, being established without an oath, were thereby declared to be changeable at God's pleasure." This judicious note is from Dr. Macknight.

21. Those priests) The Levitical were made without an oath, to show that the whole system was changeable, and might be abolished:—

But this) The everlasting Priesthood of Christ, with an oath, to show that the Gospel dispensation should never change, and never be abolished.

By him) God the Father:—that said unto him, the promised Messiah, Psa. cx. 4.) The Lord swears, to show the immutability of His counsel:—And will not repent: can never change His mind nor purpose. Thou art a Priest for ever:—as long as time shall run, and the generations of men be continued on earth. Till the necessity of the mediatorial kingdom be superseded by the fixed state of eternity; till this kingdom be delivered up unto the Father, and God shall be all in all, shall this Priesthood of Christ endure.

23 And they truly were many priests, because they were not suffered to continue by reason of death:

24 But this man, because he continueth ever, hath an unchangeable priesthood.

25 Wherefore he is able also to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them.

26 For such an high-priest became us who is holy, harmless, v Or, which passeth not from one to another. — v Or, evermore. — Rom. 6. 34. 1 Tim. 2. 8. Ch. 2. 17. — John 2. 1. — Ch. 4. 15. — Eph. 4. 10. Ch. 8. 1.

22. By so much] This solemn unchangeable oath of God: was Jesus made a surety, τυπος, a mediator; one who brings the two parties together, witnesses the contract, and offers the covenant sacrifice on the occasion. See at end of the chapter.

A better testament] Καίριον διαθήκη, a better covenant; called in the title to the sacred books, which contain the whole Christian code, ἡ Καινὴ Διαθήκη, THE NEW COVENANT, thus contradistinguished from the Mosaic, which was the old covenant; and this is called the new and better covenant, because God has in it promised other blessings, to other people, on other conditions than the old covenant did. The new covenant is better than the old, in the following particulars:—1. God promised to the Jewish nation certain secular blessings, peculiar to that nation, on condition of their keeping the law of Moses; but, under the new covenant, He promises pardon of sin, and final salvation to all mankind, on condition of believing on Jesus Christ, and walking in his testimonies. 2. The Jewish priests, fallible, dying men, were mediators of the old covenant, by means of their sacrifices, which could not take away sin, nor render the comers thereunto perfect. But Jesus Christ, who liveth for ever, who is infinite in wisdom and power, by the sacrifice of Himself, has established this new covenant; and, by the shedding of His blood, has opened the kingdom of heaven to all believers.

23. And they truly were many priests] Under the Mosaic law, it was necessary there should be a succession of priests; because, being mortal, they were not suffered to continue always, by reason of death.

24. But this] Ὁ θε, but he, that is, Christ: because he continueth ever, is eternal, hath an unchangeable priesthood; ἀναπαύων ἑαυτοῦ, a priesthood that passeth not away from Him; He lives for ever, and He lives a Priest for ever.

25. Wherefore] Because He is an everlasting Priest, and has offered the only available sacrifice; He is able to save from the power, guilt, nature, and punishment, of sin—to the uttermost; eis to παντες, to all intents, degrees, and purposes; and always, and in and through; all times, places, and circumstances; for all this is implied in the original word:—but, in and through all times, seems to be the particular meaning here, because of what follows, he ever liveth to make intercession for them; this depends on the perpetuity of his priesthood, and the continuance of his mediatorial office.—As Jesus was the Lamb of God slain from the foundation of the world, has an everlasting priesthood, and is a continual intercessor, it is in virtue of this, that all who were saved from the foundation of the world, were saved through him; and all that shall be saved to the end of the world, will be saved through Him. He ever was, and ever will be, the High-priest, Sacrifice, Intercessor, and Mediator, of the human race. All successive generations of men are equally interested in Him, and may claim the same privileges. But none can be saved by his grace that do not come unto God through him; i. e. imploring mercy through Him as their Sacrifice and atonement; confidently trusting that God can be just, and yet the Justifier of them who thus come to Him, believing on Christ Jesus.

The phrase εὐχησάμενος, to make intercession for a person, has a considerable latitude of meaning. It signifies, 1. To come to, or meet a person on any cause whatever. 2. To intercede, pray for, or entreat, in the behalf of another. 3. To defend, or vindicate, a person. 4. To commend. 5. To furnish any kind of assistance or help. 6. And, with the preposition κατα, against, to accuse or act against another in a judicial way.

"The nature of the apostle's arguments," says Dr. Macknight, "requires, that by Christ's always living, we understand His always living in the body: for it is thus that he is an affectionate and sympathizing High-priest; who, in His intercession, pleads the merit of His death to procure the salvation of all who come unto God through him. Agreeably to this account of Christ's intercession, the apostle, in ver. 27, mentions the sacrifice of Himself, which Christ offered for the sins of the people, as the foundation of His intercession. Now, as He offered that Sacrifice in heaven, chap. viii. 2. 3. by presenting His crucified body there, (see chap. viii. 5, note) and as He continually resides there in the body, some of the ancients were of opinion, that His continual intercession consists in the continual presentation of His humanity before His Father; because it is a continual declaration of His earnest desire of the salvation of men, and of His having, in obedience to His Father's will, made Himself flesh, and suffered death to accomplish it.—See Rom. viii. 34. note 3. This opinion is confirmed by the manner in which the Jewish high-priest made intercession for the people on the day of atonement, and which was a type of Christ's intercession in heaven. He made it, not by offering of prayers for them, in the most holy place, but by sprinkling the blood of the sacrifices on the mercy-seat, in token of their death. And as, by that action, he opened the earthly holy places to the prayers and undefiled, separate from sinners, * and made higher than the heavens;

27 Who needeth not daily, as those high-priests, to offer up sacrifice, * first for his own sins, * and then for the people's for * this he did once, when he offered up himself.

28 For the law maketh * men high priests which have infirmity; but the word of the oath, which was since the law, * maketh the Son * who is * consecrated for evermore.

worship of the Israelites during the ensuing year; so Jesus, by presenting His humanity continually before the presence of His Father, opens heaven to the prayers of His people in the present life, and to their persons after the resurrection."

26. Such a high-priest became us] Such a High-priest was in every respect suitable to us—every way qualified to accomplish the end for which He came into the world. There is probably here an allusion to the qualifications of the Jewish high-priest:—

1. He was required to be holy, ἅγιος, answering to the Hebrew כהן חסיד, merciful. Holiness was his calling; and as he was the representative of his brethren, he was required to be merciful and compassionate.

2. He was to be harmless, ἀκατος, without evil, holy without, and holy within; injuring none, but rather living for the benefit of others.

3. He was undefiled, ἀπαύστος, answering to the Hebrew כהן טהור, without blemish; having no bodily imperfection. Nothing low, mean, base, or unbecoming, in his conduct.

4. He was separate from sinners, ἀπεχωρισμένος ἀπὸ τῶν ἁμαρτωλῶν; by his office, he was separated from all men and worldly occupations; and entirely devoted to the service of God. And, as to sinners or heathens, he was never to be found in their society.

5. Higher than the heavens. There may be some reference here to the exceeding dignity of the high-priesthood: it was the highest office that could be sustained by man; the high-priest himself being the immediate representative of God.

But these things suit our Lord in a sense in which they cannot be applied to the high-priest of the Jews.

1. He was holy, infinitely so; and merciful, witness His shedding His blood for the sins of mankind.

2. Harmless; perfectly without sin, in his humanity, as well as His Divinity.

3. Undefiled; contracted no sinful infirmity in consequence of His dwelling among men.

4. Separate from sinners; absolutely unblameable in the whole of His conduct; so that he could challenge the most inveterate of His enemies with Which of you convicteth me of sin? Who of you can show in my conduct the slightest deviation from truth and righteousness?

5. Higher than the heavens; more exalted than all the angels of God—than all created beings, whether thrones, dominions, principalities, or powers; because all these were created by Him and for Him, and derive their continued subsistence from His infinite energy.

But how was a person of such infinite dignity suitable to us? His greatness is put in opposition to our meanness. He was holy; we unholy: He was harmless; we harmful, injuring both ourselves and others. He was undefiled; we defiled, most sinfully spotted and impure. He was separate from sinners; we were joined to sinners, companions of the vile, the worthless, the profane, and the wicked. He was higher than the heavens; we baser, and lower than the earth; totally unworthy to be called the creatures of God. And had we not had such a Saviour, and had we not been redeemed at an infinite price, we should, to use the nervous language of Milton on another occasion, "after a shameful life and end in this world, have been thrown down eternally, into the darkest and deepest gulf of hell; where, under the despotic control, the trample and spurn of all the other damned, that in the anguish of their torture should have no other ease than to exercise a raving and bestial tyranny over us as their slaves, we should have remained in that plight for ever, the basest, the most wretched, the most under-foot and down-trodden vessels of perdition."—Milton on Reformation, in Ans.

27. Who needeth not daily] Though the high-priest offered the great atonement only once in the year; yet, in the Jewish services, there was a daily acknowledgment of sin; and a daily sacrifice offered by the priests, at whose head was the high-priest, for their own sins and the sins of the people. The Jews held that a priest who neglected his own expiatory sacrifice, would be smitten with death.—Sanhedr. f. 83. When they offered this victim, they prayed the following prayer:—"O Lord, I have sinned, and done wickedly, and gone astray before thy face; I, and my house, and the sons of Aaron, the people of thy holiness. I beseech thee, for thy name's sake, blot out the sins, iniquities, and transgressions, by which I have sinned, done wickedly, and gone astray before thy face, I and my house, and the sons of Aaron, the people of thy holiness; as it is written in the law of Moses thy servant.—(Lev. xvi. 30.)—On that day shall he make an atonement for you, to cleanse you, that ye may be clean from all your sins before the Lord!" To which the Levites answered, "Blessed be the name of the glory of thy kingdom, for ever and ever!"

This prayer states, that the priest offered a sacrifice, ἀνα er his own sins, and then for the sins of the people, as the postle asserts.

For this he did once) For Himself He offered no sacrifice; and the apostle gives the reason, He needed none; because he was holy, harmless, undefiled, and separate from sinners: and for the people, He offered Himself once for all, when He expired upon the cross.

It has been very properly remarked, that the sacrifice offered by Christ differed, in four essential respects, from those offered by the Jewish priests:—1. He offered no sacrifice for Himself, but only for the people. 2. He did not offer that sacrifice annually, but once for all. 3. The sacrifice which He offered was not of calves and goats, but of Himself. 4. This sacrifice was offered, not for one people, but for the whole human race: for He tasted death for every man.

23 For the law maketh men high-priests) The Jewish priests have need of these repeated offerings and sacrifices, because they are fallible sinful men: but the word of the oath, till referring to Psa. cx. 4.) which was since the law; foravid, who mentions this, lived nearly 500 years after the giving of the law, and consequently, that oath, constituting another priesthood, abrogates the law, and by this the law is abrogated, ἀνελεῖται, is perfected for evermore. Being High-priest without blemish, immaculately holy, every way perfect, immortal, and eternal, His is a Priest, εἰς τὸ αἰῶνα, ETERNITY.

1. There are several respects in which the apostle shows the priesthood of Christ to be more excellent than that of the law, which Priesthood was typified by that of Melchisedec. 1. Being after the order of Melchisedec, there was no need a rigorous examination of His genealogy to show His right. 2. He has an eternal Priesthood; whereas theirs was but temporal.

3. The other priests, as a token of the dignity of their office, and their state of dependence on God, received tithes from a people. Melchisedec, a priest and king, after whose order Christ comes, tithed Abraham, δέκατος τῶν Ἀβραάμ, the her of the patriarchs: Jesus, infinitely greater than all, having an absolute and independent life, needs none. He is no man's debtor, but all receive out of His fulness.

4. He alone can bless the people: not by praying for their sins merely, but by communicating the good which is necessary.

5. As another priesthood, different from that of Aaron, was promised, it necessarily implies that the Levitical priesthood is insufficient: the Priesthood of Christ being that promised, is greater than that of Aaron.

6. That which God has appointed and consecrated with an A, as to endure for ever, must be greater than that which has appointed, simply for a time: but the Priesthood of Christ is thus appointed; therefore, &c.

7. All the Levitical priests were fallible and sinful men; Christ was holy and undefiled.

8. The Levitical priests were only by their office distinguished from the rest of their brethren, being equally frail, mortal, and corruptible: but Jesus, our High-priest, is higher than the heavens. The statements from which these differences are drawn are all laid down in this chapter.

9. The word surety, εγγυος, in ver. 22 has been often abused, used in an unscriptural and dangerous sense, it may not amiss to inquire a little farther into its meaning. The word εγγυος, from εγγυω, a pledge, is supposed to be so used from being lodged, ἐν γυοῖς, in the hands of the creditor.

It is nearly of the same meaning with bail, and signifies engagement made by C. with A., that B. shall fulfil conditions then and there specified, for which C. makes itself answerable: if, therefore, B. fails, C. becomes wholly responsible to A. In such suretyship, it is never designed that C. shall pay any debt, or fulfil any engagement, that belongs to B.; but if B. fail, then C. becomes responsible, because he had pledged himself for B. In this scheme A. is a person legally empowered to take the bail or pledge, B. debtor, and C. the surety.—The idea, therefore, of B. paying his own debt, is necessarily implied in taking the surety. It is once to be supposed that the surety undertakes absolutely to pay the debt, his suretyship is at an end, and he becomes the debtor; and the real debtor is no longer bound. As the nature of the transaction becomes entirely changed, and we find nothing but debtor and creditor in the case. In this sense, therefore, the word εγγυος, which we translate surety, cannot be applied in the above case, for Christ never became surety that if men did not fulfil the conditions of this better covenant, i. e. repent of sin, turn from it, believe on the Son of God, and having received grace, walk as children of the light, and be faithful unto death; that He would do all these things for them Himself! This would be both absurd and impossible; and hence the gloss of some here is both absurd and dangerous—viz. "That Christ was the surety of the first covenant, to pay the debt; of the second, to perform the duty." That it cannot have this meaning in the passage in question, is sufficiently proved by Dr. Macknight; and, instead of extending my own reasoning on the subject, I shall transcribe his note:—

"The Greek commentators explain this word εγγυος very properly, by μεσῆτης, a mediator, which is its etymological meaning; for it comes from εγγυος, near, and signifies one who draws near, or who causes another to draw near. Now, as in this passage a comparison is stated between Jesus as a High-priest, and the Levitical high-priests; and as these were justly considered by the apostle as the mediators of the Sinaitic covenant, because, through their mediation the Israelites worshipped God with sacrifices, and received from Him, as their king, a political pardon, in consequence of the sacrifices offered by the high-priest on the day of atonement; it is evident that the apostle in this passage calls Jesus the High-priest, or Mediator of the better covenant; because, through His mediation, that is, through the sacrifice of Himself, which He offered to God, believers receive all the blessings of the better covenant. And as the apostle has said, ver. 16, that by the introduction of a better hope, εγγυωσθε, we draw near to God; he in this verse very properly calls Jesus εγγυος, rather than μεσῆτης, to denote the effect of His mediation.—See ver. 25. Our translators, indeed, following the Vulgate and Beza, have rendered εγγυος by the word surety, a sense which it has, Ecclesiasticus xix. 16. and which naturally enough follows from its etymological meaning; for the person who becomes surety for the good behaviour of another, or for his performing something stipulated, brings that other near to the party to whom he gives the security; he reconciles the two. But in this sense the word εγγυος is not applicable to the Jewish high-priests; for, to be a proper surety, one must either have power to compel the party to perform that for which he has become his surety; or in case of his not performing it, he must be able to perform it himself. This being the case, will any one say that the Jewish high-priests were sureties to God for the Israelites performing their part of the covenant of the law? Or to the people for God's performing His part of the covenant? As little is the appellation, surety of the new covenant, applicable to Jesus. For, since the new covenant does not require perfect obedience, but only the obedience of faith; if the obedience of faith be not given by men themselves, it cannot be given by another in their room; unless we suppose that men can be saved without personal faith. I must therefore infer, that those who speak of Jesus as the surety of the new covenant, must hold that it requires perfect obedience; which, not being in the power of believers to give, Jesus has performed it for them. But is not this to make the covenant of grace a covenant of works, contrary to the whole tenor of Scripture? For these reasons I think the Greek commentators have given the true meaning of the word εγγυος, in this passage, when they explain it by μεσῆτης, mediator."

The chief difference lies here: the old covenant required perfect obedience from the very commencement of life. This is impossible, because man comes into the world depraved; the new covenant declares God's righteousness for the remission of sins that are past; and furnishes grace to enable all true believers to live up to all the requisitions of the moral law, as found in the Gospels. But in this sense, Christ cannot be called the surety, for the reasons given above; for He does not perform the obedience of faith in behalf of any man. It is the highest privilege of believers to love God with all their hearts, and to serve Him with all their strength; and to remove their obligation to keep this moral law, would be to deprive them of the highest happiness they can possibly have on this side heaven.

sum, or chief articles of what the apostle has spoken concerning the eternal Priesthood of Christ, 1—5. The excellency the new covenant beyond that of the old, 6—9. OTEN.—Verbo 1. Of the things which we have spoken this is the sum) The word κεφαλαῖον, which we translate sum, signifies the chief, the principal, or head; or as St. Chrysostom explains it, κεφαλαῖον αὐτὸ τοῦ μυστηρίου λέγεται, "that which is greatest is always called κεφαλαῖον;" i. e. the head, chief.

2 We have such a high priest, who is set on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens) This is what the postle states to be the chief or most important point of all that he had yet discussed. His sitting down at the right hand of the throne of God, proves—1. That He is higher than all the high-priests that ever existed. 2. That the sacrifice which He offered for the sins of the world was sufficient and effectual, and as such accepted by God. 3. That He has all power in the heavens and in the earth, and is able to save and defend to the uttermost all that come to God through Him. 4. That He did not, like the Jewish high-priest, depart out of the holy ness: wherefore 'it is of necessity that this man have somewhat also to offer.

4 For, if he were on earth, he should not be a priest, seeing that there are priests that offer gifts according to the law:

5 Who serve unto the example and shadow of heavenly things, as Moses was admonished of God when he was about to make the tabernacle: for, see, saith he, that thou make all things according to the pattern showed to thee in the mount.

6 But now he hath obtained a more excellent ministry, by how much also he is the mediator of a better covenant, which was established upon better promises.

[Eph. 5.2. Ch. 9. 14.—Or, they are priests.—h. Col. 2.17. Ch. 2.23. & 10.1.—1. Esd. 5.40. & 2.20. & 2.2. Numb. 8.4. Act. 7.44.]

of holies, after having offered the atonement; but abides there at the throne of God, as a continual Priest, in the permanent act of offering His crucified body unto God, in behalf of all the succeeding generations of mankind. It is no wonder the apostle should call this sitting down at the right hand of the throne of the Divine Majesty, the chief or head of all that He had before spoken.

2. A minister of the sanctuary] Τῶν ἁγίων λειτουργῶν, a public minister of the holy things or places. The word λειτουργῶν, from λατρεῖν, public, and εργον, a work or office, means a person who officiated for the public, a public officer; in whom, and his work, all the people had a common right; hence our word Liturgy, the public work of prayer and praise, designed for the people at large; all having a right to attend it, and each having an equal interest in it. Properly speaking, the Jewish priest was the servant of the public; he transacted the business of the people with God. Jesus Christ is also the same kind of public officer: both as Priest and Mediator. He transacts the business of the whole human race with God. He performs the holy things or acts, in the true tabernacle, HEAVEN; of which the Jewish tabernacle was the type. The tabernacle was the place among the Jews, where God, by the symbol of His presence, dwelt. This could only typify heaven, where God, in His essential glory, dwells; and is manifest to angels and glorified saints; and hence heaven is called here the true tabernacle, to distinguish it from the type.

Which the Lord pitched] The Jewish tabernacle was man's work, though made by God's direction: the heavens, this true tabernacle, the work of God alone, and infinitely more glorious than that of the Jews. The tabernacle was also a type of the human nature of Christ, John 1. 14. And the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us: καὶ σκηνώσας ἐν ἡμῖν, and tabernacled among us: for, as the Divine presence dwelt in the tabernacle; so the fulness of the Godhead, bodily, dwelt in the man Christ Jesus. And this human body was the peculiar work of God, as it came not in the way of natural generation.

3. Every high-priest is ordained] Καθίσταται, is set apart, for this especial work.

Gifts and sacrifices] Δωρα τε καὶ θυσίας, eucharistic offerings, and sacrifices for sin. By the former, God's government of the universe, and His benevolence to His creatures, in providing for their support, were acknowledged.—By the latter, the destructive and ruinous nature of sin, and the necessity of an atonement, were confessed.

Wherefore—of necessity] If Christ be a High-priest, and if it be essential to the office of a high-priest to offer atoning sacrifices to God, Jesus must offer such. Now, it is manifest that, as He is the public Minister, officiating in the true tabernacle, as High-priest, He must make an atonement; and His being at the right hand of the Throne shows that He has offered, and continues to offer such an atonement.

4. For, if he were on earth] As the Jewish temple was standing when this epistle was written, the whole temple service continued to be performed by the legal priests, descendants of Aaron, of the tribe of Levi; therefore, if Christ had been then on earth, He could not have performed the office of a priest, being of the tribe of Judah; to which tribe, the office of the priesthood did not appertain.

There are priests that offer gifts] This is an additional proof that this epistle was written before the destruction of Jerusalem. As the word θυσία, sacrifices, is not added here, as it is ver. 3. is it any evidence that bloody sacrifices had then ceased to be offered? Or, are both kinds included in the word δωρα, gifts? But is δωρον, a gift, ever used to express a bloody sacrifice? I believe the Septuagint never use it for τὰς εὐχάριστας, which signifies an animal offered to God in sacrifice.

5. Who serve] Οἱ τῶν θεῶν λειτουργοὶ, who perform Divine worship.

Unto the example and shadow] Υποδηγμαὶ καὶ σκῆμα, with the representation and shadow; this is Dr. Macknight's translation, and probably the true one.

The whole Levitical service was a representation and shadow of heavenly things; it appears, therefore, absurd to say, that the priests served unto an example, or representation of heavenly things; they served rather unto the substance of those things, with appropriate representations and shadows. As Moses was admonished] Καθὼς ἐκχρημάτισατ Μωϋσῆν, as Moses was divinely warned or admonished of God.

According to the pattern] Κατὰ τὸν τύπον, according to the type, plan, or form. It is very likely that God gave a regular plan and specification of the tabernacle, and all its parts, to 7 For if that first covenant had been faultless, then should no place have been sought for the second.

8 For, finding fault with them, he saith, Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, when I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel and with the house of Judah:

9 Not according to the covenant that I made with their fathers in the day when I took them by the hand to lead them out of the land of Egypt; because they continued not in my covenant, and I regarded them not, saith the Lord.

10 For this is the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel after those days, saith the Lord; I will put my laws in their hearts, &c. Ch. 7. 11.—1 Jer. 31. 31, 32, 33, 34.—Ch. 13. 16.—Or, give.

Moses; and that, for this Divine plan, the whole was constructed.—see on Exod. xxv. 40.

6. Now hath he obtained a more excellent ministry] His office of Priesthood is more excellent than the Levitical; because the covenant is better, and established on better promises: the old covenant referred to earthly things; the new covenant, to heavenly. The old covenant had promises of secular good; the new covenant of spiritual and eternal blessings. As far as Christianity is preferable to Judaism; as far as Christ is preferable to Moses: as far as spiritual blessings are preferable to earthly blessings; and as far as the enjoyment of God throughout eternity, is preferable to the communication of earthly good during time: so far does the new covenant exceed the old.

7. If that first—had been faultless] This is nearly the same argument with that in chap. vii. 11. The simple meaning is; if the first covenant had been a provision for, and actually conferred pardon and purity, and given a title to, eternal life, then there could have been no need for a second. But the first covenant did not give these things; therefore a second was necessary: and the covenant that gives these things is the Christian covenant.

8. For, finding fault with them] The meaning is evidently this: God, in order to show that the first covenant was inefficient, saith to them, the Israelites, Behold, the days come when I will make a new covenant, &c. He found fault with the covenant, and addressed the people, concerning His purpose of giving another covenant, that should be such as the necessities of mankind required. As this place refers to Jerem. xxxi. 31—34, the words finding fault with them, may refer to the Jewish people, of whom the Lord complains that they had broken His covenant, though he was a husband to them.—See below.

With the house of Israel, and with the house of Judah] That is, with all the descendants of the twelve sons of Jacob. This is thought to be a promise of the conversion of all the Jews to Christianity; both of the lost tribes, and of those who are known to exist in Asiatic and European countries.

9. Not according to the covenant] The new covenant is of a widely different nature to that of the old; it was only temporal and earthly in itself, though it pointed out spiritual and eternal things. The new covenant is totally different from this, as we have already seen: and such a covenant, or system of religion, the Jews should have been prepared to expect, as the prophet Jeremiah had, in the above place, so clearly foretold it.

They continued not in my covenant] It should be observed, that the word διαθήκη, which we translate covenant, often means religion itself, and its various precepts. The old covenant in general, stated on God's side, I will be your God; on the Israelites' side, We will be thy people. This covenant they broke; they served other gods, and neglected the precepts of that holy religion which God had delivered to them.

And I regarded them not] Καθὼς ἠμέλησα αὐτοὺς, and I neglected them, or despised them; but the words in the Hebrew text, are ἠμέλησα αὐτὸν ὡς ἄνθρωπον ἄπιστον, which we translate, although I was a husband to them. If our translation be correct, is it possible to account for this most strange difference between the apostle and the prophet? Could the Spirit of God be the Author of such a strange, not to say contradictory, translation of the same words? Let it be observed:—1. That the apostle quotes from the Septuagint; and in quoting a version accredited by, and commonly used among the Jews, he ought to give the text as he found it; unless the Spirit of God dictated an extension of meaning, as is sometimes the case: but, in the present case, there seems to be no necessity to alter the meaning. 2. The Hebrew words will bear a translation much nearer to the Septuagint and the apostle than our translation intimates. The words might be literally rendered, and I was Lord over them, or I lorded, or ruled over them; i. e. I chastised them for their transgressions, and punished them for their iniquities. ὡς ἀνηλεῆς, I took no farther care of them, and gave them up into the hands of their enemies; and so they were carried away into captivity. This pretty nearly reconciles the Hebrew and the Greek, as it shows the act of God in reference to them is nearly the same, when the proper meaning of the Hebrew and Greek words is considered. Some suppose that the letter γ αἰν in קָדוֹשׁ is changed, for כֶּחֶץ, and that the word should be קָדוֹשׁ כֶּחֶץ, I have hated, or despised them. An ancient and learned Jew, Rab. Parchon, has these remarkable words on this passage, קָדוֹשׁ כֶּחֶץ אֵינֶנּוּ בְּכֹחַ הַשֵּׁנִי וְכֹחַ הַשֵּׁנִי אֵינֶנּוּ בְּכֹחַ הַשֵּׁנִי, and I, baali ben, translate, I hated them; for γ αἰν, is here changed into their mind, and write them in their hearts: and I will be to them a God, and they shall be to me a people.

11 And they shall not teach every man his neighbour, and every man his brother, saying, Know the Lord: for all shall know me, from the least to the greatest.

q Or, upon.—Zech. 5.5.—Isa. 54.13. John 6.45. 1 John 2.27.

and stands for eth; as it is said, their soul, hahatsi bi, translate hath hated me." None of the Hebrew MSS. collated by Kennicott, and De Rossi, give any various reading on this word. Some of the Versions have used as much latitude in their translations of the Hebrew, as the Septuagint. But it is unnecessary to discuss the subject any farther: the word yaal, itself, by the consent of the most learned men, signifies to disdain or despise; and this is pretty nearly the sense of the apostle's expression.

10. This is the covenant) This is the nature of that glorious system of religion which I shall publish among them after these days; i. e. in the times of the Gospel. I will influence them with the principles of law, truth, holiness, &c. and their understandings shall be fully enlightened to comprehend them.

And write them in their hearts) All their affections, passions, and appetites, shall be purified and filled with holiness and love to God and man; so that they shall willingly obey, and feel, that love is the fulfilling of the law. Instead of being written on tables of stone, they shall be written on the fleshy tables of their hearts.

I will be to them a God) These are two grand conditions by which the parties in this covenant or agreement are bound:—1. I will be your God. 2. Ye shall be my people. As the object of religious adoration to any man, is that Being from whom he expects light, direction, defence, support, and happiness; so God, promising to be their God, promises in effect to give them all these great and good things. To be God's people, implies that they should give God their whole hearts, serve Him with all their light and strength, and have no other object of worship or dependence but Himself. Any of these conditions broken, the covenant is rendered null and void; and the other party absolved from His engagement.

11. They shall not teach every man his neighbour) Under the old covenant, properly speaking, there was no public instruction: before the erection of synagogues, all worship was confined at first to the tabernacle, afterward to the temple. When synagogues were established, they were used principally for the bare reading of the law and the prophets: and scarcely any such thing as a public ministry for the continual instruction of the common people was found in the land, till the time of John Baptist, our Lord, and his apostles. It is true there were prophets, who were a sort of general teachers; but neither was their ministry extended through all the people; and there were schools of the prophets and schools of the rabbins; but these were for the instruction of select persons. Hence it was necessary that every man should do what he could, under that dispensation, to instruct his neighbour and brother. But the prophecy here indicates that there should be, under the Gospel dispensation, a profusion of Divine light; and this we find to be the case, by the plentiful diffusion of the Sacred Writings, and by an abundant Gospel ministry; and these blessings are not confined to temples or palaces, but are found in every corner of the land; so that, literally, all the people, from the least to the greatest, know and acknowledge the only true God; and Jesus Christ, whom He has sent. Almost every man, at least in this land, has a Bible, and can read it; and there is not a family that has not the opportunity of hearing the Gospel preached, explained, and enforced.

Some have thought, that from the least to the greatest is intended to signify the order in which God proceeds with a work of grace: He generally begins with the poor; and through them, the great and the high often hear the Gospel of Christ.

12. I will be merciful to their unrighteousness) In order to 12 For I will be merciful to their unrighteousness, and their sins and their iniquities will I remember no more.

13 In that he saith, A new covenant, he hath made the first old. Now that which decayeth and waxeth old is ready to vanish away.

t Rom. 11.27. Ch. 10.17.—u 2 Cor. 5.17.

be their God, as mentioned under the preceding verse, it is requisite that their iniquity should be pardoned: this is provided for by the immolation of Jesus Christ, as the covenant sacrifice. By His blood, redemption has been purchased; and all who, with penitent hearts, believe on the Lord Jesus, receive remission of sins; and God remembers their iniquities no more against them, so as to punish them on that account. All spiritual evil against the nature and law of God is represented here under the following terms:

1. Unrighteousness, adikia; injustice. This is against God, his neighbour, and himself.

2. Sin, hamartia; deviation from the Divine law, missing the mark; aiming at happiness, but never attaining it, because sought out of God, and in the breach of His laws.

3. Iniquity, avomia; lawlessness, not having, knowing, or acknowledging a law: having no law written in their hearts, and restrained by none in the conduct of their lives. All these are to be removed by God's mercy; and this is to be understood of His mercy in Christ Jesus.

13. He hath made the first old) That is, He has considered it as antiquated; and as being no longer of any force.

That which decayeth and waxeth old) Here is an allusion to the ancient laws, which either had perished from the tables on which they were written, through old age; or were fallen into disuse, or were abrogated.

Is ready to vanish away.) Egyros aphairontes, is about to be abolished. Dionysius of Halicarnassus, speaking of the laws of Numa, which had been written on oak boards, says, "Ac aphairontes onta en to xrono," which had perished through old age." And the word aphairontes is used to express the abolition of the law. The apostle, therefore, intimates that the old covenant was just about to be abolished; but he expresses himself cautiously and tenderly, that he might not give unnecessary offence.

1. When the apostle said, All shall know the Lord from the least to the greatest, under the new covenant; he had copious authority for saying so, from the rabbins themselves. In Sohar Chadaash, fol. 42. it is said, "In the days of the Messiah, knowledge shall be renewed in the world, and the law shall be made plain among all; as it is written, (Jer. xxxi. 33.) All shall know me from the least to the greatest." We find the following legend in Midraah Yalcut Simeoni, par. 2. fol. 46. "The Holy blessed God shall sit in Paradise, and explain the law; all the righteous shall sit before Him, and the whole heavenly family shall stand on their feet; and the Holy blessed God shall sit, and the new law, which he is to give by the Messiah, shall be interpreted."

In Sohar Genes, fol. 74. col. 291. we find these remarkable words, "When the days of the Messiah shall approach, even the little children in this world shall find out the hidden things of wisdom; and in that time all things shall be revealed to all men."

And in Sohar Levit, fol. 24. col. 95. "There shall be no time like this till the Messiah comes; and then the knowledge of God shall be found in every part of the world."

This day are all these sayings fulfilled in our ears: the word of God is multiplied; many run to and fro, and knowledge is increased; all the nations of the earth are receiving the Book of God; and every man hears in his own tongue wherein he was born. Parthians, and Medes, and Eamites; the dwellers in Mesopotamia, in Judea, in Cappadocia, in Pontus and Asia; Phrygia and Pamphylia; in Egypt, in Libya, strangers of Rome, Jews and proselytes; in Crete and Arabians; Americans, Indians, and Chinese, hear in their own tongues the wonderful works of God.

CHAPTER IX.

Of the first covenant, and its ordinances. 1. NOTES.—Verse 1. The first covenant had also ordinances) Our translators have introduced the word covenant as if diatheta had been, if not originally in the text, yet in the apostle's mind. Several MSS. but not of good note, as well as printed editions, with the Coptic versions, have oxnra, tabernacle; but this is omitted by ABDE several others, both the Syriac, Ethiopic, Armenian, Vulgate, some copies of the Itala, several of the Greek fathers; and it is, in all probability, a spurious reading: the whole context showing, that covenant is that to which the apostle refers, as that was the subject in the preceding chapter; and this is a continuation of the same discourse.

Ordinances—Δικαιωματα. Rites and ceremonies. A worldly sanctuary) Αγιον κοσμικον. It is supposed that the term worldly here, is opposed to the term heavenly, chap. viii. 5. and that the whole should be referred to the carnality or secular nature of the tabernacle service. But I think there is nothing plainer than that the apostle is speaking here in praise of this sublimely emblematic service: and hence he proceeds to enumerate the various things contained in the first tabernacle, which added vastly to its splendour and importance; such as the table of the shew-bread, the golden candlestick, the golden censer; the ark of the covenant, overlaid round about with gold, in which was the golden pot that had the manna, Aaron's rod that budded, and the two tables which God had written with His own finger: hence I am led to believe that κοσμος; is here taken in its proper natural meaning, and signifies adorned, embellished, splendid; and hence κοσμος, the world, tota hujus universi machina, calum et terram complectens et quicquid utriusque continetur, κοσμος dicitur, quod nihil est ei munditius, pulchrius et ornatius. Plin. Hist. Nat. l. ii. c. 3. Num quom κοσμος Græci nomine ornamenta appellaverunt, eum nos a perfectâ absolutâque elegantia, κόσμος. "The whole machine of this universe, comprehending the heavens and the earth, and whatsoever is contained in both, is called κοσμος; because nothing is more beautiful, more fair, more elegant." Hence, Pliny says, "That which the Greeks call κοσμος, ornament; we, (the Latins) from its perfect and absolute elegance, call mundum, world."—See on Gen. ii. 1.

The Jews believe that the tabernacle was an epitome of the world; and it is remarkable, when speaking of their city that they express this sentiment by the same Greek word, in Hebrew letters, which the apostle uses here: so, in Bereshith Rabba, a. 19. fol. 19. אין כל המון קוסמיקון כל קוסמיקון (κοσμικον) ελεθε ελκω αυ. "All this world is placed there." Philo says much to the same purpose.

If my exposition be not admitted, the next most likely is, that God has a worldly tabernacle as well as a heavenly one: that He as truly dwelt in the Jewish tabernacle, as He did in the heaven of heavens; the one being His worldly house, the other His heavenly house.

2. For there was a tabernacle made; the first wherein] The sense is here very obscure, and the construction involved, leaving out all punctuation, which is the case with all the very ancient MSS. the verse stands thus; — επειδη γαρ παρεσκευασθη η σκηνη εν η η τε λογια, κ. τ. λ. which I suppose an indifferent person, who understood the language, would, without hesitation, render, For there was the first tabernacle constructed, in which were the candlestick, &c. And this tabernacle or dwelling may be called the first dwelling-place which God had among men; to distinguish it from the second dwelling-place, the temple built by Solomon. For tabernacle here is to be considered in its general sense, as implying a dwelling.

To have a proper understanding of what the apostle relates here, we should endeavour to take a concise view of the tabernacle erected by Moses in the wilderness. This tabernacle was the epitome of the Jewish temple; or rather, according to this, as a model, was the Jewish temple built. It comprised, 1. The court, where the people might enter. 2. In this was contained the altar of burnt-offerings, on which were offered the sacrifices in general, besides offerings of bread, wine, and other things. 3. At the bottom or lower end of this court, was the tent of the covenant; the two principal parts of the tabernacle were, the holy place and the holy of holies. In the temple built by Solomon there was a court for the Levites, different from that of the people; and at the entrance of the holy place, a vestibule. But, in the tabernacle built by Moses, these parts were not found; nor does the apostle mention them here.

In the holy place, as the apostle observes, there were—

1. The golden candlestick of seven branches, on the south.
2. The golden altar, or altar of incense, on the north.
3. The altar, or table of the shew-bread; or where the twelve loaves, representing the twelve tribes, were laid before the Lord. 1. In each branch of the golden candlestick was a lamp; these were lighted every evening, and extinguished every morning. They were intended to give light by night.
2. The altar of incense was of gold; and a priest, chosen by lot each week, offered incense every morning and evening in a golden censer, which he probably left on the altar, after the completion of the offering.
3. The table of the shew-bread was covered with plates of gold; and on this, every sabbath, they placed twelve loaves in two piles, six in each, which continued there all the week, till the next sabbath, when they were removed, and fresh loaves put in their place. The whole of this may be seen in all its details, in the book of Exodus, from chap. xxxv. to xl.—See Calmet also.

Which is called the sanctuary] Ηεγ, ληγουσιν εγια. This is called holy. This clause may apply to any of the nouns in this verse, in the nominative case, which are all of the feminine gender; and the adjective εγια, holy, may be considered here as the nominative singular, feminine, agreeing with εγης. Several editions accent the words in reference to this construction. The word εγης, tabernacle, may be the proper antecedent; and then we may read εγια instead of εγια: but these niceties belong chiefly to grammarians.

3. And after the second veil] The first veil, of which the apostle has not yet spoken, was at the entrance of the holy place, and separated the temple from the court, and prevented the people, and even the Levites, from seeing what was in the holy place. The second veil, of which the apostle speaks here, separated the holy place from the holy of holies.

5 And over it the cherubims of glory shadowing the mercy-seat: of which we cannot now speak particularly.

6 Now, when these things were thus ordained, the priests went always into the first tabernacle, accomplishing the service of God.

7 But into the second went the high priest alone once every year.

ed the people, and even the Levites, from seeing what was in the holy place. The second veil, of which the apostle speaks here, separated the holy place from the holy of holies.

The tabernacle which is called the Holiest of all] That is, that part of the tabernacle which is called the holy of holies.

4. Which had the golden censer] It is evident that the apostle speaks here of the tabernacle built by Moses; and of the state and contents of that tabernacle, as they were during the life-time of Moses. For, as Calmet remarks, in the temple, which was afterward built, there were many things added, which were not in the tabernacle; and several things left out. The ark of the covenant, and the two tables of the law, were never found after the return from the Babylonish captivity. We have no proof that even, in the time of Solomon, the golden pot of manna, or the rod of Aaron, were either in or near the ark. In Solomon's temple the holy place was separated from the holy of holies, by a solid wall instead of a veil; and by strong wooden doors, 1 Kings vi. 31—33. In the same temple there was a large vestibule before the holy place; and round about this and the holy of holies there were many chambers, in three stories, 1 Kings vi. 5, 6. But there was nothing of all this in the Mosaic tabernacle; therefore, says Calmet, we need not trouble ourselves to reconcile the various scriptures which mention this subject; some of which refer to the tabernacle, others to Solomon's temple, and others to the temple built by Zerobabel; which places were very different from each other.

The apostle says, that the golden censer was in the holy of holies; but this is nowhere mentioned by Moses. But he tells us that the high-priest went in, once every year, with the golden censer to burn incense; and Calmet thinks this censer was left there all the year, and that its place was supplied by a new one, brought in by the priest the year following. Others think it was left just within the veil; so that the priest, by putting his hand under the curtain, could take it out, and prepare it for his next entrance into the holiest.

The ark of the covenant] This was a sort of chest overlaid with plates of gold, in which the two tables of the law, Aaron's rod, the pot of manna, &c. were deposited. Its top, or lid, was the propitiatory or mercy-seat.

And over it the cherubims of glory] Cherubim is the plural of cherub; and it is absurd to add our plural termination (s) to the plural termination of the Hebrew. The glory here signifies the shekinah, or symbol of the Divine Presence.

Shadowing the mercy-seat] One at each end of the ark, with their faces turned towards each other, but looking down on the cover or propitiatory, (καρπιον, here called the mercy-seat.

Of which we cannot now speak particularly] The apostle did not judge any farther account of these to be necessary; and I may be excused from considering them particularly here, having said so much on each in the places where they occur in the Pentateuch. What these point out, or signify, is thus explained by St. Cyril; Christus licet unus sit, multifarium tamen et nobis intelligitur. Ipse est Tabernaculum propter carnem legumentum: ipse est Mense, quia voster cibus est et vita. Ipse est Arca habens legem Dei conditam, quia est Verbum Patris: Ipse est Candelabrum, quia est lux spiritualis: Ipse est Altare incensæ quia est odor suavitatis in sanctificationem: Ipse est Altare holocausti, quia est hostia pro totius mundi vita in cruce oblata. "Although Christ be but one, yet he is understood by us under a variety of forms. He is the Tabernacle, on account of the human body in which He dwelt. He is the Table, because He is our Bread of Life. He is the Ark which has the law of God inclosed within; because He is the Word of the Father. He is the Candlestick, because He is our spiritual light. He is the Altar of incense, because He is the sweet-smelling odour in sanctification. He is the Altar of burnt-offering, because He is the victim, by death on the cross, for the sins of the whole world." This father has said, in a few words, what others have employed whole volumes on; by refining, spiritualizing, and allegorizing.

6. When these things were thus ordained] When the tabernacle was made, and its furniture placed in it, according to the Divine direction.

The priest went always into the first tabernacle] That is, into the first part of the tabernacle, or holy place, into which he went every day twice, accomplishing the services, vos hæreticus et ceteros, which included his burning the incense at the morning and evening sacrifice, in dressing the lamps, removing the old shew-bread, and laying on the new; and in sprinkling the blood of the sin-offerings before the veil, Lev. iv. 6. and for these works, he must have constant access to the place.

7. But into the second] That is, the holy of holies, or second part of the tabernacle—the high priest alone, once every year, that is, on one day in the year only, which was the day on which the general atonement was made. The priest could enter into this place only on one day in the year; but on that day he might enter several times.—See Lev. xvi.

9 Which was a figure for the time then present, in which were offered both gifts and sacrifices, that could not make him that did the service perfect, as pertaining to the conscience : 10 Which stood only in meats and drinks, and divers washings, and carnal ordinances, imposed on them until the time of reformation.

[Not without blood] The day prescribed by the law for this great solemnity was, the tenth of the month Tisri, in which the high-priest brought in the incense or perfumes, which he placed on the golden censer: he brought also the blood of the bullock, and sprinkled some portion of it seven times before the ark and the veil which separated the holy place from the holy of holies.—See Lev. xvi. 14. He then came out; and taking some of the blood of the goat which had been sacrificed, he sprinkled it between the veil and the ark of the covenant, ver. 15.

Which he offered for himself, and for the errors of the people [Ἐπεὶ τὸν ἑαυτοῦ ἁμαρτιῶν ἕνεκα] For transgressions of which they were not conscious: there were so many niceties in the ritual worship of the Jews, and so many ways in which they might offend against the law, and incur guilt, that it was found necessary to institute sacrifices to atone for these sins of ignorance. And, as the high-priest was also clothed with iniquity, he required to have an interest in the same sacrifice, on the same account. This was a national sacrifice; and by it the people understood that they were absolved from all the errors of the past year; and that they now had a renewed right of access to the mercy-seat.

8. The Holy Ghost this signifying] These services were livelyly appointed; and by each of them the Holy Spirit of God is supposed to speak.

The way into the holiest] That full access to God was not the common privilege of the people, while the Mosaic economy subsisted: that the apostle means, that it is only by Christ that any man, and every man can approach God, is evident from chap. x. 19—22. and it is about this, and not about the tabernacle of this world, that he is here discoursing.

I have already observed, that the apostle appears to use the word σκηνή, or tabernacle, in the general sense of a dwelling-place; and therefore applies it to the temple, which was reputed the house or dwelling-place of God, as well as the ancient tabernacle. Therefore, while he speaks here concerning the first tabernacle, he may be understood as applying with propriety to the then Jewish temple, as well as to the ancient tabernacle; which, even with all their sacrifices and ceremonies, could not make the way of holiness plain, nor the way to God's favour possible.

9. Which] Tabernacle and its services was a figure, καταβολή, a dark enigmatical representation for the time then present, for that age and dispensation; and for all those who lived under it.

In which, καθ' οὗ, during which time or dispensation were offered both gifts and sacrifices, eucharistic offerings, and victims for sin; that could not make him that did the service, whether the priest or who made the offering, or the person who brought it in the behalf of his soul, perfect as pertaining to the conscience; could not take away guilt from the mind, nor purify the conscience from dead works. The whole was a figure, or dark representation, of a spiritual and more glorious system: and although a sinner, who made these offerings and sacrifices according to the law, might be considered as having done his duty, and thus he would be exempted from any ecclesiastical and legal disabilities and punishments; yet his conscience would ever tell him that the guilt of sin was still remaining; and that it was impossible for the blood of bulls and goats to take it away. Thus even he that did the rite best, continued to be imperfect; had a guilty conscience, and an unholiness heart.

The words, in which, καθ' οὗ, referred in the above passage to τὸν καιρὸν, the time, are read καθ' οὗ, by ABD. and several others; one copy of the Slavonic, the Vulgate, and one of the fathers, and thus refer to τὴν σκηνήν, the tabernacle; and this is the reading which our translators appear to have followed. Griesbach places it in his margin, as a very observable reading; but I prefer the other.

10. In meats and drinks, and divers washings] He had already mentioned eucharistic and sacrificial offerings; and thing properly remained but the different kinds of clean and unclean animals which were used, or forbidden to be used, as articles of food; together with the different kinds of inks, washings, βαπτισμοί, baptisms, immersions, sprinkings and washings of the body and the clothes, and carnal ordinances, or things which had respect merely to the body; it could have no moral influence upon the soul, unless considered in reference to that of which they were the similitude, figures.

monies pertaining merely to the body. The word carnal is not used here, nor scarcely in any part of the New Testament, in that catachrestical or degrading sense in which many preachers and professors of Christianity take the liberty to use it.

Imposed on them until the time of reformation.] These rites and ceremonies were enacted by Divine authority, as proper representations of the Gospel system, which should reform and rectify all things.

The time of reformation, καιρὸς διορθώσεως, the time of rectifying, signifies the Gospel dispensation, under which every thing is set straight: every thing referred to its proper purpose and end; the ceremonial law fulfilled and abrogated; the moral law exhibited, and more strictly enjoined; (See our Lord's sermon upon the mount,) and the spiritual nature of God's worship taught, and grace promised to purify the heart; so that, through the power of the eternal Spirit, all that was wrong in the soul is rectified; the affections, passions, and appetites purified; the understanding enlightened; the judgment corrected; and the will reformed: in a word, all things made new.

11. But Christ being come, a high-priest of good things] I think this and the succeeding verses not happily translated: indeed, the division of them has led to a wrong translation; therefore, they must be taken together thus:—But the Christ, the high-priest of those good things (or services) which were to come, through a greater and more perfect tabernacle, not made with hands, that is, not of the same workmanship, entered once for all into the sanctuary; having obtained eternal redemption for us, not by the blood of goats and calves, but by his own blood, ver. 13. For, if the blood of goats, and bulls, and calves, and an heifer's ashes, sprinkled on the unclean, sanctifieth to the cleansing of the flesh, (ver. 14.) how much more shall the blood of Christ, who, through the eternal Spirit, offered himself, without spot, to God, cleanse your consciences from dead works, in order to worship, (or, that ye may worship,) the living God ?

In the above translation I have added in ver. 13. ἵνα προσέσθω, of goats, on the authority of ABDPE. three others, the Syriac, the Arabic of Erpenius, Coptic, Vulgate, two copies of the Itala, and Theodoret. And I have rendered τὴν ἑαυτοῦ ἁμαρτιῶν, (ver. 14.) in order to worship, or, THAT YE MAY WORSHIP; for this is the meaning of these particles, εἰς το, in many parts of the New Testament. I shall now make a few observations on some of the principal expressions.

High-priest of good things] Or services, to come; τὸν μελλόντων ἀγαθῶν. He is the High-priest of Christianity: He officiates in the behalf of all mankind; for, by Him are all the prayers, praises, and services, of mankind offered to God; and He ever appears in the presence of God for us.

A greater and more perfect tabernacle] This appears to mean our Lord's human nature. That in which dwelt all the fulness of the Godhead bodily, was fitly typified by the tabernacle and temple; in both of which the majesty of God dwelt.

Not made with hands] Though our Lord's body was a perfect human body, yet it did not come in the way of natural generation: His miraculous conception will sufficiently justify the expression used here by the apostle.

12. But by his own blood] Here the redemption of man is attributed to the blood of Christ; and this blood is stated to be shed in a sacrificial way, precisely as the blood of bulls, goats, and calves, was shed under the law.

Once] Once for all, ἑσάρα, in opposition to the annual entering of the high-priest into the holiest, with the blood of the annual victim.

The holy place] Or sanctuary, τὰ ἅγια, signifies Azeen, into which Jesus entered with His own blood, as the high-priest entered into the holy of holies with the blood of the victims which he had sacrificed.

Eternal redemption] Αἰώνιον λύτρωσις, a redemption price, which should stand good for ever, when once offered; and an endless redemption from sin; in reference to the pardon of which, and reconciliation to God, there needs no other sacrifice; it is eternal in its merit and efficacy.

13. Sanctifieth to the purifying of the flesh] Answers the end proposed by the law; namely, to remove legal disabilities and punishments; having the body and its interests particularly in view, though adumbrating or typifying the soul and its concerns.

M. Who through the eternal Spirit] This expression is un-

16 For where a testament is, there must also of necessity be the death of the testator.

17 For <sup>t</sup> a testament is of force after men are dead: otherwise it is of no strength at all while the testator liveth.

18 Whereupon neither the first testament was dedicated without blood.

derstood two ways: 1. Of the Holy Ghost himself. As Christ's miraculous conception was by the Holy Spirit, and He wrought all His miracles by the Spirit of God, so His death, or final offering, was made through or by the eternal Spirit; and by that Spirit He was raised from the dead, 1 Pet. iii. 18. Indeed, through the whole of His life, He was justified by the Spirit; and we find that in this great work of human redemption, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit were continually employed; therefore the words may be understood of the Holy Spirit properly. 2. Of the eternal Logos, or Deity, which dwelt in the man Christ Jesus; through the energy of which the offering of His humanity became an infinitely meritorious victim: therefore, the Deity of Christ is here intended. But we cannot well consider one of these distinct from the other; and hence probably arose the various readings in the MSS. and Versions on this article. Instead of dia Pneumatos aionios, by the eternal Spirit, dia Pneumatou, 'Aywv, by the Holy Spirit, is the reading of D'. and more than twenty others of good note; besides the Coptic, Slavonic, Vulgate, two copies of the Itala, Cyril, Athanasius sometimes, Damascenus, Chrysostom, and some others. But the common reading is supported by ABD. and others, besides the Syriac, all the Arabic, Armenian, Ethiopic, Athanasius, generally, Theodoret, Theophylact, and Ambrosius. This, therefore, is the reading that should be preferred; as it is probable that the Holy Ghost, not the Logos, is what the apostle had more immediately in view. But still we must say, that the Holy Spirit, with the eternal Logos, and the almighty Father, equally concurred in offering up the sacrifice of the human nature of Christ, in order to make atonement for the sin of the world.

Purge your consciences. Καθαίρει τὴν συνείδησιν, purify your consciences. The term purify should be every where, both in the translation of the Scriptures, and in preaching the Gospel, preferred to the word purge; which at present is scarcely ever used in the sense in which our translators have employed it.

Dead works. Sin in general; or acts to which the penalty of death is annexed by the law.—See the phrase explained, chap. vi. 1.

15. And for this cause] Some translate dia rovra, on account of this (blood.) Perhaps it means no more than a mere inference, such as therefore or wherefore.

He is the mediator of the new testament] There was no proper reason why our translators should render διωτης by testament, here: when, in almost every other case, they render it covenant, which is its proper ecclesiastical meaning, as answering to the Hebrew מְדִינָה berith, which see largely explained, Gen. xv. 10. and in other places of the Pentateuch.

Very few persons are satisfied with the translation of the following verses, to the 20th, particularly the 16th and 17th: at all events, the word covenant must be retained. He, Jesus Christ, is Mediator:—the μεστωρ, or mediator, was the person who witnessed the contract made between the two contracting parties, slew the victim, and sprinkled each with its blood.

Of the new testament] The new contract betwixt God and the whole human race, by Christ Jesus, the Mediator, distinguished here from the old covenant between God and the Israelites, in which Moses was the mediator.

That by means of death] His own death upon the Cross.

For the redemption of the transgressions] To make atonement for the transgressions which were committed under the old covenant, which the blood of bulis and calves could not do: so the death of Jesus had respect to all the time antecedent to it, as well as to all the time afterward till the conclusion of the world.

They which are called] The Gentiles might receive the promise; might, by being brought into a covenant with God, have an equal right with the Jews, not merely to an inheritance such as the promised land; but to an eternal inheritance; and, consequently, infinitely superior to that of the Jews; inasmuch as the new covenant is superior, in every point of view, to the old.

How frequently the Gentiles are termed εκλημενοι, and εκαλημενοι, the called, all St. Paul's writings show. And they were thus termed, because they were called and elected in the place of the Jews, the ancient called and elect: who are now divorced and reprobated, because of their disobedience.

16. For where a testament is] A learned and judicious friend furnishes me with the following translation of this and the 17th verse:—

"For, where there is a covenant, it is necessary that the death of the appointed victim should be exhibited, because a

19 For when Moses had spoken every precept to all the people according to the law, he took the blood of calves and of goats, and of water, and scarlet wool, and hyssop, and sprinkled both the book, and all the people, 20 Saying, This is the blood of the testament which God hath enjoined unto you.

21 Moreover he sprinkled likewise with blood both the tabernacle, and all the vessels of the ministry.

22 And almost all things are by the law purged with blood; and without shedding of blood is no remission.

covenant is confirmed over dead victims; since it is not at all valid while the appointed victim is alive."

He observes, "There is no word signifying testator, or wren, in the original. Διωτης is not a substantive, but a participle, or participial adjective, derived from the same root as διωτης, and must have a substantive understood. I therefore render it, the disposed or appointed victim; alluding to the manner of disposing or setting apart the pieces of the victim when they were going to ratify a covenant; and you know well the old custom of ratifying a covenant to which the apostle alludes. I refer to your own notes on Gen. vi. 13. and xv. 10.—J. C."

Mr. Wakefield has translated the passage nearly in the same way:

"For, where a covenant is, there must be necessarily introduced the death of that which establisheth the covenant, because a covenant is confirmed over dead things; and is of no force at all whilst that which establisheth the covenant is alive." This is undoubtedly the meaning of this passage, and we should endeavour to forget that testament and testator were ever introduced, as they totally change the apostle's meaning.—See the observations at the end of this chapter.

13. Whereupon] Οθεν, wherefore, as a victim was required for the ratification of every covenant, the first covenant made between God and the Hebrews, by the mediation of Moses, was not dedicated, εσταθισται, renewed or solemnized, without blood, without the death of a victim, and the asperson of its blood.

19. When Moses had spoken every precept] The place to which the apostle alludes is Exod. xxiv. 4—8. where the reader is requested to consult the notes.

And sprinkled both the book] The sprinkling of the book is not mentioned in the place to which the apostle refers (see above), nor did it in fact take place. The words ερε τρε βιβλιον, and the book itself, should be referred to καθωσ, taking; and not to επαρται, he sprinkled: the verse should therefore be read thus.—For after every commandment of the law had been recited by Moses to all the people, he took the blood of the calves, and of the goats, with water, and scarlet wool, and hyssop, and the book itself, and sprinkled all the people. The rite was performed thus:—Having received the blood of the calves and goats into basins, and mingled it with water, to prevent it from coagulating; he then took a bunch of hyssop: and having bound it together with a strand made of scarlet wool, he dipped this in the basin, and sprinkled the blood and water upon the people who were nearest to him, and who might be considered, on this occasion, the representatives of all the rest. For it is impossible that he should have had blood enough to have sprinkled the whole of the congregation.

Some think that the blood was actually sprinkled upon the book itself, which contained the written covenant, to signify that the covenant itself was ratified by the blood.

20. This is the blood of the testament] (Covenant.) Our Lord refers to the conduct of Moses here, and partly quotes his words in the institution of the eucharist. This is my blood of the new covenant, which is shed for many, for the remission of sins, Matt. xxvi. 28. And by thus using the words and applying them, He shows that His sacrificial blood was intended by the blood shed and sprinkled on this occasion; and that by it alone the remission of sins is obtained.

21. He sprinkled—with blood—all the vessels of the ministry] To intimate that every thing used by sinful man is polluted; and that nothing can be acceptable in the sight of a holy God, that has not, in effect, the sprinkling of the atoning blood.

22. And almost all things are—purged with blood] The apostle says almost, because in some cases certain vessels were purified by water, certain by fire, Numb. xxxi. 23. and some with the ashes of the red heifer, Numb. xix. 2—10. but it was always understood that every thing was at first consecrated by the blood of the victim.

And without shedding of blood is no remission.] The apostle shows fully here, what is one of his great objects in the whole of this epistle, viz. that there is no salvation but through the sacrificial death of Christ; and to prefigure this, the law itself would not grant any remission of sin, without the blood of a victim. This is a maxim even among the Jews themselves, אין עופרת אלא בדם ein cophrah, ala bdam, "There is no expiation but by blood." Yoma, fol. 5. l. Menachoth, fol. 93. 2. Every sinner has forfeited his life by his transgressions, and the law of God requires his death;—the blood of the victim, which is its life, is shed as a substitute for the life of the sinner. By these victims the sacrifice of Christ was typified.

23 It was therefore necessary that the patterns of things in the heavens should be purified with these; but the heavenly things themselves with better sacrifices than these.

24 For Christ is not entered into the holy places made with hands, which are the figures of the true; but into heaven itself, now to appear in the presence of God for us;

25 Nor yet that he should offer himself often, as the high priest entereth into the holy place every year with blood of others;

[Ch. 8:1-4 Ch. 8:10-11 Ch. 8:12-13 Rom. 8:31. Ch. 8:37. [John 2:1-4 Ver. 7-11 Ver. 12. Ch. 7:27-30. 10:10. 1 Pet. 3:18-19. 1 Cor. 10:11. Gal. 4:4. Eph. 1:16.]

He gave His life for the life of the world; human life for human life; but a life infinitely dignified by its union with God.

23. The patterns of things in the heavens) That is, the tabernacle, and all its utensils, services, &c. must be purified by these, viz. the blood of calves and goats, and the sprinkling of the blood and water with the bunch of hyssop bound about with scarlet wool. These are called patterns, τροπίαι, para, examples, earthly things, which were the representatives of heavenly things. And there is no doubt that every thing in the tabernacle, its parts, divisions, utensils, ministry, &c. as appointed by God, were representations of celestial matters; but how far, and in what way, we cannot now see.

Purification implies not only cleansing from defilement, but the dedication, or consecration. All the utensils employed in the tabernacle service were thus purified, though incapable of any moral pollution.

But the heavenly things themselves) Some think this means heaven itself, which, by receiving the sacrificed body of Christ, which appears in the presence of God for us, may be said to be purified, i. e. set apart for the reception of the souls of those who have found redemption in His blood. 2. Others think the body of Christ is intended, which is the tabernacle in which His Divinity dwelt; and that this might be said to be purified by its own sacrifice, as He is said, John xvii. to sanctify Himself: that is, to consecrate Himself unto God, as a sin-offering, for the redemption of man. 3. Others suppose the church is intended, which He is present to the Father without spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing. 4. As the entrance to the holy of holies must be made by the sprinkling of the blood of the sacrifice, and as that holy of holies represented heaven, the apostle's meaning seems to be, that there was and could be no entrance to the holiest but through His blood: and, therefore, when by a more perfect tabernacle, ver. 11, 12. He passed into the heavens, not with the blood of bulls and goats, but by His own blood, He thus purified or laid open the entrance to the holiest, by a more valuable sacrifice than those required to open the entrance of the holy of holies. It was necessary, therefore, for God had appointed it so, that the tabernacle, and its parts, &c. which were patterns of things in the heavens, should be consecrated and entered with such sacrifices as have already been mentioned; but the heaven of heavens, into which Jesus entered, and whither He will bring all His faithful followers, must be propitiated, consecrated, and entered, by the infinitely better sacrifice of His own body and blood. That this is the meaning, appears from the following verse.

24. Christ is not entered into the holy places made with hands) He is not gone into the holy of holies of the tabernacle or temple, as the Jewish high-priest does, once in the year, with the blood of the victim to sprinkle it before the mercy-seat there; but into heaven itself, which he has thus opened to all believers, having made the propitiatory offering, by which both he, and those whom he represents, are entitled to enter, and enjoy eternal blessedness. And hence we may consider, that Christ appearing in His crucified body before the throne, is a real offering of Himself to the Divine justice, in behalf of man; and that there He continues, in the constant act of being offered, so that every penitent and believer coming unto God, through Him, find Him their ever ready and available Sacrifice, officiating as the High-priest of mankind in the presence of God.

25. Nor yet that he should offer himself often) The sacrifice of Christ is not like that of the Jewish high-priest—his must be offered every year; Christ has offered himself once for all; and this sacrificial act has ever the same efficacy, His crucified body being still powerful and infinitely meritorious sacrifice before the throne.

26. For then must he often have suffered) In the counsel of God, Christ was considered the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world, Rev. xiii. 8. so that all believers before His advent, were as equally interested in His sacrificial death as those who have lived since His coming. Humanly speaking, the virtue of the annual atonement could not last long, and must be repeated: Christ's sacrifice is ever the same: His life's blood is still considered as in the act of being continually poured out. See Rev. v. 6.

The end of the world) The conclusion of the Jewish dispensation—the Christian dispensation being that which shall continue till the end of time.

To put away sin) Ἐξ ἁρτηνῶν ἀμαρτίας, to abolish sin-offerings; i. e. to put an end to the Mosaic economy by His one offering of Himself. It is certain that after Christ had offered Himself, the typical sin-offerings of the law ceased: and this was expressly foretold by the prophet Daniel, ch. ix. 24. Some think that the expression should be applied to the putting away the guilt, power, and being, of sin from the souls of believers.

26 For then must he often have suffered since the foundation of the world: but now once in the end of the world hath he appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself.

27 And as it is appointed unto men once to die, but after this the judgment:

28 So Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many; and unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time without sin unto salvation.

[Gen. 8:10. Exodus 3:10.—9 Cor. 5:10. Rev. 20:12, 13.—4 Rom. 6:10. 1 Pet. 3:18.—1 Pet. 2:24. 1 John 2:2.—1 Matt. 25:10. Rom. 8:10.—4 Th. 2:13. 2 Pet. 3:12.]

27. As it is appointed) Ἀπορίται, it is laid before them by the Divine decree, Dust thou art, and unto dust thou shalt return. Unto men—generally, during the course of the present world—not all men, as some falsely quote: for Enoch and Elijah have not died; and those that shall be alive at the day of judgment shall not die, but be changed.

But after this the judgment) They shall die but once, and be judged but once; therefore, there is no metempsychosis, no transmigration from body to body; judgment succeeds in dying; and, as they shall be judged but once, they can die but once.

28. So Christ was once offered) He shall die no more: He has borne away the sins of many: and what He has done once, shall stand good for ever. Yet He will appear a second time without sin, χωρίς ἁμαρτίας, without a sin-offering—τῆρας He has already made.

Unto salvation) To deliver the bodies of believers from the empire of death, reunite them to their purified souls, and bring both into His eternal glory. This is salvation; and the very highest of which the human being is capable. Amen, even so, come Lord Jesus! Hallelujah!

In the preceding notes I have given my reasons for dissenting from our translation of the 15th, 16th, and 17th verses. Many learned men are of the same opinion; but I have not met with any who appears to have treated the whole in a more satisfactory manner than Dr. Macknight: and for the edification of my readers I shall here subjoin the substance of what he has written on this point.

Verse 15. Mediator of the new covenant) See Heb. viii. 7. The word διαθήκη, here translated covenant, answers to the Hebrew word, berith, which all the translators of the Jewish scriptures have understood to signify a covenant. The same signification our translators have affixed to the word διαθήκη, as often as it occurs in the writings of the evangelists and apostles; except in the history of the institution of the Supper, and in 2 Cor. iii. 6. and Heb. vii. 22. and in the passage under consideration; in which places, copying the Vulgate version, they have rendered διαθήκη by the word testament. Beza, following the Syriac version, translates διαθήκη every where by the words foedus, pactum, except in the 16th, 17th, and 20th verses of this chapter, where likewise, following the Syriac version, he has testamentum. Now, if καινή διαθήκη, the New Testament, in the passages above-mentioned, means the Gospel covenant, as all interpreters acknowledge, παλαιά διαθήκη, the Old Testament, 2 Cor. iii. 14. and ἡ πρώτη διαθήκη, the first testament, Heb. ix. 15. must certainly be the Sinaitic covenant, or law of Moses; as is evident also from Heb. ix. 20. On this supposition it may be asked, 1. In what sense the Sinaitic covenant, or law of Moses, which required perfect obedience to all its precepts under penalty of death, and allowed no mercy to any sinner, however penitent, can be called a testament, which is a deed conferring something valuable on a person, who may accept or refuse it, as he thinks fit? Besides the transaction at Sinai, in which God promised to continue the Israelites in Canaan, on condition they refrained from the wicked practices of the Canaanites, and observed His statutes, Lev. xviii. can in no sense be called a testament.

2. If the law of Moses be a testament, and if, to render that testament valid, the death of the testator be necessary, as the English translators have taught us, ver. 16. I ask, who was it that made the testament of the law? Was it God, or Moses? And did either of them die to render it valid? 3. I observe, that even the Gospel covenant is improperly called a testament; because, notwithstanding all its blessings were procured by the death of Christ, and are most freely bestowed, it lost any validity which, as a testament, it is thought to have received, by the death of Christ, when He revived again on the third day. 4. The things affirmed in the common translation of ver. 15. concerning the New Testament: namely, that it has a Mediator: that that Mediator is the Testator Himself; that there were transgressions of a former testament, for the redemption of which the Mediator of the New Testament died; and ver. 19. that the first testament was made by sprinkling the people, in whose favor it was made, with blood; are all things quite foreign to a testament. For, was it ever known, in any nation, that a testament needed a mediator? Or, that the testator was the mediator of his own testament? Or, that it was necessary the testator of a new testament should die to redeem the transgressions of a former testament? Or, that any testament was ever made by sprinkling the legatees with blood? These things, however, were usual in covenants. They had mediators, who assisted at the making of them, and were sureties for the performance of them. They were commonly ratified by sacrifices, the blood of which was sprinkled on the parties; withal, if any former covenant was infringed by the parties, satisfaction was given at the me-king of a second covenant. 5. By calling Christ the Mediator of the New Testament our thoughts are turned away entirely from the view which the Scriptures give us of His death as a sacrifice for sin: whereas, if He is called the Mediator of the New Covenant, which is the true translation of διασφραγισμὸς εὐαγγελίου, that appellation directly suggests to us, that the New Covenant was procured and ratified by His death as a sacrifice for sin. Accordingly Jesus, on account of His being made a Priest by the oath of God, is said to be the Priest, or Mediator of a better covenant than that of which the Levitical priests were the mediators. I acknowledge that in classical Greek διασφραγισμὸς commonly signifies a testament. Yet, since the Seventy have uniformly translated the Hebrew word berith, which properly signifies a covenant, by the word διασφραγισμὸς, in writing Greek the Jews naturally used διασφραγισμὸς for εὐαγγελίον, as our translators have acknowledged, by their version of Heb. x. 16. To conclude, seeing, in the verses under consideration, διασφραγισμὸς may be translated a covenant; and seeing, when so translated, those verses make a better sense, and agree better with the scope of the apostle's reasoning, than if it were translated a testament; we can be at no loss to know which translation of διασφραγισμὸς in these verses ought to be preferred. Nevertheless, the absurdity of a phraseology, to which readers have been long accustomed, without attending distinctly to its meaning, does not soon appear.

"He is the Mediator. Here it is remarkable that Jesus is not called διασφραγισμὸς, the Testator, but μεσστής, the Mediator, of the New Covenant; first, because His procured the New Covenant for mankind, in which the pardon of sin is promised; for, as the apostle tells us, His death, as a sacrifice for sin, is the consideration on account of which the pardon of the transgressions of the first covenant is granted. Secondly, because the new covenant having been ratified, as well as procured, by the death of Christ, He is fitly called the Mediator of that covenant in the same sense that God's oath is called, Heb. vi. 17. the mediator, or confirmer of His promise. Thirdly, Jesus, who died to procure the New Covenant, being appointed by God the High-priest thereof, to dispense His blessings, He is on that account also called, Heb. viii. 6. the mediator of that better covenant.

"Verse 16. For whose covenant (is made sacrifice) there is a necessity that the death of the appointed sacrifice be produced. This elliptical expression must be completed, if, as is probable, the apostle had now in his eye the covenant which God made with Noah and Abraham. His covenant is recorded Gen. viii. 20. where we are told, that on coming out of the ark, Noah offered a burnt-offering of every clean beast and fowl. And the Lord smelled a sweet savour. And the Lord said in his heart, I will not again curse the ground, neither will I again smite any more every living thing as I have done. This promise, or declaration, God called His covenant with men, and with every living creature. Gen. ix. 9, 10. In like manner God made a covenant with Abraham by sacrifice, Gen. xv. 9, 18. and with the Israelites at Sinai, Exod. xxiv. 8. See also Psalm 1. 5. By making His covenants with men in this manner, God taught them that His intercourses with them were all founded on an expiation afterward to be made for their sins, by the sacrifice of the Seed of the woman, the bruising of whose heel, or death, was foretold at the fall. On the authority of these examples, the practice of making covenants by sacrifice prevailed among the Jews: Jer. xxxiv. 18. Zech. ix. 11. and even among the heathens; for they had the knowledge of these examples by tradition. Stabant et caesib jungebant fœdera porcū: Virgil, Æneid, viii. 611. Hence the phrases, ſœdus ferre and percute, to strike, or kill the covenant.

"There is a necessity that the death, τὸ διασφραγισμὸς, of the appointed. Here we may supply either the word θύματα, sacrifice, or ζῶα, animal, which might be either a calf, a goat, a bull, or any other animal, which the parties making the covenant chose. Διασφραγισμὸς is the participle of the second aorist of the middle voice of the verb διατίθημι, constituo, I appoint. Wherefore its primary and literal signification is, of the appointed. Our translators have used the word this sense, Luke xxii. 29. Κἀγὼ διατίθημαι ὑμῖν, καθὼς διατίθητε μοι ὁ Πατήρ μου βασιλείαν. And I appoint to you a kingdom, as my Father hath appointed to me a kingdom.

"He brought in—ἑσαυτον αναχθησθεσθαι τὸ διασφραγισμὸς. Elsner, Vol. II. p. 361, has showed that the word φερεσθαι is sometimes used in a forensic sense for what is produced or proved, or made apparent in a court of judicature. Wherefore the apostle's meaning is, that it is necessary the death of the appointed sacrifice be brought in, or produced, at the making of the covenant. In the margin of our Bibles this clause is rightly translated be brought in. See Acts xxv. 7. where φερεσθαι is used in a forensic sense.

"Verse 17. A covenant is firm over dead sacrifices; Ἐστὶν νεκρῶν. Νεκρῶν being an adjective, it must have a substantive agreeing with it, either expressed or understood. The substantive understood in this place, I think, is θύματα, sacrifice, for which reason I have supplied it in the translation. Perhaps the word ζῶα, animal, may be equally proper; especially as, in the following clause, διασφραγισμὸς is in the gender of the animals appointed for the sacrifice. Our translators have supplied the word ἀνθρώπων, men, and have translated εἰς νεκρῶν, after men are dead, contrary to the propriety of the phrase.

"I never hath force while the appointed lieth. Ὅτι ἡ δίασφραγισμὸς: supply πορεύσῃ, or παύσῃ, or ναύσῃ; whilst the calf, or goat, or bull, appointed for the sacrifice of ratification lieth. The apostle having, in ver 15. showed that Christ's death was necessary, as ὁ Μεσστής, the Mediator, that is, the Procurer and Ratifier of the New Covenant, he, in the 16th and 17th verses, observes, that since God's covenants with men were all ratified by sacrifice, to show that his intercourses with men are founded on the sacrifice of His Son, it was necessary that the New Covenant itself should be ratified by His Son's actually dying as a sacrifice."

The fullness of the common translation of the 15th, 16th, 17th, 18th, and 20th verses of this chapter having been already shown in the notes, nothing needs be added here, except to call the reader's attention to the propriety and strength of the apostle's reasoning, as it appears in the translation of those verses, which I have given, compared with his reasoning, as represented in the common version.

2. It is supposed that in verse 28. the apostle in speaking about Christ's bearing the sins of many, alludes to the ceremony of the scape goat. This mysterious sacrifice was to be presented to God, Lev. xvi. 7. and the sins of the people were to be confessed over the head of it, ver. 21. and after this the goat was dismissed into a land uninhabited, laden, as the institution implied, with the sins of the people; and this the word ἀνελάμβανεν, to bear or carry away, seems to imply. So truly as the goat did metaphorically bear away the sins of the many; so truly did Christ literally bear the punishment due to our sins; and, in reference to every believer, has so borne them away, that they shall never more rise in judgment against him.

3. In Christ's coming, or appearing the second time, it is very probable, as Dr. Doddridge, and others, have conjectured, that there is an allusion to the return of the high-priest from the inner tabernacle. For, after appearing there in the presence of God, and making atonement for the people in the plain dress of an ordinary priest, Lev. xvi. 23, 24. he came out arrayed in his magnificent robes, to bless the people, who waited for him in the court of the tabernacle of the congregation. "But there will be this difference," says Dr. Macknight, "between the return of Christ to bless his people, and the return of the high-priest to bless the congregation. The latter, after coming out of the most holy place, made a new atonement in his pontifical robes, for himself and for the people, Lev. xvi. 24. which showed that the former atonement was not real, but typical. Whereas Jesus, after having made atonement [and presented Himself in heaven, before God] will not return to the earth for the purpose of making Himself a sacrifice the second time. But having procured an eternal redemption for us, by the sacrifice of Himself once offered, He will return for the purpose of declaring to them who wait for Him, that they are accepted, and of bestowing on them the great blessing of eternal life. This reward He, being surrounded with the glory of the Father, Mark xvi. 27. will give them in the presence of an assembled universe, both as their King and their Priest. This is the great salvation which Christ came to preach, and which was confirmed to the world by them who heard Him, Heb. ii. 3." Reader, say this sincerely to heart!

4. The form in which the high-priests and the ordinary priests were to bless the people, after burning the incense in the tabernacle, is prescribed Num. vi. 23-26. Literally translated from the Hebrew, it is as follows, and consists of three parts, or benedictions:

1. May Jehovah bless thee, and preserve thee!
2. May Jehovah cause His face to shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee!
3. May Jehovah lift up His faces upon thee, and may He put prosperity unto thee!—See my notes on the place.

We may therefore say, that Christ, our High-priest, came to bless each of us, by turning us away from our iniquity. And let no one ever expect to see Him at His second coming with joy, unless he have, in this life, been turned away from his iniquity, and obtained remission of all his sins, and that holiness, without which none can see God. Reader, the time of His reappearing is, to thee, at hand! Prepare to meet thy God!

On the word conscientias, which occurs so often in this chapter, and in other parts of this epistle, see the observations at the end of chap. xiii.

NOR the law having a shadow of good things to come, and not the very image of the things, can never with those sacrifices which they offered year by year continually make the comers thereunto perfect.

For then would they not have ceased to be offered? because that the worshippers once purged should have had no more conscience of sins.

But in those sacrifices there is a remembrance again made of sins every year.

NOTES.—Verse 1. The law having a shadow of good things to come! A shadow, ecia, signifies—1. Literally, the shade cast from a body of any kind, interposed between the place on which the shadow is projected, and the sun or light; the rays of the light not shining on that place, because intercepted by the opacity of the body, through which they cannot pass. 2. It signifies, technically, a sketch, rude plan, or imperfect draught, of a building, landscape, man, beast, &c. 3. It signifies, metaphorically, any faint adumbration, symbolical expression, imperfect or obscure image of a thing; and is opposed to ecia, body, or the thing intended to be thereby defined. 4. It is used anachronistically among the Greek writers, as umbra is among the Latins, to signify any thing vain, empty, light, not solid: Quæ Philostratus, Vit. Soph. lib. i. cap. 20. Ori ecia kai outopos an abova tara, all pleasures are but shadows and dreams. And Cicero, in Pison, cap. 24. Omnes, subvæ falsæ gloria consecrari. "All pursue the SHADOWS of FALSE GLORY."

And again, De offic, lib. iii. cap. 17. Non veri juris germanaque iustitias solidam et expressam æquæ mentium tenemus: umbra et inæquibus umbræ. "We have no solid and express efficacy of true law, and genuine justice; but we employ shadows and images to represent them."

And not the very image) Εἰκων, image, signifies—1. A simple representation; from εἰκω, I am like. 2. The form, or particular fashion, of a thing. 3. The model, according to which any thing is formed. 4. The perfect image of a thing, as opposed to a faint representation. 5. Metaphorically, a similitude, agreement, or conformity.

The law, with all its ceremonies and sacrifices, was only a shadow of spiritual and eternal good. The Gospel is the image or thing itself, as including every spiritual and eternal good.

We may note three things here—1. The shadow, or general outline, limiting the size and proportions of the thing to be represented. 2. The image or likeness completed from this shadow, or general outline: whether represented on paper, canvas, or in statuary. 3. The person or thing thus represented in its actual natural state of existence; or what is called here the very image of the things, αὐτὴν τῆν εἰκονα τῶν πραγμάτων. Such is the Gospel, when compared with the law; such is Christ, when compared with Aaron; such is His sacrifice, when compared with the Levitical offerings; such is the Gospel remission of sins and purification, when compared with those afforded by the law; such is the Holy Ghost ministered by the Gospel, when compared with its types and shadows in the Levitical service; such the heavenly rest, when compared with the earthly Canaan. Well, therefore, might the apostle say, the law was only the shadow of good things to come.

Can never—make the comers thereunto perfect] Cannot remove guilt from the conscience, or impurity from the heart. I leave preachers to improve these points.

2. Would they not have ceased to be offered? Had they made an effectual reconciliation for the sins of the world, and contained in their one offering, a plenitude of permanent merit, they would have ceased to be offered, at least in reference to any individual who had once offered them; because, in such a case, his conscience would be satisfied that his guilt had been taken away. But no Jew pretended to believe that even the annual atonement cancelled his sin before God; yet he continued to make his offerings, the law of God having so enjoined, because these sacrifices pointed out that which was to come. They were offered, therefore, not in consideration of their own efficacy, but as referring to Christ: see on chap. ix. 9.

4. For it is not possible] Common sense must have taught them that shedding the blood of bulls and goats could never satisfy Divine Justice, nor take away guilt from the conscience; and God intended that they should understand the matter so; and this the following quotation from the Psalmist sufficiently proves.

5. When he (the Messiah) cometh into the world] Was about to be incarnated, He said to God the Father, Sacrifice and offering thou wouldest not; it was never Thy will and design that the sacrifices under Thy own law should be considered as

4 For, it is not possible that the blood of bulls and of goats should take away sins.

5 Wherefore, when he cometh into the world, he saith, a Sacrifice and offering thou wouldest not, but a body hast thou prepared me:

6 In burnt offerings and sacrifices for sin thou hast had no pleasure.

7 Then said I, Lo, I come (in the volume of the book it is written of me), to do thy will, O God.

8 Mic. 6. 6, 7. Ch. 9. 13. Ver. 11.—Ps. 40. 6, 7, & 50. 5, &c. Isa. 1. 11. Jer. 6. 20. Amos 6. 21, 22.—Or, thou hast fitted me.

making atonement for sin; they were only designed to point out My incarnation and consequent sacrificial death; and therefore a body hast thou prepared me, by a miraculous conception in the womb of a virgin; according to Thy word, the seed of the woman shall bruise the head of the serpent.

A body hast thou prepared me] The quotation in this and the two following verses is taken from Psalm xl. 6th, 7th, and 8th verses, as they stand now in the Septuagint, with scarcely any variety of reading; but, although the general meaning is the same, they are widely different in verbal expression in the Hebrew. David's words are, אני עבדך אנוני מן הבטן anayim carita li, which we translate, my ears hast thou opened; but they might be more properly rendered, my ears hast thou bored; that he, thou hast made me thy servant for ever, to dwell in Thine own house: for the allusion is evidently to the custom mentioned Exod. xxi. 2, &c. "If thou buy a Hebrew servant, six years shall he serve, and in the seventh he shall go out free: but if the servant shall positively say, I love my master, &c. I will not go out free, then his master shall bring him to the door-post, and shall bore his ear through with an awl, and he shall serve him for ever."

But how is it possible that the Septuagint and the apostle should take a meaning so totally different from the sense of the Hebrew? Dr. Kennicott has a very ingenious conjecture here: he supposes that the Septuagint and apostle express the meaning of the words as they stood in the copy from which the Greek translation was made; and that the present Hebrew text is corrupted in the word אנוני anayim, ears, which has been written through carelessness for אני an as געאכ, געאכ, a root. The first syllable אני an, אני, is the same in both; and the latter ני nim, which, joined to אני an, makes אנוני anayim, might have been easily mistaken for אני geach, געאכ; אני an, being very like גמיל; גי, like גי gi; and ה he, like final h mem; especially if the line on which the letters were written in the MS. happened to be blacker than ordinary, which has often been a cause of mistake, it might have been easily taken for the under stroke of the mem, and thus give rise to a corrupt reading: add to this, the root אני carah, signifies as well to prepare as to open, bore, &c. On this supposition the ancient copy translated by the Septuagint, and followed by the apostle, must have read the text thus, אני עבדך אני an geach carita li; אנוני an geach carita li, then a body thou hast prepared me; thus the Hebrew text, the Version of the Septuagint, and the apostle, will agree in what is known to be an indisputable fact in Christianity; namely, that Christ was incarnated for the sin of the world.

The Ethiopic has nearly the same reading: the Arabic has both, A body thou hast prepared me, and mine ears thou hast opened. But the Syriac, the Chaldeæ, and the Vulgate, agree with the present Hebrew text; and none of the MSS. collated by Kennicott and De Rossi have any various reading on the disputed words.

It is remarkable, that all the offerings and sacrifices which were considered to be of an atoning or cleansing nature, offered under the law, are here enumerated by the Psalmist and the apostle, to show that none of them, nor all of them, could take away sin; and that the grand sacrifice of Christ was that alone which could do it.

Four kinds are here specified, both by the Psalmist and the apostle—viz. זבחים, זב zabach, קריבה, קרבה, קריבה, קריבה minchah, קריבה; זבחים, קרבה, קרבה, קרבה, קרבה, קרבה minchah, קרבה; זבחים, קרבה, קרבה, קרבה, קרבה, קרבה minchah, קרבה; זבחים, קרבה, קרבה, קרבה, קרבה, קרבה minchah, קרבה.—Of all these we may say, with the apostle, it was impossible that the blood of bulls and goats, &c. should take away sin.

6. Thou hast had no pleasure] Thou couldest never be pleased with the victims under the law; Thou couldest never consider them as atonements for sin; as they could never satisfy Thy justice, nor make Thy law honourable.

7. In the volume of the book] בספר benigellath sepher, "in the roll of the book." Anciently books were written on skins, and rolled up. Among the Romans, these were called volumina, from volvo, I roll; and the Pentateuch, in the 9 Then said he, Lo, I come to do thy will, O God. He taketh away the first, that he may establish the second.

10 By the which will we are sanctified, I through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all.

11 And every priest standeth daily ministering and offering oftentimes the same sacrifices, which can never take away sins:

12 But this man, after he had offered one sacrifice for sins, for ever sat down on the right hand of God;

13 From henceforth expecting till his enemies be made his footstool.

Jewish synagogues, is still written in this way. There are two wooden rollers; on one they roll on, on the other they roll off, as they proceed in reading. The book mentioned here must be the Pentateuch, or five books of Moses; for, in David's time, no other part of Divine revelation had been committed to writing. This whole book speaks about Christ, and His accomplishing the will of God; not only in The Seed of the woman shall bruise the head of the serpent, and In thy Seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed, but in all the sacrifices and sacrificial rites mentioned in the law.

To do thy will] God willed not the sacrifices under the law; but He willed that a human victim of infinite merit should be offered for the redemption of mankind. That there might be such a victim, a body was prepared for the eternal Logos; and in that body He came to do the will of God: that is, to suffer and die for the sins of the world.

He taketh away the first] The offerings, sacrifices, burnt-offerings, and sacrifices for sin, which were prescribed by the law.

That he may establish the second] The offering of the body of Jesus, once for all. It will make little odds in the meaning, if we say, He taketh away the first covenant, that He may establish the second covenant; He takes away the first dispensation, that he may establish the second; He takes away the law, that He may establish the Gospel. In all these cases the sense is nearly the same: I prefer the first.

By the which will we are sanctified] Closing in with this so solemnly declared will of God, that there is no name given under heaven among men, by which we can be saved, but Jesus the Christ; we believe in Him, and redemption in His blood, and are sanctified unto God, through the sacrificial offering of His body.

1. Hence we see that the sovereign will of God is, that Jesus should be incarnated: that He should suffer and die; or, in the apostle's words, taste death for every man: that all should believe on Him, and be saved from their sins; for this is the will of God, our sanctification.

2. And as the apostle grounds this on the words of the Psalm, we see that it is the will of God, that that system shall end: for, as the essence of it is contained in its sacrifices, and God says He will not have these, and has prepared the Messiah to do His will, i. e. to die for men, hence it necessarily follows from the Psalmist himself that the introduction of the Messiah into the world is the abolition of the law; and that His Sacrifice is that which shall last for ever.

11. Every priest standeth] The office of the Jewish priest is here compared with the office of our High-priest. The Jewish priest stands daily at the altar, like a servant ministering, repeating the same sacrifices; our High-priest offered Himself once for all, and is sat down at the right-hand of God, as the only-begotten Son and Heir of all things, ver. 12. This continual offering argued the imperfection of the sacrifices. Our Lord's once offering, proves His was complete.

13. Till his enemies be made his footstool] Till all that opposed His High-priesthood and sacrificial offering shall be defeated, routed, and confounded; and acknowledge in their punishment, the supremacy of His power as universal and eternal King; who refused to receive Him as their atoning and sanctifying Priest. There is also an oblique reference here to the destruction of the Jews, which was then at hand; for Christ was about to take away the second with an overwhelming flood of desolations.

14. For by one offering] His death upon the cross.

He hath perfected for ever] He has procured remission of sins and holiness: for it is well observed here, and in several parts of this epistle, that τελειωσις, to make perfect, is the same as ἀποινα αμαρτιων ποιησις, to procure remission of sins.

Them that are sanctified] Τους αγιαζομενους, them that have received the sprinkling of the blood of this Offering. These therefore, receiving redemption through that blood, have no need of any other offering; as this was a complete atonement, purification, and title to eternal glory.

15. The Holy Ghost—is a witness to us] The words are quoted from Jer. xxxi. 33, 34, and here we are assured that Jeremiah spoke by the inspiration of the Spirit of God.

Hath said before] See chap. viii. 10, 12, and the notes there.

18. Now where remission of these is] In any case, where sin is once pardoned, there is no farther need of a sin-offering; but every believer on Christ has his sin blotted out, and therefore needs no other offering for that sin.

14 For, by one offering he hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified.

15 Wherof the Holy Ghost also is a witness to us: for after that he had said before,

16 This is the covenant that I will make with them after those days, saith the Lord, I will put my laws into their hearts, and in their minds will I write them;

17 And their sins and iniquities will I remember no more.

18 Now where remission of these is, there is no more offering for sin.

19 Having therefore, brethren, boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus,

20 By a new and living way, which he hath consecrated for us, through the veil, that is to say, his flesh;

a Some copies have, Then he said, And their.—1 Romans 8:2. Ephesians 2:13, 14. Or, liberty.—2 Chapter 9: 8, 12.—3 John 10:9, 10. 14:6. Chapter 2: 2.—4 Or new made.—5 Ch. 8:12.

"If," says Dr. Macknight, "after remission is granted to the sinner, there is no need of any more sacrifice for sin; and if Christ, by offering Himself once, has perfected for ever the sanctified, ver. 14, the sacrifice of the mass, as it is called, about which the Romish clergy employ themselves so incessantly, and to which the Papists trust for the pardon of their sins, has no foundation in Scripture. Nay, it is an evident impley, as it proceeds upon the supposition that the offering of the body of Christ once, is not sufficient to procure the pardon of sin; but must be frequently repeated. If they reply that their mass is only the representation and commemoration of the sacrifice of Christ; they give up the cause, and renounce an article of their faith established by the council of Trent, which, in Session xxii. can. 1, 3, declared the sacrifice of the mass to be a true and propitiatory sacrifice for sin: I say, give up the cause; for the representation and commemoration of a sacrifice is not a sacrifice. Further, it cannot be affirmed that the body of Christ is offered in the mass, unless it can be said, that as often as it is offered, Christ has suffered death; for the apostle says expressly, Heb. ix. 25, 26, that if Christ offered himself often, He must often have suffered since the foundation of the world." Let him disprove this who can.

19. Having therefore, brethren, boldness] The apostle having now finished the doctrinal part of his epistle, and fully shown the superiority of Christ to all men and angels; and the superiority of His priesthood to that of Aaron and his successors; the absolute inefficacy of the Jewish sacrifices to make atonement for sin; and the absolute efficacy of that of Christ to make reconciliation of man to God; he proceeds now to show what influence these doctrines should have on the hearts and lives of those who believe in his merits and death.

Boldness to enter] Πραγματι ως την εισοδον; liberty, full access to the entrance of the holy place; και ενωπιον.—This is an allusion to the case of the high-priest going into the holy of holies. He went with fear and trembling, because, if He had neglected the smallest item prescribed by the law, He could expect nothing but death. Genuine believers can come even to the throne of God with confidence, as they carry into the Divine presence the infinitely meritorious blood of the Great Atonement; and, being justified through that blood, they have a right to all the blessings of the eternal kingdom.

20. By a new and living way] It is a new way; no human being had ever before entered into the heaven of heavens; Jesus, in human nature, was the first; and thus he has opened the way to heaven to mankind; his own resurrection and ascension to glory, being the proof and pledge of ours.

The way is called, οδον νεωφαρας και ζωναν, new, or fresh, and living; this is evidently an allusion to the blood of the victim newly shed, uncoagulated, and, consequently, proper to be used for sprinkling. The blood of the Jewish victims was fit for sacrificial purposes only so long as it was warm and fluid; and might be considered as yet possessing its vitality; but when it grew cold, it coagulated, lost its vitality, and was no longer proper to be used sacrificially. Christ is here, in the allusion, represented as newly slain, and yet living; the blood ever considered as flowing, and giving life to the world. The way by the Old Covenant neither gave life, nor removed the liability to death. The way to peace and reconciliation, under the Old Covenant, was through the dead bodies of the animals slain; but Christ is living, and ever liveth, so make intercession for us; therefore He is a new and living way.

In the Choephorm of Æschylus, ver. 801, there is an expression like this of the apostle:—

Αγρε, τον παλαι περιμνηνον
Ανασθ' αιμα προφαρτικον δικας.
Agite, olim venditorum
Solvite sanguinem recenti vindictâ.

This way, says Dr. Owen, is new.—1. Because it was but newly made and prepared. 2. Because it belongs unto the New Covenant. 3. Because it admits of no decays, but is always new as to its efficacy and use, as in the day of its first preparation. 4. The way of the tabernacle waxed old, and so was prepared for a removal; but the Gospel way of salvation shall never be altered, nor changed, nor decay: it is always new and remains for ever.

It is also called ζωναν, living.—1. In opposition to the way into the Holiest under the tabernacle, which was by death.

nothing could be done in it without the blood of a victim. 2. was the cause of death to any who might use it, except the high-priest himself; and he could have access to it only one day in the year. 3. It is called living, because it has a spiritual efficacy, in our access to God. 4. It is living as to a effects; it leads to life, and infallibly brings those who walk in it unto life eternal.

Through the veil. As the high-priest lifted up or drew aside the veil that separated the holy from the most holy place, in order that he might have access to the Divine Majesty; and as the veil of the temple was rent from the top to the bottom, at the crucifixion of Christ, to show that the way to the Holiest was then laid open: so we must approach the Throne through the mediation of Christ, and through His sacrificial death. His pierced side is the way to the Holiest. Here, the veil, His humanity, is rent, and the kingdom of heaven opened to all believers.

21. A high-priest over the house of God. The house, or family, of God, is the Christian church; or all true believers in the Lord Jesus. Over this church, house, or family, Christ is the High-priest; in their behalf He offers His own blood, and their prayers; and praises: and as the high-priest had the ordering of all things that appertained to the house and worship of God; so has Christ in the government of His church. This government He never gave into other hands. As none can govern and preserve the world but God; so none can govern and save the church but the Lord Jesus: He is over the house; He is its President; He instructs, protects, guides, feeds, defends, and saves, the flock. Those who have such a President, may well have confidence; for, with Him is the fountain of life; and He has all power in the heavens and in the earth.

22. Let us draw near. Let us come with the blood of our sacrifice to the Throne of God; the expression is sacrificial.

With a true heart. Deeply convinced of our need of help, and truly in earnest to obtain it.

In full assurance of faith. Being fully persuaded that God will accept us for the sake of His Son; and that the sacrificial death of Christ gives us full authority to expect every blessing we need.

Having our hearts sprinkled. Not our bodies, as was the use among the Hebrews, when they had contracted any pollution, for they were to be sprinkled with the water of separation, see Numb. xix. 2.—i.e. but our hearts, sprinkled by the cleansing efficacy of the blood of Christ, without which we cannot draw nigh to God.

From an evil conscience. Having that deep sense of guilt, which our conscience felt, taken all away; and the peace and love of God shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost given into us.

Our bodies washed with pure water. The high-priest, before he entered into the inner tabernacle, or put on his holy garments, was to wash his flesh in water, Lev. xvi. 4. and the Levites were to be cleansed the same way, Numb. viii. 7. The apostle probably alludes to this in what he says here; though it appears that he refers principally to baptisms, the washing by which was an emblem of the purification of the soul by the grace and Spirit of Christ: but it is most likely that it is to the Jewish baptisms, and not the Christian, that he alludes.

23. Let us hold fast the profession of our faith. The word μολογια, from μολο, together, and λογος, a word, implies that general consent that was among Christians on all the important articles of their faith and practice; particularly their acknowledgment of the truth of the Gospel; and of Jesus Christ, as the only victim for sin, and the only Saviour from it. If the word washed above refer to Christian baptism in the case of adults, then the profession is that which the baptized then made of their faith in the Gospel; and of their determination to live and die in that faith.

The various readings on this clause are many in the MSS. Sc. Τῆς ἑλπίδος τῆς ἀπολογίας, the confession of our hope; D. two of the Itala, Psilgata, Erpen's Arabic, and the Ethiopic. Ὁμολογίαν τῆς πίστεως, the confession of faith; one of the Barberini MSS. and two others. This is the reading which our translators have followed; but it is of very little authority. Τῆς σπέρματος τῆς ἐλπίδος, the promise of hope; R. Christostom. Τῆς ἐλπίδος τῆς ἀπολογίας, the hope of our confession; one of Petavias's MSS.—but among all these, the confession, or profession of hope, is undoubtedly the genuine reading. Now, among the primitive Christians, the hope which they professed was the resurrection of the body, and everlasting life; every thing among these Christians was done and believed in reference to a future state; and for the joy that his set before them, they, like their Master, endured every cross, and despised all shame; they expected to be with God, 25 <sup>a</sup> Not forsaking the assembling of ourselves together, as the manner of some is; but exhorting one another: and so much the more, as ye see <sup>b</sup> the day approaching.

26 For, <sup>c</sup> if we sin wilfully <sup>d</sup> after that we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sins.

27 But a certain fearful looking for of judgment and <sup>e</sup> fiery indignation, which shall devour the adversaries.

through Christ; this hope they professed to have; and they confessed, boldly and publicly, the faith on which this hope was built. The apostle exhorts them to hold fast this confession, without wavering; never to doubt the declarations made to them by their Redeemer: but, having the full assurance of faith that their hearts were sprinkled from an evil conscience, that they had found redemption in the blood of the Lamb, they might expect to be glorified with their living Head, in the kingdom of their Father.

He is faithful that promised. The eternal life, which is the object of your hope, is promised to you by Him who cannot lie: as He, then, is faithful who has given you this promise, hold fast the profession of your hope.

24. And let us consider one another. Κατανοήσωμεν. Let us diligently and attentively consider each other's trials, difficulties, and weaknesses; feel for each other, and excite each other to an increase in love to God and man; and, as the proof of it, to be fruitful in good works. The words εὐσποροῦμεν, to the provocation, is often taken in a good sense, and signifies excitement, stirring up, to do any thing laudable, useful, honourable, or necessary. Xenophon, Cyrop. lib. vii. cap. 108. speaking of the conduct of Cyrus towards his officers, says, Καὶ τούτους εὐσποροῦσε, πὰρ ὁρῶντες, καὶ χαριζόμενος αὐτοῖς ἐν τῷ αἵματι. "He, by praises and gifts excited them as much as possible."—See the note on Acts xv. 39. where the subject is farther considered.

25. Not forsaking the assembling of ourselves. Ἐκτενωσάμενοι ἑαυτοῦ. Whether this means public or private worship, is hard to say; but as the word is but once more used in the New Testament, (2 Thess. ii. 1.) and there means the gathering together of the redeemed of the Lord, at the day of judgment; it is as likely that it means here private religious meetings, for the purpose of mutual exhortation; and this sense appears the more natural here; because it is evident that the church was now in a state of persecution; and, therefore, their meetings were most probably held in private. For fear of persecution, it seems as if some had deserted these meetings, καθὼς ἐθὼς οἰοῦν, as the custom of certain persons is. They had given up those strengthening and instructive means; and the others were in danger of following their example.

The day approaching. Τῆς ἡμέρας, that day; the time in which God would come and pour out his judgments on the Jewish nation. We may also apply it to the day of death, and the day of judgment. Both of these are approaching to every human being. He who wishes to be found ready, will carefully use every means of grace; and particularly the communion of saints, if there be even but two or three in the place where he lives, who steadily meet together in the name of Christ. Those who relinquish Christian communion, are in a backsliding state; those who backslide, are in danger of apostacy. To prevent this latter, the apostle speaks the awful words following.—See at the end of this chapter.

26. For if we sin wilfully. If we deliberately, for fear of persecution, or from any other motive, renounce the profession of the Gospel, and the Author of that Gospel, after having received the knowledge of the truth, so as to be convinced that Jesus is the promised Messiah, and that He had sprinkled our hearts from an evil conscience; for such there remaineth no sacrifice for sins; for as the Jewish sacrifices are abolished, as appears by the declaration of God himself, in the xith Psalm, and Jesus being now the only sacrifice which God will accept, those who reject Him, have none other: therefore, their case must be utterly without remedy. This is the meaning of the apostle; and the case is that of a deliberate apostate; one who has utterly rejected Jesus Christ and His atonement; and renounced the whole Gospel system. It has nothing to do with backsliders in our common use of that term. A man may be overtaken in a fault, or he may deliberately go into sin; and yet neither renounce the Gospel, nor deny the Lord that bought him. His case is dreary and dangerous, but it is not hopeless; no case is hopeless, but that of the deliberate apostate, who rejects the whole Gospel system, after having been saved by grace, or convinced of the truth of the Gospel. To him there remaineth no more sacrifice for sin; for there was but the one, Jesus; and this he has utterly rejected.

27. A certain fearful looking for of judgment. From this it is evident, that God will pardon no man without a sacrifice for sin; for otherwise, as Dr. Macknight argues, it would not follow from there remaining to apostates no more sacrifice for sin, that there must remain to them a dreadful expectation of judgment.

And fiery indignation. Καὶ ἔπος φῶς, a zeal or fervour of fire; something similar to the fire that came down from heaven, and destroyed Korah and his company, Numb. xvi. 36.

28 * He that despised Moses' law died without mercy, * under two or three witnesses:

29 * Of how much sorer punishment, suppose ye, shall he be thought worthy, who hath trodden under foot the Son of God, and hath counted the blood of the covenant, wherewith he was sanctified, an unholy thing, and hath done despite unto the Spirit of grace?

30 For, we know him that hath said, * Vengeance belongeth unto me, I will recompense, saith the Lord. And again, * The Lord shall judge his people.

31 * It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God.

* Ch. 2. 2.—Deut. 17. 2, 6, 10, 12. Matt. 18. 10. John 8. 17. 9 Cor. 12. 1.—Ch. 2. 2 & 12. 18.—1 Cor. 11. 22. Chap. 13. 9.—1 Matt. 18. 31, 32. Eph. 4. 30.—1 Pet. 2. 8. Rom. 12. 19.—Deu. 32. 35. Psalms 137. 8 & 138. 16.—v Luke 12. 1.—v Gal. 3. 4. 2 John 8.—1 Ch. 6. 4.

Probably the apostle here refers to the case of the unbelieving Jews in general, as in chap. vi. to the dreadful judgment that was coming upon them; and the burning up their temple and city with fire. These people had, by the preaching of Christ and His apostles, received the knowledge of the truth. It was impossible that they could have witnessed His miracles, and heard His doctrine, without being convinced that He was the Messiah; and that their own system was at an end; but they rejected this only Sacrifice, at a time when God abolished their own. To that nation, therefore, there remained no other sacrifice for sin; therefore the dreadful judgment came, (the very indignation was poured out, and they, as adversaries, were devoured by it.

28. He that despised Moses' law] Adversus; he that rejected it, threw it aside, and denied its divine authority by presumptuous sinning; did without mercy, without any extenuation or mitigation of punishment, Numb. xv. 30.

Under two or three witnesses] That is, when convicted by the testimony of two or three respectable witnesses.—See Dent. xvii. 6.

29. Of how much sorer punishment] Such offences were trifling in comparison of this; and, in justice, the punishment should be proportioned to the offence.

Trodden under foot the Son of God] Treated Him with the utmost contempt and blasphemy.

The blood of the covenant—an unholy thing] The blood of the covenant means here the sacrificial death of Christ, by which the New Covenant between God and man was ratified, sealed, and confirmed. And counting this unholy or common, κοινον, intimates that they expected nothing from it in a sacrificial or atoning way. How near to those persons, and how near to their destruction, do these come in the present day, who reject the atoning blood; and say, "that they expect no more benefit from the blood of Christ than they do from that of a cow or a sheep!" Is not this precisely the crime of which the apostle speaks here, and to which he tells us God would show no mercy.

Despite unto the Spirit of grace? Hath insulted the Spirit of grace. The apostle means the Holy Spirit, whose gifts were bestowed in the first age, on believers, for the confirmation of the Gospel.—See chap. vi. 4—6. Wherefore, if one apostatized in the first age after having been witness to these miraculous gifts much more after having possessed them himself; he must, like the scribes and Pharisees, have ascribed them to evil spirits; than which a greater indignity could not be done to the Spirit of God.—Macknight. This is properly the sin against the Holy Ghost, which has no forgiveness.

30. Vengeance belongeth unto me] This is the saying of God, Deut. xxxii. 35. in reference to the idolatrous Gentiles, who were the enemies of His people; and is here, with propriety, applied to the above apostates, who being enemies to God's ordinances, and Christ's ministry and merits, must also be enemies to Christ's people, and labour for the destruction of them and the cause in which they are engaged.

The Lord shall judge his people] That is, He shall execute judgment for them; for this is evidently the sense in which the word is used, in the place from which the apostle quotes, Dent. xxxii. 36. For the Lord shall judge his people, and repent himself for his servants, when he seeth that their power is gone. So God will avenge and vindicate the cause of Christianity by destroying its enemies; as He did in the case of the Jewish people, whom He destroyed from being a nation; and made them a proverb of reproach, and monuments of His wrathful indignation, to the present day.

31. It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God.] To fall into the hands of God, is to fall under His displeasure; and He who lives for ever can punish for ever. How dreadful to have the displeasure of an eternal almighty Being to rest on the soul for ever! Apostates, and all the persecutors and enemies of God's cause and people, may expect the heaviest judgments of an incensed Deity; and these not for a time, but through eternity.

32. But call to remembrance] It appears from this, and indeed from some parts of the Gospel history, that the first believers in Judea were greedily persecuted; our Lord's crucifixion, Stephen's martyrdom, the persecution that arose after the death of Stephen, Acts vii. 1. Herod's persecution, Acts xii. 1. in which James was killed and the various persecutions of St. Paul, sufficiently show that this disposition was predominant among that bad people.

great combat or contention of sufferings. Here we have an allusion to the combats at the Grecian games, or to exhibitions of gladiators at the public spectacles; and an intimation how honourable it was to contend for the faith once delivered to the saints, and to overcome, through the blood of the Lamb, and their own testimony.

33. Ye were made a gazing-stock] Θαυματοποιουσι, ye were exhibited as wild beasts and other shows at the theatres.—See the note on 1 Cor. iv. 9. where all this is illustrated.

Companions of them that were so used.] It appears from 1 Thim. ii. 14, 15, that the churches of God in Judea were greatly persecuted, and that they believed with courage and constancy in their persecution. When any victim of persecuting rage was marked out, the rest were prompt to take his part, and acknowledge themselves believers in the same doctrine for which he suffered. This was a noble spirit; many would have sunk into a corner, and put off the marks of Christ, that they might not be exposed to affliction on this account.

34. Ye had compassion of me in my bonds] Συνηθησατε, ye suffered with me—ye sympathized with me when bound for the testimony of Jesus. This probably refers to the sympathy they showed towards him, and the help they afforded him, during his long imprisonment in Caesarea and Jerusalem. But, instead of τοις δεσμοις μου, my bonds, τοις δεσμοις, the prisoners, is the reading of AD. and several others, both the Syriac, the Arabic of Erpen, the Coptic, Armenian, Vulgate, some of the Itala, and several of the Greek fathers. This reading appears to be so well supported, that Griesbach has admitted it into the text. If it be genuine, it shows that there had been, and perhaps were then, several bonds for the testimony of Jesus, and that the church in Judea had shown its attachment to Christ, by openly acknowledging these prisoners, and ministering to them.

Took joyfully the spoiling of your goods] They were deprived of their inheritances, turned out of their houses, and plundered of their goods; they wandered about in sheepskins and goat-skins, being destitute, afflicted, tormented. To suffer such persecution patiently was great; to endure it without a murmur was greater; to rejoice in it, was greatest of all. But, how could they do all this? The next clause informs us:—

Knowing in yourselves] They had the fullest evidence that they were the children of God; the Spirit itself bearing this witness to their spirits; and if children, then heirs, heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Christ. They knew that heaven was their portion; and that to it they had a sure right and indefeasible title, by Christ Jesus. This accounts, and this alone can account, for their taking joyfully the spoiling of their goods: they had Christ in their hearts; they knew that they were His children, and that they had a kingdom, but that kingdom was not of this world. They had the support they needed; and they had it in the time in which they needed it most.

35. Cast not away therefore your confidence] Την παρανομiam θυμων, your liberty of access to God; your title and right to approach His throne; your birthright, as His sons and daughters; and the clear evidence you have of His favour which, if you be not steady and faithful, you must lose. Do not throw it away, μη αποβαλητε; neither men nor devils can take it from you; and God will never deprive you of it, if you continue faithful. There is a reference here to cowardly soldiers, who throw away their shields, and run away from the battle. This is your shield, your faith in Christ, which gives you the knowledge of salvation: keep it, and it will keep you.

The Lacedemonian women, when they presented the shield to their sons going to battle, were accustomed to say, η πατρις εναντι σου, "Either bring this back, or be brought back upon it, alluding to the custom of bringing back a slain soldier on his own shield, a proof that he had preserved it to the last, as had been faithful to his country. They were accustomed also to excite their courage by delivering to them their father's shields with the following short address:—Ταυρων ε κεραιρα εις αυτων και εν οντων ταυρων σωσεις, η μη τον. "This shield I father always preserved: do thou preserve it also, or perish Lacedaemonian Apophthegmata, Flor. Oras, & Wittenbach, v. 1. p. 682. Thus spake the Lacedemonian mothers to their sons; and what say the oracles of God to us? Μη αποβαλατε την παρανομiam θυμων. Cast not away your confidence of fear. This is your shield: keep it, and it will ever be your sure defence: for, by it, you will quench every fiery dart of a wicked one. The church of Christ speaks this to all her own 26 *For ye have need of patience, that, after ye have done the will of God, ye might receive the promise.

37 For yet a little while, and he that shall come will come, and will not tarry.

Luke 21. 26. Gal. 5. 21. Col. 2. 26. Ch. 9. 8. 1 Pet. 1. 8.—Luke 12. 8. 1 Pet. 2. 9.

and especially to those employed in the work of the ministry. If this shield, of this glorious system of salvation by Jesus Christ, illustrated and defended in this work, I say to each of my children, καὶ τὴν ἰσχυρὰν ἐπὶ αὐτῶν ἐστὶν ἡ χάρις τοῦ θεοῦ, ἡ ἡμῶν. This faith, thy father, by the grace of God, hath always kept; keep thou it also, or thou must expect a perish! May this be received both as a warning and encouragement!

[Great recompense of reward.] No less than God's continual approbation; the peace that passeth all understanding ruling he heart here; and the glories of heaven as an eternal portion. Conscientiously keep the shield, and all these shall be thine. This will be thy reward; but remember that it is the mercy of God that gives it.

36 Ye have need of patience] Having so great a fight of offerings to pass through, and they of so long continuance. God furnishes the grace; you must exercise it. The grace or principle of patience comes from God; the use or exercise of that grace is of yourselves. Here, ye must be workers together with God. Patience and perseverance are nearly the same.

Have done the will of God] By keeping the faith, and patiently suffering for it.

37. For yet a little while] Ἐτι γὰρ μικροῦ ὁσόν. For yet a very little time. In a short space of time the Messiah will come, and execute judgment upon your rebellions country. This is determined, because they have filled up the measure of their iniquity; and their destruction slumbereth not. [The apostle seems to refer to Hab. ii. 3, 4. and accomodates he words to his own purpose.]

38. Now the just shall live by faith] Ὁ δὲ δίκαιος ἐκ πίστεως, ζήσεται. But the just by faith; i. e. he who is justified by faith, shall live, shall be preserved when this overflowing scourge shall come. See this meaning of the phrase vindicated, Rom. i. 17. And it is evident, both from this text and Gal. iii. 11. that it is in this sense that the apostle uses it.

But if any man draw back] Ὅστις ἀποστρέψῃ, ἀπολεῖται. But if he draw back; he, the man who is justified by faith, for it is of him, and none other, that the text speaks. The insertion of he words any man, if done to serve the purpose of a particular creed, is a wicked perversion of the words of God. They were evidently intended to turn away the relatives from he antecedent, in order to save the doctrine of final and unconditional perseverance; which doctrine this text destroys.

My soul shall have no pleasure in him.] My very heart shall be opposed to him who makes shipwreck of faith and a good conscience. The word προσβαλεῖν signifies not only to draw back, but to sink away and hide through fear. In this sense it is used by the very best Greek writers, as well as by Josephus and Philo. An dastards and cowards are hated by all men; so those that sink away from Christ and His cause, or fear of persecution or secular loss, God must despise: in them He cannot delight; and His Spirit, grieved with their conduct, must desert their hearts, and leave them to darkness and hardness.

39. But we are not of them who draw back] Οὐκ ἐσμεν ἀποστρέψαντες, ἀλλὰ πιστοί. "We are not the cowards, but the courageous." I have no doubt of this being the meaning of the apostle: and the form of speech requires such a translation: it occurs more than once in the New Testament. So Gal. iii. 7. ἐκ πίστεως, they who are of the faith, rather the faithful, the believers. Rom. iii. 26. ἄλλοι ἐκ πίστεως, the believers. Rom. ii. 8. ἐκ ἐπιθυμίας, the contentious; in all which places the learned reader will find that the form of speech is the same. We are not cowards, who sink away, and notwithstanding meet destruction; but we are faithful, and have our souls saved live. The words ἐπιθυμίας ψυχῶν signify the preservation of the life. See the note, Eph. i. 14. He intimates, that, notwithstanding the persecution was hot, yet they should escape with their lives.

1. It is very remarkable, and I have more than once called be reader's attention to it, that not one Christian life was lost in the siege and destruction of Jerusalem. Every Jew perished, or was taken captive; all those who had apostatized, and sunk away from Christianity, perished with them: all be genuine Christians escaped with their lives. This very important information, which casts light on many passages in the New Testament, and manifests the grace and providence of God in a very conspicuous way, is given both by Eusebius and Epiphanius. I shall adduce their words: "When the whole congregation of the church in Jerusalem, according to an oracle given by revelation to the approved persons among them before the war, were τιμῶν χρησθέντων

38 Now! the just shall live by faith: but if any man draw back, my soul shall have no pleasure in him.

39 But we are not of them who draw back unto perdition; but of them that believe to the saving of the soul.

1 Hab. 2. 3, 4.—1 Rom. 1. 17. Gal. 3. 11.—2 Pet. 2. 20, 21.—1 Thes. 5. 2. 2 Thes. 2. 14.

εὐνοῦ δοκιμοῖς δι' ἀποκαλίψεως δόξαστα προ τοῦ πολέμου, μεταναστεύοντες τῆς πόλεως, καὶ τὰ τῆς περὶ αὐτοὺς οἰκίαν ἐκτίθειν οὐκ ἐπιθυμῶντες, Πέλλα ἀπὸν ὀνομασθέντες, were commanded to depart from the city, and inhabit a certain city, which they call Pella, beyond Jordan; to which, when all those who believed in Christ had removed from Jerusalem, and when the saints had totally abandoned the royal city, which is the metropolis of the Jews: then the Divine vengeance seized them who had dealt so wickedly with Christ and His apostles, and utterly destroyed that wicked and abominable generation." Euseb. Hist. Eccles. lib. iii. cap. v.

St. Epiphanius, in Hæres. Nazaren. c. 7. says, "The Christians, who dwell in Jerusalem, being forewarned by Christ of the approaching siege, removed to Pella."

The same, in his book, De Ponderibus et Mensuris, says, "The disciples of Christ, being warned by an angel, removed to Pella; and afterward, when Adrian rebuilt Jerusalem, and called it after his own name, Ælia Colonia, they returned thither." Vid. Euseb. a reading, Vol. I. p. 93. As those places in Epiphanius are of considerable importance, I shall subjoin the original: ἐκείθεν γὰρ ἢ ἀρχῆ γενομένη μετὰ τὴν αὐτῶν ἱεροσολύμων μεταστροφήν, πάντων τῶν μαθητῶν τῶν ἐν Πέλλῃ οὐκ ἐπιθυμῶντων, Χριστὸν φησάντων καταλιπεῖν τὰ ἱεροσόλυμα καὶ ἀναχωρῆσαι, ἐκείθῃ ἠέλλαν παρῆναι πολιορκίαν, Ἐπιφ. ἀδούρ. Hæres. l. i. c. 7. Vol. I. p. 123. Edit. Par. 1622. The other place is as follows: ἦν γὰρ ἐμὴν ἢ πόλιν ἀδικεῖσθαι ἐκ τῶν Ῥωμαίων, προσηρητισθῆσαν ὑπὸ Ἀγγέλου παντὸς ἡ μαθῆναι μεταστῆναι ἐπὶ τὴν πόλιν μελλούσας ἀρῆν ἀναλίσθαι. Ὅτι τινες καὶ μεταναστεύοντες ἐκ Πέλλης—πέραν τὸν Ἰορδάνου, ἢ τὴν ἐν Ἀσακτοῦ λέγουται αὐταί. Ibid. De Pon. et Mens. Vol. II. p. 171.

These are remarkable testimonies, and should be carefully preserved. Pella, it appears, was a city of Cælosyria, beyond Jordan, in the district of Decapolis. Thus it is evident that these Christians held fast their faith, preserved their alibi, and continued to believe to the saving of their lives, as well as to the saving of their souls. As the apostle gives several hints of the approaching destruction of Jerusalem, it is likely that this is the true sense in which the words above are to be understood.

2. I have already said a little from ver. 26, on the importance of social worship. Public worship is not of less consequence. Were it not for public, private worship would soon be at end. To this, under God, the church of Christ owes its being and its continuance. Where there is no public worship, there is no religion. It is by this that God is acknowledged; and as He is the Universal Being; and by His bounty and providence all live; consequently, it is the duty of every intelligent creature publicly to acknowledge Him, and offer Him that worship which Himself has preserved in His Word. The ancient Jews have some good maxims on this subject, which may be seen in Schoetgen. I shall quote a few.

In Beracoth, fol. 8. it is written, "Rabbi Levi said, He, who has a synagogue in his city, and does not go thither to pray, shall be esteemed a bad citizen," or "a bad neighbour." And to this they apply the words of the prophet, Jer. xii. 14. Thus saith the Lord against all his evil neighbours—behold, I will pluck them out of their land.

In Mechilta, fol. 48. "Rabbi Eleazar the son of Jacob said," speaking as from God, "If thou wilt come to my house, I will go to thy house; but if thou wilt not come to my house, I will not enter thy house. The place that my heart loveth, to that shall my feet go."—We may safely add, that those who do not frequent the house of God, can never expect His presence or blessing in their own.

In Taanith, fol. 11. it is said, that "to him who separates himself from the congregation, shall two angels come, and lay their hands upon his head and say, This man who separates himself from the congregation, shall not see the comfort which God grants to His afflicted church."—The wisest and best of men have always felt it their duty and their interest to worship God in public. As there is nothing more necessary, so there is nothing more reasonable; he who acknowledges God in all His ways, may expect all his steps to be directed. The public worship of God is one grand line of distinction between the atheist and the believer. He who uses not public worship, has either no God, or has no right notion of His being; and such a person, according to the rabbins, is a bad neighbour: it is dangerous to live near him; for neither he nor his can be under the protection of God. No man should be forced to attend a particular place of worship; but every man should be obliged to attend some place: and he who has any fear of God, will not find it difficult to get a place to his mind.

CHAPTER XI.

A definition of faith. 1. What are its immediate objects, 2, 3. What are its effects, instanced in Abel, 4. In Enoch, 5, 6. In Noah, 7. In Abraham, 8-10. In Sarah, 11. In their righteous posterity, 12-16. In Abraham's offering of his son Isaac, 17-19. In Isaac, 20. In Jacob, 21. In Joseph, 22. In Moses, 23-25. In the Israelites, in the Wilderness, 26. In the fall of Jericho, 30. In Rachab, 31. In several of the judges, and in David, Samuel, and the prophets, 32-34. The glorious effects produced by it in the primitive martyrs, 35-40. [A. NOW faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen. 2 For by it the elders obtained a good report. 3 Through faith we understand that the worlds were framed by the word of God, so that things which are seen were not made of things which do appear. 4 By faith Abel offered unto God a more excellent sacrifice than Cain, by which he obtained witness that he was righteous, a just man, being dead before he offered it. By the same faith Enoch was translated, that he should not see death; and was found because God had translated him: for before his translation he had this testimony, that he pleased God. 5 But without faith it is impossible to please him: for he that cometh to God must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him.

God testifying of his gifts: and by it he being dead yet speaketh. 5 By faith Enoch was translated that he should not see death, and was found because God had translated him: for before his translation he had this testimony, that he pleased God. 6 But without faith it is impossible to please him: for, he that cometh to God must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him.

NOTES.—Verse 1. Faith is the substance of things hoped for. Ἐστὶ δὲ πίστις ἐλπίς πραγμάτων ὁρατοῦ. Faith is the substantiveness of things hoped for; πραγμάτων ἐλπίσος ὁρατοῦ. DEMONSTRATION OF THINGS NOT SEEN. The word ὁρατοῦ, which we translate substance, signifies substantiveness—that which becomes a foundation for another thing to stand on. And ἐλπίσος signifies such a conviction as is produced in the mind by the demonstration of a problem; after which demonstration no doubt can remain, because we see from it that the thing is; that it cannot but be; and that it cannot be otherwise than as it is, and is proved to be. Such is the faith by which the soul is justified: or rather, such are the effects of justifying faith: on it subsists the peace of God, which passeth all understanding; and the love of God is shed abroad in the heart, where it lives, by the Holy Ghost. At the same time the Spirit of God witnesses with their spirits who have this faith, that their sins are blotted out: and this is as fully manifest to their judgment and conscience as the axioms—"Equal lines and angles being placed on one another do not exceed each other." Or to the demonstration of Prop. 47. Book I. Euclid, "The square of the base of a right-angled triangle is equal to the difference of the squares of the other two sides." Ἐλπίσος is defined by logicians, Demonstratio que fit argumentis certis et rationibus indubitatis, qua rei certitudo efficitur: "A demonstration of the certainty of a thing by sure arguments and indubitable reasons." Aristotle uses it for a mathematical demonstration, and properly defines it thus, Ἐλπίσος δὲ ἐστὶν ἡ μὴ ὀυδατος ἄλλως εἶναι, ἀλλ' ὁρατοῦ ὡς πρὸς λέγειν. "Elenchos, or Demonstration, is that which cannot be otherwise, but is so as we assert." Rhetor. ad Alexand. cap. 14. περὶ ἐλπίσος. On this account I have produced the above theorem from Euclid.

Things hoped for. Are the peace and approbation of God, and those blessings by which the soul is prepared for the kingdom of heaven. A penitent hopes for the pardon of his sins, and the favour of his God: faith in Christ puts him in possession of this pardon; and thus the thing that was hoped for is enjoyed by faith. When this is received, a man has the full conviction of the truth and reality of all these blessings: though unseen by the eye, they are felt by the heart; and the man has no more doubt of God's approbation, and his own free pardon, than he has of his being.

In an extended sense, the things hoped for are the resurrection of the body, the new heavens and the new earth, the introduction of believers into the heavenly country, and the possession of eternal glory.

The things unseen, as distinguished from the things hoped for, are, in an extended sense, the creation of the world from nothing, the destruction of the world by the deluge, the miraculous conception of Christ, His resurrection from the dead, His ascension to glory, His mediation at the right hand of God, His government of the universe, &c. &c. all which we as firmly believe on the testimony of God's word, as if we had seen them.—See Macknight. But this faith has particular respect to the being, goodness, providence, grace, and mercy, of God, as the subsequent verses sufficiently show.

2. For by it the elders obtained a good report. By the elders are meant ancestors, forefathers, such as the patriarchs and prophets; several of whom he afterward particularly names, and produces some fact from the history of their lives.

It is very remarkable that, among the whole, there is not one word concerning poor Adam and his wife, though both Abraham and Sarah are mentioned. There was no good report concerning them: not a word of their repentance, faith, or holiness! Alas! alas! Did ever such bright suns set in so thick a cloud! Had there been any thing praiseworthy in their life after their fall, any act of faith by which they could have been distinguished, it had surely come out here; the mention of their second son Abel would have suggested it. But God has covered the whole of their spiritual and eternal state with a thick and impenetrable veil. Conjectures relative to their state would be very precarious; little else than hope can be exercised in their favour: but, as to them the promise of Jesus was given, so we may believe they found redemption in that blood which was shed from the foundation of the world. His rebellion against his Maker was too great, and too glaring, to permit his name to be ever after mentioned with honour or respect. The word εὐαγγελιστῶν, which we translate obtained a good report, literally signifies were witnessed of, and thus leads us naturally to God, who, by His Word, as the succeeding parts of the chapter show, bore testimony to the faith and holiness of His servants. The apostle does not mention one of whom an account is not given in the Old Testament. This, therefore, is God's witness or testimony concerning them.

3. Through faith we understand by words, res, auras, we are to understand the material fabric of the universe; for auras can have no reference here to age, or any measurement of time, for he speaks of the things which are seen not being made out of the things which do appear: this, therefore, must refer to the material creation: and, as the word is used in the plural number, it may comprehend not only the earth and visible heavens, but the whole planetary system: the different worlds which, in our system at least, revolve round the sun. The apostle states that these things were not made out of a pre-existent matter: for, if they were, that matter, however extended or modified, must appear in that thing into which it is compounded and modified; therefore, it could not be said that the things which are seen are not made of the things that appear: and He shows us also, by these words, that the present mundane fabric was not formed, or reformed, from one anterior, as some suppose. According to Moses and the apostle, we believe that God made all things out of nothing.—See the notes on Gen. 1. 1. &c.

At present we see trees of different kinds are produced from trees; beasts, birds, and fishes, from others of the same kind; and man from man: but we are necessarily led to believe that there was a first man, who owed not his being to man; first, there were beasts, &c. who did not derive their being from others of the same kind: and so of all manner of trees, plants, &c. God, therefore, made all these out of nothing; His word tells us so, and we credit that word.

4. By faith Abel offered a more excellent sacrifice. Ἰλαστικῶς θύσας, more sacrifice: as if He had said, Abel, by faith, made more than one offering: and hence it is said, God testified of His gifts, res, duplos. The plain state of the case seems to have been this: Cain and Abel both brought offerings to the altar of God; probably the altar erected for the family worship. As Cain was a husbandman, he brought a mincha or eucharistic offering, of the fruits of the ground, by which he acknowledged the being and providence of God. Abel being a shepherd, or a feeder of cattle, brought not only the eucharistic offering, but also of the produce of his flock as a sin-offering to God; by which he acknowledged his own sinfulness, God's justice and mercy, as well as His Being and providence. Cain, not at all apprehensive of the demerit of sin, or God's holiness, contented himself with the mincha or thank-offering: this God could not, consistently with His holiness and justice, receive with complacency; the other, as referring to Him, who was the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world, God could receive, and did particularly testify His approbation. Though the mincha or eucharistic offering, was a very proper offering in its place; yet this was not received, because there was no sin-offering. The rest of the history is well known.

Now, by this faith, thus exercised, in references to an abovementioned, he, Abel, though dead, yet speaketh: i. e. preacheth to mankind the necessity of an atonement, and that God will accept no sacrifice unless connected with this.—See this transaction explained at large in my notes on Gen. v. 3. &c.

5. By faith Enoch was translated. It is said in Gen. v. 25. that Enoch walked with God, and he was not, for God took him; here the apostle explains what God's taking him means, by saying that he was translated, that he should not see death; from which we learn that he did not die: and that God took him to a state of blessedness without obliging him to pass through death.—See his history explained at large in the above place, in Gen. v. 22-25.

6. He that cometh to God. The man who professes that it is his duty to worship God, must, if he act rationally, do it on the conviction—First, that there is such a Being, infinite, eternal, unoriginated, and self-existent; the Cause of all other being: on whom all being depends, and by whose energy, bounty, and providence, all other beings exist, live, and are supplied

7 By faith Noah, being warned of God of things not seen as yet, moved with fear, prepared an ark to the saving of his house: by the which he condemned the world, and became heir of the righteousness which is by faith.

8 By faith Abraham, when he was called to go out into a place which he should after receive for an inheritance, obeyed; and he went out, not knowing whither he went.

9 By faith he sojourned in the land of promise, as in a strange country, dwelling in tabernacles with Isaac and Jacob, who the heirs with him of the same promise:

10 For, he looked for a city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God.

11 Through faith also Sarah herself received strength to conceive seed, and was delivered of a child when she was past age, because she judged him faithful who had promised.

12 Therefore sprang there even of one, and him as good as dead, so many as the stars of the sky in multitude, and as the sand which is by the sea shore innumerable.

13 These all died in faith, not having received the promises, but having seen them afar off, and were persuaded of

with the means of continued existence and life. He must believe that, that He rewards them that diligently seek Him; that He is not indifferent about his own worship; that He receives adoration and religious service from men; and that He blesses, and especially protects and saves, those who, in simplicity and uprightness of heart, seek and serve Him. This requires faith, such a faith as is mentioned above; a faith by which he can please God: and now, that we have an abundant revelation, a faith according to that revelation; a faith in Him through Christ, the great sin-offering, without which a man can no more please God, or be accepted of Him, than Cain was. As the knowledge of the being of God is of infinite importance in religion, I shall introduce at the end of this chapter, a series of propositions, tending to prove the being of God, ist. A priori, and 2dly, A posteriori; omitting the proofs that are generally produced on those points, for which my readers may refer to works in general circulation on this subject; and, 3dly, I shall lay down some phenomena relative to the heavenly bodies, which it will be difficult to account for, without acknowledging the infinite skill, power, and continual energy of God.

7. By faith Noah] See the whole of this history, Gen. vi. 13. Warned of God] Καταρτίσθης. As we know from the history in Genesis, that God did warn Noah, we see from this the real import of the verb καταρτίσθης, as used in various parts of the New Testament; it signifies to utter oracles, to give Divine warning.

Moved with fear] Ευλαβήσθης, influenced by religious fear, or reverence towards God. This is mentioned to show that he acted not from a fear of losing his life, but from the fear of God: and hence that fear is here properly attributed to faith.

He condemned the world] He credited God, they did not; As walked in the way God had commanded, they did not; he repeatedly admonished them, 1 Pet. iii. 20. they regarded it not: this aggravated their crimes, while it exalted his faith and righteousness. "His faith and obedience condemned the world, i. e. the unbelievers: in the same sense in which every good man's virtues and exhortations condemn such as will not attend to, and imitate them."—Dodd.

Became heir of the righteousness] He became entitled to that justification which is by faith; and his temporal deliverance was a pledge of the salvation of his soul.

8. Abraham, when he was called] See on Gen. xii. 1—4. Not knowing whither he went.] Therefore, his obedience was the fullest proof of his faith in God; and his faith was an implicit faith; he obeyed, and went out from his own country, having no prospect of any good or success but what his implicit faith led him to expect from God, as the rewarder of them that diligently seek him. In all the preceding cases, and in all that follow, the apostle keeps this maxim fully in view.

9. By faith he sojourned in the land of promise] It is remarkable that Abraham did not acquire any right in Canaan, except that of a sojourning-place; nor did he build any house in it: his faith showed him that it was only a type and pledge of a better country; and he kept that better country continually in view: he, with Isaac and Jacob, who were heirs of the same promise, were contented to dwell in tents, without any fixed habitation.

10. For he looked for a city which hath foundations] He knew that earth could afford no permanent residence for an immortal mind; and he looked for that heavenly building of which God is the Architect and Owner; in a word, he lost sight of earth, that he might keep heaven in view. And all who are partakers of his faith, possess the same Spirit, walk by the same rule, and mind the same thing.

Whose builder and maker is God] The word αρχιτεκτων, signifies an architect, one who plans, calculates, and constructs a building. The word δημοσιος, signifies the governor of a people; one who forms them by institutions and laws; the framers of a political constitution. God is here represented the Maker or Father of all the heavenly inhabitants, and the

them, and embraced them, and confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth.

14 For, they that say such things declare plainly that they seek a country.

15 And truly, if they had been mindful of that country from whence they came out, they might have had opportunity to have returned.

16 But now they desire a better country, that is, an heavenly: wherefore God is not ashamed to be called their God: for he hath prepared for them a city.

17 By faith Abraham, when he was tried, offered up Isaac; and he that had received the promises offered up his only-begotten son,

18 Of whom it was said, That in Isaac shall thy seed be called:

19 Accounting that God was able to raise him up, even from the dead; from whence also he received him in a figure.

20 By faith Isaac blessed Jacob and Esau concerning things to come.

21 By faith Jacob, when he was a dying, blessed both the Planner of their citizenship in that heavenly country. — See Macknight.

11. Through faith also Sarah] Her history, as far as the event here is concerned, may be seen Gen. xvii. 19. and xxi.

2. Sarah at first treated the Divine message with ridicule, judging it to be absolutely impossible, not knowing then that it was from God; and this her age and circumstances justified; for, humanly speaking, such an event was impossible: but, when she knew that it was God who said this, it does not appear that she doubted any more, but implicitly believed that what God had promised He was able to perform.

12. Him as good as dead] According to nature, long past the time of the procreation of children. The birth of Isaac, (the circumstances of the father and mother considered,) was entirely supernatural; and the people who proceeded from this birth were a supernatural people; and were and are most strikingly singular through every period of their history to the present day.

13. These all died in faith] That is, Abraham, Sarah, Isaac, and Jacob, continued to believe, to the end of their lives, that God would fulfil this promise; but they neither saw the numerous seed, nor did they get the promised rest in Canaan.

Strangers and pilgrims] Strangers, ξενoi, persons who are out of their own country, who are in a foreign land; πιηριμοι, παροικητοι, sojourners only for a time; not intending to take up their abode in that place, nor to get naturalized in that country.

How many use these expressions, professing to be strangers and pilgrims here below; and yet the whole of their conduct, spirit, and attachments, show that they are here perfectly at home. How little consideration and weight are in many of our professions, whether they relate to earth or heaven!

14. Declare plainly that they seek a country.] A man's country is that in which he has constitutional rights and privileges; no stranger or sojourner has any such rights in the country where he sojourns. These, by declaring that they felt themselves strangers and sojourners, professed their faith in a heavenly country and state; and looked beyond the grave for a place of happiness. No intelligent Jew could suppose that Canaan was all the rest which God had promised to His people.

15. If they had been mindful of that country] They considered their right to the promises of God as dependent on their utter renunciation of Chaldaea; and it was this that induced Abraham to cause his steward Eliezer to swear that he would not carry his son Isaac to Chaldaea; see Gen. xxiv. 5—8. There idolatry reigned; and God had called them to be the patriarchs and progenitors of a people among whom the knowledge of the true God, and the worship required by Him, should be established and preserved.

16. But now they desire a better] They all expected spiritual blessings, and a heavenly inheritance; they sought God as their portion, and in such a way, and on such principles that He is not ashamed to be called their God; and He shows His affection for them by preparing for them a city, to wit, heaven, as themselves would seek no city on earth; which is certainly what the apostle has here in view. And from this it is evident that the patriarchs had a proper notion of the immortality of the soul, and expected a place of residence widely different from Canaan. Though to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, the promises were made in which Canaan was so particularly included, yet God did not give them any inheritance in that country; no, not so much as to set a foot on, Acts vii. 5. Therefore, if they had not understood the promises to belong to spiritual things, far from enduring, as seeing Him who is invisible, they must have considered themselves deceived and mocked. The apostle, therefore, with the highest propriety, attributes their whole conduct and expectation to faith.

17. Abraham, when he was tried] See the history of this whole transaction explained at large in Gen. xxii. 1—9.

Offered up his only-begotten] Abraham did, in effect, offer up Isaac: he built an altar, bound his son, laid him upon the sons of Joseph; and <sup>21</sup> worshipped, leaning upon the top of his staff.

<sup>24</sup> By faith <sup>24</sup> Moses, when he was come to years, refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter; altar, had ready the incense, took the knife, and would immediately have slain him had he not been prevented by the same authority by which the sacrifice was enjoined.—Isaac is here called his only-begotten, as he was the only son he had by his legitimate wife, who was heir to his property, and heir of the promises of God. The man who proved faithful in such a trial, deserved to have his faith and obedience recorded throughout the world.

<sup>26</sup> Esteeming <sup>26</sup> the reproach <sup>26</sup> of Christ greater riches than in Gen. 47. 31.—a Gen. 50. 25, 26. Exod. 13. 13.—a Or, remembered.—a Exod. 2. 2. Acts 7. 23.—a Exod. 1. 16, 22.—a Exod. 2. 10, 11.—a Psal. 10.—a Ch. 13. 13.—a Or, for Christ.—a Ch. 10. 25.

<sup>19</sup> To raise him up, even from the dead] Abraham staggered not at the promise through unbelief, but was strong in faith, giving glory to God. The resurrection of the dead must have been a doctrine of the patriarchs: they expected a heavenly inheritance; they saw they died as did other men; and they must have known that they could not enjoy it but in consequence of a resurrection from the dead.

He received him in a figure] By παραβολα. In my discourse on parabolic writing at the end of Matt. xiii. I have shown, (signification 9) that παραβολα sometimes means a dangerous exploit, a jeoparding of the life; and have referred to this place. I think it should be so understood here, as pointing out the very imminent danger he was in of losing his life. The clause may therefore be thus translated: "Accounting that God was able to raise him up from the dead, from whence He had received him, he being in the most imminent danger of losing his life." It is not, therefore, the natural deadness of Abraham and Sarah to which the apostle alludes, but the death to which Isaac, on this occasion was exposed, and which he escaped by the immediate intercession of God.

<sup>20</sup> By faith Isaac blessed Jacob and Esau] He believed that God would fulfil His promise to his posterity; and God gave him to see what would befall them in their future generations. The apostle does not seem to intimate that one should be an object of the Divine hatred, and the other of Divine love, in reference to their eternal states. This is wholly a discovery of later ages. For an ample consideration of this subject, see the notes on Gen. xviii.

It appears that at the time Joseph visited his father, he was very weak, and generally confined to his couch; having at hand his staff, either that with which he usually supported his feeble body, or that which was the ensign of his office, as patriarch or chief of a very numerous family. The ancient chiefs, in all countries, had this staff or sceptre continually at hand.—See Homer throughout. It is said, Gen. xlviii. 2, that when Joseph came to see his father, Jacob, who was then in his last sickness, that Isaac strengthened himself and sat upon the bed. Still conceive he had his staff or sceptre at hand; and while sitting upon the bed, with his feet on the floor, he supported himself with his staff. When Joseph swore to him that he should be carried up from Egypt, he bowed himself on his bed's head, still supporting himself with his staff, which probably with this last act he laid aside, gathered up his feet, and reclined wholly on his couch. It was therefore indifferent to say, that he worshipped or bowed himself on his staff, or on his bed's head. But as πρὸς στήθεα, signifies not only to bow, but also to worship, because acts of adoration were performed by bowing and prostration: and as ἔως ἄστράγαλον, a bed, by the change of the vowel points, becomes ματῆα, a staff, hence the Septuagint have translated the passage καὶ προσεκύνησεν ἐπ' αὐτῆς τοῦ ἀγκυρῆς τοῦ πύθου αὐτοῦ, And Israel bowed, or worshipped on the head of his staff. This reading the apostle follows here literatim.

Wretched must that cause be which is obliged to have recourse to what, at best, is an equivocal expression, to prove and support a favourite opinion. The Romanists allege this in favour of image worship. This is too contemptible to require confutation. To make it speak this language, the Rheims version renders the verse thus:—By faith Jacob dying, blessed every one of the sons of Joseph, and adored the top of his rod. A pretty object of adoration, indeed, for a dying patriarch! Here the preposition ἐπ', upon, answering to the Hebrew ב, is wholly suppressed, to make it favour the corrupt reading of the Vulgate. This preposition is found in the Hebrew text, in the Greek Version of the Seventy, the printed Greek text of the New Testament, and in every MS. yet discovered of this epistle. It is also found in the Syriac, Æthiopic, Arabic, and Coptic. In which languages the connection necessarily is, that it is not an idle particle; and the treasures in Egypt: for he had respect unto the recompense of the reward.

<sup>28</sup> Through faith <sup>28</sup> he kept the passover, and the sprinkling of blood, lest he that destroyed the first-born should touch them.

<sup>29</sup> By faith <sup>29</sup> they passed through the Red Sea as by dry land: when the Egyptians assaying to go down, after they were compassed about seven days.

by no mode of construction can the text be brought to support image worship, any more than it can support transubstantiation.

<sup>22</sup> Joseph when he died] Τελωνον, when he was dying, gave commandment concerning his bones. On this subject I refer the reader to the notes on Gen. 1. 23. And I have this to add to the account I have given of the sarcophagus now in the British Museum, vulgarly called Alexander's coffin, that it is more probably the coffin of Joseph himself: and, should the time ever arrive in which the hieroglyphics on it shall be interpreted, this conjecture may appear to have had its foundation in truth.

<sup>23</sup> By faith Moses, &c.] See the notes on Exod. ii. 2 and Acts vii. 20. We know that Moses was bred up at the Egyptian court: and there, was considered to be the son of Pharaoh's daughter; and probably might have succeeded to the throne of Egypt; but finding that God had visited His people, and given them a promise of spiritual and eternal blessing, he chose rather to take the lot of this people, i. e. God as his portion for ever; than to enjoy the pleasures of sin, which, however gratifying to the animal senses, could only be temporary.

After the 23d verse, there is a whole clause added by DE. two copies of the Itala, and some copies of the Vulgate. The clause is the following:—Πιστὶς Μωϋσῆος ἀνέλας τὸν Αἴγυπτον, κατὰ τὴν τὴν τακτικὴν τῆς ἀδελφῶν αὐτοῦ. By faith Moses, when he was grown up, slew the Egyptian, considering the oppression of his own brethren. This is a remarkable addition, and one of the largest in the whole New Testament. It seems to have been collected from the history of Moses, as given in Exodus; and to have been put originally into the margin of some MS. from which it afterward crept into the text.

<sup>26</sup> The reproach of Christ] The Christ, or Messiah, had been revealed to Moses: of Him he prophesied, Deut. xviii. 15. and the reproach which God's people had, in consequence of their decided opposition to idolatry, may be termed the reproach of Christ, for they refused to become one people with the Egyptians, because the promises of the rest was made to them; and in this rest Christ and His salvation were included: but, although it does not appear these things were known to the Hebrews at large, yet it is evident that there were sufficient intimations given to Moses concerning the Great Deliverer, (of whom himself was a type,) that determined his conduct in the above respect; as he fully understood that he must renounce his interest in the promises, and in the life eternal to which they led, if he did not obey the Divine call in the present instance. Many have been stumbled by the word ὑποτίθησθε, Christ, here; because they cannot see how Moses should have any knowledge of Him. It may be said that it was just as easy for God Almighty to reveal Christ to Moses, as it was for Him to reveal Him to Isaiah, or to the shepherds, or to John Baptist; or to manifest Him in the  flesh. After all there is much reason to believe that, by τὸν χριστόν, here, of Christ or the anointed, the apostle means the whole body of the Israelitish or Hebrew people; for, as the word signifies the anointed, and anointing was a consecration to God, to serve Him in some particular office, as prophet, priest, king, or the like, all the Hebrew people were considered thus anointed or consecrated: and it is worthy of remark, that χριστός, is used in this very sense, by the Septuagint, 1 Sam. ii. 36. Psal. cv. 15 and Heb. iii. 13. where the word is necessarily restrained to this meaning.

He had respect unto the recompense] ἄραβάρη, he looked attentively to it; his eyes were constantly directed to it. This is the import of the original word; and the whole conduct of Moses was an illustration of it.

<sup>27</sup> He forsook Egypt] He believed that God would fulfil the promise He had made: and he cheerfully changed an earthly for a heavenly portion.

Not fearing the wrath of the king] The apostle speaks here of the departure of Moses with the Israelites, not of his flight to Midian, Exod. ii. 14, 15. for he was then in great fear; but when he went to Pharaoh with God's authority, to demand the dismissal of the Hebrews, he was without fear; and acted in the most noble and dignified manner; he then feared nothing but God.

As seeing him who is invisible.] He continued to act as one who had the Judge of his heart and conduct always before his eyes. By calling the Divine Being the invisible, the apostle distinguishes him from the gods of Egypt, who were visible.

corporeal, gross, and worthless. The Israelites were worshippers of the true God; and this worship was not tolerated in Egypt. His pure and spiritual worship could never comport with the adoration of oxen, goats, monkeys, leeks, and onions.

23. He kept the pass-over God told him that He would destroy the first-born of the Egyptians; but would spare all those whose doors were sprinkled with the blood of the Paschal Lamb. Moses believed this, kept the pass-over, and sprinkled the blood. See the notes on Exod. xii. One of the Itala adds here, Fide, prædaverunt Egyptianæ exæcuti "By faith, when they went out, they spoiled the Egyptians." This is any thing but genuine.

23. By faith they passed through the Red Sea See the notes on Exod. xiv. 22. The Egyptians thought they could walk through the sea as well as the Israelites. They tried, and were drowned; while the former passed in perfect safety. The one walked by faith, the other by sight; one perished, the other was saved.

20. The walls of Jericho fell down This is particularly explained Joshua vi. &c. God had promised that the walls of Jericho should fall down, if they compassed them about seven days. They believed, did as they were commanded, and the promise was fulfilled.

21. The harlot Rahab perished not See this account Josh. ii. 1, 9, 11. & vi. 23. where it is rendered exceedingly probable that the word rahab, in Hebrew, and ραββι in Greek, which we translate harlot, should be rendered innkeeper or tavernkeeper, as there is no proper evidence that the person in question was such a woman as our translation represents her. As to her having been a harlot before, and converted afterward, it is a signment of an idle fancy. She was afterward married to Salmen, a Jewish prince; see Matt. i. 5. And it is extremely incredible that had she been what we represent her, he would have sought for such an alliance.

Received the spies with peace. Μηρ εἰρήνης, the same as ἡμεῖς βασιλοῦν, giving them a kind welcome, good fare, and protection. After these words the Slavonic adds, καὶ ἐτρέψατο ἐκβαλοῦσα, and sent them out another way.

22. Time would fail me Με ἀνεχομένου ὁ χρόνος. A very usual mode of expression with the best Greek writers, when they wish to intimate that much important intelligence remains to be communicated on the subject already in hand; which must be omitted, because of other points which have not yet been handled.

Gedeon Who by faith in God, with 300 men, destroyed a countless multitude of Midianites and Amalekites, and delivered Israel from oppression and slavery. Judges vi. vii. viii.

Barak Who overthrew Jabin, king of Canaan, and delivered Israel from servitude. Judges iv.

Samson Who was appointed by God to deliver Israel from her oppressive yoke of the Philistines; and, by extraordinary assistance, discomfited them on various occasions. Judges xiii.—xv.

Jephthah Who, under the same guidance, defeated the Ammonites, and delivered Israel. Judges xi. xii.

David King of Israel, whose whole life was a life of faith and dependence on God; but whose character will be best seen in those books which contain an account of his reign, and the book of Psalms; to which, and the notes there, the reader must be referred. It is probable he is referred to here or that act of faith and courage which he showed in his combat with Goliath. See 1 Sam. xvii.

Samuel The last of the Israelitish judges, to whom succeeded a race of kings, of whom Saul and David were the two first, and were both anointed by this most eminent man. See his history in the first book of Samuel.

All these are said to have performed their various exploits through faith. 1. The faith of Gedeon consisted in his throwing down the altar of Baal, and cutting down his grove, in obedience to the command of God. 2. The faith of Barak consisted in his believing the revelation made to Deborah, and in command to go against Jabin's numerous army. 3. Samson's faith consisted in his obeying the various impulses produced by the Spirit of God in his own mind. 4. Jephthah's faith consisted particularly in his believing the promise made to him and his posterity, that they should possess the land of Canaan; and in his resolutely fighting against the Ammonites, that they might not deprive the Israelites of the land between Arnon and Jabbok. It may be observed here, that an apostle does not produce these in chronological order: for Barak lived before Gedeon, and Jephthah before Samson, and Samuel before David. He was not producing facts in their chronological order; but instances of the power of God exerted in the behalf of men who had strong confidence in Him.

33. Who through faith subdued kingdoms As Joshua, who subdued the seven Canaanitish nations; and David, who

25 Women received their dead raised to life again; and others were tortured, not accepting deliverance; that they might obtain a better resurrection; subdued the Moabites, Syrians, Ammonites, and Edomites. 2 Sam. viii. &c.

Wrought righteousness Did a great variety of works indicative of that faith in God, without which it is impossible to do any thing that is good.

Obtained promises This is supposed to refer to Joshua and Caleb, who through their faith in God, obtained the promised land, while all the rest of the Israelites were excluded: to Phineas also, who, for his act of zealous faith in slaying Zimri and Cozbi, got the promise of an everlasting priesthood: and to David, who, for his faith and obedience, obtained the kingdom of Israel, and had the promise, that from his seed the Messiah should spring.

Stopped the mouths of lions Daniel, who, though cast into a den of lions, for his fidelity to God, was preserved among them unhurt; and finally came to great honour.

34. Quenched the violence of fire As in the case of the three faithful Hebrews, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, who, for their steady attachment to God's worship, were cast into a fiery furnace; in which they were preserved, and from which they escaped unhurt. Dan. iii.

Escaped the edge of the sword Moses, who escaped the sword of Pharaoh; Exod. xviii. 4. Elijah, that of Jezebel; and David, that of Saul; and many others.

Out of weakness were made strong Were miraculously restored from sickness which seemed to threaten their life; as Hezekiah, Isa. xxxviii. 21.

Waxed valiant in fight Like Gedeon, who overthrew the camp of the Midianites; and Jonathan, that of the Philistines, in such a way as must have proved that God was with them.

35. Women received their dead As did the widow of Zarephath, 1 Kings xvii. 21. and the Shunammite, 2 Kings iv. 34. What other cases under all the above heads the apostle might have in view, we know not.

Others were tortured Ερτυματισθησαν. This is a word concerning the meaning of which the critics are not agreed. Τυρματωρ signifies a stick, or baton, which was used in bastinadoing criminals. And τυρματωρ signifies to beat violently, and is thus explained by the best lexicographers. After considering what others have written on this subject, I am inclined to think that the bastinado on the soles of the feet is what is here designed. That this was a most torturing and dangerous punishment, we learn from the most authentic accounts; and it is practised among the Turks and other Mohammedans to the present day. Mr. Antes, of Fulnek, in Yorkshire, twenty years a resident in Egypt, furnishes the latest account I have met with; he himself was the unhappy subject of his own description. See article 4, at the end of this chapter.

Not accepting deliverance This looks very like a reference to the case of the mother and her seven sons, mentioned 2 Maccab. vii. 1. &c.

36. Had trial of cruel mockings and scourgings We do not know the cases to which the apostle refers. The mockings here can never mean such as those of Ishmael against Isaac, or the youths of Bethel against Eliah. It is more probable that it refers to public exhibitions of the people of God at idol feasts, and the like; and Samson's case before Dagon, when the Philistines had put out his eyes, is quite in point. As to scourgings, this was a common way of punishing minor culprits; and even those who were to be punished capitally, were first scourged. See the case of our Lord.

Bonds and imprisonment Joseph was cast into prison. Jeremiah was cast into a dungeon full of mire; chap. xxxvii. 16. and xxxviii. 6. And the prophet Micahiah was imprisoned by Ahab, 1 Kings xxii. 27.

37. They were stoned As Zechariah, the son of Barachiah, or Jehoiada, was, between the altar and the temple; see the account, 2 Chron. xxiv. 21. and see the notes on Matt. xxiii. 35. And as Naboth the Jezreelite, who, on refusing to give up his father's inheritance to a covetous king, because it had respect to the promise of God, was falsely accused and stoned to death; 1 Kings xxi. 1.—14.

They were sawn asunder There is a tradition that the prophet Isaiah was thus martyred. In Yevamoth, fol. 49. 2. it is thus written, "Manasseh slew Isaiah; for he commanded that he should be slain with a wooden saw. They then brought the saw, and cut him in two; and when the saw reached his mouth, his soul fled forth." St. Jerom, and others, mention the same thing; and among the Jews the tradition is indubitable.

Were tempted Ἐκπεισθησαν. I believe this word has vexed the critics more than any other in the New Testament. How being tempted can be ranked among the heavy sufferings of the primitive martyrs and confessors is not easy to discern; because, to be tempted, is the common lot of every godly man. This difficulty has induced learned men to mend the text by sheep skins and goat skins; being destitute, afflicted, tormented;

38 (Of whom the world was not worthy;) they wandered in deserts, and in mountains, and in dens and caves of the earth.

γ 1 Kings 18. 4 & 12. 4 - 1 Sam. 2. 13 - 4 Or, foremen.

conjecture: Baza proposes ερωσθησας, they were branded. Junius, Piscator, and others, propose εσπασθησας, they were burnt alive. Gataker thinks, εσπινθησας, of the same import, should be preferred. Tanaquil Faber gives the preference to ερωσθησας, they were mutilated—had different parts of their bodies topped off. Sir Norton Knatchbull contends for εσπασθησας, they were transfixed, or pierced through. Alberici thinks the original reading was εσπασθησας, they were strangled. About as many more differences have been proposed by learned men, all bearing a very near resemblance to the words now found in the Greek text. By three MSS. the word is entirely omitted; as also by the Syriac, Arabic of Erpenius, the Ethiopic, and by Eusebius, and Theophylact. Of all the conjectures, that of Knatchbull appears to me to be the most probable; they were transfixed, or impaled—and even the present reading might be construed in this sense.

Were slain with the sword] As in the case of the eighty-five priests slain by Doeg; see 1 Sam. xxii. 18. and the prophets, of whose slaughter by the sword, Elijah complains, 1 Kings ix. 10. Probably the word means being beheaded, which was formerly done with a sword, and not with an axe; and in the East is done by the sword, to the present day.

They wandered about in sheep-skins] Μηλωταις. Sheep-skins dressed with the wool on. This was probably the sort of mantle that Elijah wore, and which was afterward used by Elisha; for the Septuagint, in 2 Kings ii. 8, 13, expressly say, καὶ ἔθηκεν Ἠλίου τὴν μίλητον αὐτοῦ; and Elijah took his sheep-skin (mantle) καὶ ἔθηκεν τὴν μίλητον Ἠλίου ἣ ἐκείνου εσπασθῆν ἄνθρω. And he (Elisha) took the sheep-skin of Elijah, which had fallen from off him. It was most probably on this account, as Dr. Macknight conjectures, that Elijah was called a hairy man, 2 Kings i. 8. and not on account of having a preposterously long beard, as those rarrers of all the trifles of time, place, circumstances, and common sense, the painters, represent him. And it is likely that the prophets themselves wore such garments; and that the false prophets imitated them in this, in order that they might gain the greater credit. And it shall come to pass in that day, that the prophets shall be ashamed every one of his vision—neither shall they wear a rough garment to deceive. Zech. xiii. 4. ἄβρις ἑριχθίνον, a hairy skin, says, probably the goat-skins mentioned above. In general, this was an upper garment; but in the cases to which the apostle alludes, the sheep-skins and goat-skin seem to have been the only covering.

Being destitute] Υπεροσπιτοι, in want of all the comforts and conveniences of life, and often of its necessities.

Afflicted] In consequence of enduring such privations. Tormented] Κακοχρηστούτοι, maltreated, harassed, variously persecuted by those to whom they brought the message of salvation.

38. (Of whom the world was not worthy) Yet they were obliged to wander by day in deserts and mountains, driven from the society of men; and often obliged to hide by night in dens and caves of the earth, to conceal themselves from the brutal rage of men. Perhaps he refers here principally to the case of Elijah, and the hundred prophets hidden in caves by Obadiah, and fed with bread and water. See 1 Kings xviii. 4. David was often obliged thus to hide himself from Saul. 1 Sam. xxiv. 3, &c.

39. Having obtained a good report (having been witness to; see verse 2.) through faith] It was faith in God which supported all those eminent men, who, in different parts of the world, and in different ages, were persecuted for righteousness' sake.

Received not the promise] They all heard of the promises made to Abraham of a heavenly rest; and of the promise of the Messiah, for this was a constant tradition: but they died without having seen this Anointed of the Lord. Christ was not in any of their times manifested in the flesh; and of Him, who was the expectation of all nations, they heard only by the hearing of the ear. This must be the promise, without receiving of which, the apostle says, they died.

40. God having provided some better thing for us] This is the dispensation of the Gospel, with all the privileges and advantages it confers.

That they without us should not be made perfect] Believers before the flood, after the flood, under the Law, and since the Law, make but one church. The Gospel dispensation is the last; and the church cannot be considered as complete till the believers under all dispensations are gathered together. As the Gospel is the last dispensation, the preceding believers cannot be consummated even in glory till the Gospel church arrive in the heaven of heavens.

There are a great variety of meanings put on this place; but the above seems the most simple and consistent. See Rev. vi. 11. "White robes were given unto every one of them; and he said unto them, that they should rest yet for a little season, till their servants also, and their brethren, that were, should be fulfilled." This time upon the wing.

39 And these all, having obtained a good report of faith, received not the promise:

40 God having provided some better thing for us, they without us should not be made perfect.

OBSERVATIONS ON THE BEING OF A DEIFIED FROM A CONSIDERATION OF HEBREWS, CH. II. He that cometh unto God must believe that he is: he is the rewarder of them who diligently seek him.

I. Metaphysicians and philosophers, in order to existence of God, have used two modes of arguing.

1. A priori, proofs drawn from the necessity that being as God is must exist: arguments of this kind deduce any thing in evidence which is derived from God. 2. A posteriori, proofs of the being and perfection drawn from His own works.

PROPOSITIONS A PRIORI. Prop. I.—If there be no Being in the universe but such as might possibly not be, it would follow, that there might possibly have been no Being at all: and if that could be so, it would be as if that the present existence might have arisen from nothing, which is absurd. Therefore, it is not possible that there might have been no existence at all. Consequently, the impossibility of not existing must be found somewhere. It must have been a Being whose nonexistence is impossible.

II. The whole nature of an unoriginated Being, as the cause of His attributes, must be unoriginated, and independent of what it is. A being cannot produce its own attributes; this would suppose it acted before it existed. Therefore, the nature of this Being that is contingent upon what it is, must have a cause to determine its mode of existence.

III. The attributes of an unoriginated Being must be possessed by it unlimitedly; for, to possess an attribute in a certain degree, must suppose a cause to determine it to have modified this Being so as to make Him in that degree, having that attribute in any other than an imperfect manner. But no cause can be admitted in this case, because First of all beings, and the Cause of all things, must be perfect attribute, or any one that is not in its highest degree, must be capable of improvement by exercise and effort, which would imply that the unoriginated Being must be naturally imperfect; and that He was deriving farther perfection from the exercise of His own powers, and from His own works.

IV. The unoriginated Being must exist every where in the same manner He does any where; for if He did not exist in some cause by which His presence was limited, there can be no cause to limit that presence.

V. This unoriginated Being must be a simple substance, identically the same every where, consisting of parts, for these must be distinct and independent; nor of whole, for this is the aggregate of parts, magnitude or quantity, for these signify a compound. This Being must be as truly one and undivided in the present moment of time as indivisibly one in nature; and can no more be limited or measured by the present moment than by duration.

Hence, this Being cannot be matter or body, because matter belongs extension, divisibility, figurability, and weight, which imply limitation. God and matter have contrary properties.

God is not material. It has already been shown that matter necessarily must exist one infinite, unoriginated, and unmeasured Being. Now, this Being must be a thinking Being, as it is impossible to conceive that unthinking matter could produce a thinking intelligent Being, as it is to conceive that nothing could produce matter.

Let us suppose any parcel of matter to be eternal, and in itself, unable to produce any thing. Let its parts firmly at rest together; if there were no motion in the world, must it not eternally remain so, a dead lump? Is it possible to conceive that it can add to itself, or produce it in other portions of matter? Therefore, by its own strength, cannot produce in itself motion. The motion it has must also be from eternally added to matter by some other being more powerful than matter.

But let us suppose motion eternal too; yet matter, matter, and motion, could never produce thought. Knowledge will still be as far beyond the power of motion as to produce, as matter is beyond the power of motion to produce. Divide matter into as minute parts as you will operate no other ways upon other bodies of matter, than it did before this division. The mind, the mind of matter strike, impel, and resist one another, greater do; and that is all that they can do. So that suppose nothing eternal, matter can never begin to suppose bare matter, without motion, and matter; it can never begin to be. If we suppose only matter eternal, then thought can never begin to be. For, if matter, that matter, either with or without motion, could be originally, in and from itself, sense, perception, knowledge, as is evident, from hence, that sense, and knowledge, must be properties eternally inseparable from matter, and every particle of it.

Since, therefore, whatsoever is the first eternal Being must necessarily be a lasting Being, and whatsoever is first of all things must necessarily contain in it, and actually have, at least, all the perfections that can ever after exist; it necessarily follows that the first eternal Being cannot be matter.

VI.—This Being must possess intelligence and power unlimited, and all other attributes that are in themselves absolute perfections. Attributes are divided into natural and moral, or primary and secondary. The first, are those which essentially belong to the nature of a Being considered in itself; the second, in his manner of acting towards others. All the attributes of God being essential, must be unlimited; and, therefore, His knowledge must extend to every thing that can be known, and His power to every thing that can be done.

VII.—There cannot be in the universe more than one unoriginated Being; for as this Being is possessed of infinite attributes, let us suppose a second unoriginated Being. He must possess the same; for both these Beings are eternal, and necessarily the same, every where alike present, without any possible difference or distinction, and therefore the same. Two such cannot subsist; and the supposition of a second such Being is only a mental repetition of the being and attributes of the first.

VIII.—All things owe their existence to their First Cause, operating according to its own free will. Absolute power does not act of necessity, but freely: the power may exist without exertion; if it did not, then it acts by necessity; and if so, necessity is the agent, and not the free power of the independent God. He can do what He will; but He will only do what is right, &c.

The like may be said of His omniscience. He knows Himself, and what He has formed, and what He can do; but is not necessitated to know as certain what Himself has made contingent. If God must continually act because He is omnipotent; and know, because He is omniscient; then He must be constantly employed in doing or undoing whatever is possible to be done or undone; and knowing all that is, and all that can be, and what cannot be, which is absurd.

IX.—God is a Being of infinite goodness, wisdom, mercy, justice, and truth; and all other perfections which become the Prætor and Governor of the universe. Goodness consists in being pleased with communicating happiness to others. Wisdom, in making a right, or beneficial use of knowledge or power; for no being, however intelligent or powerful, is said to act wisely, but that which makes a good or beneficial use of knowledge and power. Hence wisdom and goodness must be ever conjoined to make any act of power perfect. As He is wise, He knows what is best to be done; powerful, He can do it; good, He will do it. Justice, mercy, truth, or faithfulness, are not distinct attributes, but denominations given to His power and wisdom, in their various operations on different occasions, in reference to His creatures.

God's liberty of acting; His power and wisdom being infinite. He cannot be prevented by any outward cause; His nature being essentially good, He can have no opposition from within. His power, and all His other attributes, being infinite, eternal, and consequently unlimited, can have no opposition from without. And His liberty consists in His being free to act or not act; or infinitely or limitedly to vary His operations according to His own wisdom, goodness, and truth.—See also the late Bishop of Osory, Chevalier Ramsay, Dr. S. Clarke, and others.

REMARKS OF PROOFS A POSTERIORI.—Recapitulation of the preceding propositions. II. In the argument a priori, in order to demonstrate the being of a God, it was attempted to prove, that there must have been a Being whose nonexistence is impossible. In arguing on this subject, it has been shown, 1. That this Being was unoriginated. 2. That all His attributes must also be unoriginated. 3. That these attributes must be unlimited, and absolutely perfect. 4. That this Being must exist every where, in the same manner He does any where. 5. That He is simple and uncompounded; not consisting of parts, nor of whole; nor of magnitude, nor of quantity. 6. That He must possess intelligence and power unlimited; and all other attributes that are in themselves absolute perfections. 7. That there cannot be in the universe any more than one such unoriginated, simple, and infinite Being. 8. That all things owe their existence to this First Cause; operating, not according to any kind of necessity, but according to its own free will. 9. That as, in all His operations, all His attributes must concur and combine; so all the works of His hands must bear the impress of wisdom and goodness, of that wisdom which consists in making a right use of knowledge and power; i. e. using both beneficially; of that goodness which consists in being pleased with communicating happiness to others. Hence may be deduced CREATION; the plan of which proceeded from His wisdom; the execution from his power; and the result, a proof of His goodness.

From these data we might proceed, to prove the being of a God, and His beneficence and moral government of the world, a posteriori, i. e. arguing from the effects to the Cause.

And first, a being of infinite wisdom must be expected to form His works so, as to evidence that wisdom, in their multiplicity, variety, internal structure, arrangement, connexions, and dependencies; and consequently, that these works must be in many respects inscrutable to man. And this, as they are His works, must be one of their characteristics.

Whether there be any other kind of being than spiritual and material, and such as are of a mixed nature, we cannot tell; but we have no ideas of any other kind, nor can we conceive the possibility of the existence of any other: as we have no ideas of any figure that is not formed of straight or curved lines, or a mixture of both.

God, the uncreated Spirit, manifests Himself by material substances. Created spirits must be manifested in the same way; and though matter may exist without spirit, and spirit without matter; yet, without the latter, spirit cannot become manifest. Hence matter appears to have been created for the use of spirit, or intellectual beings.

Creation, in general, demonstrates the being of a God. THE SOLAR SYSTEM, and plurality of worlds; magnitude, distances, velocity, and gravity, of the celestial bodies; projectile and centripetal forces; centre of gravity; ellipses; double and treble motion; attraction; all demonstrate the wisdom, power, and goodness, of God. VEGETATION.—Plants; trees; circulation of nutritious juices; composition of ligneous fibres; dissolution and regeneration of terrestrial productions. PANORAMA of genera and species, demonstrations of infinite skill, and of the wisest and most beneficent Providence. MAN.—Life; nutrition; sleep; the senses, particularly vision; and muscular motion; each furnishes a series of irrefragable arguments. THE HEART, and the circulation of the blood; afford the most striking proofs; and on this point let the reader particularly fix his attention. In a healthy state, the heart makes eighty pulsations in a minute; and it is calculated that from two ounces to two ounces and a half of blood are expelled into the aorta at each pulsation; consequently, at least nine thousand six hundred ounces will be thrown into the aorta in an hour; which would amount to one thousand four hundred and forty pounds in one day. At each pulsation, this quantum of blood is propelled eight inches, which amounts to fifty feet in a minute! The quantity of blood in a human body is, on an average, about thirty pounds, and passes through the heart about twenty-three times in the space of one hour! A weight of fifty pounds, hung to the foot, the leg laid across the opposite knee, was raised by the action of the popliteal artery. Allowing for the distance from the centre of motion, this proves that the heart must possess a power of at least four hundred pounds! The blood circulates by pressure from behind, occasioned by the action of the heart; which pressure, having propelled it, according to the laws of gravity, to the extremities, recondacts it, contrary to those laws, back to the heart. How is this effected? It has been supposed that the ARTERIES contribute much to the circulation of the blood; were it even so, it would be comparatively useless, as they cease where such an auxiliary power is most wanting, at the extremities, where their anastomosis with the veins takes place; and the veins are not supposed to possess any such propelling power.

But that the arteries possess no such power, Bichat has proved by the following experiment. He took the arm of a dead man, placed it in warm water, inserted one end of a tube in the brachial artery, and the other end in the carotid artery of a living dog: the blood circulated in the dead arm, the pulse of which beat regularly by the action of the heart of the living animal. Is there not a wondrous and especial providence of God by which this is effected?

Others have attributed the pulsation of the heart itself to the stimulating nature of the blood. Bichat has disproved this by the following experiments:—1. Expose the heart of an animal, and empty it; apply a stimulus to its muscles, and it will dilate, and contract, as if it were full. 2. Puncture all the large vessels connected with the heart, so as to empty it entirely; and the alternate contractions and dilatations will continue for some time, notwithstanding the total absence of the blood. 3. Remove two hearts of equal bulk from two living animals, place the fingers in the ventricles of the one, and grasp the other in the opposite hand, and it will be found that the effort of the latter in its dilatation, is as forcible as the other in its contraction.

Incessant action of the heart.—Its unweariedness.—What exhausts all other muscles appears to increase its action and its force! Can any person conceive how it is possible that a muscle can be in incessant action for threecore, fourcore, or a hundred years, without any kind of weariness? There is nothing in nature that can well explain this. Over its motion the mind has no power. This is wisely ordered; as many in momentary fits of caprice, despair, and passion, would suspend the circulation, and thus put an end to their lives.

Providence; or the economical government of God, in the provision for men and animals.—Never too much; never too little: the produce of the earth being ever in proportion to the consumers; and the consumers to that produce.

Redemption.—1. As all things are intimately known to God; He must know wherein their happiness consists; and may, from His goodness, be expected to make every provision for that happiness.

2. Every sentient creature is capable of happiness or misery. 3. No creature can choose a state of misery for itself, because no creature can desire to be unhappy.

4. If any being could choose that state for another, he must be led to it by some motive which may make it eligible or desirable: and this must spring from his envy, jealousy, fear, or a conviction that the wretchedness of the other will contribute to his own happiness. None of these can exist in God, the Creator; consequently, He must be supposed to have made man for happiness. His counsels never change; and therefore, when man had fallen, He provided him a Saviour: this might be naturally expected from His infinite benevolence.

The moral changes made in sinners, proofs of the being, agency, goodness, and presence of God.

Man's existence is a proof of the Being of God; he feels himself to be the effect of a Cause, and that Cause to be wise, powerful, and good. There is evidently no cause in nature capable of producing such an effect, for no operation of nature can produce mind or intellect; the wonderful structure of the body, and the astonishing powers of mind, equally prove that God is our Maker, and that in Him we live, move, and have our being.

III. Astronomical phenomena very difficult to be accounted for upon natural principles; are strong evidences of the being and continual agency of God.

PHENOMENON I. The motion of a planet in an elliptic orbit is truly wonderful, and incapable of a physical demonstration in all its particulars. From its aphelion, or greatest distance from the sun, or body round which it revolves, to its perihelion, or least distance, its motion is continually accelerated; and from its perihelion to its aphelion as constantly retarded. From what source has the planet derived that power, which it opposes to the solar attraction, in such a manner, that when passing from aphelion to perihelion, by a continued acceleration, it is prevented from making a nearer approach to the sun? And, on the other hand, what influence prevents the planet, after it has passed, by a continued retardation, from perihelion to aphelion, from going altogether out of the solar attraction, and causes it to return again to perihelion? In Sir Isaac Newton's demonstration that this phenomenon is a necessary result of the laws of gravity and projectile forces; it is worthy of observation, that to account for a planet's moving in an elliptic orbit, little differing from a circle, and having the sun in the lower focus, the projectile force of the planet, or the power by which it would move for ever in a straight line, if not acted upon from without, is assumed to be nearly sufficient to counterbalance the planet's gravitating power, or, which is the same thing, the attraction of the central body:—for, the demonstration, the particulars of which are too complicated to be here detailed, puts us in possession of the following facts:—if a planet be projected in a direction exactly perpendicular to that of the central body, with a velocity equal to what it would acquire by falling half way to the centre by attraction alone, it will describe a circle round the central body. If the velocity of projection be greater than this, but not equal to what the planet would acquire in falling to the centre, it will move in an elliptical orbit more or less eccentric according to the greater or less degree of projectile force. If the velocity of projection be equal to that which the planet would acquire in falling to the central body, it will move in a parabola; if greater than this, in a hyperbola. Now it cannot be demonstrated upon physical principles, that a planet should have a certain projectile force, and no other; or that it should have any at all; for it is a law of nature, ably demonstrated by Newton in his Principia, that all bodies have such an indiffidence to rest or motion, that if once at rest, they must remain eternally so, unless acted upon by some power sufficient to move them; and that a body once put in motion will proceed of itself ever after in a straight line, if not diverted out of this rectilinear course by some influence. Every planetary body has a certain projectile force; therefore, some previously existing cause must have communicated it. The planets have not only a projectile force, but this power is at the same time nearly a counterbalance to its gravitation, or the attraction of the central body; so that by virtue of these powers, thus harmoniously united, the planets perform their revolutions in orbits nearly circular, with the greatest regularity. It hence follows that the Cause which has communicated just so much projectile force as to produce so near an equilibrium in the centrifugal and centripetal powers, is infinitely intelligent: therefore this Cause must be God.

As all the planets move in orbits more or less elliptical, when they could have been made to move in circles by a particular adjustment of the attractive and projectile forces; the Divine purpose must be best answered by the eccentric orbit. The habitable earth evidently derives very great advantage from the elliptical orbit; for, in consequence of it, the sun is seven or eight days of every year longer on the northern side of the ecliptic than he is on the southern; i. e. from the 21st of March, when he crosses the equator northward, to the 23d of September, when he again returns to the equator, there are 186 days; but from the 23d of September, or autumnal equinox, to the 21st of March, or vernal equinox, there are only 179 days. From this circumstance the northern hemisphere, which it has pleased God should contain by far the greatest portion of land, is considerably warmer towards the polar regions than in similar latitudes towards the south pole, where an equal degree of temperature is not needed. Circumnavigators have not yet been able (because of the great cold of the south polar regions) to proceed beyond seventy-two or seventy-three degrees of south latitude. The same thing, to approach the south pole, has been done in the same thing, to approach the northern frigid zone, where the temperature has been explored to within thirty degrees of the pole, i. e. to nearly eighty-two deg.

PHENOMENON II. The double motion, namely, its annual revolution and diurnal the greatest wonders the science of astronomy.—The laws which regulate the planets are so completely hid from man, notwithstanding the great extension of philosophic researches, that the planets employ in their rotations and revolutions by observation. How is it that two motions so different from each other, should be in the same time, without one interfering with the astonishing accuracy with which celestial motions are conducted within the last one hundred astronomers to demonstrate that the earth very sensibly affect the figure of the equator, and consequently is motion in its orbit. Of this the astronomer who examines the calculus employed for any particular point of time, the sun, or moon, or which is the same thing, the orbit which is exactly opposed to the perihelion. Thus the maximum that the earth is in nine seconds and seven tenths of a second, and six seconds and seven tenths; and by two thirds, &c. But no astronomer, of the world, has been able to demonstrate that the earth is at all accelerated in its diurnal rotation; or, on the other hand, that on its axis experiences the least irregularity of revolution. How wonderful is this controllable benefits result from it! The equable diurnal rotation of the earth gives in their succession, and the annual regularity of its scenery of the year. If one motion were retarded, the return of day and night would change of seasons attended with uncertainty. These two motions are, therefore, pressed upon the earth, that the gracious Creator might be fulfilled, "While the earth and day and night, shall not cease." The secondary planet is still more singular than the primary; for, (taking the moon for an example) her revolution round the earth, which is in seven days seven hours forty three minutes and a half; it is carried round the sun with a velocity of 67 miles in a day, and a tolerable acquaintance, that of the moon upwards of twenty equators are necessary in a majority of cases, to reduce her mean to her true position. One of them is derivable from the circumference of the earth in its revolution round the sun, and the other from the different distances of the earth from the sun in its annual revolution, the position of the earth at various other causes, and not on the annual motion which of all others might be expected to be irregularities in her revolution round the earth produced in that of the latter by the primary planet. Who can form an adequate conception of the earth which thus draws the moon with it in the same manner as if it were a surface, notwithstanding the intervening distance of a hundred and forty thousand miles; and at the same time, the moon's proper motion round the earth, which is the consequence of it we have the periodical full moon; and the ebbing and flowing of the sea on the various lunar phases, with respect to the earth, (as is demonstrable from each of the tides) always succeed each other with a regularity equal to that of the causes which produce them.

PHENOMENON III. The impression of an irregular motion upon the earth, without disturbing the regularity of its surface, or in the surrounding it; is another instance of the wisdom of God. That with which God has endowed the earth in order to accomplish this end, is called gravity. The existence of this influence is easily demonstrated by the curious law which pervades all the bodies of the universe, and probably every other body in the space. This law, viz. that the squares of the times of the planets are to each other as the cubes of their distances from the central body, was first discovered, and afterward demonstrated by Sir Isaac Newton. The distance of but one planet from the sun, and the periodic revolutions of the whole, the distance of the sun is easily ascertained. The mean distance from the sun has been found by the transits of Venus and 1769, to be about ninety-five and a half million miles; and the periodic times of all the planets known by direct observation. This, to find the distance of Jupiter from the sun, nothing more is necessary than to divide the period of the earth, 365 days, 5 hours, 48 minutes, and that of Jupiter, 11 years, 315 days, 14 hours, and divide the greater product by the less, and the quotient one bears to the other; then to cube the distance from the sun, 954 millions, and multiply the proportion between the periodic times already cube root of the last product will be the distance required. By this means it was that the distances of the different planets from the sun, and of the satellites from the primaries, (for his law extends to the satellites,) have been calculated.—See the Table of the Periodic Revolutions, &c. of the Planets, in his notes on the first chapter of Genesis. From this law it is evident, to every one that deeply considers this subject, that the planets revolve in orbits by an influence emanating from the sun; for the nearer a planet is to the sun, the swifter is its motion in its orbit, and vice versa.—(See the Tables already referred to.) The singular phenomenon of a planet's describing equal areas in equal times, results from gravitation combined with the projectile power; or, in other words, from the union of the centripetal and centrifugal forces. Thus, if a planet describe in twenty-four hours any given arc of its orbit, and the area contained between two straight lines drawn from the extremities of this arc and meeting in the sun be ascertained; it will be precisely equal to what the planet will describe in any other twenty-four hours, the greater or less quantity of the arc described being continually compensated by the less or greater extent of the straight lines including the respective areas. We also find that, by virtue of these laws, the motion of a planet in its orbit is not decreased in arithmetical proportion to the increase of the distance from the central body; for the hourly orbital motion of the Georgium tidium, for example, is only about five times slower than that of the earth, though its distance from the sun is full nineteen times greater.

Every man may convince himself of the existence of gravity, by observing the phenomena attending falling bodies. Why is it that the velocity of a falling body is continually accelerated till it arrives on the earth? We answer, that the earth continually attracts it; consequently, its velocity must be continually increasing as it falls. It is also observable, that the nature of the influence on falling bodies is precisely the same with that which retains the planets in their orbits;—by numerous experiments it is found, that if the falling body descends towards the earth 16 feet in the first second, (a statement very near the truth,) it will fall through three times this space, or 48 feet, in the next second; five times this space, or 80 feet, in the third second; seven times this space, or 112 feet, in the fourth second; nine times this space, or 144 feet, in the fifth second, &c. Hence the spaces fallen through are in the squares of the times of falling, i. e. in the first second the body falls 16 feet; and in the next second, 48 feet; consequently, the body falls as many feet in the two first seconds as is equal to the sum of these two numbers, viz. 64, which is 16 multiplied by 4, the square of two, the number of seconds it took up in falling through the first 64 feet.

The above is but a very brief account of the influence of this wonderful principle, which is universally diffused through nature; and capable of attracting every particle of matter under all its possible modifications, and of imparting to each substance, from the lightest gas to the most ponderous metal, that property which constitutes one body specifically heavier or lighter than another. To detail all the benefits which result from it, would be almost to give a history of the whole material creation. But it may be asked, What is gravity? To the solution of this question natural philosophy is unable to lead us. Suffice it to say, all we know of gravity is its mode of operation, and that it is, like the Great Creator, an all pervading and continued energy. Therefore, that it is, and not in what it consists, is capable of demonstration.

All these things prove not only that there is a God infinitely powerful and intelligent, but also kind and merciful; working all according to the counsel of His will, and causing all His operations to result in the benefit of His creatures. They prove, also, that God is continually present, supporting all things by His energy; and that, while His working is manifest, His ways are not finding out. Yet, as far as He may be known, we should endeavour to know Him: for, he that cometh unto God, must know that he is. Without this, it is not likely that any man will serve Him; for, those alone who know Him, seek Him: and they only, who put their trust in Him, can testify He is the rewarder of them who diligently seek Him.

& short account of the BASTINADO, supposed to be referred to in ver. 35.

IV On the 15th of November, 1779, Mr. Antea, returning from a country excursion to Grand Cairo, was seized by some of the attendants of Orson Bey, a Mameluke chief; and, after stripping him of his clothes, they demanded money; which he not having about him, they dragged him before the bey, telling him that he was an European, from whom he might get something. In order to extort money from him, the bey ordered him to be bastinadoed: they first threw him down flat on his face, and then bent up his legs, so that the soles of his feet were horizontal; they then brought a strong staff, about six feet long, with an iron chain fixed to it at both ends. This chain they threw round both feet above the ankles, and twisted them together; and two fellows, on each side, provided with what they call a carbaga, held up the soles of the feet by means of the stick. When thus placed, an officer whispered in his ear, "Do not suffer yourself to be beaten; give him a thousand dollars, and he will let you go." Mr. Antea, not willing to give up the money which he had received for the goods of other merchants, refused: the two men then began to beat the soles of his feet, at first moderately; but when a second application for money was refused, and then the demand was two thousand dollars, they began to lay on more roughly, and every stroke felt like the application of a red hot poker. Finding they could get no money, supposing he might have some choice goods, a third application was made to him by the officer: he told them he had a fine silver-mounted bladder-buss at his lodging, which he would give. The bey asked what he offered; the officer answered, and said, bir carbaga, i. e. "one blunderbuss;" on which the bey said, dirrup il kulp, "beat the dog." Then they began to lay on with all their might. "At first," says Mr. Antea, "the pain was excruciating; but, after some time, my feeling grew numb, and it was like beating a bag of wool." Finding that nothing was to be got from him, and knowing that he had done nothing to deserve punishment, the bey ordered them to let him go. One of the attendants anointed his feet, and bound them up with some rags, put him on an ass, and conducted him to his house in Cairo, and laid him on his bed, where he was confined for six weeks, before he could walk even with crutches; and, for more than three years, his feet and ankles were very much swelled; and, though twenty years had elapsed, when he published this account, his feet and ankles were so affected, that, on any strong exertion, they were accustomed to swell.

He mentions instances of the bastinado having been applied for three days successively; and, if the person survived, the feet were rendered useless for life; but, in general, he observes, when they have received between five and six hundred strokes, the blood gushes from their mouth and nose, and they die either under, or soon after, the operation.

How he felt his mind affected on this distressing occasion, he thus piously describes: "I at once gave up myself for lost, well knowing that my life depended on the caprice of a brute, in human shape; and, having heard and seen such examples of unrelenting cruelty, I could not expect to fare better than others had done before me: I had, therefore, nothing left but to cast myself on the mercy of God, commending my soul to him; and, indeed, I must, in gratitude, confess, that I experienced His support most powerfully; so that all fear of death was taken from me; and, if I could have bought my life for one halfpenny, I should, I believe, have hesitated to accept the offer."—Observations on the Manners, &c. of the Egyptians, by J. ANTEA, Esq. 12mo. Dublin, 1801, p. 146.

If this be the punishment to which the apostle alludes, it may justly rank with the most severe; and all circumstances considered, this appears to be what is intended in the original word cruciansis-onas, which we, not knowing what was meant by it, render they were tortured. These holy men needed no mercy from man; and they received no justice. The case above is a specimen of Mohammedan Justice, and Mameluke cruelty. And to rescue such wretches from the government of the French, we spent torrents of British blood! It would have been a mercy to man, to have left them in the hands of any power that might abate their pride, assuage their malice, and confound their devices. As to their being corrupted by French manners, that is impossible: the Mohammedans in general, and the Turka and Mamelukes of Egypt, in particular, are too bad for the devil himself to corrupt. Pity, that political considerations rendered it necessary to restore that corrupt and abominable government. Reader, there is an infinite difference between the Bible and the Koran: the one is from Heaven; the other from earth and bell. "Thanks be to God for His holy Gospel!"

Having so many incitements to holiness, patience, and perseverance, we should lay aside every hinderance, 1—4. rected us, and we gave them reverence: shall we not much rather be in subjection unto the Father of spirits and life?

but bastards are neglected in their manners and education; he fathers of such feeling little affection for, or obligation to regard, their spurious issue. But, all that are legitimate children are partakers of chastisement, or discipline; for the original word paideia does not imply stripes and punishments; but the whole discipline of a child, both at home and at school.

9. We have had fathers of our flesh] The fathers of our flesh, i. e. our natural parents, were correctors; and we revered them, notwithstanding their corrections often arose from whim or caprice:—but shall we not rather be in subjection to the Father of spirits; to Him from whom we have received both body and soul; who is our Creator, Preserver, and Supporter; to whom both we and our parents owe our life and our blessings; and who corrects us only for our profit, that we may live and be partakers of his holiness. The apostle, in asking, Shall we not much rather be in subjection to the Father of spirits, and live? alludes to the punishment of the stubborn and rebellious son, Deut. xxi. 18–21. "If a man have a stubborn and rebellious son, who will not obey the voice of his father, or the voice of his mother, and that, when they have chastened him, will not hearken unto them; then shall his father and mother lay hold on him, and bring him to the elders of the city; and they shall say, This our son is stubborn and rebellious; he will not obey our voice:—all the men of his city shall stone him with stones that he die." Had he been subject to his earthly parents, he would have lived; because not subject, he dies. If we be subject to our heavenly Father, we shall live, and be partakers of His holiness; if not, we shall die, and be treated as bastards and not sons. This is the sum of the apostle's meaning; and the fact and the law to which he alludes.

10. For—a few days] The chastisement of our earthly parents lasted only a short time; that of our heavenly Father, will also be but a short time, if we submit; and as our parents ceased to correct, when we learned obedience; so will our heavenly Father, when the end for which he sent the chastisement is accomplished. God delights not in the rod: Judgment is His strange work.

11. No chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous] Neither correction, wholesome restraint, domestic regulations, or gymnastic discipline, are pleasant to them that are thus exercised: but it is by these means that obedient children, cholera, and great men, are made. And it is by God's discipline that Christians are made. He who does not bear the yoke of Christ is good for nothing to others, and never gains rest to his own soul.

There is still an allusion to the Grecian games: and, in the word before us, to those gymnastic exercises by which the candidates or the prizes were trained to the different kinds of exercises in which they were to contend, when the games were publicly opened.

12. Wherefore lift up the hands] The apostle refers to Isa. xxv. 3. The words are an address to persons almost worn out with sickness and fatigue: whose hands hang down; and whose knees shake; and who are totally discouraged. These are exhorted to exert themselves, and take courage, with the assurance that they shall infallibly conquer, if they persevere.

13. Make straight paths for your feet] That is, take the straight path that is before you; do not go in crooked or rough ways, where are stones, briars, and thorns, by which you will be inevitably lamed, and so, totally prevented from proceeding in the way: whereas, if you go in the even, proper path, though ye have been wounded by getting into a wrong way, yet which was wounded will be healed by moderate equal exercise, all impediments being removed. The application of it to this a correct, holy deportment in religious life, is both natural and easy.

14. Follow peace with all men] Cultivate, as far as you possibly can, a good understanding both with Jews and Gentiles. ἄσπασθαι διωκτας, pursue peace with the same care, attention, and diligence, as beasts do their game; follow it through all laces; trace it through all winding circumstances; and have with all men, if you can, with a safe conscience.

Rom. 6. 14. & 8. 15. 2 Tim. 1. 7.

world of blessedness. To see God, in the Hebrew phrase, is to enjoy Him: and without holiness of heart and life, this is impossible. No soul can be fit for heaven that has not suitable dispositions for the place.

15. Looking diligently] Βεβαιωσθενοις, looking about, over, and upon; being constantly on your guard.

Lest any man fall of the grace of God] Μὴ τις βεβαιωσθε νοσ ἕξῃς χάριτος τοῦ Θεοῦ, lest any person should come behind, or fall off from this grace or gift of God; this state of salvation, viz. the Gospel system, or Christianity: for this is most evidently the meaning of the apostle. It is not the falling from a work of grace in their own souls; but from the Gospel; to apostatize from which, they had now many temptations; and to guard them against this, the whole epistle was written.

Lest any root of bitterness springing up] A root of bitterness, signifies a poisonous plant. The Hebrews call every species of poison a bitter; and with considerable propriety, as most plants are poisonous in proportion to the quantum of the bitter principle they possess. The root of bitterness is here used metaphorically for a bad man; or a man holding unsound doctrines, and endeavouring to spread them in the church.

Trouble you] This alludes to the effects of poison taken into the body: the whole animal system is disturbed; sometimes violent retchings, great disturbances through the whole alimentary canal, together with the most fatal changes in the whole sanguineous system, are the consequences of poison taken into the stomach. The blood itself, the principle, under God, of life, becomes putrescent; and, probably, to this the intelligent apostle alludes, when he says, and thereby many be defiled, ἁγιασθων, corrupted, or contaminated.

Bad example, and false teaching, have corrupted thousands; and are still making desolation in the world, and in the church.

16. Lest there be any fornicator] Any licentious person, who would turn the Gospel of the grace of God into lasciviousness.

Or profane person, as Esau] It is not intimated that Esau was a fornicator; and the disjunctive and, or separates the profane person from the fornicator. And Esau is here termed profane, because he so far disregarded the spiritual advantages connected with his rights of primogeniture, that he alienated the whole for a single morsel of pottage.—See the note on Gen. xxv. 34. The word βιβλος, which we translate profane, is compounded of βη, which in composition has a negative signification, and βλῆς, the threshold of a temple, or sacred edifice; and was applied to those who were not initiated into the sacred mysteries; or who were despisers of sacred things; and, consequently, were to be denied admittance to the temple; and were not permitted to assist at holy rites. Indeed, among the Greeks, βιβλος, signifies any thing or person which was not consecrated to the gods. Hence, in the opening of their worship, they were accustomed to proclaim, Προκυ, προκυ, este προφαν! "Hence! hence! ye profane!"

And Odi profanum vulgus, et execra. Hon. "I abominate the profane vulgar, and drive them from the temple."

The Latin profanus, from which we have our word, is compounded of procul & fanus, "far from the temple," properly, an irreligious man.

Sold his birthright] The first-born, in patriarchal times, 1. Had a right to the priesthood, Exod. xlii. 22. 2. And a double portion of all the father's possessions, Deut. xxi. 17. 3. And was lord over his brethren, Gen. xxi. 29, 37. xlii. 3. 4. And in the family of Abraham, the first-born was the very source whence the Messiah, as the Redeemer of the world, and the church of God, were to spring. Further, 5. The first-born had the right of conveying special blessings and privileges when he came to die.—See the case of Isaac and his two sons, Jacob and Esau, in the history to which the apostle alludes, Gen. xxvii. and that of Jacob and his twelve sons, Gen. xlix. In short, the rights of primogeniture were among the most noble, honourable, and spiritual, in the ancient world.

17. When he would have inherited the blessing] When he wished to have the lordship over the whole family conveyed to him, and sought it earnestly with tears, he found no place for a change in his father's mind and counsel, who now perceived that it was the will of God that Jacob should be made lord of all.

Repentance] Here repentance is not to be taken in a theo-escaped not who refused him that spake on earth, much more shall not we escape, if we turn away from him that speaketh from heaven :

28 Whose voice then shook the earth : but now he hath promised, saying, " Yet once more I shake not the earth only, but also heaven.

29 And this word, Yet once more, signifieth the removing of heaven and earth. — 1 Hag. 2.6.—2 Psa. 102.26. Matt. 24.35. 2 Psa. 3.10. Rev. 21.1.—Or, may be shaken.

ch. vii. 13. The New Covenant, i. e. the Gospel, is now in force, and will be to the end of the world; and Jesus, the Son of God, the brightness of the Father's glory, the Maker and Preserver of all things, the Saviour, and the Judge of all men, is the Mediator. Both the covenant and its Mediator are infinitely superior to those of the Jews; and they are very properly set down here among the superior benefits and glories of Christianity.

To the blood of sprinkling] This is an allusion, as was before observed, to the sprinkling of the blood of the covenant sacrifice upon the people, when that covenant was made upon Mount Sinai; to the sprinkling of the blood of the sin-offerings before the mercy-seat; and probably to the sprinkling of the blood of the paschal lamb on their houses, to prevent their destruction by the destroying angel. But all these sprinklings were partial and inefficacious; and had no meaning but as they referred to this: the blood of sprinkling under the New Covenant is ever ready; all may have it applied; it continues through ages; and is the highest glory of Christianity, because by it we draw nigh to God, and through it get our hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience; and, in a word, have an entrance unto the holiest by the blood of Jesus.

Better things than that of Abel] God accepted Abel's sacrifice, and was well pleased with it; for Abel was a righteous man, and offered his sacrifice by faith in the great promise, that the blood of Christ's sacrifice was infinitely more precious than the blood of Abel's sacrifice; as Jesus is infinitely greater than Abel; and the blood of Christ avails for the sins of the whole world, whereas the blood of Abel's sacrifice, could avail only for himself.

Many have supposed that the blood of Abel means here the blood that was shed by Cain in the murder of this holy man; and that the blood of Jesus speaks better things than it does, because the blood of Abel called for vengeance, but the blood of Christ for pardon; this interpretation reflects little credit on the understanding of the apostle. To say that the blood of Christ speaks better things than that of Abel, is saying little indeed; it might speak very little good to any soul of man, and yet speak better things than that blood of Abel which spoke no kind of good to any human creature; and only called for vengeance against him that shed it. The truth is, the sacrifice offered by Abel is that which is intended; that, as we have already seen, was pleasing in the sight of God, and was accepted to behalf of him who offered it; but the blood of Christ is infinitely more acceptable with God; it was shed for the whole human race, and cleanses all who believe from all unrighteousness.

See] [BETTER, Take heed that ye refuse not him, the Lord Jesus, the Mediator of the New Covenant, who now speaketh from heaven by His Gospel to the Jews and to the Gentiles; having, in His incarnation, come down from God.

Him that spake on earth] Moses, who spoke on the part of God to the Hebrews; every transgression of whose word required a just recompense of reward; none being permitted to escape punishment; consequently, if ye turn away from Christ, who speaks to you from heaven, you may expect a much sorer punishment; the offence against God being so much the more heinous, as the privileges slighted are more important and glorious.

Whose voice then shook the earth] Namely, at the giving of the Law on Mount Sinai; and from this it seems that it was the voice of Jesus that then shook the earth; and that it was He who came down on the mount. But others refer this simply to God the Father, giving the law.

Not the earth only, but also heaven.] Probably referring to the approaching destruction of Jerusalem, and the total abolition of the political and ecclesiastical constitution of the Jews; the one being signified by the earth, the other by heaven; for the Jewish state and worship, are frequently thus named in the prophetic writings. And this seems to be the apostle's meaning, as he evidently refers to Haggai ii. 6, where the event is predicted. It may also remotely refer to the final destruction of all things.

The removing of those things that are shaken] The state of the Jewish polity, which had been in a shaken state, as the time that Judea had fallen under the power of the Romans.

As of things that are made] That is, subjects intended to last only for a time. God never designed that the Jewish religion should become general, nor be permanent.

Those things which cannot be shaken] The whole Gospel dispensation, which cannot be moved by the power of man.

May remain.] Be permanent; God designing that this shall be the last dispensation of His grace and mercy, and that it shall continue till the earth and the heavens are no more.

We receiving a kingdom] The Gospel dispensation, improperly termed the kingdom of God, and the kingdom of Christ; because in it, God reigns among men, and He reigns of those things that are shaken, as of things that are made, that those things which cannot be shaken may remain.

28 Wherefore we receiving a kingdom which cannot be moved, let us have grace, whereby we may serve God acceptably with reverence and godly fear :

29 For our God is a consuming fire.

Or, let us hold fast.—2 Exod. 24.17. Deu. 4.24. 2 Psa. 103.2. 2 Psa. 53.2. 2 Psa. 97.2. Isa. 66.16. 2 Thess. 1.8. Ch. 10.27.

in the hearts of those that believe; and His kingdom is righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost.

Which cannot be moved] Which never can fall, because it is the last dispensation.

Let us have grace] Εἶχοντες χάριν, let us have, keep, or hold fast, the benefit or gift, that is, the heavenly kingdom which God has given us. This is the meaning of the word, 2 Cor. vii. 4. and is so rendered by our translators; and it is only by this heavenly gift of the Gospel, that we can serve God acceptably, for He can be pleased with no service that is not performed according to the Gospel of His Son.

If we prefer the common meaning of the word grace, it comes to the same thing: without the grace, the especial favour and influence of Christ, we cannot serve, λατρεύομεν pay religious worship to God; for He receives no burnt-offering that is not kindled by fire from His own altar.

Acceptably] Ευαγερωσ, in such a way as to please Him well. And the offering with which He is well pleased, He will graciously accept; and if He accept our service, His Spirit will testify in our conscience that our ways please Him. When Abel sacrificed, God is well pleased; where Cain offers, there is no approbation.

Reverence] Αιδωσ, with shamefacedness, or modesty.

Godly fear] Ευλαβιασ, religious fear] We have boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus; but let that boldness be ever tempered with modesty and religious fear; for we should never forget that we have sinned, and that God is a consuming fire. Instead of αιδωσ και ευλαβιασ, modesty and religious fear, ACD* several others, with the Slavonic and Chrysostom, have ευλαβιασ και δεωσ, and others have φοβωσ και τροπωσ, fear and trembling; but the sense is nearly the same.

29. For our God is a consuming fire.] The apostle quotes Deut. iv. 24. and by doing so he teaches us this great truth—that sin under the Gospel is as abominable in God's sight as it was under the Law; and that the man who does not labour to serve God with the principle, and in the way already prescribed; will find that fire to consume him which would otherwise have consumed his sin.

Additional remarks on verses 22, 23, and 24.

On the whole, I think the description in these verses, refers to the state of the church here below, and not to any heavenly state. Let us review the particulars.—1. As the law was given at Mount Sinai; so the Gospel was given at Mount Zion.

2. As Jerusalem was the city of the Living God, while the Jewish dispensation lasted; for there was the temple, its services, sacrifices, &c. the Christian church is now called the heavenly Jerusalem, the city of the Living God.—In it is the great Sacrifice; in it that spiritual worship which God the infinite Spirit requires. 3. The ministry of angels was used under the Old Covenant; but that was partial, being granted only to particular persons, such as Moses, Joshua, Manoah, &c.; and only to a few before the law, as Abraham, Jacob, &c. It is employed under the New Covenant, in its utmost latitude; not to a few peculiarly favoured people, but to all the followers of God in general; so that, in this very epistle, the apostle asserts that they are all ministering spirits, sent forth to minister to them that shall be heirs of salvation. 4. At the giving of the law, when the church of the Old Covenant was formed, there was a general assembly of the different tribes by their representatives: in the Gospel church, all who believe in Christ, of every nation, and kindred, and tongue, form one grand aggregate body. Believers of all nations, of all languages, of all climates, however differing in their colour, or local habits, are one in Christ Jesus; one body of which He is the Head, and the Holy Spirit the Soul. 5. The Hebrews under the old dispensation had exclusive privileges: they had authority, emolument, and honour, of which the other children in the same family did not partake; but under the new, all who believe in Christ Jesus, with a heart unto righteousness, are equally children of God, are all entitled to the same privileges; for, says the apostle, we are all children of God by faith in Christ; and to them that received Him, He gave authority to become the children of God; so that, through the whole of this Divine family, all have equal rights and equal privileges; all have God for their portion, and heaven for their inheritance. 6. As those who had the rights of citizens were enrolled, and their names entered on tables, &c. so that it might be known who were citizens and who had the rights of such; so, all the faithful under the New Covenant are represented as having their names written in heaven, which is another form of speech for have a right to that glorious state, and all the blessings it possesses; there, are their possessions, and there are their rights. 7. Only the high-priest, and he but one day in the year, was permitted to approach God, under the Old Testament dispensation; but, under the New, every believer in Jesus can come even to the throne: each has liberty to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus; and to real Christians alone it can be said, Ye are come to God—the Judge of all: to Him ye have constant access, and from Him ye are continually receiving grace upon grace. 8. We have already seen that the righteous perfect, or the just men made perfect, is a Jewish phrase, and signified those who had made the farthest advances in moral rectitude. The apostle uses it here to point out those in the church of Christ, who had received the highest degrees of grace, possessed most of the mind of Christ, and were doing and suffering most for the glory of God; those who were most deeply acquainted with the things of God, and the mysteries of the Gospel, such as the apostles, evangelists, the primitive teachers, and those who presided in and over different churches. And these are termed the spirits, δικαιῶν τελειωμένων, of the just perfected, because they were a spiritual people, forsaking earth, and living in reference to that spiritual rest that was typified by Canaan. In short, all genuine Christians had communion with each other, through God's Spirit, and even with those whose faces they had not seen in the flesh. 9. Moses, as the servant of God, and Mediator of the Old Covenant, was of great consequence in the Levitical economy. By his laws and maxims every thing was directed and tried; and to him the whole Hebrew people came for both their civil and religious ordinances, but Christians come to Jesus, the Mediator of the New Covenant: He not only stands immediately between God and Man, but reconciles and comes from Him we receive the Divine law, by His conversation is to be ruled, and He gives both the life by which we walk: these things Moses could do for spirituality and excellence, the Old Covenant no provision; it was, therefore, a high privilege to say, Ye are come to Jesus, the Mediator of the New Covenant. 10. The Jews had their blood of sprinkling could not satisfy, as touching things which conscience: it took away no guilt, it made no rest to God; but the blood of sprinkling under the New Covenant purifies from all unrighteousness; for the New Covenant was shed for the remission of sins, infinite merit, it still continues to sprinkle and cleanse. All these are privileges of infinite consequence, salvation of man; privileges, which should be held great and most cautiously guarded; and because so great, so necessary, and so unobtainable in the Law, therefore we should lay aside every weight, run with perseverance the race that is set before us, nothing, therefore, in these verses, which determines the heavenly state; all is suited to the church of Christ, militant, here on earth; and some particulars cannot be applied to the church triumphant. Any rule of construction whatever.

The covetous man is ever out into futurity with insatiable desires after security and if this disposition be not checked, it increases as a jet of it increases in years. Covetousness is the age.

NOTES.—Verse 1. Let brotherly love continue.] Be all of one heart and one soul. Feel for, comfort, and support, each other; and remember that he who professes to love God, should love his brother also. They had this brotherly love among them; they should take care to retain it. As God is remarkable for His φιλανθρωπία, philanthropy, or love to man; so should they be for φιλαδελφία, or love to each other. See the note on Titus iii. 4.

Content with such things as ye have] Ἀποκαρῶν. Being satisfied with present things. The sentences of Phocylides, we have a sentiment in the same words as that of the apostle, ἀρκιῶσθαι καὶ ἀλλοτρῶν ἀπεχθῆσθαι. Be content with present and abstain from others. The covetous man is ever out into futurity with insatiable desires after security and if this disposition be not checked, it increases as a jet of it increases in years. Covetousness is the age.

Entertained angels] Abraham and Lot are the persons particularly referred to. Their history, the angels whom they entertained, not knowing them to be such, and the good they derived from exercising their hospitality on these occasions, are well known: and have been particularly referred to in the notes on Gen. xviii. 3. xix. 2.

Remember them that are in bonds] He appears to refer to those Christians who were suffering imprisonment for the testimony of Jesus.

As bound with them] Feel for them as you would wish others to feel for you, were you in their circumstances; knowing, that being in the body you are liable to the same evils; and may be called to suffer in the same way for the same cause.

Marriage is honourable in a] Let this state be highly esteemed as one of God's own instituting; and as highly calculated to produce the best interests of mankind. This may have been said against the opinion of the Essenes, called Therapeutae, who held marriage in little repute; and totally abstained from it themselves, as a state of comparative imperfection. At the same time it shows the absurdity of the popular tenet, that marriage, in the body, is both dishonourable and sinful: which is, in fact, in opposition to the apostle, who says, marriage is honourable in ALL; and to the institution of God, which evidently designed that every male and female should be united in this holy bond; and to nature, which, in every part of the habitable world, has produced men and women in due proportion to each other.

Content with such things as ye have] Ἀποκαρῶν. Being satisfied with present things. The sentences of Phocylides, we have a sentiment in the same words as that of the apostle, ἀρκιῶσθαι καὶ ἀλλοτρῶν ἀπεχθῆσθαι. Be content with present and abstain from others. Instead of de, but, yap, for, is the reading of AD* one ether, with the Vulgate, Coptic, and one of the Itala; it more forcibly expresses the reason of the prohibition, that the bed be undefiled, from whoremongers and adulterers.

8 Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, and to-day, and for ever. 9 Be not carried about with divers and strange doctrines. For it is a good thing that the heart be established with grace; not with meats, which have not profited them that have been occupied therein.

10 We have an altar, whereof they have no right to eat which serve the tabernacle.

11 For, the bodies of those beasts, whose blood is brought into the sanctuary by the high priest for sin, are burned without the camp.

12 Wherefore Jesus also, that he might sanctify the people with his own blood, suffered without the gate.

13 Let us go forth therefore unto him without the camp, bearing his reproach.

14 For here have we no continuing city, but we seek one to come.

howsoever strong he may be, he can do nothing against the Almighty.

7. Remember them which have the rule over you] This clause should be translated, Remember your guides, τῶν ἡγουμένων, who have spoken unto you the doctrine of God. Theodoret's note on this verse is very judicious: "He intends the saints who were dead, Stephen the first martyr, James the brother of John, and James called The Just. And there were many others, who were taken off by the Jewish rage. Consider these, (said he) and observing their example, imitate their faith." This remembrance of the dead saints, with admiration of their virtues, and a desire to imitate them, is, says Dr. Macknight, the only worship which is due to them from the living.

Considering the end of their conversation] Ἐν ἀναθεώρησι τῆς ἐξέτασις τῆς ἀναστροφῆς, "the issue of whose course of life most carefully consider." They lived to get good and do good. They were faithful to their God and His cause: they suffered persecution; and for the testimony of Jesus died a violent death. God never left them, no, He never forsook them; so that they were happy in their afflictions, and glorious in their death. Carefully consider this; act as they did; keep the faith, and God will keep you.

8. Jesus Christ, the same yesterday] In all past times there was no way to the holiest but through the blood of Jesus, either actually shed, or significantly typified. To-day He is the Lamb slain, and continues to appear in the presence of God for us; for ever, to the conclusion of time, He will be the Way, the Truth, and the Life, none coming to the Father but through Him. And throughout eternity, εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας, it will appear that all glorified human spirits owe their salvation to His infinite merit. This Jesus was thus witnessed of by your guides, who are already departed to glory. Remember Him; remember them; and take heed to yourselves.

9. Be not carried about] Μὴ κεραισθεσθε, be not whirled about. But ABCD, and almost every other MS. of importance, with the Syriac, Coptic, Arabic, Vulgate, and several of the Greek fathers, have μὴ παραφέρεσθε, be not carried away, which is undoubtedly the true reading; and signifies here, do not apostatize: permit not yourselves to be carried off from Christ and His Doctrine.

Divers and strange doctrines] Ἄλλὰ καὶ ἑτεροκλίτας, various doctrines: those that blended the law and the Gospel; and brought in the Levitical sacrifices and institutions, in order to perfect the Christian system! Remember the Old Covenant is abolished; the New alone is in force.

Strange Doctrines, ἄλλὰ καὶ ἑτεροκλίτας, foreign doctrines; such as have no apostolical authority to recommend them.

To have the heart established with grace.] It is well to have the heart, the mind, and conscience, fully satisfied with the truth and efficacy of the Gospel; for so the word χάρις should be understood here; which is put in opposition to βρωμαῖαι, meats, signifying here the Levitical institutions; and especially its sacrifices, these being emphatically termed meats, because the offerers were permitted to feast upon them, after the blood had been poured out before the Lord.—See Lev. vii. 15. Deut. xii. 6, 7.

Which have not profited them] Because they neither took away guilt, cleansed the heart, nor gave power over sin.

10. We have an altar] The altar is here put for the sacrifice on the altar; the Christian altar is the Christian Sacrifice, which is Christ Jesus, with all the benefits of His passion and death. To these privileges they had no right who continued to offer the Levitical sacrifices, and to trust in them for remission of sins.

11. For the bodies of those beasts] Though in making covenants, and in some victims offered according to the law, the flesh of the sacrifice was eaten by the offerers; yet the flesh of the sin-offering might no man eat; when the blood was sprinkled before the holy place, to make an atonement for their souls, their skins, flesh, entrails, &c. were carried without the camp, and there entirely consumed by fire; and this entire consumption, according to the opinion of some, was intended to show, that sin was not pardoned by such offerings. For, as eating the other sacrifices intimated they were made partakers of the benefits procured by those sacrifices: so not be-

15 By him therefore let us offer the sacrifice of praise to God continually, that is, the fruit of our lips giving thanks to his name.

16 But to do good and to communicate, forget not: for with such sacrifices God is well pleased.

17 Obey them that have the rule over you, and submit yourselves: for they watch for your souls, as they that must give account, that they may do it with joy, and not with grief for that is unprofitable for you.

18 Pray for us: for we trust we have a good conscience, in all things willing to live honestly.

19 But I beseech you the rather to do this, that I may be restored to you the sooner.

20 Now the God of peace, that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, that great shepherd of the sheep, through the blood of the everlasting covenant, ing permitted to eat of the sin-offering, proved that they had no benefit from it; and that they must look to the Christ, whose sacrifice it pointed out, that they might receive that real pardon of sin which the shedding of His Blood could alone procure. While, therefore, they continued offering those sacrifices, and refused to acknowledge the Christ, they had no right to any of the blessings procured by Him; and it is evident they could have no benefit from their own.

12. That he might sanctify the people] That He might consecrate them to God, and make an atonement for their sins. He suffered without the gate, at Jerusalem; as the sin-offering was consumed, without the camp, when the tabernacle abode in the wilderness. Perhaps all this was typical of the abolition of the Jewish sacrifices, and the termination of the whole Levitical system of worship. He left the city, denounced its final destruction, and abandoned it to its fate; and suffered without the gate to bring the Gentiles to God.

13. Let us go forth therefore unto him] Let us leave this city and system, devoted to destruction, and take refuge in Jesus alone; hearing His reproach; being willing to be accounted the refuse of all things, and the worst of men, for His sake who bore the contradiction of sinners against Himself, and was put to death as a malefactor.

14. For here have we no continuing city.] Here is an elegant and forcible allusion to the approaching destruction of Jerusalem. The Jerusalem that was below was about to be burnt with fire, and rased to the ground: the Jerusalem that was from above, was that alone which could be considered to be permanent. The words seem to say, "Arise, and depart; for this is not your rest: it is pointed." About seven or eight years after this, Jerusalem was wholly destroyed.

15. By him, therefore, let us offer the sacrifice of praise] He has now fulfilled all vision and prophecy; has offered the last bloody Sacrifice which God will ever accept: and as He is the gift of God's love to the world, let us, through Him, offer the sacrifice of praise to God continually: this being the substitute for all the Levitical sacrifices.

The Jews allowed that, in the time of the Messiah, all sacrifices, except the sacrifice of praise, should cease. To this maxim the apostle appears to allude; and understood in this way, his words are much more forcible. In Vesperta Rabba, sect. 9. fol. 153, and Rabbi Tanetum, fol. 55. "Rabbi Phineas, Rabbi Levi, and Rabbi Johanan, from the authority of Rabbi Menachem of Galilee, said, In the time of the Messiah, all sacrifices shall cease, except the sacrifice of praise." This was, in effect, quoting the authority of one of their own maxims, that now was the time of the Messiah; that Jesus was that Messiah; that the Jewish sacrificial system was now abolished; and that no sacrifice would now be accepted with God, except the sacrifice of praise for the gift of His Son.

That is, the fruit of our lips] This expression is probably borrowed from Hos. xiv. 2. In the version of the Septuagint, καρπον χειλέων, which in the Hebrew text is פרי שפתים parim sepantin, "the helpers of our lips." This may refer primarily to the sacrifices, helpers, calves, &c. which they had vowed to God; so that the calves of their lips were the sacrifices which they had promised. But how could the Septuagint translate פריים parim, calves, by καρπον, fruit? Very easily, if they had in their copy פרי, pery, the mem being omitted; and thus the word would be literally fruit, and not calves. This reading, however, is not found in any of the MSS. hitherto collated.

16. But to do good, and to communicate] These are continual sacrifices which God requires: and which will spring from a sense of God's love in Christ Jesus. Praise to God for His unspeakable gift; and acts of kindness to men for God's sake. No reliance, even on the infinitely meritorious sacrifice of Christ, can be acceptable in the sight of God, if a man have not love and charity towards his neighbour. Praise, prayer, and thanksgiving to God, with works of charity and mercy to man, are the sacrifices which every genuine follower of Christ must offer; and they are the proofs that a man belongs to Christ; and he who does not bear these fruits, gives full evidence, whatever his creed may be, that he is no Christian.

17. Obey them that have the rule over you] Obey your leaders, τοῖς ἡγουμένοις. He is not fit to rule who is not capable of 21 "Make you perfect in every good work to do his will, working in you that which is well pleasing in his sight, through Jesus Christ; to whom be glory for ever and ever. Amen.

22 And I beseech you, brethren, suffer the word of exhortation: for I have written a letter unto you in few words.

m 2 Thess. 2.17. 1 Pet. 5.10.—Or, doing.— Phil. 2.13.— Gal. 1.5. 2 Tim. 4.13.

guiding.—See on ver. 7. In the former verse the apostle exhorts them to remember those who have borne their load, and to imitate their faith: in this he exhorts them to obey the leaders they now had; and to submit to their authority in all matters of doctrine and discipline, on the ground that they watched for their souls; and should have to give an account of their conduct to God. If this conduct were improper, they must give in their report before the great tribunal with grief; but in it must be given: if holy and pure, they would give it in with joy. It is an awful consideration that many pastors who had loved their flocks as their own souls, should be obliged to accuse them before God, for either having rejected or neglected the great salvation.

18. Pray for us. Even the success of apostles depended, in a certain way, on the prayers of the church. Few Christian congregations feel, as they ought, that it is their bounden duty to pray for the success of the Gospel, both among themselves, and in the world. The church is weak, dark, poor, and imperfect, because it prays little.

We trust we have a good conscience. We are persuaded that we have a conscience that not only acquits us of all fraud and sinister design; but assures us that in simplicity and godly sincerity we have laboured to promote the welfare of you and of all mankind.

To live honestly. Εν ταις κλησιν θελουντες αναπροσβατα, willing in all things to conduct ourselves well; to behave with decency and propriety.

19. The rather to do this. That is, pray for us; that, being enabled to complete the work which God has given us here to do, we may be the sooner enabled to visit you. It is evident from this, that the people to whom this epistle was written, knew well who was the author of it: nor does there appear, in any place, any design in the writer to conceal his name: and how the epistle came to lack a name, it is impossible to say. I have sometimes thought that a part of the beginning might have been lost: as it not only begins without a name, but begins very abruptly.

20. Now the God of peace. We have often seen that peace among the Hebrews signifies prosperity of every kind. The God of peace, is the same as the God of all blessedness, who has at His disposal all temporal and eternal good; who loves mankind, and has provided them a complete salvation.

Brought again from the dead our Lord. As our Lord's sacrificial death is considered as an atonement offered to the Divine justice, God's acceptance of it as an atonement, is signified by His raising the human nature of Christ from the dead: and hence this raising of Christ is, with the utmost propriety, attributed to God the Father, as this proves His acceptance of the sacrificial offering.

That great shepherd of the sheep. This is a title of our blessed Lord, given to Him by the prophets: so Isa. xl. 11. He shall feed his flock like a shepherd; he shall gather the lambs with his arms, and carry them in his bosom; and shall gently lead those which are with young. And, Ezek. xxxiv. 23. *I will set up one shepherd over them, and he shall feed them: even my servant David, (i. e. the Beloved, viz. Jesus), and he shall feed them, and be their shepherd; and, Zech. xiii. 7. Awake, O sword, against my shepherd—smite the shepherd, and the flock shall be scattered. In all these places the term shepherd is allowed to belong to our blessed Lord: and He appropriates it to Himself, John x. by calling Himself the good shepherd, who lays down his life for the sheep.*

Through the blood of the everlasting covenant. Some understand this in the following way: that "God brought back our Lord from the dead on account of His having shed His blood to procure the everlasting covenant." Others, that "the Lord Jesus became the Great Shepherd and Saviour of the sheep, by shedding His blood to procure and ratify the everlasting covenant." The sense, however, will appear much plainer, if we connect this with the following verse:—"Now the God of peace, who brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, that Great Shepherd of the sheep; make you, through the blood of the everlasting covenant, perfect in every good work to do his will." The Christian system is termed the everlasting covenant, to distinguish it from the temporary covenant made with the Israelites at Mount Sinai: and to show that it is the last dispensation of grace to the world; and shall endure to the end of time.

21. Make you perfect. Καταρτισαι υμας, put you completely in joint. See the note on 2 Cor. xiii. 9., where the meaning of the original word is largely considered. From the following terms we see what the apostle meant by the perfection for which he prays. They were to do the will of God in every good work, from God working in them that which is well pleasing in His sight. 1. This necessarily implies a complete change in the whole soul; that God may be well pleased with whatsoever He sees in it: and this "being cleansed from all sin; for God's sight is anything that is unholly. 2. This complete union is to produce an outward conformity to God's will: were to be made perfect in every good work. 3. fection within, and the perfection without, were deduced by the blood of the everlasting covenant. For God is love, yet it is not consistent with His justice to communicate any good to mankind, but through and through Him, as having died for the offences of man race.

To whom be glory for ever! As God does all through Christ Jesus, to Him be the honour of His ascribed through time and eternity! Amen.

22. Suffer the word of exhortation. Bear the doctrine of this exhortation. This seems to be an epistle whole epistle:—and, as the apostle had in it shown the deficiency of the Levitical system to atone for sin and soul; and had proved that it was the design of God should be abolished; and had proved also that it was abolished, by the coming of Christ, whom He had set a greater priest than Aaron—higher than all the only Son of God, as to His human nature—and the Governor, and Judge, of all;—and that their city was to be destroyed; he might suppose that they would be judged against him, and thus lose the benefit of His intentions towards them; therefore He entreats the exhortation, which, notwithstanding the greatness of the subject, he had included in a short compass.

I have written a letter unto you in few words. It would be better to translate δια βραχυων επιστολων have written to you briefly; as επιστολιν often signifies to write; and this appears to be its meaning here.

23. Know ye that our brother Timothy. The word which is supplied by our translators, is very probably as it is found in ACB, ten others, the Syriac, Erpenz, the Coptic, Armenian, Slavonic, and Vulgate.

Is set at liberty. Απολυμενος, is set away; there is no evidence that Timothy had been imprisoned. It is probable that the apostle refers here to his being sent into Asia, Phil. ii. 19—24., in order that he might bring to an account of the affairs of the church in that country of St. Paul's epistles, written during his confinement, does he give any intimation of Timothy's name; although it appears, from Phil. i. 1. Col. i. 1. that he was with Paul, during the greatest part of that imprisonment.

With whom, if he come shortly, I will see you. Before Paul himself, or the writer of this epistle, was at liberty, as he had the disposal of his person and of his own power. Some suppose that Timothy did accompany Paul about this time; and that both together visited churches in Judea.

24. Salute all them that have the rule over you; your leaders, or guides; τους ηγουμενους υμων. See 7 and 17.

And all the saints. All the Christians; for this real meaning of the term in most parts of St. Paul's Epistles. But a Christian was then a saint; i. e. by profession; and most of the primitive Christians were such. But in process of time the term was applied to the Christian name; as elect, holy people, saints were to the nation of the Jews, when both their peculiarities were at a very low ebb.

They of Italy salute you. Therefore it is most probable that the writer of this epistle was then in some part of Italy, which he had not as yet removed after his being released from prison. By they of Italy probably the apostle meant those who had embraced the Christian faith. The expressions show what a brotherly feeling existed in every part of the Christian church: even those who had not yet embraced the Christian name, and felt deeply interested in each other's welfare.

25. Grace be with you all. May the Divine favour be upon and among you; and may you receive from God of all good; whatsoever is calculated to make you useful, and happy! And may you be enabled to persevere in the truth to the end of your lives! Amen. May it be the will of God seal the prayer by giving the blessing!

1. On the term "conscience," is frequently occurring in this Epistle. I beg leave to make a few observations.

Conscience is defined by some to be "that judgment which the rational soul passes on all her actions; and is said to be faculty of the soul itself, and consequently natural to it. Others state, that it is a ray of Divine light. Milton calls it God's empire;" and Dr. Young calls it a "god in man." To me it seems to be no other than a faculty capable of receiving grace and conviction from the Spirit of God: and answers its end, in spiritual matters, to the soul, that the eye does to the body in the process of vision. The eye is not light in itself; nor is it capable of discerning any object, but by the instrumentality of solar or artificial light: but "it has organs properly adapted to the reception of the rays of light, and the various images of the objects which they exhibit. When these are present to an eye, (the organs of which are perfect,) then there is a discernment of those objects which are within the sphere of vision: but when the light is absent, there is no perception of the shape, dimensions, size, or colour, of any object, howsoever entire or perfect the optic nerve and the different humours may be.

In the same manner, (comparing spiritual things with natural,) the Spirit of God enlightens that eye of the soul which we call conscience: it penetrates it with its effulgence; and speaking as human language will permit on the subject) it as powers properly adapted to the reception of the Spirit's emanations, which, when received, exhibit a real view of the nation, state, &c. of the soul, as it stands in reference to God and eternity. Thus, the Scripture says, "The Spirit itself bears witness with our spirit," &c. i. e. it shines into the conscience, and reflects throughout the soul a conviction (proportioned to the degree of light communicated) of condemnation, or acquittance, according to the end of its coming.

The late Mr. J. Wesley's definition of conscience, taken in Christian sense, is nearly the same with the above: "It," says he, "that faculty of the soul, which, by the assistance of the grace of God, sees at one and the same time, i. our own tempers and lives; the real nature and quality of our thoughts, words, and actions. 2. The rule whereby we are to be directed. And, 3. The agreement or disagreement thereof with it. To express this a little more largely, conscience implies, first, the faculty a man has of knowing himself; of discerning both in general and in particular, his tempers, words, thoughts, and actions: but this is not possible for him to do, without the assistance of the Spirit of God. Otherwise, self-love, and indeed every other irregular passion, would disguise, and wholly conceal him from himself. It implies, secondly, a knowledge of the rule, whereby he is to be directed in every particular, which is no other than the written word of God. Conscience implies, thirdly, a knowledge, that all our thoughts, and words, and actions, are conformable to that rule. In all these offices of conscience, the unction of the Holy One is indispensably needful. Without this, neither could we clearly discern our lives and tempers; nor could we judge of the rule whereby we are to walk; nor of our conformity or disconformity to it. A good conscience is a Divine consciousness of walking in all things, according to the written word of God. It seems, indeed, that there can be no conscience that has not a regard to God. I doubt whether the words right and wrong, according to the Christian system, do not imply, in the very idea of them, agreement and disagreement to the will and word of God. And if so, there is no such thing as conscience in a Christian, if we leave God out of the question."—Sermon on Conscience, page 332.

Some of the Greek fathers seem to consider it as an essential part of God; a principle implanted immediately by Himself. Chrysostom, on Psa. vii. speaking of conscience, says, Φυλον γαρ εστι, και κατα του θεου ημιν κατα την αρχην ενθηκεν. It is a natural thing, but is planted in us by our God from its birth. In his homily on Isa. vi. 2. he explains himself more particularly: θελον γαρ εστι, και κατα θεου κατα ημερας ιδρυμενον ψυχαις. It is a Divine principle, and is by God implanted in our souls. It is allowed on all hands that it is a censor and judge of human actions, which cannot be corrupted, or be induced to bear a false testimony. Every sense of the body, and every faculty of the mind, may be weakened, obstructed, or impaired, but conscience—all other powers may be deceived, or imposed on, but conscience. "No man," says Chrysostom, "can flee from the judgment of his own conscience, which cannot be shunned. It cannot be corrupted—it cannot be terrified—it cannot be flattered or bribed—nor can its testimony be obscured by any lapse of time." Epist. ad Olymp. This strongly argues its Divine nature; and, while the Spirit of God strives with man, conscience has its full influence, and is ever alert in the performance of its office. Cicero, in his oration for Milo, describes the power of conscience well, in a few words:—Magna est vis conscientia in utramque partem, ut neque timeant qui nihil commiserint, et pœnam semper ante oculos versari putant qui peccaverint. "Great is the power of conscience in both cases: they fear nothing, who know they have committed no evil; on the contrary, they who have sinned live in continual dread of punishment." One of our poets has said, "The conscience that makes cowards of us all." And were we sure that he had been a scholar from Menander.

Ο ευνοησας ενοχον ητι, και ο θρασευοντος. Η ενωστικη ανηρω δειλοτατων ανων σωτηρ. If a man be conscious of any crime, although he were the most undaunted of mankind.

His conscience makes him the most timid of mortals.

Apud Sibyrum, Serm. xxiv. p. 192.

Conscience is sometimes said to be good, bad, tender, seared, &c.—good, if it acquit or approve; bad, if it condemn or disapprove; tender, if it be alarmed at the least approach of evil, and severe in scrutinizing the actions of the mind or body; and seared, if it feel little alarm, &c. on the commission of guilt. But these epithets can scarcely belong to it if the common definition of it be admitted; for, how can it be said there is a "tender light," a "dark or hardened light, bad God," &c. &c. But, on the other definition, these terms are easily understood, and are exceedingly proper, e. g. "a good conscience" is one to which the Spirit of God has brought intelligence of the pardon of all the sins of the soul, and its reconciliation to God through the blood of Christ; and this good conscience retained, implies God's continued approbation of such a person's conduct; see Acts xxiii. 1. 1 Tim. i. 5, 19. and here, Heb. xiii. 18. "A bad, or evil, conscience," supposes a charge of guilt brought against the soul by the Holy Spirit, for the breach of the Divine laws; and which He makes known to it by conscience, as a medium of conveying His own light to the mind; see Heb. x. 22. 1 Tim. iv. 2. Tit. i. 3. "A tender conscience," implies one fully irradiated by the light of the Holy Ghost, which enables the soul to view the good as good, and the evil as evil, in every important respect; which leads it to abominate the latter, and cleave to the former; and, if at any time it act in the smallest measure opposite to these views, it is severe in its reprehensions, and bitter in its regrets. "A darkened or hardened conscience," means one that has little or none of this Divine light; consequently, the soul feels little or no self-reprehension for acts of transgression, but runs on in sin, and is not aware of the destruction that awaits it; heedless of counsels, and regardless of reproof. This state of the soul St. Paul calls by the name of a "seared conscience," or one calloused by repeated applications of sin, and resistings of the Holy Ghost; so that, being grieved and quenched, He has withdrawn His light and influence from it.

The word conscience itself ascertains the above explanation with its deductions, being compounded of con, together, or with, and scio, to know, because it knows, or convinces, by or together with the Spirit of God. The Greek word συνειδησις, which is the only word used for conscience, through the whole New Testament, has the very same meaning, being compounded of συν, together, or with, and ιδω, to know. This is the same as συνειδω, which is the word generally used among ecclesiastical writers.

From the above view of the subject, I think we are warranted in drawing the following inferences:—

1. All men have what is called conscience; and conscience plainly supposes the Light or Spirit of God. 2. The Spirit of God is given to enlighten, convince, strengthen, and bring men back to God. 3. Therefore, all men may be saved who attend to, and coincide with, the lights and convictions communicated; for the God of the Christians does not give men His Spirit to enlighten, &c. merely to leave them without excuse; but that it may direct, strengthen, and lead them to Himself, that they may be finally saved. 4. That this Spirit comes from the grace of God is demonstrable from hence.—It is a "good and perfect gift," and St. James says, all such come from the Father of lights. Again, it cannot be merited, for as it implies the influence of the Holy Spirit, it must be of an infinite value, yet it is gratis; that then, which is not merited, and yet is given, must be of grace; not ineffectual grace, there is no such principle in the Godhead.

Thus it appears all men are partakers of the grace of God, for all acknowledge that conscience is common to all; and this is but a recipient faculty, and necessarily implies the Spirit of grace, given by Jesus Christ; not that the world might be thereby condemned, but that it might be saved. Nevertheless multitudes, who are partakers of this heavenly gift, sit against it, lose it, and perish everlastingly, not through the deficiency of the gift, but through the abuse of it. I conclude, that conscience is not a power of the soul, acting by or of itself; but a recipient faculty, in which that true light that lighteneth every man that cometh into the world has its especial operation.

2. In this chapter the apostle inculcates the duty of hospitality, particularly in respect to entertaining strangers; i. e. persons of whom we know nothing; but that they are now in a state of distress, and require the necessaries of life. Some, says the apostle, have entertained angels without knowing them: and some, we may say, have entertained great men, kings and emperors, without knowing them. By exercising this virtue, many have gained; few have ever lost.

God, in many parts of his own word, is represented as the stranger's friend: and there is scarcely a duty in life which He inculcates on stronger terms than that of hospitality to strangers. The heathen highly applauded this virtue; and among them the person of a stranger was sacred, and supposed to be under the particular protection of Jove. Homer gives the sentiment in all its beauty, when he puts the following words into the mouth of Eumæus, when he addressed Ulysses, who appeared a forlorn stranger, and being kindly received by him, implored in his behalf a Divine blessing:—

Ζεὺς τοι δοῖν, ἔπειτα, καὶ ἀβανῶν θεοὶ ἄλλοι Ὅττι μάλισ' ἄδελφι, σὺ μὲ πρόφρων ἐπέδωκε.
 Τὸν δ' ἀπαμβρομῶνος προσέφη, Ἐρμῆαι ἐσθλῶτα:
 ἔειπ' οὐ μοι θεμῖς ἐστ' ἀπὸ εἰ κακίῳ σέθεν ἔλθοι.
 ἔπειτα ἀτιμῆσαι: πρὸς γὰρ Διὸς εἰσὶν ἀπαρτῆς ἔπεινοι τε, πτωχοὶ τε: δοῖσι δ' ὀλίγη τε φίλη τε
 Γίγνεται ἡμετέρα. Οὔγυα. lib. xiv. v. 53.
 My gentle host, Jove grant thee, and the gods
 All grant thee, for this deed thy best desire I
 To whom the herd Eumæus thus replied:—
 My guest, it were unjust to treat with scorn
 The stranger, though a poorer should arrive
 Than even thou; for all the poor that are,
 And all the strangers, are the care of Jove.
 Little, and with good will, is all that lies Within my scope.—

The Scriptures, which more particularly recommend this duty, are the following:—He doth execute the judgment of the fatherless and widow, and loveth the stranger in giving him food and raiment. Love ye, therefore, the stranger; for ye were strangers in the land of Egypt, Deut. x. 18, 19. I was a stranger, and ye took me in. Come, ye blessed of my father, Matt. xxv. 35. Given to hospitality, Rom. xii. 13. Neglect not to entertain strangers, Heb. xiii. 2.

"The entertaining of unknown strangers," says Dr. Owen, "which was so great a virtue in ancient times, is almost driven out of the world by the wickedness of it. The false practices of some, with wicked designs, under the habit and pretence of strangers on the one hand, and pretences for sordid covetousness on the other, have banished it from the earth. And there are enough who are called Christians, who never once thought it to be their duty." But it is vain to inculcate the duty, where the spirit of it is not found: and we shall never find the spirit of it in any heart, where the love of God and man does not rule.

Benevolent wishes of Be ye warmed, and Be ye clothed are frequent enough: these cost nothing; and, therefore, are readily used by the most parsimonious. But to warm a man's soul to the hungry; to draw out his warm affections while he is drawing out, in order to divide with him, the contents of his purse, belongs to the man of liberal feeling; and this can scarcely be expected, of a compassionate mind that was in Christ does not count his own life dear, and his own soul as dear as the souls of the poor, may often be a prevent death: for, there are times in which a man may be so low for want of proper nourishment, that, if he be not timely supplied, after-help comes in vain; nature being exhausted ever to recover itself, though the vital spark may linger long. One wholesome meal, in time, may be of more use in enabling nature to contend, successfully, with a disease; and he who has afforded this meal to the destitute, has saved a life. "But most who go about seeking relief from persons and impostors; and it would be sufficient for them." When you know the applicant to be such, refuse his suit: but, if you have nothing but suspicious suspicion generally arises from an uncharitable and unkind heart, then beware how you indulge it. If through your neglect a man should lose his life, God will require it at your hand.

Reader, permit me to relate an anecdote which I have seen in a book from that most eminent man of God, the Reverend Mr. Epworth, in Lincolnshire, where (says he) I was born. A woman came to a house in the market-place, and asked for a morsel of bread, saying, I am very hungry. The house called her a lazy jade, and bade her begone. She went forward, called at another house, and asked for a morsel of bread, saying, I am very thirsty. Here she was told to go to the workhouse. She struggled at the door, and begged a little water, saying, I am faint. She drove her away, saying, He would encourage a beggar. It was winter; and the snow lay upon the ground. The boys, seeing a poor ragged creature driven a door to door, began to throw snow-balls at her. She, at a little distance, sat down on the ground, lifted up her hands to heaven, reclined on the earth, and expired!" Her husband, the stranger: had the first to whom she applied relieved her with a morsel of bread, he would have saved her life, and her guilt of blood. As the case stood, the woman was left to die; and those three householders will stand arraigned at the bar of God for her death. Reader, fear to send a man empty away. If you know him to be an impostor, give him nothing. But if you only suspect it, let suspicion be the rule of your conduct: give something ever little; because that little may be sufficient to save him, if in real want, from present death. If you give him nothing, you may be an angel. God will never be a matter of regret to you that you gave not to God's sake, though you should afterward find that you had given to whom you gave it was both a hypocrite and impostor to whom you gave it by ninety-nine hypocrites out of an hundred applicants, than send one, like the poor Epworth, empty away.

PREFACE TO THE GENERAL EPISTLE OF JAMES

THERE have been more doubts, and more diversity of opinion, concerning the author of this epistle, and the time in which it was written, than about most other parts of the New Testament. To enter at large into a discussion of the opinions of ancient and modern writers on this subject, would tend but little to the establishment of truth, or to the edification of the reader. Lardner, Michaelis, and Macknight, have entered considerably into the controversy, relative to the author, the time, and the canonical authority, of this book; and to them, the reader who wishes to see the difficulties with which the subject is pressed, may have recourse.

This epistle, (with those of Peter, John, and Jude,) is termed catholic, καθολικη, from kata, through, and holos, the whole; for the application of which term Œcumenicus, in cap. i. Jacobus, gives the following reason: Καθολικὰς λέγονται αὐταί, διονεὶ ἐγκλησι: οὐ γὰρ ἀθροισματικῶς εἶναι ἐν ἡ πόλει, ἀλλὰ καὶ ἀθροιστικῶς ἐν τοῖς κείνοις. "These epistles are called catholic, universal, or circular, because they were not written to one nation or city, but to believers every where."

Yet as these epistles had some difficulty at first to get into general circulation, but at last were every where received: it is more likely that they obtained the term catholic from the circumstance of their being at last universally acknowledged as canonical; so that the word catholic is to be understood here in the same sense as canonical.

Who the writer of the epistle in question was, is difficult to say: all that we know certainly, is from his own words, that his name was James, and that he was a servant of God, and of the Lord Jesus. Two persons of this name were mentioned in the New Testament; James the son of Zebedee, James the elder; and James ὁ μικρὸς, the less or the younger, called the son of Alphaeus, and brother of our Lord. Whether one of these, or if one of them, which, or one of the same name, different from both, are persons cannot be satisfactorily determined. Michaelis, who examined the subject with his usual ability, leans to the opinion, that James the son of Zebedee was the author, and that this epistle was written by any of those in the New Testament. Other great writers ascribe it to James, called the brother of our Lord, president, or bishop, of the church in Jerusalem. Following this opinion to be correct, it is not agreeable to sense James is called our Lord's brother, there being several different opinions concerning the meaning of From Matt. xiii. 55, 56, we learn that there were five brothers of our Lord; "Is not this the carpenter? Is not his mother called Mary? And his brethren James, and Simon, and Judas? And his sisters, are all with us?" Now, it is generally allowed, that here, is the author of this epistle; and the Jude mentioned with him, the author of that which stands at the end of this collection. But with respect to the meaning of brother, as here used, it will be necessary to state the opinions of learned men:—

1. It is supposed that these were children of Joseph and Mary: this is a very ancient opinion: as the thing is improbable in the supposition that Joseph was when he married the blessed Virgin.

2 They are supposed to have been children of Joseph and his wife Mary; all born after the birth of our Lord. This is an opinion extremely probable: see some reasons for it in the note on Matt. xiii. 56. see also on Matt. i. 25.

3 That they were called our Lord's brethren, because children of Joseph by the wife of one of his brothers, who had died childless, and whose widow Joseph took, according to the Mosaic law, to raise up seed to his deceased brother. This is very unlikely, because, in this case, it would have been only requisite for Joseph to have had one male by his brother's wife; but here we find four, besides several sisters.

4 That Cleopas, called also Alpheus, married a sister of the blessed Virgin, called also Mary, by whom he had the above issue; and that these were called brethren of our Lord, from the common custom among the Hebrews, to term all the more immediately cognate branches of the same family, brothers and sisters' children, i. e. cousins-german, brethren. These, therefore, being aunt's children of our Lord, are, according to this usage, called his brethren. The first and second of these opinions appear to me the most probable; though most modern writers are of the latter opinion.

That, of the two James's, James the less was the author of the epistle, Dr. Macknight thinks, following Lardner and others, is incontestable: I shall quote his abridgment of Lardner's arguments; but the point in question is not, in my opinion, made out by any of these writers.

In the catalogue of the apostles, Matt. x. 2. Mark iii. 16. Luke vi. 14. Acts i. 13. we find two persons of the name of James: the first was the son of Zebedee, Matt. x. 2. the second in all the catalogues is called the son of Alphaeus: one of these apostles is called, Gal. i. 19. The Lord's brother. Wherefore, as there were only twelve apostles, and as James the son of Zebedee, so far as we know, was in no respect related to our Lord, the apostle, called James the Lord's brother, must have been James the son of Alphaeus, called also James the less or minor, whose relation to Christ will appear by comparing Mark xv. 40. with John i. 25. In the former passage, Mark, speaking of the women who were present at the crucifixion, says, 'There were also women looking on afar off, among whom were Mary Magdalen, and Mary the mother of James the less, and of Joseph and Simeon.' In the latter passage, John, speaking of the same women, says, 'There stood by the cross of Jesus, his mother, and his mother's sister, Mary, the wife of Cleophas, and Mary Magdalen; wherefore, our Lord's mother's sister, Mary the wife of Cleophas, mentioned by John, is, in all probability, the person whom Mark calls Mary the mother of James the less, and of Joseph; consequently, her sons James and Joseph, were our Lord's cousins-german by his mother. And as the Hebrews called all near relations brethren, it is more than probable that James the son of Alphaeus, who was our Lord's cousin-german, is James the Lord's brother, mentioned Gal. i. 19. Three circumstances confirm this opinion:—1. James and Joseph, the sons of Mary, our Lord's mother's sister, are expressly called the brethren of Jesus, Matt. xiii. 55. Mark vi. 3. 2. James, the son of our Lord's mother's sister, being distinguished from another James, by the appellation of The Less, Mark xv. 40. there is good reason to suppose that he is the James whom Mark, in his catalogue, distinguishes from James the son of Zebedee, by the appellation of the son of Alphaeus. It is true, Mary, the mother of James and of Joseph, is called the wife of Cleophas, John xix. 25. But Cleophas and Alphaeus are the same name, differently pronounced; the one according to the Hebrew, and the other according to the Greek orthography. 3. Of the persons called the brethren of Jesus, Matt. xiii. 55. there are three mentioned in the catalogue as APOTLOS; James, and Simeon, and Judas. They, I suppose, are the brethren of the Lord, who are said, as apostles, to have had a right to lead about a sister or a wife, &c. 1 Cor. ix. 5. Jerom likewise thought James the Lord's brother, was so called because he was the son of Mary, our Lord's mother's sister; Art. Jacobus. Lardner, Canon. Vol. III. p. 63. says—'Jerom seems to have been the first who said our Lord's brethren were the sons of His mother's sister; and that this opinion was at length embraced by Augustine, and has prevailed very much of late, being the opinion of the Romanists in general; and of Lightfoot, Witatus, Lampe, and many of the Protestants. On the other hand Origen, Epiphanius, and other ancient writers, both Greeks and Latins, were of opinion that James, the Lord's brother, was not the son of the virgin's sister, but of Joseph, our Lord's reputed father, by a former wife, who died before he espoused the virgin. Of the same opinion were Peccius, Barnage, and Care, among the Protestants, and Valesius among the Romanists. Epiphanius and Theophylact supposed, that Joseph's first wife was the widow of Alphaeus, who being Joseph's brother, Joseph married her, to raise up seed to him; and therefore James, the issue of that marriage, was truly called the son of Alphaeus and brother of our Lord. But these suppositions might have been spared; if the ancients and moderns had recollected, that near relations were called brethren by the Hebrews; and that Alphaeus and Cleophas are the same names, differently written. James the less, the son of Alphaeus, being not only the Lord's near relation, but an apostle, whom, as is generally supposed, He honoured in a particular manner, by appearing to him alone, after His resurrection, 1 Cor. xv. These circumstances, together with his own personal merit, rendered him of such note among the apostles, that they appointed him to reside at Jerusalem, and to superintend the church there.' This appointment, Lardner says, was made soon after the martyrdom of Stephen; and, in support of this opinion, observes, 'that Peter always speaks first, as president among the apostles, until after the choice of the seven deacons. Every thing said of St. James, after that, implies his presiding in the church at Jerusalem.' Canon. Vol. III. pag. 28. For example; when the apostles and elders at Jerusalem came together to consider whether it was needful to circumcise the Gentiles, after there had been much disputing, Peter spake, Acts xv. 7. then Barnabas and Paul, ver. 12. And when they had ended, James summed up the whole, and proposed the terms on which the Gentiles were to be received into the church, ver. 19, 20, 21. to which the whole assembly agreed, and wrote letters to the Gentiles, conformably to the opinion of James, ver. 22—23. From this it is inferred, that James presided in the council of Jerusalem, because he was president of the church in that city.

'Chrysostom, in his Homily on Acts xv. says—'James was bishop of Jerusalem, and therefore spake last.' In the time of this council, Paul communicated the Gospel which he preached among the Gentiles, to three of the apostles, whom he calls pillars; and tells us, that when they perceived the inspiration and miraculous powers which he possessed, they gave him the right hand of fellowship, mentioning James first, Gal. ii. 9. 'And knowing the grace that was bestowed on me, James, Cephas, and John, who were pillars, gave to me and Barnabas the right hand of fellowship.' This implies, that James, whom, in the first chapter, he had called 'the Lord's brother,' was not only an apostle, but the presiding apostle in the church at Jerusalem. In the same chapter, Paul, giving an account of what happened after the council, says, ver. 11. 'When Peter was come to Antioch, before that certain came from James, he did eat with the Gentiles; but when they were come he withdrew, and separated himself from them who were of the circumcision.' This shows that James resided at Jerusalem, and presided in the church there, and was greatly respected by the Jewish believers. The same circumstance appears from Acts xxi. 17. where, giving an account of Paul's journey to Jerusalem, with the collections from the saints in Judea, Luke says, ver. 18. 'Paul went in with us to James, and all the elders were present.' Farther, the respect in which James was held by the apostles, appears from two facts recorded by Luke: the first is, when Paul came to Jerusalem, three years after his conversion, Barnabas took him, and brought him to Peter and James, as the chief apostles.—Compare Acts xix. 27. with Gal. i. 9. The second fact is, after Peter was miraculously delivered out of prison, about the time of the pass-over, in the year 44, 'he came to the house of Mary—where many were gathered together praying, Acts xii. 12. and when he had declared to them how the Lord had brought him out of the prison, he said, Go show these things to James and to the brethren,' ver. 17. These particulars are mentioned by Lardner, and before him by Whitty and Care, to show that James, the Lord's brother, was really an apostle, in the strict acceptation of the word; consequently, that Eusebius was mistaken when he placed him among the seventy disciples, E. H. lib. vii. c. 12.

'That the Epistle of James was early esteemed an inspired writing, is evident from the following fact:—that while the second Epistle of Peter, the second and third of John, the Epistle of Jude, and the Revelation, are omitted in the first Syriac translation of the New Testament, (the Peshito), which was made in the beginning of the second century for the use of the converted Jews; the Epistle of James has found a place in it equally with the books which were never called in question. This is an argument of great weight: for certainly the Jewish believers, to whom that epistle was addressed and delivered, were much better judges of its authenticity, than the converted Gentiles, to whom it was not sent: and who, perhaps, had no opportunity of being acquainted with it, till long after it was written. Wherefore, its being received by the Jewish believers, is an undeniable proof that they knew it to be written by James the apostle; whereas, the ignorance of the Gentile believers concerning this epistle, is not even a presumption against its authenticity.

'That the converted Gentiles had little knowledge of the Epistle of James in the first ages, may have been owing to various causes: such as, that it was addressed to the Jews, and that the matters contained in it were personal to the Jews. For, on these accounts the Jewish believers may have thought it not necessary to communicate it to the Gentiles. And when it was made known to them, they may have scrupled to receive it as an inspired writing, for the following reasons:—1. The Writer does not, in the inscription, take the title of an apostle, but calls himself simply, 'James, a servant of God, and of the Lord Jesus Christ.' 2. Many of the ancients, by calling the writer of this epistle, James the just, have rendered his apostleship doubtful. 3. As they have done, likewise, by speaking of him commonly as Bishop of Jerusalem, and not as an apostle of Christ. It is little wonder, therefore, that this epistle was not received generally by the converted Gentiles; consequently, that it was not often quoted by them in their writings. But, afterward, when it was considered that this epistle was, from the beginning, received by the Jewish believers, and that it was translated into the Syriac language for their use; and that Paul, though an apostle, sometimes contented himself with the appellation of 'a servant of Christ,' Philip. i. 1. Philem. ver. 1. and sometimes took no appellation but his own name, 1 Thess. i. 1. 2 Thess. i. 1. and that the apostle John did not, in any of his epistles, call himself an apostle, the title which the author of the Epistle of James had to be an apostle, was no longer doubted; but he was generally acknowledged to be James the son of Alphaeus and the Lord's brother; and his epistle, after an accurate examination, was received as an inspired writing. So Barius tells us, who affirms, that after the fourth century, no church, nor ecclesiastical writer, is found, who ever doubted of the authority of this epistle; but, on the contrary, all the catalogues of the books of Scripture published, whether by general or provincial councils, or by Roman bishops, or other orthodox writers, since the fourth century, constantly number it among the canonical Scriptures.

With respect to what is remarked by Eusebius, that there are not many ancient writers who have quoted the Epistle of James; learned men have observed, that Clement of Rome has quoted it four several times; and so does Ignatius in his genuine Epistle to the Ephesians, sect. 10, 12, 17, 30. and Origen, in his thirteenth Homily on Genesis, sect. 5. That it was not more generally quoted by the ancients, besides the things already mentioned, may have been owing to the following reasons:—1. Being written to the whole Jewish nation, to correct the errors and vices which prevailed among them, the Gentiles may have thought themselves little concerned with it, and may have been at no pains to procure copies of it; by which means it was not so generally known among them as some other books of Scripture. 2. The seeming opposition of the doctrine of this epistle to the doctrine of Paul, concerning justification by faith, without the works of the law, may have occasioned it to be less regarded by the most ancient writers; just as it was in later times, on the same account, rejected by Luther, who, to show his contempt of it, called it (epistola straminea) a strawy, or chaffy, epistle.

To conclude, the authority of the Epistle of James, as an inspired writing, is abundantly established, in Mill's opinion, by the apostles Paul and Peter, who have in their writings many sentiments and expressions similar to those contained in this epistle; for example,

1 Pet. i. 1. Who hath begotten us again to a living hope through the resurrection of Jesus Christ. James i. 18. Having willed it, he hath begotten us by the word.

Rom. v. 3. Knowing that affliction worketh out patience, and patience experience. James i. 3. Knowing that the proving of your faith worketh out patience.

Rom. ii. 13. That the hearers of the law are not just before God, but the doers of the law shall be justified. James i. 22. And be ye doers of the law, and not hearers only, deceiving yourselves by false reasoning.

Rom. vii. 23. I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind. James iv. 1. Come they not hence, even from your lusts, which war in your members.

1 Pet. ii. 11. Lust which war against the soul. James iv. 7. Resist the devil, and he will flee from you.

1 Pet. v. 8. Your adversary the devil; 9. whom resist, steadfast in the faith. James iv. 10. Be humbled in the presence of God, and he will lift you up.

1 Pet. v. 6. Be humbled under the mighty hand of God, that he may exalt you.

Rom. xiv. 4. Who art thou that condemnest another man's household servant?

1 Pet. iv. 8. Love covereth a multitude of sins. James v. 20. multitude of sins. See Macknight

That James the less may have been our Lord's man, or even our Lord's brother by a former wife, or even by the Virgin, is perfectly possible; and an apostle, and an eminent man among both nations, may be readily credited; and that he was epistle, is also possible:—but I must still assert, neither decisive nor satisfactory evidence on that point that it is arguing in a circle, to deduce the evidence from the apostleship of James the less, person is not proved to be its author. The evidence of its being canonical, must be taken that it was universally received by the church without scruple, incorporated with those writings, on all hands, allowed to have been given in the time of God.

Before I conclude, I shall mention the opinion relative to the author of this epistle.

"All things considered," says he, "I see no assertion, that James the son of Zebedee was not this epistle. One circumstance affords, at least, argument in favour of the opinion, that it was written by the elder James, and at a time when the Gospel propagated among the Gentiles: namely, that exhortations to harmony between the Jewish and Gentile converts; which, after the time that the Gentiles into the church, became absolutely necessary written after the apostolic council of Jerusalem, Acts v. and by the younger James, we might think, that at least, some allusion would be made in that of that council, which was propounded by James in favour of the Gentile converts; and that the epistle contain an admonition to the Jewish converts, to receive the Gentile converts as their brethren." Introduction to the Testament.

The epistle itself is entirely different in its style and manner from all those in the Sacred Canon; the style and manner of a Jewish prophet, than a Christian apostle touches on any subject purely Christian. Our only mentioned twice in it, Chap. i. 1. & ii. 1. thing of His miracles or teaching: of His death or of any redemption by him. It begins with a lofty salutation; and ends without any apostolic benediction. In short, had it not been for the two stanzas of our blessed Lord, we had not known that it was any Christian writer. It may be considered as a link between Judaism and Christianity, as John Baptist was between the Old Covenant and the New. It is neither plan nor arrangement in it; many invaluable lessons, which no serious person can afford to neglect without profit.

James the less was martyred at Jerusalem and the epistle is supposed to have been written before his death. Though I believe it to be the work of an unknown author, not long after the ascension shall follow the usual Chronology, and date it not because I think that to be the true date, but what is generally adopted.

THE GENERAL EPISTLE OF JAMES.

For Chronological Eras, see at the end of the Acts.

CHAPTER I.

He addresses the dispersed of the twelve tribes, 1. Shows that they should rejoice under the cross, because of the good which they may derive from it; especially in the increase and perfecting of their patience, 2-4. They are to ask wisdom of God, who gives liberally to all, 5. But they must ask in faith, and not with a doubtful confidence, 6. Directions to the rich and the poor, 9-11. The blessedness of the man that endures trials, 12. How men are drawn away from God, 13-15. God is the Father of lights, and all good proceeds from Him, 16-18. Caution against hasty words, and wrong tempers, 19-21. We should be doers of the word, and not hearers merely, lest we deceive ourselves, 22. Beholding their natural face in a glass, when it is removed, forget what manner of persons they were, and should look into the perfect law of liberty, and continue therein, 25. The nature and properties of pure religion, 26-27.

JAMES, a servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ, to the twelve tribes which are scattered abroad, greeting.

1. John 1. 22. Acts 2. 5, 6, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100.

NOTES.—Verse 1. James, a servant of God [and of the Lord Jesus Christ]. For an account of this person, or rather for the conjecture, see the Preface. He neither calls himself a brother, nor does he say that he was the brother of Christ. It is not known whether he was James the elder, or James the less, called our Lord's brother. The names of the same name, we know not. The writers concerning these points are worthy of notice, as the church has always received him as an apostle.

2 My brethren, count it all joy when ye are assayed with temptations;

4. Deu. 32. 26. Job 7. 35. Acts 2. 5, 6, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100.

To the twelve tribes—scattered abroad]—The converted to Christianity or not, who were scattered among the Gentiles, for the purpose of this time there were Jews part and partly resident, in particularly in Asia, Greece, Egypt, &c. restricting it to Jewish belief it might concern, but the faith of our Lord

4 But let patience have her perfect work, that ye may be perfect and entire, wanting nothing.

5 If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God, that giveth to all more liberally, and upbraideth not; and it shall be given him.

much less must we confine it to those who were scattered abroad at the persecution raised concerning Stephen, Acts vii. 58. ix. 12, &c. That the twelve tribes were in actual existence when James wrote this epistle, Dr. Macknight thinks evident, from the following facts:—"1. Notwithstanding Cyrus saved all the Jews in his dominions to return to their own land, many of them did not return. This happened agreeably to God's purpose, in permitting them to be carried captive into Assyria and Bablyonia; for He intended to make himself known among the heathens, by means of the knowledge of His being and perfections, which the Jews, in their dispersion, could not communicate to them. This also was the reason that God determined that the ten tribes should never return to their own land, Hos. i. 6. viii. 8. ix. 3, 15-17. 2. That, comparatively speaking, few of the twelve tribes returned in consequence of Cyrus's decree, but continued to live among the Gentiles, appears from this, that in the days of Augustus, as also of the successors of Cyrus, who reigned from India to Æthiopia, over a hundred and twenty-seven provinces, Bethel &c. The Jews were dispersed among the people in all the provinces of his kingdom, and their laws were divers from the laws of all other people, and they did not keep the king's laws; so that, by adhering to their own usages, they kept themselves distinct from all the nations among whom they lived. 3. On the day of Pentecost, which happened next after our Lord's ascension, Acts ii. 5, 9. *There were dwelling at Jerusalem Jews, devout men, out of every nation under heaven; Parthians, Medes, and Ælaniites, &c. So numbers were the Jews, and so widely dispersed through all the countries of the world. 4. When Paul travelled through Asia Minor, Europe, he found the Jews so numerous that, in all the great cities of the Gentiles, they had synagogues in which they assembled for the worship of God, and were joined by multitudes of proselytes from among the heathens, to whom likewise he preached the Gospel. 5. The same apostle, in his speech to King Agrippa, affirmed that the twelve tribes were still existing, and that they served God day and night, in expectation of the promise made to the fathers, Acts xxvi. 6, 7. 6. *Greenish, Ant. p. 14, cap. 12, tells us, that one region could not contain the Jews, but they dwelled in most of the flourishing cities of Asia and Europe, in the islands and continent, not much less in number than the heathen inhabitants. From all this it is evident that the Jews of the dispersion were more numerous than even the Jews in Judæa; and that James very properly inscribed this letter to the twelve tribes which were in the dispersion, seeing the twelve tribes really existed then, and do still exist, although not distinguished by separate habitations, as they were anciently in their own land.

12 Blessed is the man that endureth temptation: for when he is tried, he shall receive the crown of life, which the Lord hath promised to them that love him.

13 Let no man say when he is tempted, I am tempted of God: for God cannot be tempted with evil, neither tempteth he any man:

14 But every man is tempted, when he is drawn away of his own lust, and enticed.

15 Then, when lust hath conceived, it bringeth forth sin: and sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death.

them to be uncertain, that they may never become an object of confidence to His followers, and that they may put their whole trust in God. If, for righteousness' sake, any of those who were in affluence suffer loss, or spoiling of their goods; they should consider that while they have gained that of infinite worth, they have lost what is but of little value; and which, in the nature of things, they must soon part with, though they should suffer nothing on account of religion.

12. Blessed is the man that endureth temptation] This is a mere Jewish sentiment; and on it the Jews speak some excellent things. In Shemoth Rabba, sect. 31, fol. 129, and in Rab. Tanchum, fol. 29, 4. we have these words: "Blessed is the man שְׂמֵחַ עַד שֶׁיִּשְׁתָּהוּ שְׂמֵחַ עֲשֵׂהוּ בְּנֵסוֹ Sheheyeah omed benesomo, who stands in his temptation; for there is no man whom God does not try. He tries the rich, to see if they will open their hands to the poor: He tries the poor, to see if they will receive affliction, and not murmur. If, therefore, the rich stand in his temptation, and give alms to the poor, he shall enjoy his riches in this world, and his horn shall be exalted in the world to come; and the holy blessed God shall deliver him from the punishment of hell. If the poor stand in his temptation, and do not repine, (kick back,) he shall have double in the world to come." This is exactly the sentiment of James. Every man is, in this life, in a state of temptation or trial; and in this state he is a candidate for another and a better world: he that stands in his trial shall receive the crown of life which the Lord hath promised to them that love Him. It is only love to God, that can enable a man to endure the trials of life. Love feels no loads; all practicable things are possible to him who loveth.

There may be an allusion here to the contests in the Grecian games. He is crowned who conquers; and none else.

13. Let no man say] Lest the former sentiment should be misapplied; as the word temptation has two grand meanings, solicitation to sin, and trial from providential situation or circumstances; James, taking up the word in the former sense, after having used it in the latter, says, Let no man say, when he is tempted, (solicited to sin) I am tempted of God; for God cannot be tempted with evil: neither tempteth he (thus) any man. Thus the author has explained and guarded his meaning.

14. But every man is tempted] Successfully solicited to sin; when he is drawn away of his own lust: when, giving way to the evil propensity of his own heart, he does that to which he is solicited by the enemy of his soul.

Among the rabbins we find some fine sayings on this subject. In Midrash hanaftam, fol. 20, and Yalcut rubeni, fol. 17, it is said, "This is the custom of evil concupiscence, עֵץ יָסוּר yetsar hara'ot: to-day it saith, Do this; to-morrow, Worship an idol. The man goes and worships. Again it saith, Be angry.

"Evil concupiscence is, at the beginning, like the thread of a spider's web; afterward it is like a cart-ropes." Sanhedrin, fol. 99.

In the words, drawn away by his own lust and enticed, ἐκ τῆς ἰδίας ἐπιθυμίας ἐλκόμενος καὶ ὀκταζόμενος, there is a double metaphor; the first referring to the dragging a fish out of the water by a hook which it had swallowed, because concealed by a bait; the second, to the enticements of impure women, who draw away the unwary into their snares, and involve them in their ruin. Illicit connexions of this kind the writer has clearly in view: and every word that he uses refers to something of this nature, as the following verse shows.

15. When lust hath conceived] When the evil propensity works unchecked, it bringeth forth sin. The evil act between the parties is perpetrated.

And sin, when it is finished] When this breach of the law of God, and of innocence, has been a sufficient time completed, it bringeth forth death. The spurious offspring is the fruit of the criminal connexion; and the evidence of that death, or punishment, due to the transgressors.

Any person acquainted with the import of the verbs συλλαμβάνει, τρεφεί, and ἀποκτείνει, will see that this is the metaphor; and that I have not exhausted it. Συλλαμβάνω, signifies concipio sobolem, quæ comprehenditur utero; concipio festum; τρεφάω, pario, genero, efficio; ἀποκτείνω, ex, amo, et vivo prægnans sum, in utero gero. Verbum proprium prægnantium, quæ sobolem maturum emittunt. Interdum etiam gignendi notionem habet.—Marius Oberer. Sacr. Vol. II. page 184. Kypke and Schleuser.

Sin is a small matter in its commencement, but, by indulgence, it grows great, and multiplies. To use the rabbinical phrase, the transgressions, like the 16 Do not err, my beloved brethren.

17 Every good gift and every perfect gift is from cometh down from the Father of lights, with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning.

18 Of his own will begat he us with the word, and we should be a kind of first-fruits of his creation.

19 Wherefore, my beloved brethren, be slow to hear, slow to speak, slow to wrath:

20 For the wrath of man worketh not the right God.

imperceptible through its extreme tenacity, or firmness; broken; for it is, as yet, but a simple impression: afterward it becomes like a cart-ropes; being indulged, produced strong desire and delusion; then, time, place, and opportunity served, was conceived in the mind, and finished in the consummation by act.

The soul, which the Greek philosophers consist of the appetites and passions, is called by the female part of our nature; and the spirit, the male part. In allusion to this notion, James, represents us as a harlot, who entices their understanding into impure embraces, and from that conjunction sin being brought forth, immediately acts, and by frequent repetition, till at length it gains such in its turn it begets death. This is the true genesis and death. Lust is the mother of sin, and sin the death; and the sinner the parent of both. See

16. Do not err] By supposing that God is the author of that He impels any man to commit it.

17. Every good gift and every perfect gift] Whatever is good, is from God; whatever is evil, is from himself. As from the sun, which is the father of light, all light comes: so from God, who is the Father, and Source of good, all good comes; ever can be called good, or pure, or light, or exalted, must necessarily spring from Him, as the Source of all goodness and perfection.

With whom is no variableness] The sun, the light to the whole of our system, may be obscured or the different bodies which revolve round him, partly the earth, may, from time to time, suffer a loss of his light, by the intervention of other bodies; splendour; and his apparent tropical variations turning; when, for instance, in our winter, he to the southern tropic, (the tropic of Capricorn) our days are greatly shortened, and we suffer in a great diminution, both of light and heat. But of this kind with God; He is never affected by such and chances to which mortal things are exposed; no one place in the universe: He fills the earth, is every where present, sees all, pervades upon all; dispenses his blessings equitably; hates nothing that He has made; is loquacious; and His tender mercies are over all His creatures. He is not affected with evil; nor does His influence to sin, any man. The sun, the source and acts with a continual variety, as to the time, the length of the time in which, in the course of an and sixty-five days, five hours, forty-eight minutes and eight seconds, it has its revolution through the ether rather the earth has its revolution round it, in which its light and heat are, to the inhabitants, either constantly increasing or decreasing; Creator and Preserver of all things, is eternally dispensing His good and perfect gifts, His earthly blessings, to all His creatures; ever unclouded and ever smiling with, and willing good. Men are not self-made from His light by the works of darkness but hide themselves in dens and caves of the prevalence of the solar light. But His good creatures is permanent; He wills not the death but rather that he may come unto Him and live; walks in wretchedness or misery but he who is unto God that he may have life. See diagram at the end of this chapter.

18. Of his own will begat he us] God's will is to the lust of man, verse 15. His truth, the new salvation, to the sinful means referred to in the and the new creatures, to the sin conceived and as above. As the will of God is essentially good, and his good must be good also; as it is infinitely perfect, his good must be holy. The word or doctrine St. Paul calls the word of the truth of the Gospel is the means which God uses to convert souls.

A kind of first-fruits] By creatures, we are stand the Gentiles; and by first-fruits, the Jew Gospel was first sent; and those of them that the first-fruits of that astonishing harvest which reaped over the whole Gentile world.—See the viii. 19, &c. There is a remarkable saying in the text, De Allegoria, lib. II. p. 101. God began father of the perfect nature; superior to seed in souls, and begetting happiness

21 Wherefore, lay apart all filthiness and superfluity of naughtiness, and receive with meekness the ingrafted word, which is able to save your souls.

22 But, be ye doers of the word, and not hearers only, deceiving your own selves.

23 For if any be a hearer of the word, and not a doer, he is like unto a man beholding his natural face in a glass:

24 For he beholdeth himself, and goeth his way, and straightway forgetteth what manner of man he was.

19. Swift to hear] Talk little, and work much, is a rabbinical adage.—Pirkey Aboth, cap. 1. 15.

The righteous speak little, and do much; the wicked speak much, and do nothing.—Bava Metzia, fol. 87.

The son of Sirach says, chap. v. 11. Γνωσ ταχως εν τη ακροασει σου, και εν μακροθυμια απαντησιν.—"Be swift to hear; and with deep consideration give answer."

Slow to wrath] "There are four kinds of dispositions, says he Midrash Hanaalam, cap. v. 11.—First, Those who are easily incensed, and easily pacified. These gain on one hand, and lose on the other. Secondly, Those who are not easily incensed, but are difficult to be appeased: these lose on the one hand, and gain on the other. Thirdly, Those who are difficult to be incensed, and are easily appeased: these are the good. Fourthly, Those who are easily angered, and difficult to be appeased: these are the wicked.

Those who are hasty in speech, are generally of a peevish or angry disposition. A person who is careful to consider what he says, is not likely to be soon angry.

20. The wrath of man] A furious zeal in matters of religion is detestable in the sight of God: He will have no sacrifice that is not consumed by fire from His own altar. The zeal that nade the Papists persecute and burn the Protestants, was kindled in hell. This was the wrath of man, and did not work any righteousness act for God; nor was it the means of working righteousness in others: the bad fruit of a bad tree.

21. All filthiness] Παντα παραπαια. This word signifies any impurity that cleaves to the body; but, applied to the mind, it implies all impure and unholly affections, such as those spoken of ver. 15. which pollute the soul: in this sense it is used by the best Greek writers.

Superfluity of naughtiness] Περσισσιν κακιας, the over-loving of wickedness. Perhaps there is an allusion here to he part cut off in circumcision, which was the emblem of inure desire; and to lessen that propensity, God, in His mercy, nacted this rite. Put all these evil dispositions aside; for they blind the soul, and render it incapable of receiving any word, even from that ingrafted word of God, which otherwise would have saved their souls.

The ingrafted word] That doctrine which has already been planted among you; which has brought forth fruit in all them that have meekly and humbly received it; and is as powerful o save your souls, as the souls of those who have already believed. I think this to be the meaning of εμψυον λογον, the grafted word, or doctrine. The seed of life had been sown n the land; many of them had received it to their salvation; thers had partially credited it, but not so as to produce in hem any saving effects. Besides, they appear to have taken p with other doctrines, from which they had got no salation; he, therefore, exhorts them to receive the doctrine of rist, which would be the means of saving them unto eteral life.

22. But be ye doers of the word] They had heard this doctrine; they had believed it; but they had put it to no practical use. They were downright Antinomians, who put a sort f stupid inactive faith in the place of all moral righteousness. This is sufficiently evident from the second chapter.

Deceiving your own selves] Παραλογισματα σεβους, im- posing on your own selves by sophistical arguments; this is he meaning of the words. They had reasoned themselves into a state of carnal security; and the object of St. James is, o awake them out of their sleep.

23. Beholding his natural face in a glass] This metaphor is very simple, but very expressive. A man wishes to see s own face; and how, in his natural state, it appears; for his purpose he looks into a mirror, by which his real face, rith all its blemishes and imperfections, is exhibited. He is flected with his own appearance; he sees deformities that ight be remedied; spots, superfluities, and impurities, that ight be removed. While he continues to look into the mir- or he is affected, and wishes himself different to what he ap- ears; and forms purposes of doing what he can to render his countenance agreeable. On going away he soon forgets what sanner of person he was, because the mirror is now remov- d, and his face is no longer reflected to himself; and he no nger recollects how disagreeably he appeared, and his own ecollections of improving his countenance. The doctrines of od, faithfully preached, are such a mirror; he who hears annot help discovering his own character, and being affected rith his own deformity; he sorrows, and purposes amend- nt; but when the preaching is over, the mirror is removed; nd not being careful to examine the records of his salvation, he perfect law of liberty, ver. 25, or, not continuing to look therein, he soon forgets what manner of man he was; or, uposing some unscriptural trust in God's mercy, he reasons

25 But whose looketh into the perfect law of liberty, and continueth therein, he being not a forgetful hearer, but a doer of the work, this man shall be blessed in his deed.

26 If any man among you seem to be religious, and bridlet his not his tongue, but deceiveth his own heart, this man's religion is vain.

27 Pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father is this, to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world.

hirself out of the necessity of repentance and amendment of life, and thus deceives his soul.

25. But whose looketh into the perfect law] The word παραλογος, which we translate looketh into, is very emphatic, and signifies that deep and attentive consideration given to a thing or subject which a man cannot bring up to his eyes, and therefore must bend his back and neck, stooping down, that he may see it to the greater advantage. The law of liberty must mean the Gospel; it is a law, for it imposes obligations from God, and prescribes a rule of life; and it punishes transgressors, and rewards the obedient. It is, nevertheless, a law that gives liberty from the guilt, power, dominion, and influence of sin. And it is perfect, providing a fulness of salvation for the soul; and it may be called perfect here, in opposition to the law, which was a system of types and representations of which the Gospel is the sum and substance. Some think that the word perfect, is added here to signify that the whole of the Gospel must be considered and received; not a part; all its threatenings, with its promises; all its precepts with its privileges.

And continueth] Παραμεινεις, takes time to see and examine the state of his soul, the grace of his God, the extent of his duty, and the height of the promised glory. The metaphor here is taken from those females who spend much time at their glass, in order that they may decorate themselves to the greatest advantage; and not leave one hair, or the smallest ornament, out of its place.

He being not a forgetful hearer] This seems to be a reference to Deut. iv. 9. "Only take heed to thyself, and keep thy soul diligently, lest thou forget the things which thine eyes have seen; and lest they depart from thy heart all the days of thy life." He who studies and forgets, is like to a woman who brings forth children, and immediately buries them.—Aboth R. Nathan, cap. 23.

Shall be blessed in his deed] In Pirkey Aboth, cap. v. 14. it is said, "There are four kinds of men who visit the synagogues:—1. He who enters, but does not work. 2. He who works, but does not enter. 3. He who enters and works. 4. He who neither enters nor works. The first two are indifferent characters; the third is the righteous man; the fourth is wholly evil.

As the path of duty is the way of safety, so it is the way of happiness: he who obeys God from a loving heart, and pure conscience, will infallibly find continual blessedness.

26. Seem to be religious] The word φημοσ, and φημοσια, which we translate religious and religion, (see the next verse,) are of very uncertain etymology. Suidas under the word φημοσ, which he translates θεοφιλια, υπηρεσι τοις θεοις, he worships or serves the gods, accounts for the derivation thus: "It is said, that Orpheus, a Thracian, instituted the mysteries, (or religious rites,) of the Greeks, and called the worshipping of God φημοσ, θρακησικη, as being a Thracian invention." Whatever its derivation may be, the word is used both to signify true religion, and superstition, or heterodoxy. See Hesychius: and see on verse 27.

Bridlet his not his tongue] He who speaks not according to the oracles of God, whatever pretences he makes to religion, only shows, by his want of Scriptural knowledge, that his religion is false, parasitic, or empty of solid truth, profit to others, and good to himself. Such a person should bridle his tongue, put the bit in his mouth; and, particularly, if he be a professed teacher of religion; no matter where he is studied, or what else he has learned, if he have not learned religion he can never teach it. And religion is of such a nature that no man can learn it but by experience: he who does not feel the doctrine of God to be the power of God to the salvation of his soul, can neither teach religion, nor act according to its dictates; because he is an unconverted, unrenewed man. If he be old, let him retire to the desert, and pray to God for light; if he be in the prime of life, let him turn his attention to some honest calling; if he be young, let him tarry at Jericho till his beard grow.

27. Pure religion and undefiled] Having seen something of the etymology of the word φημοσια, which we translate religion, it will be well to consider the etymology of the word religion itself.

In the 28th chapter of the 17th book of his Divine Institution, LACTANTIUS, who flourished about A. D. 300. treats of hope, true religion, and superstition: of the two latter, he gives Cicero's definition from his book de Naturæ Deorum, lib. ii. c. 23. which, with his own definition, will lead us to a correct view not only of the etymology, but of the thing itself.

"Superstition," according to that philosopher, "had its name from the custom of those who offered daily prayers and sacrifices, that their children might survive THEM; ut su

ubi liberi superstites essent. Hence they were called superstitiosi, superstitious. On the other hand, religion, religio, had its name from those who, not satisfied with what was commonly spoken concerning the nature and worship of the gods, searched into the whole matter, and perused the writings of past times; hence they were called religiosi, from re, again, and lego, I read."

This definition Lactantius ridicules, and shows that religion has its name from re, intensive, and ligo, I bind, because of that bond of piety, by which it binds us to God; and this he shows was the notion conceived of it by Lucretius, who laboured to dissolve this bond, and make men Atheists.

Primum quod magnis doces de rebus et acria,
Religionum animos exsolvas pergo.

For, first, I teach great things in lofty strains,
And loose men from religion's grievous chains.

Lucret. lib. l. ver. 930—31.

As to superstition, he says it derived its name from those who paid religious veneration to the memory of the dead; (quasi superstitionem memoriarum defunctorum colunt); or from those who, surviving their parents, worshipped their images at home, as household gods. Aut qui parentibus suis superstites, celebrant imagines eorum domi, tanquam deos penates. Superstition, according to others, refers to novel rites and ceremonies in religion, or to the worship of new gods. But by religion is meant the ancient forms of worship belonging to those gods, which had been long received. Hence that saying of Virgil:

Vana superstitione veterumque ignara deorum.

"Vain superstition not knowing the ancient gods."

Here Lactantius observes, that as the ancient gods were consecrated precisely in the same way with these new ones, that, therefore, it was nothing but superstition from the beginning. Hence he asserts, the superstitious are those who worship many and false gods; and the Christians alone are religious, who worship and supplicate the one true God only. St. James's definition rather refers to the effects of pure religion, than to its nature. The life of God in the soul of man, producing love to God and man, will show itself in the acts which St. James mentions here. It is pure in the principle; for it is Divine truth and Divine love. It is undefiled in all its operations—it can produce nothing unholily, because it ever acts in the sight of God; and it can produce no ungentle word, nor unkind act, because it comes from the Father.

The words καθαρά και απίαντος, pure and undefiled, are supposed to have reference to a diamond or precious stone, whose perfection consists in its being free from flaws; not cloudy, but of a pure water. True religion is the ornament of the soul, and its effects the ornament of the life.

To visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction.] Works of charity and mercy are the proper fruits of religion; and none are more especially the objects of charity and mercy than the orphans and widows. False religion may perform acts of mercy and charity; but its motives not being pure, and its principle being defiled, the flesh, self, and hypocrisy, spot the man, and spot his acts. True religion does not merely give something for the relief of the distressed, but it visits them—it takes the oversight of them—it takes them under its care—οικουμένης means; it goes to their houses and speaks to their hearts. It relieves their wants, sympathizes with them in their distresses, instructs them in Divine things, and recommends them to God. And all this it does for the Lord's sake. This is the religion of Christ. The religion that does not prove itself by works of charity and mercy, is not of God. Reader, what religion hast thou? Has thine ever led thee to cellars, garrets, cottages, and houses, to find out the distressed? Hast thou ever fed, clothed, and visited a destitute representative of Christ?

The subject in verse 11. suggests several reflections on the mutability of human affairs, and the end of all things.

1. Nature itself is subject to mutability: though, by her secret and inscrutable exertions, she effects her renovation from her decay; and thus change is prevented from terminating in destruction. Yet nature herself is tending, by continual mutations, to a final destruction; or rather to a fixed state, when time, the place and sphere of mutability, shall be absorbed in eternity. Time and nature are coeval; they began and must terminate together. All changes are efforts to arrive at destruction or renovation: and destruction must be the term, or bound, of all created things, had not the Creator purposed that His works should endure for ever. According to His promise, we look for a new heaven and a new earth; a fixed, permanent, and endless state of things;—an everlasting sabbath to all the works of God.

I shall confirm these observations with the last verses of that incomparable poem, the Fairy Queen, of our much-neglected but unrivalled poet Edmund Spenser:—

"When I bethink me on that speech whylear,
Of mutability, and well it weigh;
Me seems, that though she all unworthy were
Of the Heaven's rule; yet very sooth to say,
In all things else she bears the greatest sway;
Which makes me loath this state of life so tickle,
And love of things so vain and cast away;
Whose flowing pride, so fading and so fickle,
Short Time shall soon cut down with his consuming sickle.

Then 'gin I think on that which Nature sayd,
Of that same time when so more change shall
But steadfast rest of all things, firmly stayd
Upon the pillars of eternity,
That is contrary to mutability:

For all that morneth, doth in change delight:
But thenceforth all shall rest eternally

With Him that is the God of Sabaoth light:

O that great Sabaoth God, grant me that Sabaoth's
When this is to be the glorious issue, who can speedy lapse of time! Mutability shall end in perfection, when time, the destroyer of all things, shall ed in eternity. And what has a righteous man that "wreck of matter, and that crush of worlds him shall usher in the glories of an eternal day!"
has said, "Though heaven shall vanish like a this firm globe of earth shall crumble into dust; the man shall stand unmoved amidst the shocked deep a crushed world; for, He who hath appointed the the earth to fall, hath said unto the virtuous soul for thou shalt neither perish, nor be wretched."

Another of our poets, in concordia sacra facile p.
expressed the whole with all the strength of Spee's words formed of fire from the celestial altar:—

"stand the Omnipotent decree,

Jeovah's will be done!

Nature's end we wait to see,

And hear her final groan.—

Let this earth dissolve, and bleed

In death the wicked and the just:—

Let those ponderous orbs descend

And grind us into dust:—

Rests secure the righteous man;

At his Redeemer's beck,

Sure to emerge, and rise again,

And mount above the wreck:

Lo! the heavenly spirit towers

Like flames o'er our nature's funeral pyre

Triumphs in immortal powers,

And claps her wings of fire.

Nothing hath the just to lose

By worlds on worlds destroyed;

Far beneath his feet he views,

With smiles, the flaming void;

Sees the universe renewed;

The grand millennial reign begun;

Shouts with all the sons of God,

Around th' eternal throne."

One word more, and I shall trouble my reader no a subject on which I could wear out my pen, and d drop of my ink. The learned reader will join in
"Talia encla, enis dixerunt, currite, fuisi
Concordes stabili statum numine Purca.
Aggredere d magnos (aderit jam tempus!) hon
Cura Deum soboles, magnum Jovis incremen
Aspicere consero mutantem pondera mundum,
Terraque, tracheusque maris, caluunusque profu
Aspicere, venturo hebetur ut omnia seculo.
O mihi tam longa maneat pars ultima vite,
Spiritus, et quantumcum erit tua dicere facta!"

There has never been a translation of this, w poet; and to such a piece I cannot persuade myse the hobbling verses of Mr. Dryden.

2. Taken in every point of view, the 17th verse most curious and singular in the New Testament.
well observed, that the first words make a regular ameter verse, supposed to be quoted from some not now extant; and the last clause of the verse, little change, makes another hexameter.

It is *δοξαι αναθη, και τας δοξαις τελειου
λε' are τας δοξαις Πατρος καταβατος αν
"Every goodly gift, and every perfect donation,* is from the Father of lights; and from above it descends."

The first line, which is incontestably a perfect may have been designed by St. James; or, in the composition, may have originated from accident which often occurs to all good writers; but the self is immediately from heaven. I know not the justified by sound criticism in making any particular between δοξαι and δωματα—our translators he-same word in rendering both. They are often sybut sometimes we may observe a shade of differ-signifying a gift of any kind, here probably mean-blessings of all sorts; δωματα signifying a free gift comes without constraint from the mere benefice giver. And here it may signify all spiritual ca-blessings. Now, all these come from above; God the Author of our earthly good, as He is of our eternal. Earthly blessings are simply good; but they fact; they perish in the using. The blessings of glory are supreme good—they are permanent and and to the gift that includes these the term relatio here properly added by St. James.

3. In the latter part of the verse, τας ομοι τροπας αποκαταστα, which we translate, with a variableness, neither shadow of turning, there is to some of the most abstruse principles in astron-

is not accidental; for every word in the whole verse is astronomical. his πατὴρ τῶν φωτῶν, Father of lights, there is the most allusion to the sun, who is the father, as the sources, of all the lights, or luminaries, proper to our system. It is not only his light which we enjoy by day; but it is his light also which is reflected to us, from the moon's surface, by night. And it is demonstrable that all the planets, Mercury, Venus, the Earth, the Moon, Mars, Ceres, Pallas, Juno, Vesta, Jupiter, Saturn, Saturn's Rings, and Herschel, &c. the Georgium Sidus; with the four satellites of Jupiter, the seven satellites of Saturn, and the six satellites of the Georgium Sidus, thirty-one bodies in all, besides the comets; all derive their light from the sun, being perfectly opaque or dark in themselves; the sun being the only luminous body in our system; all the rest being illuminated by him.

The word παραλλαγή, which we translate variableness, from παραλλάττω, to change alternately; to pass from one degree to another, evidently refers to parallax in astronomy. To give a proper idea of what astronomers mean by this term, I must be premised that all the diurnal motions of the heavenly bodies, from east to west, are only apparent, being occasioned by the rotation of the earth upon its axis in an opposite direction in about twenty-four hours. These diurnal motions are, therefore, performed uniformly round the axis, or polar diameter, of the earth, and not round the place of the spectator, who is upon the earth's surface. Hence every one who observes the apparent motion of the heavens from this surface, will find that this motion is not even, equal arches being described in unequal times:—for if a globular body, such as the earth, describe equally the circumference of a circle by its rotatory motion, it is evident the equality of this motion can be seen in no other points than those in the axis of the circle; and, therefore, any object viewed from the centre of the earth will appear in a different place from what it does when observed from the surface. This difference of place of the same object, seen at the same time from the earth's centre and surface, is called its parallax.

As I shall make some farther use of this point, in order to make it plain to those who are not much acquainted with the subject to which I am satisfied St. James alludes, I shall introduce the following diagram:

Let the circle ORNS, in the annexed figure, represent the earth, E its centre, O the place of an observer on its surface, whose visible or sensible horizon is OH, and the line EST, parallel to OH, the rational, true, or mathematical horizon. Let ZDFT be considered a portion of a great circle in the heavens, and A the place of an object in the visible horizon. Join EA by a line produced to C; then C is the true place of the object, and H is its apparent place; and the angle CAH is its parallax; and because the object is in the horizon, it is called its horizontal parallax. As OAE, the angle which the earth's radius, or semidiameter, subtends at the object, is necessarily equal to its opposite angle CAH; hence the horizontal parallax of an object is defined to be the angle which the earth's semidiameter subtends at that object.

The whole effect of parallax is in a vertical direction; for the parallactic angle is in the plane passing through the observer and the earth's centre; which plane is necessarily perpendicular to the horizon, the earth being considered as a sphere. The more elevated an object is above the horizon, the less the parallax, the distance from the earth's centre continuing the same. To make this sufficiently clear, let B represent an object at any given altitude above the visible horizon OAH, then the angle DBF, formed by the straight lines OB and EB, produced to F and D, will be the parallax of the object at the given altitude, and is less than the parallax of the same object when in the visible horizon OAH, for the angle DBF is less than the angle CAH. Hence the horizontal parallax is the greatest of all diurnal parallaxes; and when the object is in the zenith, it has no parallax; the visual ray passing perpendicularly from the object, through the observer, to the earth's centre, as in the line ZOE.

The quantity of the horizontal parallax of any object is in proportion to its distance from the place of observation, being greater or less, as the object is nearer to, or farther removed from, the spectator. In illustration of this point, let I be the place of an object in the sensible horizon; then will LIH be its horizontal parallax, which is a smaller angle than CAH, the horizontal parallax of the nearer object A.

The horizontal parallax being given, the distance of the object from the earth's centre, EA or EI, may be readily found in semidiameters of the earth by the resolution of the right-angled triangle OEA, in which we have given, the angle OAE, the horizontal parallax, the side OE, the semidiameter of the earth, considered as unity, and the right angle AOE, to find the side EA, the distance of the object from the earth's centre. The proportion to be used in this case is: The sine of the horizontal parallax is to unity, the semidiameter of the earth; as radius, i. e. the right angle AOE, the sine of ninety degrees being the radius of a circle, is to the side EA. This proportion is very compendiously wrought by logarithms as follows: subtract the logarithmic sine of the horizontal parallax from 10, the radius, and the remainder will be the logarithm of the answer.

Example.—When the moon's horizontal parallax is a degree, what is her distance from the earth's centre in semidiameters of the earth?
 From the radius, . . . . . 10.000000
 Subtract the sine of one degree . . . . . 8.2418663
 Remainder the logarithm of 57.2967 . . . . . 1.7681447

Which is the distance of the moon in semidiameters of the earth, when her horizontal parallax amounts to a degree. If 57.2967 be multiplied by 3977, the English miles contained in the earth's semidiameter, the product, 227876.9 will be the moon's distance from the earth's centre in English miles.

The sun's horizontal parallax is about eight seconds and three-fifths, as is evident from the phenomena attending the transit of Venus, of 1761 and 1769, as observed in different parts of the world:—a method of obtaining the solar parallax abundantly less liable to be materially affected by error of observation than that of Hipparchus, who lived between the 154th and 163d Olympiad, from lunar eclipses; or than that of Aristarchus the Samian, from the moon's dichotomy; or even than that of modern astronomers from the parallax of Mars when in opposition, and, at the same time, in or near his perihelion. The sun's horizontal parallax being scarcely the 418th part of that of the moon given in the preceding example, if 227876.9, the distance of the moon as found above, be multiplied by 418.6, (for the horizontal parallax decreases nearly in proportion as the distance increases,) the product will be the distance of the sun from the earth's centre, which will be found to be upwards of ninety-five millions of English miles.

When we know the horizontal parallax of any object, its magnitude is easily determined. The apparent diameter of the sun, for example, at his mean distance from the earth, is somewhat more than thirty-two minutes of a degree, which is at least a hundred and eleven times greater than the double of the sun's horizontal parallax, or the apparent diameter of the earth as seen from the sun; therefore, the real solar diameter must be at least a hundred and eleven times greater than that of the earth; i. e. upwards of 890,000 English miles. And as spherical bodies are to each other as the cubes of their diameters, if 111 be cubed, we shall find that the magnitude of the sun is more than thirteen hundred thousand times greater than that of the earth.

The whole effect of parallax being in a vertical circle, and the circles of the sphere not being in this direction, the parallax of a star will evidently change its true place with respect to these different circles; whence there are five kinds of diurnal parallaxes, viz. the parallax of longitude, parallax of latitude, parallax of ascension or descension, parallax of declination, and parallax of altitude, the last of which has been already largely explained; and the meaning of the first four, simply, is the difference between the true and visible longitude, latitude, right ascension, and declination of an object. Besides these, there is another kind of parallax, called by modern astronomers the parallax of the earth's ANNUAL ORBIT, by which is meant the difference between the places of a planet as seen from the sun and the earth at the same time, the former being its true or heliocentric place, and the latter its apparent or geocentric place. The ancient astronomers gave the term parallax only to the diurnal apparent inequalities of motion in the moon and planets, Ptolemy, who lived in the second century, calling protophæresis orbis what is now named the parallax of the great or annual orbit. This parallax is more considerable than the diurnal parallax, as the earth's annual orbit is more considerable than the earth's semidiameter. This parallax, when greatest, amounts in Mars, the nearest superior planet, to upwards of forty-seven degrees;—in Jupiter to near twelve degrees;—in Saturn to more than six degrees, &c. In the region of the nearest fixed stars, i. e. those new ones of 1572 and 1604, double the radius of the earth's orbit does not subtend an angle of a single minute of a degree; whence it is evident the nearest fixed stars are at least hundreds of times more distant from us than the Georgium Sidus is, whose greatest annual parallax amounts to upwards of three degrees. The annual parallaxes of the fixed stars are, in general, too minute to be measured; hence these distances from the earth must be inconceivably great.

Any further description of parallax would be useless in reference to the subject to be illustrated.

The words ῥοπαῖα ἀποστραφῆς, shulow of turning, either refer to the darkness in which the earth is involved in consequence of its turning round its axis once in every twenty-four hours, by means of which one hemisphere, or half of its surface, is involved in darkness, being hidden from the sun by the opposite hemisphere; or, to the different portions of the earth which come gradually into the solar light, by its revolution round its orbit; which, in consequence of the pole of the earth being inclined nearly twenty-three degrees and a half to the plane of its orbit, and keeping its parallelism through every part of its revolution, causes all the vicissitudes of seasons, with all the increasing and decreasing proportions of light and darkness, and of cold and heat.

Every person who understands the images, will see with what propriety St. James has introduced them; and through this, his great object is at once discernible. It is evident from this chapter, that there were persons among those to whom he wrote, that held very erroneous opinions concerning the Divine nature; viz. that God tempted, or influenced, men to sin: and, consequently, that He was the author of all the evil that is in the world; and that He withholds His light and influence when necessary to convey the truth, and to correct vice. To destroy this error, he shows, that though the sun, for its splendour, genial heat, and general utility to the globe and its inhabitants, may be a fit emblem of God; yet, in several respects, the metaphor is very imperfect, for the sun himself is liable to repeated obscurations; and although, as to his mass, he is in the focus of the system, giving light and heat to all; yet he is not every where present, and both his light and heat may be intercepted by a great variety of opposing bodies, and other causes.—St. James refers particularly to the Divine ubiquity, or omnipresence. Wherever His light and energy are, there is He Himself; neither His Word nor His Spirit gives false or inconsistent views of His nature and gracious purposes. He has no parallax, because He is equal present every where, and intimately near to all His creatures; He is never seen where He is not; or not seen where He is. He is the God and Father of all; who is above all, and ταπεινὸν all, and ἐν all; "in the wide waste, as in the city full." Nor can any thing be hidden from him. There can be no opposing bodies to prevent forth His light and His truth, because where essentially present. He suffers no eclipses not in His nature.—He varies not in His desire a full, free, and eternal fountain of mercy, truth, and good will to all His intelligent offspring the Lord God Omnipotent reigneth! Amen.

In concluding these observations, I think it necessary to Mr. Wakefield's translation of this text, a citation of that translation: "Every good gift, as a gift of kindness, cometh down from above, from lights, with whom is no parallax, nor tropical shadow have affected," says he, "to ridicule my translation—If it be obscure, the author must answer, not the translator. Why should we impoverish writers, by robbing them of the learning and science play? Why should we conceal in them, what tentatively point out in profane authors? these wise, learned, and judicious critics think stand the phrase shadow of turning, I wish they descend to explain it." Yes, if such a sentiment in Aratus, or in any other ancient astronomical pages of commentary would be written on it, a doctrine of the parallax angle proved to be itself, and its use in determining the distances and of the heavenly bodies, to the ancients some hundred years before the Christian era.

The sentiment is as elegant as it is just; and it sets out the unchangeableness and beneficence of God, not of a system, but of all worlds: the great Dispenser of light and heat; of power and harmony, and perfection. In Him, all live and move from Him; they have their being. There are no fisks; all is unclouded splendour. Can He who unanswerable and unapproachable light, in His self-sufficiency, concern Himself with the affairs of men?—Yes, for we are His offspring; and it is one perfection to delight in the welfare of His intelligent creatures: He is loving to every man: He hates nothing made: and His praise endureth for ever!

CHAPTER II.

We should not prefer the rich to the poor, nor show any partiality inconsistent with the Gospel of Christ, 1.—chosen the poor, rich in faith, to be heirs of his kingdom, even those whom some among their brethren despised, 5, 6. They should love their neighbour as themselves, and have no respect of persons, 7—9. He who commands of God is guilty of the whole, 10, 11. They should act as those who shall be judged by the law of liberty; all have judgment without mercy, who shows no mercy, 12, 13. Faith without works of charity and mercy cannot exist where there are no good works, 14—20. Abraham proved his faith by his works, 21—24. And so the body without the soul is dead; so is faith without good works, 26. [A. M. cir. 4065. A. D. cir. 61.]

MY brethren, have not the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Lord of glory, with respect of persons. 2 For if there come unto your assembly, a man with a gold ring, in goodly apparel, and there come in also a poor man in vile raiment; 3 And ye have respect to him that weareth the gay clothing, and say unto him, Sit thou here in a good place; and say to the poor, Stand thou there, or sit here under my footstool: 4 Are ye not then partial in yourselves, and are become judges of evil thoughts? 5 Hearken, my beloved brethren, Hath not God chosen the poor of this world rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom which he hath promised to them that love him? But ye have despised the poor. Do not rich you, and draw you before the judgment seat of God? 7 Do not they blaspheme that worthy name by which are called? 8 If ye fulfil the royal law according to the scripture, shall love thy neighbour as thyself, ye do well; 9 But if ye have respect to persons, ye are commenders of the law as transgressors. 10 For whosoever shall keep the whole law, and yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all. 11 For he that said, Do not commit adultery

NOTES.—Verse 1. My brethren, have not] This verse should be read interrogatively, My brethren, do ye not make profession of the faith or religion of our glorious Lord Jesus Christ, with acceptance of persons? That is, preferring the rich to the poor, merely because of their riches, and not on account of any moral excellence, personal piety, or public usefulness. Πιστις, faith, is put here for religion: and τῆς δόξης, of glory, should, according to some critics, be construed with it as the Syriac and Coptic have done. Some connect it with our Lord Jesus Christ—the religion of our glorious Lord Jesus Christ. Others translate thus, the faith of the glory of our Lord Jesus. There are many various readings in the MSS. and Versions on this verse; the meaning is clear enough, though the connexion be rather obscure.

2. If there come unto your assembly] Εἰς τὴν ἐκκλησίαν, into the synagogue. It appears from this, that the apostle is addressing Jews, who frequented their synagogues, and carried on their worship there, and judicial proceedings, as the Jews were accustomed to do. Our word assembly does not express the original: and we cannot suppose that these synagogues were, at this time, occupied with Christian worship: but that the Christian Jews continued to frequent them for the purpose of hearing the Law and the prophets read, as they had formerly done, previously to their conversion to the Christian faith. But St. James may refer here to proceedings in a court of justice.

With a gold ring, in goodly apparel] The ring on the finger, and the splendid garb, were proofs of the man's opulence; and his ring, and his coat, not his worth, moral good respect, or the righteousness of his cause, proper respect of which St. James speaks.

There come in also a poor man] In ancient courts of judicature were held in the synagogues, has sufficiently proved, De Vet. Syn. 1. 3. p. 1. c. 6. probable that the case here adduced was one kind; where, of the two parties, one was rich, poor; and the master, or ruler of the synagogue presided in this court, paid particular deference to the rich man, and neglected the poor man; though, as defendants, they were equal in the eye of justice, have been considered so by an impartial judge.

3. Sit here under my footstool] Thus evident the cause, and giving the poor man to see that pect no impartial administration of justice in his

4. Are ye not then partial] Οὐ διακρίθητε. Do a distinction, though the case has not been he law has not decided?

Judges of evil thoughts] Κριταὶ διαλογιστῶν, Judges of evil reasonings; that is, judges who edly. Who, in effect, say in your hearts, We will cause of the rich, because they can befriend neglect that of the poor, because they cannot have they power to hurt us.

5. Hath not God chosen the poor of this world] to refer to Matt. xi. 5. And the poor have been ed to them. These believed on the Lord Jesus a salvation, while the rich despised, neglected, ar Elm. These had that faith in Christ which put warmed and filled; notwithstanding ye give them not those things which are needful to the body; what doth it profit?

17 Even so faith, if it hath not works, is dead, being alone. 18 Yea, a man may say, Thou hast faith, and I have works: show me thy faith without thy works, and I will show thee my faith by my works.

19 Thou believest that there is one God; thou doest well: the devils also believe, and tremble.

20 But wilt thou know, O vain man, that faith without works is dead?

21 Was not Abraham our father justified by works, when he had offered Isaac his son upon the altar?

<sup>a</sup> Or, by itself.—Some copies read, by thy works.—Chap. 3. 13.—a Matt. 8. 10. Mark 1. 24. & 7. Luke 4. 34. Acts 16. 17 & 19. 16.

not to be wondered at, that those who were converted, and saw the absolute necessity of faith, in order to their justification, should have gone into the contrary extreme.

Can faith save him? That is, his profession of faith; for it is not said that he has faith; but that he says, I have faith. St. James probably refers to that faith which simply took in the being and unity of God.—See on ver. 19, 24, 25.

15. If a brother or sister be naked? That is, ill-clothed; for xyφος, naked, has this meaning in several parts of the New Testament; signifying bad clothing, or the want of some particular article of dress.—See Matt. xxv. 36, 38, 43, 44, and John xxi. 7. It has the same comparative signification in most languages.

16. Be ye warmed and filled? Your saying so to them, while you give them nothing, will just profit them as much as your professed faith, without those works which are the genuine fruits of true faith, will profit you in the day when God comes to sit in judgment upon your soul.

17. If it hath not works, is dead? The faith that does not produce works of charity and mercy, is without the living principle which animates all true faith, that is, love to God, and love to man. They had faith, such as a man has who credits a well-circumstanced relation, because it has all the appearance of truth; but they had nothing of that faith that a sinner, convinced of his sinfulness, God's purity, and the strictness of the Divine laws, is obliged to exert in the Lord Jesus, in order to be saved from his sins.

18. Show me thy faith without thy works? Your pretending to have faith, while you have no works of charity or mercy, is utterly vain: for, as faith, which is a principle in the mind, cannot be discerned but by the effects, that is, good works; he, who has no good works, has, presumptively, no faith.

I will show thee my faith by my works. My works of charity and mercy will show, that I have faith; and that it is the living tree, whose root is love to God and man; and whose fruit is the good works here contended for.

19. Thou believest that there is one God? This is the faith in which these persons put their hope of pleasing God, and of obtaining eternal life. Believing in the being and unity of God distinguished them from all the nations of the world; and having been circumcised, and thus brought into the covenant, they thought themselves secure of salvation. The insufficiency of this, St. James immediately shows.

The devils also believe and tremble. It is well to believe, there is one true God; this truth universal nature proclaims. Even the devils believe it; but far from justifying or saving them, it leaves them in their damned state, and every act of it only increases their torment;—φρονουσι, they shudder with horror; they believe and tremble; are increasingly tormented; but they can neither love nor obey.

20. But wilt thou know? Art thou willing to be instructed in the nature of true saving faith? Then attend to the following examples.

21. Was not Abraham our father? Did not the conduct of Abraham, in offering up his son Isaac on the altar, sufficiently prove, that he believed in God, and that it was his faith in Him, that led him to this extraordinary act of obedience.

22. Seest thou how faith wrought? Here is a proof that faith cannot exist without being active in works of righteousness. His faith in God would have been of no avail to him, had it not been manifested by works; for by works, by his obedience to the commands of God, his faith was made perfect; it dictated obedience; he obeyed; and thus faith, ερεκευωθη, had its consummation.—Even true faith will soon die, if its possessor do not live in the spirit of obedience.

23. The Scripture was fulfilled? He believed God; this faith was never inactive; it was accounted to him for righteousness; and being justified by thus believing, his life of obedience showed that he had not received the grace of God in

22. Seest thou how faith wrought with his works? how was faith made perfect?

23. And the scripture was fulfilled which saith, believed God, and it was imputed unto him for righteousness; and he was called the Friend of God.

24. Ye see then how that by works a man is justified, and he shall have life thereby.

25. Likewise also was not Rahab the harlot justified, when she had received the messengers, and had sent them another way?

26. For, as the body without the spirit is dead, so our works is dead also.

vain.—See the notes on Gen. xv. 6. Rom. iv. 3. Gal. 3. This subject is largely explained.

The Friend of God? The highest character ever man. As among friends, every thing is in common: took Abraham into intimate communion with Him, poured out upon him the choicest of His blessings: God can never be in want, because he possesses all: Abraham, His friend, could never be destitute, because he was His friend.

24. Ye see then how? It is evident from this example, that Abraham's faith was not merely believing that there was a God, but a principle that led him to credit God's promises of the future Redeemer, and to implore God's mercy: he was received, and was justified by faith. His faith now work by love; and therefore, he was found ever to be the will of his Maker. He brought forth the fruit of righteousness; and his works justified, proved the genuineness of his faith, and he continued to enjoy the Divine favour, which he could not have done, had he not been thus: for the Spirit of God would have been grieved, and the principle of faith would have perished. Obedience to God is essentially requisite to maintain faith. Faith lives, by works; and works have their being and excellence in faith. Neither can subsist without the other: an apostle which St. James labours to prove, in order to the Antinomians of his time, that their faith was dead, and that the hopes built on it must needs perish.

25. Rahab the harlot? See the notes on Joshua 2. and Heb. xi. 31, &c. Rahab had the approbation of a genuine faith, which she actually possessed; an fullest proof that she did so, by her conduct. As signifies not only the pardon of sin, but receiving approbation; James seems to use the word in this sense. God approved of them, because of their obedience: and He approves of no man who is not obedient.

26. For, as the body without the spirit is dead? There is no more a genuine faith without good works, than there is a living human body without a soul.

We shall never find a series of disinterested works without true faith. And we shall never find true faith without such a life. We may see works of apparent piety without faith: their principle is ostentation. and they can have the reward (human applause) which they may be continued. And yet the experience of the world shows, how short-lived such works are: the principle and spring; they endure for a time, but they are soon away. Where true faith is, there is God; His Spirit and His love affords motives to righteous actions. The more a Divine principle leads to its increase. The more exercises faith in Christ, the more he is enabled to receive the more he believes, the more he receives; and the more he receives, the more able he is to work for God. O his delight, because love to God and man is the principle which his soul lives. Reader, thou professest to be a Christian, both to God and man, by a life conforming to the royal law, which ever gives liberty and confers a blessing: if some persons, known to St. James, must have been men are justified by merely believing in the one God, he would not have taken such pains to confute it: the unity of the Godhead, and the doctrine of a Father and a Son, was that faith through which both the Jews in time, and the Mohammedans of the present day, are justified. St. James, in denying this faith to be of any avail, is accompanied with good works, has said nothing more than what St. Paul has said in other words, Rom. chap. 2. He combats the same Jewish error, and asserts, that hearers, but the doers of the law, will be justified: and that knowledge of God's will, without the performance of it, will not increase our condemnation.—Michaelis.

They are exhorted not to be many masters, 1. And to bridle the tongue, which is often an instrument of much evil. The character and fruits of true and false wisdom, 13—18. [A. M. cir. 4065. A. D. cir. 61. An. Olym. p. 21. A. U. C. cir. 814.]

plus after him. We find a caution against such persons, and of the same nature with that of St. James, in Pirkey Aboth, c. 1. 10. Love labour, and hate the rabbins' office.

This caution is still necessary: there are multitudes whom God has never called, and never can call, because He has never qualified them for the work, who earnestly wish to get into the priest's office. And of this kind, in opposition to St. James, we have many masters: persons who undertake to show us the way of salvation; who know nothing of that way, and are unswayed themselves. These are found among all descriptions of Christians, and have been the means of bringing the ministerial office into contempt. Their case is awful; they shall receive greater condemnation than common sinners: they have not only sinned in thrusting themselves into that office, to which God has never called them; but, through their inefficiency, the flocks, over whom they have assumed the mastery, perish for lack of knowledge; and their blood will God require at the watchman's hand. A man may have this mastery according to the law of the land; and yet not have it according to the Gospel—another may affect to have it according to the Gospel, because he dissents from the religion of the state; and not have it according to Christ. Blockheads are common; and also knaves and hypocrites may be found every where.

2. In many things we offend all] Πρασινοι αναντες, we all stumble, or trip. Dr. Barrow very properly observes, "As the general course of life is called a way, and particular actions steps; so going on in a regular course of right action is walking uprightly; and acting amiss, tripping or stumbling." There are very few who walk so closely with God, and infrequently with men, as never to stumble; and, although it is the privilege of every follower of God to be sincere and without offence to the day of Christ; yet few of them are so. Were this unavoidable, it would be useless to make it a subject of regret; but as every man may receive grace from his sin, to enable him to walk in every respect uprightly, it is to be deplored that so few live up to their privileges. Some have produced these words as a proof that "no man can live without sinning against God; for James himself, a holy apostle, speaking of himself, all the apostles, and the whole church of Christ, says, in many things we offend all." This is a very bad and dangerous doctrine; and, pushed to its consequences, would greatly affect the credibility of the whole Gospel system. Besides, were the doctrine as true as it is dangerous and false, it is foolish to ground it upon such a text; because St. James, after the common mode of all teachers, includes himself in his addresses to his hearers. And were we to suppose, that where he appears, by the use of the plural pronoun, to include himself, he means to be thus understood: we must then grant that himself was one of those many teachers who were to receive a great condemnation, ver. 2.—that he was a horse-breaker, because he says, "we put bits in the horses' mouths, that they may obey us." ver. 3.—that his tongue was a world of iniquity, and set on fire of hell, for he says, "so is the tongue among our members," ver. 6.—that he cursed men: "wherewith curse we men," ver. 9. No man possessing common sense could imagine that James, or any man of even tolerable morals, could be guilty of those things. But some of those were to whom he wrote; and, to soften his reproofs, and to cause them to enter the more deeply into their hearts; he appears to include himself in his own censure. And yet not one of his readers would understand him as being a brother delinquent.

Offend not in word, (the same is a perfect man.) To understand this properly, we must refer to the caution St. James gives in the preceding verse: Be not many masters, or teachers. Do not affect that for which you are not qualified; because, in your teaching, not knowing the heavenly doctrine, ye may sin against the analogy of faith. But, says he, if any man offend not, or κραται, trip not, εν λογος, in doctrine, teaching the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth; the same is τελειος ανηρ, a man fully instructed in Divine things. How often the term λογος, which we render word, is used to express doctrine, and the doctrine of the Gospel, we have seen in many parts of the preceding comment. And how often the word τελειος, which we translate perfect, is used to signify an adult Christian, one thoroughly instructed in the doctrines of the Gospel, may be seen in various parts of St. Paul's writings. See, among others, 1 Cor. ii. 6. xiv. 20. Eph. iv. 13. Phil. iii. 16. Coloss. iv. 12. Heb. v. 14. The man, therefore, who advanced no false doctrine, and gave no imperfect views of any of the great truths of Christianity, that man proved himself thereby to be thoroughly instructed in Divine things; to be no novice, and, consequently, among the many teachers, to be a perfect master, and worthy of the sacred vocation.

Able also to bridle the whole body.] Grotius, by body, believed that the church of Christ was intended; and this, the view we have taken of the preceding clauses, renders very probable. But some think the passions and appetites are intended: yet these persons understand not offending in word, things. Behold, how great a matter a little fire kindleth. 6 And the tongue is a fire, a world of iniquity; so is the tongue among our members, that it defileth the whole body and setteth on fire the course of nature; and it is set on fire of hell.

m Matt. 18. 11, 12, 19, 20. Mark 7. 15, 20, 23.—a Cr. wheat.

as referring simply to well-guarded speech. Now, how a man's cautiousness in what he says, can be a proof that he has every passion and appetite under control, I cannot see. Indeed, I have seen so many examples of a contrary kind, that I can have no doubt of the impropriety of this exposition. But it is objected, "that καταβιβατω signifies to check, turn, or rule with a bridle; and is never applied to the government of the church of Christ." Probably not: but St. James is a very peculiar writer; his phraseology, metaphors, and diction, in general, are different from all the rest of the New Testament writers, so as to have scarcely any thing in common with them, but only that he writes in Greek. The sixth verse is supposed to be a proof against the opinion of Grotius; but I conceive the verse to belong to a different subject, which commences ver. 3.

3. Behold, we put bits in the horses' mouths] In order to show the necessity of regulating the tongue, to which St. James was led by his exhortation to them who wished to thrust themselves into the teacher's office, supposing, because they had the gift of a ready flow of speech, that therefore they might commence teachers of Divine things; he proceeds to show that the tongue must be bridled as the horse, and governed as the ships; because, though it is small, it is capable of ruling the whole man, and of irritating and offending others.

5. Boasteth great things] That is, can do great things, whether of a good or evil kind. He seems to refer here to the powerful and all-commanding eloquence of the Greek orators; they could carry the great mob whithersoever they wished; calm them to peaceableness and submission, or excite them to furious sedition.

Behold, how great a matter] See what a flame of discord and insubordination one man, merely by his persuasive tongue, may kindle among the common people.

6. The tongue is a fire] It is often the instrument of producing the most desperate contentions and insurrections.

A world of iniquity] This is an unusual form of speech; but the meaning is plain enough: world, signifies heat or mass, a great collection, an abundance. We use the term in the same sense, a world of troubles, a world of toil, a world of anxiety; for great troubles, oppressive toil, most distressing anxiety. And one of our lexicographers calls his work A world of words; i. e. a vast collection of words: so we also say, a deluge of wickedness; a sea of troubles; and the Latins, oceanus malorum, an ocean of evils. I do not recollect an example of this use of the word among the Greek writers; but in this sense it appears to be used by the Septuagint, Prov. xvii. 6. Του πικρου βλας ε κοπος των χρηματων, του δε ανιου ουδε οφελος; which may be translated, "The faithful has a world of riches, but the unfaithful not a penny." This clause has nothing answering to it in the Hebrew text. Some think that the word is thus used, 2 Pet. ii. 6. And brought the flood, κοπος αυτων, on the multitude of the ungodly. Mr. Wakefield translates the clause thus: the tongue is the tarnisher of injustice. We have seen that κοπος signifies adorned, elegant, beautiful, &c. but I can scarcely think that this is its sense in this place. The Syriac gives a curious turn to the expression; And the tongue is a fire; and the world of iniquity is like a wood. Above, the same version has, A little fire burns great woods. So the world of iniquity is represented as inflamed by the wicked tongues of men; the world being fuel, and the tongue a fire.

So is the tongue among our members] I think St. James refers here to those well-known speeches of the rabbins: Fayikra Rabba, sect. 16. fol. 150. "Rabbi Eleazar said, Man has one hundred and forty-eight members; some confined, others free. The tongue is placed between the jaws; and from under it proceeds a fountain of water, (the great sublingual salivary gland,) and it is folded with various foldings. Come and see what a flame the tongue kindles!" Were it one of the unconfined members, what would it not do?" The same sentiment, with a little variation, may be found in Midraah, Yalcut Simeoni, par. 2. fol. 107. And in Erachin, fol. xv. 2. on Pass. cxx. 3. What shall be given unto thee? Or, What shall be done unto thee, thou false tongue? "The Holy Blessed God said to the tongue: All the rest of the members of the body are erect, but thou liest down; all the rest are external, but thou art internal. Nor is this enough; I have built two walls about thee; the one bone, the other flesh: What shall be given unto thee? and what shall be done unto thee, O thou false tongue?"

Setteth on fire the course of nature] Ανοιγεται εν προσηοις την γενεαν, and setteth on fire the wheel of life.—I question much whether this verse be in general well understood; there are three different interpretations of it.—1. St. James does not intend to express the whole circle of human affairs, so much affected by the tongue of man; but rather the penal school of the Greeks, and not unknown to the Jews, on which they were accustomed to extend criminals, to induce them to confess, or to punish them for crimes: under which school fire was often placed to add to their torments. In the book De Maccobeeis,

7 For every * kind of beasts, and of birds, and of serpents, and of things in the sea, is tamed, and hath been tamed of * mankind :

8 But the tongue can no man tame; it is an unruly evil, full of deadly poison.

9 Therewith bless we God, even the Father; and therewith curse we men, * which are made after the similitude of God. 10 Out of the same mouth proceedeth blessing and cursing. My brethren, these things ought not so to be.

attributed to Josephus, and found in Haverkamp's edition, Vol. II. p. 497—520, where we have the account of the martyrdom of seven Hebrew brothers, in chap. 9; speaking of the death of the eldest, it is said, Ασφάλας αὐτῶν ἐπὶ τῷ τροχῷ—ἐπὶ ὧν ἐστρατιωνεύουσιν—“They cast him on the wheel, over which they extended him; ἐπὶ ὑπερβύσσῳ καὶ ἀδύρῳ τῶν τροχῶν προσηκτικαταστρατιωνεύουσιν; they put coals under it, and strongly agitated the wheel.” And of the martyrdom of the sixth brother, it is said, cap. 11. Παύρος καὶ τὸν τροχόν, ἐπ’ οὗ καταστρατιωνεύουσιν κηλέως καὶ ἀκροβόλοισι φέροντες ὅτι ἐκ αὐτοῦ, καὶ οὐβλίσεως δὲ οὐκ ἐπὶ πρῶσιν αὐτῶν, τοῖς νεύουσιν προσηκτικῶν, καὶ τὰ κλεψιδαιόμενα; ἀνοῦν, καὶ τὰ ἀπάλυττα δίσκατοι; “they brought him to the wheel; on which having distended his limbs, and broken his joints, they scorched him with the fire placed underneath; and, with sharp spits seated in the fire, they pierced his sides, and burned his bowels.”

The fire and the wheel are mentioned by Achilles Tatius, lib. 7. p. 449. “Having stripped me of my garments, I was carried aloft, τῶν μὲν ματιῶν κομίζωντων τὸν δὲ ὑπὸ καὶ τροχῶν, some bringing scourges, others the fire and the wheel.” Now, as γυνοῖς often signifies life, then the wheel of life will signify the miseries and torments of life. To set on fire the wheel of life, is to increase a man's torments; and to be set on fire from hell, implies having these miseries rendered more active by diabolic agency; or, in other words, bad men, instigated by the devil, through their lies and calumnies, make life burthensome to the objects of their malicious tongues. The wheel and the fire, so pointedly mentioned by St. James, makes it probable that this sort of punishment might have suggested the idea to him. See more in Kypke.

2. But is it not possible that, by the wheel of life, St. James may have the circulation of the blood in view. Angry or irritating language has an astonishing influence on the circulation of the blood: the heart beats high and frequent; the blood is hurried through the arteries to the veins, through the veins to the heart, and through the heart to the arteries again, and so on; an extraordinary degree of heat is at the same time engendered; the eyes become more prominent in their sockets, the capillary vessels suffused with blood, the face flushed; and, in short, the whole wheel of nature is set on fire of hell. No description can be more natural than this; but it may be objected that this intimates that the circulation of the blood was known to St. James—now supposing it does, is the thing impossible? It is allowed by some of the most judicious medical writers, that Solomon refers to this in his celebrated portraiture of old age, Eccles. xii. particularly in ver. 6. “Or over the silver cord be loosed, or the golden bowl be broken, or the pitcher be broken at the fountain, or the wheel broken at the cistern.” Here is the very wheel of life from which St. James might have borrowed the idea; and the different terms evidently refer to the circulation of the blood, which might be as well known to St. James as the doctrine of the parallax of the sun.—See on chap. i. 17.

3. It is true, however, that the rabbins use the term לִבְיָדָה גִּילְגַל תּוֹלְדוֹת, “the wheel of generations,” to mark the successive generations of men: and it is possible that St. James might refer to this; as if he had said, “the tongue has been the instrument of confusion and misery through all the ages of the world.” But the other interpretations are more likely.

7. Every kind of beasts] That is, every species of wild beasts, κατὰ φύσιν θηρίων, is tamed; i. e. brought under man's power and dominion. Beasts, birds, serpents, and some kinds of fishes, have been tamed so as to be domesticated; but every kind, particularly τῶν ἀναλίων, of sea monsters, has not been thus tamed; but all have been subjected to the power of man; both the shark and whale become an easy prey to the skill and influence of the human being.

8. But the tongue can no man tame] No cunning, persuasion, or influence, has ever been able to silence it. Nothing but the grace of God, excision, or death, can bring it under subjection.

It is an unruly evil] Ακαταράχτων ἔκων, an evil that cannot be restrained; it cannot be brought under any kind of government; it breaks all bounds.

Full of deadly poison] He refers here to the tongues of serpents, supposed to be the means of conveying their poison into wounds made by their teeth. Throughout the whole of this poetic and highly declamatory description, St. James must have the tongue of the slanderer, calumniator, backbiter, whisperer, and talebearer, particularly in view. Vipers, basilisks, and rattlesnakes, are not more dangerous to life than these are to the peace and reputation of men.

9. Therewith bless we God] The tongue is capable of rehearsing the praises, and setting forth the glories of the eternal King; what a pity that it should ever be employed in a contrary work! It can proclaim and vindicate God, and publish the Gospel of peace and good men; what a pity that it should ever be employed in backbiting, calumny, or in the cause of infidelity! And therewith curse we men] In the true sense many pray to God the Father to destroy those who of their displeasure! These are the common execrations mouths are generally full of direful imprecations with whom they are offended.

The consideration that man is made after the image of God, should restrain the tongue of the swearer; but the man who, while they pretend to sing the high praises, ready to wish the direst imprecations on those who offend them, or with whom they choose to be offended.

10. Out of the same mouth] This saying is seen in that, Prov. xviii. 21. Death and life are in the tongue; and on this, for an illustration of St. James hear Yaqirra Rabbi, sect. 33. “Rabbi Simeon Gamallel, said to his servant Tobias, Go and bring good food from the market: the servant went, and brought him good food; the master said, What is the reason ordered thee to buy me good and bad food, thou tongue? The servant answered, From the tongue and evil come to man: if it be good, there is not if bad, there is nothing worse.”

A saying very like that of St. James is found in claus, fol. 10. 4.—“The mouth desires to study and to speak good words; to praise God, to glorify to celebrate Him with hymns: but it can also siphona, reproach, and swear falsely.”—See Scholes.

To find a man who officiates in sacred things more sweeter, a slanderer, &c. is truly monstrous have been many cases of this kind; and I have read. Let me say to all such, My brethren, these are not so to be.

11. Doth a fountain send forth—sweet water and bitter? In many things nature is a sure guide to man; inconsistency is found in the natural world as well and cursing in man. No fountain, at the same opening, send forth sweet water and bitter: no fig-tree can bear figs; no vine can bear figs; nor can the sea produce and fresh from the same place. These are all contradictions and indeed impossibilities, in nature.—And it is man alone that can act the monstrous part already mentioned.

12. So can no fountain both yield salt water and sweet. For the reading of the common text, which is οὐ δύναται ἀλλὰ καὶ γλυκὴν ποιεῖσαι ὕδαρ, so no fountain can produce salt water and sweet, there are various other in the MSS. and Versions. The word οὐτος, εἶ, is this a continuation of the comparison in ver. 11. In ABC. one other, with the Armenian and ancient Syriac Syriac has it in the margin, with an asterisk five others, with the Coptic, Vulgate, one copy and Cyril, have οὐτε ἀλτικὸν γλυκὸν ποιεῖσαι ὕδαρ, salt water produce sweet. In the Syriac and the Erpen it is, So likewise, sweet water cannot be and bitter water cannot become sweet. The true appears to be, Neither can salt water produce sweet can the sea produce fresh water; and this is a nonsense, and not an inference from that in ver. 11. Griesbach has admitted into the text; and of White, in his Criseus, says, Lectio indubidè g reading undoubtedly genuine. There are, therefore, distinct comparisons here.—1. A fountain can produce sweet water and bitter. 2. A fig-tree cannot produce berries. 3. A vine cannot produce figs. 4. Salt cannot be made sweet. That is, according to the ordinance of nature, these things are impossible. Chemical out of the question.

13. Who is a wise man] One truly religious; who he can neither bridle nor tame other men's tongues, nor strain his own.

And ended with knowledge] Καὶ ἐπισημῶν, to teach others.

Let him show] Let him, by a holy life and chastity, show, through meekness and gentleness, his Divine information, that he is a Christian indeed; and his spirit proving that God is in him of a truth from the fullness of a holy heart, his feet walk in righteousness, and his tongue speaks. We may learn from his gentleness is ever accompanied with meekness. These proud, overhearing, and did who pass for great scholars and eminent critics of learning; but they have not wisdom. If ye have bitter envying and strife) If ye be under the influence of an unkind, fierce, and contemptuous spirit, even while attempting, or pretending, to defend, true religion; do not boast either of your exertions or success in silencing an adversary: ye have no religion, and no true wisdom; and, to profess either, is to be against the truth.

Be calm in arguing, for fierceness makes error a fault, and truth discovery: Why should I feel another man's mistake more than his riches or his poverty? In love I should: but anger is not love; Nor wisdom neither; therefore, g-e-n-t-l-y m-o-d-e.

15. This wisdom descendeth not from above) God is not the Author of it, because it is bitter, not meek—See at the end of this chapter.

In earthly) Having this life only in view. Sensual) Vexat, animal; having for its object the gratification of the passions and animal propensities.

Devilish) Διαβολικῶς, demoniacal, inspired by demons, and maintained in the soul by their indwelling influence.

16. For where envying and strife is) Ζηλος και επιβηη, zeal, very inflammatory passion and contention; alterations about different points of the law, of no use for edification: such as those mentioned Tit. iii. 9. The Jews were the most intolerant of all mankind: it was a maxim with them to kill those who would not conform to their law; and their salvation they believed to be impossible. This has been the spirit of popery, and of the Romish church at large: in vain do they attempt to deny it; they have written it in characters of blood and fire, even in this country, (England,) when they were possessed of political power. With them it is still an established maxim, that, out of their church there is no redemption; and fire and fogot have been, in that church, legal means of conversion or extinction. In the short popish reign of Mary, in this country, besides multitudes who suffered by fire, imprisonment, confiscation, &c. two hundred and seventy-seven were burnt alive; among whom were one archbishop, four bishops, twenty-one clergymen, eight lay gentlemen, eighty-four tradesmen, one hundred husbandmen, fifty-five women, and four children! O earth, thou hast not drunk their blood; but their ashes have been strewed on the face of the field.

17. The wisdom that is from above) The pure religion of the Lord Jesus, bought by His blood, and infused by his spirit.—See the rabbinical meaning of this phrase at the end of this chapter.

In first pure) ἁγνη, chaste, holy, and clean. Peaceable) Εἰρηνικη, living in peace with others, and promoting peace among men.

Gentle) Εἰρηνη, meek, modest, of an equal mind, taking every thing in good part, and putting the best construction upon all the actions of others.

Easy to be entreated) Ευπειθεῖς, not stubborn nor obstinate; peaceable, gentle, and easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good fruits, without partiality, and without hypocrisy.

18 And the fruit of righteousness is sown in peace of them that make peace.

4 Or, without wrangling.—Rom. 12.9. 1 Pet. 3.10.—1 John 3.10.—1 Prov. 11. 18. Heb. 10.12. Mat. 5.9. Phil. 1.11. Heb. 12.11.

of a yielding disposition in all indifferent things; obsequious, docile:—

Full of mercy) Ready to pass by a transgression, and to grant forgiveness to those who offend; and performing every possible act of kindness.

Good fruits) Each temper and disposition producing fruits suited to, and descriptive of, its nature.

Without partiality) Αδιαφοροῖς, without making a difference, rendering to every man his due; and being never swayed by self-interest, worldly honour, or the fear of man; knowing no man after the flesh.—One of the Itala has it irreprensibile.

Without hypocrisy) Ἀνεπιβεβητοῖς, without dissimulation; without pretending to be what it is not; acting always in its own character; never working under a mask. Seeking nothing but God's glory; and using no other means to attain it than those of His own prescribing.

18. And the fruit of righteousness is sown) The whole is the principle of righteousness in the soul; and all the above virtues are the fruits of that righteousness.

Is sown in peace) When the peace of God rules the heart, all these virtues and graces grow and flourish abundantly.

Of these that make peace) The peace-makers are continually recommending this wisdom to others; and their own conduct is represented as a sowing of heavenly seed, which brings forth Divine fruit. Perhaps sowing in peace signifies sowing prosperously, being very successful. This is not only the proper disposition for every teacher of the Gospel, but for every professed follower of the Lord Jesus.

Some render this verse, which is confessedly obscure, thus.—And the peaceable fruits of righteousness are sown for the practitioners of peace. He who labours to live peaceably, shall have peace for his reward.

1. Almost the whole of the preceding chapter is founded on maxims highly accredited in the rabbinical writings; and, without a reference to those writings, it would have been impossible, in some cases, to have understood St. James's meaning. There is one phrase, the rabbinical meaning and use of which I have reserved for this place: viz. The wisdom that is from above. This is greatly celebrated among them by the terms חכמה שמימי, choemah diliana, the supernal wisdom. This they seem to understand to be a peculiar inspiration of the Almighty; or a teaching communicated immediately by the angels of God. In Sedar, Yalcut Rubeni, fol. 19. Rabbi Chiya said, The wisdom from above was in Adam more than in the supreme angels; and he knew all things.

In Sedar Chadaah, fol. 36. it is said, concerning Enoch, "That the angels were sent from heaven, and taught him the wisdom that is from above." Ibid. fol. 42. 4. "Solomon came, and he was perfect in all things, and strongly set forth the praises of the wisdom that is from above."—See more in Schoetgen. St. James gives us the properties of this wisdom, which are not to be found in such detail in any of the rabbinical writers. It is another word for the life of God in the soul of man, or true religion: it is the teaching of God in the human heart; and he who has this is not a child of God: for it is written, All thy children shall be taught of the Lord.

2. To enjoy the peace of God in the conscience, and to live to promote peace among men, is to answer the end of our creation; and to enjoy as much happiness ourselves, as the present state of things can afford. They who are in continual broils, live a wretched life; and they who love the life of the salamander, must share no small portion of the demoniacal nature. In domestic society such persons are an evil disease; therefore a canker in the church; and a pest in the state.

NOTES.—Verse 1. From whence come wars and fightings) about the time in which St. James wrote, whether we follow the early or the latter date of this epistle, we find, according to the accounts given by Josephus, Bell. Jud. lib. ii. c. 17, &c. that the Jews, under pretence of defending their religion, and recurring that liberty, to which they believed themselves entitled, made various insurrections in Judea against the Romans: which occasioned much bloodshed and misery to their nation. The factions also, into which the Jews were split, and violent contentions among themselves, in which they massacred and plundered each other. In the provinces, likewise, the Jews became very turbulent; particularly in Alexandria, and different other parts of Egypt, of Syria, and other places, where they made war against the heathens, killing many, and being massacred in their turn. They were led to these outrages by the opinion, that they were bound by their law to extricate idolatry, and to kill all those who would not become proselytes to Judaism. These are probably the wars and fightings to which St. James alludes: and which they undertook rather from a principle of covetousness than from any sincere desire to convert the heathen.—See Macknight. Come they not hence—of your lusts) This was the principle from which these Jewish contentions and predatory wars proceeded; and the principle from which all the wars th-

4 * Ye adulterers and adulteresses, know ye not that the friendship of the world is enmity with God? Whosoever, therefore, will be a friend of the world is the enemy of God.

5 Do ye think that the scripture saith in vain, The spirit that dwelleth in us lusteth to envy.

6 But he giveth more grace. Wherefore he saith, God resisteth the proud, but giveth grace unto the humble.

have afflicted and desolated the world have proceeded. One nation or king covets another's territory or property; and, as conqueror is supposed to give right to all the possessions gained by it, they kill, slay, burn, and destroy, till one is overcome or exhausted; and then, the other makes his own terms; or, several neighbouring potentates fall upon one that is weak; and, after murdering one half of the people, partition among themselves the fallen king's territory; just as the Austrians, Prussians, and Russians, have done with the kingdom of Poland!—a stain upon their justice and policy, which no lapse of time can ever wash out.

These wars and fightings could not be attributed to the Christians in that time; for, howsoever fallen or degenerate, they had no power to raise contentions; and no political consequence to enable them to resist their enemies by the edge of the sword, or resistance of any kind.

2. Ye lust, and have not] Ye are ever coveting, and ever poor.

Ye kill, and desire to have] Ye are constantly engaged in insurrections and predatory wars, and never gain any advantage.

Ye have not, because ye ask not.] Ye get no especial blessing from God, as your fathers did; because ye do not pray. Worldly good is your god; ye leave no stone unturned in order to get it; and as ye ask nothing from God but to consume it upon your evil desires and propensities, your prayers are not heard.

3. Ye ask, and receive not] Some think that this refers to their prayers for the conversion of the heathen; and, on the pretence that they were not converted thus, they thought it lawful to extirpate them, and possess their goods.

Ye ask amiss] Κακος αιτιωθε, ye ask evilly; wickedly. Ye have not the proper dispositions of prayer; and ye have an improper object. Ye ask for worldly prosperity, that ye may employ it in riotous living. This is properly the meaning of the original; λεω εν ταις ηδοναις κατανασκειν. That ye may expend it upon your pleasures. The Rabbins have many good observations on asking amiss, or asking improperly; and give examples of different kinds of this sort of prayer: the phrase is Jewish, and would naturally occur to St. James in writing on this subject. Whether the lusting of which St. James speaks, were their desire to make proselytes, in order that they might increase their power and influence by means of such; or, whether it were a desire to cast off the Roman yoke, and become independent; the motive and the object were the same; and the prayers were such as God could not hear.

4. Ye adulterers and adulteresses] The Jews, because of their covenant with God, are represented as being espoused to Him; and hence their idolatry and their iniquity, in general, is represented under the notion of adultery. And although they had not, since the Babylonish captivity, been guilty of idolatry, according to the letter; yet what is intended by idolatry, having their hearts estranged from God, and seeking their portion in this life, and out of God, is that of which the Jews were then notoriously guilty. And I rather think that it is in this sense, especially, that St. James uses the words. "Lo! they that are from Thee shall perish; Thou hast destroyed all them that go a whoring from Thee." But, perhaps something more than spiritual adultery is intended.— See ver. 9.

The friendship of the world] The world was their god: here they committed their spiritual adultery; and they cultivated this friendship in order that they might gain this end.

The word πορνικαίς, adulteresses, is wanting in the Syriac, Coptic, Ethiopic, Armenian, Vulgate, and one copy of the Itala.

Whosoever will be a friend of the world] How strange it is that people professing Christianity can suppose that with a worldly spirit, worldly companions, and their lives governed by worldly maxims, they can be in the favour of God, or ever get to the kingdom of heaven! When the world gets into the church, the church becomes a painted sepulchre; its spiritual vitality being extinct.

5. Do ye think that the scripture saith in vain] This verse is exceedingly obscure. We cannot tell what Scripture St. James refers to: many have been produced by learned men, as that which he had particularly in view. Some think, Gen. vi. 5. "Every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually." Gen. viii. 21. "The imagination of man's heart is evil from his youth." Numb. xi. 29. "Moses said unto him, Enviest thou for my sake?" and Prov. xxi. 10. "The soul of the wicked desireth evil." None of these Scriptures, nor any others contain the precise words in this verse;

7 Submit yourselves therefore to God. * Resist the he will flee from you.

8 Draw nigh to God, and he will draw nigh to you. your hands, ye sinners; and purify your hearts, ye sinners.

9 Be afflicted, and mourn, and weep: let your voices be turned to mourning, and your joy to heaviness.

10 Humble yourselves in the sight of the Lord, and lift you up.

* Job 22. 6. Ps. 122. 6. Prov. 3. 24. & 29. 25. Mat. 23. 12. Luke 11. 16. 1 Pet. 3. 5. — Eph. 4. 22. & 3. 11. 1 Pet. 5. 5. — † 2 Chron. 15. 2. — ‡ 1. 12. 1 John 2. 3. — § Ch. 1. 8. — ¶ Mat. 5. 1. — † 1 John 2. 12. 18. 14. 1 Pet. 5. 6.

and, therefore, St. James may probably refer not to particular vices, but to the spirit and design of the in those various places where it speaks against contentousness, worldly associations, &c. &c.

Perhaps the words in this and the two succeeding may be well paraphrased, thus:—"Do ye think that in these things the Scripture speaks falsely, or that Spirit which dwelleth in us can excite us to envy of one being contented with the state in which the prov God has placed us? Nay, far otherwise; for He gives grace to enable us to bear the ills of life, and to lie in millity at His feet, knowing that His Holy Spirit has settled in us. God resisteth the proud; but giveth grace to the humble. Seeing these things are so, submit yourselves to resist the Devil, who would tempt you to envy, and he from you: draw nigh to God, and he will draw nigh to you."

I must leave this sense as the best I can give, without asserting that I have hit the true meaning. There is no in Europe, who has considered the passage, that has puzzled with it. I think the 5th verse should be understood as giving a contrary sense to that in our translation genuine Christian is a habitation of the Holy Ghost; Spirit, προς φθονος αιτιωθε, excites strong desires envy; therefore, a man must not suppose that he is tian, if he have an envious or covetous heart.

6. But he giveth more grace] Μεγαλα χάρις, a gift more than all the goods that the world can bestow; for genuine happiness, and thus the world cannot confer this be St. James's meaning? God resisteth the proud] Αντιστασεται, sets himself array against him.

Draw nigh to the humble] The sure way to please is to submit to the dispensations of His grace and providence and when a man acknowledges Him in all his ways direct all His steps. The covetous man grasps at the and loses the substance.

7. Submit—[to God] Continue to bow to all His and to all His dispensations.

Resist the devil] He cannot conquer you, if you to resist. Strong as he is, God never permits him to the man who continues to resist him. He cannot force man will. He who, in the terrible name of Jesus, even the devil himself, is sure to have a speedy and conquest. He flees from that Name, and from His coblood.

8. Draw nigh to God] Approach Him in the name by faith and prayer, and He will draw nigh to you, meet you at your coming. When a soul sets out to God sets out to meet that soul; so that while we are near to Him, He is drawing near to us. There is a and beauty in these expressions, that are but seldom Cleanse your hands, ye sinners] This I think to be ginning of a new address, and to different persons; and have formed the commencement of a new verse.

What conduct be changed; cease to do evil, learn to Washing, or cleansing the hands, was a token of in and purity.

Purify your hearts] Separate yourselves from the and consecrate yourselves to God: this is the true sanctification. We have often seen, that to sanctify, to separate a thing or person from profane or common and consecrate it or him to God. This is the true notion καθαρος, in Hebrew, and αφαιρος, in Greek. The purifying thus consecrated, or separated, is considered to and to be God's property; and then God allows it to There are, therefore, two things implied in a man's sanctification.—1. That he separates himself from evil ways companions, and devotes himself to God. 2. That G rates guilt from his conscience, and sin from his soul, makes him internally and externally holy.

This double sanctification is well expressed in Romans fol. 33. col. 132. on the words, Be ye holy, for I the I holy: ירום קודש ענינו כולנוה ארר מללעדי. sanctifies himself on the earth, and then he is sanctified heaven. As a man is a sinner, he must have his cleaned from wicked works; as he is double-minded must have his heart sanctified. Sanctification be the heart, because of pollution of mind; cleansing be the hands, because of sinful acts.—See the note on cl for the signification of double-minded.

9. Be afflicted and mourn] Without true and deep ance, ye cannot expect the mercy of God.

Let your laughter be turned to mourning] It most evidently, that many of those, to whom S. James

11. Speak not evil one of another, brethren. He that speaketh evil of his brother, and judgeth his brother, speaketh evil of the law, and judgeth the law: but if thou judge the law, thou art not a doer of the law, but a judge.

12. There is one lawgiver, who is able to save and to destroy: who art thou that judgest another?

13. Go to now, ye that say, To-day or to-morrow we will go into such a city, and continue there a year, and buy and sell, and get gain:

Epistle to the Romans 13. 1 Peter 2. 1. Matthew 7. 1. Luke 6. 39. Romans 2. 1. 1 Cor. 5. 2. Matthew 10. 23. Roman 14. 4, 12. Luke 12. 16, 26. Or, 27. 11.

and this epistle had lived a very irregular and dissolute life. He had already spoken of their lusts and pleasures, and he had called them adulterers and adulteresses; and perhaps they were so in the grossest sense of the words. He speaks here of their laughter, and their joy—and all the terms, taken together, show that a dissolute life is intended. What a strange view must he have of the nature of primitive Christianity, who supposes that these words can possibly have been addressed to a people professing the Gospel of Jesus Christ, who were few in number, without wealth or consequence; and were persecuted and oppressed both by their brethren the Jews, and by the Romans!

10. Humble yourselves in the sight of the Lord. In verse 7. they were exhorted to submit to God; here they are exhorted to humble themselves in his sight. Submission to God's authority will precede humiliation of soul; and genuine repentance is performed as in the sight of God; for, when a sinner is truly awakened to a sense of his guilt and danger, he seems to see, whither he turns, the face of a justly incensed God turned against him.

He shall lift you up. Mourners and penitents lay on the ground, and rolled themselves in the dust. When comforted and pardoned, they arose from the earth, shook themselves from the dust, and clothed themselves in their better garments. God promises to raise these from the dust, when sufficiently humbled.

11. Speak not evil one of another. Perhaps this exhortation refers to evil speaking, slander, and backbiting in general; he writes having no particular persons in view. It may, however, refer to the contentions among the zealous, and different actions then prevailing among this wretched people; or to their calumnies against those of their brethren who had embraced the Christian faith.

He that speaketh evil of his brother. It was an avowed and very general maxim among the rabbins, that "no one could speak evil of his brother without denying God and becoming an atheist." They consider detraction as the devil's crime originally: he calumniated God Almighty in the words, "He hath known that in the day in which ye eat of it, your eyes shall be opened, and ye shall be like God, knowing good and evil;" and, therefore, insinuated that it was through envy God had rubricated the tree of knowledge.

Speaketh evil of the law. The law condemns all evil speaking and detraction. He who is guilty of these, and allows himself in these vices, in effect judges, and condemns the law; or, he considers it unworthy to be kept; and that it is no sin to break it.

Thou art not a doer of the law, but a judge. Thou rejectest the law of God, and settest up thy own mischievous conduct as rule of life; or, by allowing this evil speaking and detraction, dost intimate that the law that condemns them is improper, imperfect, or unjust.

12. There is one lawgiver. Kai epistis, and judge, is added here by A.B., about thirty others; with both the Syriac, Arabic, Coptic, Armenian, Ethiopic, Slavonic, sigla, two copies of the Rala, Cyril of Antioch, Euthalius, Theophylact and Cassiodorus. On this evidence Griesbach has received it into the text.

The man who breaks the law, and teaches others so to do, is in effect sets himself up as a lawgiver and judge. But here is only one such Lawgiver and Judge—God Almighty—who is able to save all those who obey Him; and able to destroy all those who trample under feet His testimonies.

Who art thou that judgest another? Who art thou who dares to usurp the office and prerogative of the Supreme Judge? What is that law of which St. James speaks? and who is his Lawgiver and Judge? Most critics think that the law mentioned here is the same as that which is elsewhere called the royal law, and the law of liberty; thereby meaning the Gospel: and that Christ is the Person who is called the Lawgiver and Judge. This, however, is not clear to me: I believe it means the Jewish law; and by the Lawgiver and Judge, God Almighty, as acknowledged by the Jewish people. And, or 'think I find, from the closest examination of this epistle, but few references to Jesus Christ, or His Gospel. His Jewish creed, forms, and maxims, this writer keeps constantly in view; and it is proper he should, considering the persons to whom he wrote. Some of them were, doubtless, Christians—some of them certainly no Christians—and some of them all Christians and half Jews. The two latter descriptions of these were most frequently addressed.

13. Go to now! Aye vos, Come now, the same in meaning as the Hebrew, hazabab, come, Gen. xi. 3, 4, 7. Come, and eat what I have to say, ye that say, &c. To-day, or to-morrow we will go. This presumption on a 14. Whereas ye know not what shall be on the morrow. For what is your life? It is even a vapour, that appeareth for a little time, and then vanisheth away.

15. For that ye ought to say, If the Lord will we shall live, and do this, or that.

16. But now ye rejoice in your boastings: do all such rejoicing is evil.

17. Therefore to him that knoweth to do good, and doeth it not, to him it is sin.

Job 7. 7, Psa. 102. 3, Chap. 110. 1. Psal. 104. 1. John 2. 17. Acts 16. 21. 1 Cor. 4. 16. & 16. 7. Heb. 6. 3. 1 Cor. 13. 6. Luke 12. 47. John 9. 41. & 15. 22. Rom. 1. 29, 31. & 2. 17, 18, 23.

precarious life is here well reprov'd; and the ancient Jewish rabbins have some things on the subject, which probably St. James had in view. In Debarim Rabbah, sect. 9. fol. 261. 1. we have the following little story:—“Our rabbins tell us a story, which happened in the days of Rabbi Simeon, the son of Chelphatha. He was present at the circumcision of a child, and staid with its father to the entertainment. The father brought out wine for his guests, that was seven years old, saying, With this wine will I continue for a long time to celebrate the birth of my new-born son. They continued supper till midnight. At that time, Rabbi Simeon arose and went out, that he might return to the city in which he dwelt. On the way he saw the angel of death walking up and down. He said to him, Who art thou? He answered, I am the messenger of God. The rabbin said, Why wanderest thou about thus? He answered, I slay those persons who say, We will do this, or that, and think not how soon death may overpower them: that man with whom thou hast supped, and who said to his guests, With this wine will I continue for a long time, to celebrate the birth of my new-born son, behold the end of his life is at hand, for he shall die within thirty days.” By this parable they teach the necessity of considering the shortness and uncertainty of human life—and that God is particularly displeas'd with those—

“Who, counting on long years of pleasure here, Are quite unfurnished for a world to come.”

We will—continue there a year, and buy and sell This was the custom of those ancient times; they traded from city to city, carrying their goods on the backs of camels. The Jews traded thus to Tyre, Sidon, Cæsarea, Cræte, Ephesus, Philippi, Thessalonica, Corinth, Rome, &c. and it is to this kind of itinerant mercantile life that St. James alludes. See at the end of this chapter.

14. Whereas ye know not! This verse should be read in a parenthesis. It is not only impious, but grossly absurd, to speak thus concerning futurity, when ye know not what a day may bring forth. Life is utterly precarious; and God has not put it within the power of all the creatures He has made, to command one moment of what is future.

It is even a vapour. Αρπυς γαρ εστι, it is a smoke, always fleeting, uncertain, evanescent, and obscured with various trials and afflictions. This is a frequent metaphor with the Hebrews; see Psa. cii. 11. My days are like a shadow; Job viii. 9. Our days upon earth are a shadow; 1 Chron. xxix. 16. Our days on the earth are a shadow, and there is no abiding. Quid tam æreum est, tam breve, quam hominis vita longissima, Plin. l. iii. Ep. 7. “What is so circumscribed, or so short, as the longest life of man?” “All flesh is grass, and all the goodness thereof is as the flower of the field. The grass withereth, and the flower fadeth, because the breath of the Lord bloweth upon it. Surely the people is like grass.” St. James had produced the same figure, chap. i. 10. 11. But there is a very remarkable saying in the book of Ecclesiasticus, which should be quoted—“As of the green leaves of a thick tree, some fall and some grow; so is the generation of flesh and blood, one cometh to an end, and another is born.” Eccle. xiv. 18.

We find precisely the same image in Homer as that quoted above. Did the apocryphal writer borrow it from the Greek poet?

*Οιη περ φυλλον γεννη, τοιηδε και ανθρωπον
Φυλλα τα μεν τραπεμοι χαμαδις χειρι, αλλα δε θβλη
Τηλεθωσσοα φει, ταρος δ' επιγειγενται ωλη.
Ως ανθρωπον γεννη, η μεν φει, η θ' απολυται.*

Il. l. vi. v. 146.

Like leaves on trees, the race of man is found,
Now green in youth, now withering on the ground
Another race the following spring supplies;
They fall successive, and successive rise.
So generations in their course decay;
So flourish these, when those are pass'd away.

Poa.

15. For that ye ought to say! Αντι του λεγειν υμας Instead of saying; or, instead of which ye should say,

If the Lord will, we shall live! I think St. James had another example from the rabbins in view, which is produced by Drusius, Gregory, Carterwright, and Schoellgen on this clause:—“The bride went up to her chamber, not knowing what was to befall her there.” On which there is this comment:—“No man should ever say that he will do this or that, without the condition of God's will. A certain man said, ‘To-morrow shall I sit with my bride in my chamber, and there shall rejoice with her.’ To which some standing by said, ישעיהו ישיב אתו למחר In poster ha sham—‘If the Lord will.’ To which he answered, ‘Whither the Lord will or not, to-morrow will I sit with my bride in my chamber.’ He did so; he went with your fields, which is of you kept back by fraud, crieth: and the cries of them which have reaped are entered into the ears of the Lord of sabaoth.

5 Ye have lived in pleasure on the earth, and been wanton; ye have nourished your hearts, as in a day of slaughter.

6 Ye have condemned and killed the just; and he doth not resist you.

7 Be patient, therefore, brethren, unto the coming of the Lord. Behold, the husbandman waiteth for the precious fruit of the earth, and hath long patience for it, until he receive the early and latter rain.

8 Be ye also patient; establish your hearts: for the coming of the Lord draweth nigh.

9 Grudge not one against another, brethren, lest ye be condemned: behold, the judge standeth before the door.

in his wages. And on these laws and threatenings is built what we read in Synopsis Schar, p. 100. n. 45. "When a poor man does any work in a house, the vapour proceeding from him, through the severity of his work, ascends towards heaven. Wo to his employer, if he delay to pay him his wages." To this James seems particularly to allude, when he says, The cries of them who have reaped are entered into the ears of the Lord of hosts: and the rabbins say, "The vapour arising from the sweat of the hard-worked labourer, ascends up before God." Both images are sufficiently expressive.

The Lord of sabaoth St. James often conceives in Hebrew, though he writes in Greek. It is well known that אֱלֹהֵינוּ יְהוָה Yehowah Tsebaoth, Lord of hosts, or Lord of armies, is a frequent appellation of God in the Old Testament; and signifies His uncontrollable power, and the infinitely numerous means He has for governing the world, and defending His followers, and punishing the wicked.

5. Ye have lived in pleasure Εὐφροσαστε, ye have lived luxuriously; feeding yourselves without fear, pampering the flesh.

And been wanton Ἐγκαταλείπετε, ye have lived lasciviously. Ye have indulged all your sinful and sensual appetites to the uttermost; and your lives have been scandalous.

Ye have nourished your hearts ἐβουλεύεσθε, ye have fattened your hearts, and have rendered them incapable of feeling: as in a day of slaughter, ἡμέρα θύματος, a day of sacrifice, where many victims are offered at once, and where the people feast upon the sacrifices; many, no doubt, turning, on that occasion, a holy ordinance into a riotous festival.

6. Ye have condemned and killed the just; and he doth not resist you.] Several by τῶν δικαίων, the just one, understand Jesus Christ, who is so called, Acts iii. 14. vii. 52. xxii. 14. But the structure of the sentence, and the connexion in which it stands, seems to require that we should consider this as applying to the just or righteous in general, who were persecuted and murdered by those oppressive rich men; and their death was the consequence of their dragging them before the judgment seats, chap. ii. 6. where having no influence, and none to plead their cause, they were unjustly condemned and executed.

And he doth not resist you] In this, as in τῶν δικαίων, the just, there is an allusion of the singular for the plural number. And in the word οὐκ ἀντιτάσσεται, he doth not resist, the idea is included of defence in a court of justice. These poor righteous people had none to plead their cause: and if they had, it would have been useless, as their oppressors had all power, and all influence; and those who sat on these judgment seats were lost to all sense of justice and right. Some think that he doth not resist you should be referred to God; as if he had said, God permits you to go on in this way at present; but He will shortly awake to judgment, and destroy you as enemies of truth and righteousness.

7. Be patient, therefore] Because God is coming to execute judgment on this wicked people; therefore, be patient till He comes. He seems here to refer to the coming of the Lord to execute judgment on the Jewish nation, which shortly afterwards took place.

The husbandman waiteth] The seed of your deliverance is already sown; and by and by the harvest of your salvation will take place. God's counsels will ripen in due time.

The early and latter rain] The rain of seed-time; and the rain of ripening before harvest: the first fell in Judea, about the beginning of November, after the seed was sown; and the second, towards the end of April, when the ears were filling; and this prepared for a full harvest. Without these two rains, the earth would have been unfruitful. These God had promised: I will give you the rain of your land in his due season, the first rain and the latter rain, that thou mayest gather in thy corn, and thy wine, and thy oil, Deut. xi. 14. But, for these they were not only to wait patiently, but also to pray. Ask ye of the Lord rain, in the time of the latter rain; so shall the Lord make bright clouds, and give them showers of rain, to every one grass in the field, Zech. x. 1.

8. Be ye also patient] Wait for God's deliverance, as ye wait for His bounty in Providence.

Establish your hearts] Take courage: do not sink under your trials.

The coming of the Lord draweth nigh] Ἡγγίαι, is at 10 Take, my brethren, the prophets, who have spoken in the name of the Lord, for an example of suffering affliction, and of patience.

11 Behold, we count them happy, which endure. Ye have heard of the patience of Job, and have seen the end of the Lord; that the Lord is very pitiful, and of tender mercy.

12 But above all things, my brethren, swear not, neither by heaven, neither by the earth, neither by any other oath: but let your yea be yea; and your nay, nay; lest ye fall into condemnation.

13 Is any among you afflicted? let him pray. Is any merry? let him sing psalms.

14 Is any sick among you? let him call for the elders of the church; and let them pray over him, and anoint him with oil in the name of the Lord:

1. Matthew 24. 33. 1 Cor. 4. 5.—2 Matthew 5. 12. Hebrews 11. 35, 36.—3 Psalm 94. 12. Matt. 5. 19, 11. & 10. 22.—4 Job 1. 22. & 2. 10.—5 Job 42. 10, 32.—6 Numbers 14. 18. Psalm 133. 3.—7 Matt. 6. 24. 8.—8 Ephesians 5. 13. Colossians 2. 16.—9 Mark 6. 13. & 16. 18.

hand. He is already on His way to destroy this wicked people; to raze their city and temple, and to destroy their polity for ever: and this judgment will soon take place.

9. Grudge not Μη σφύζεσθε, grumble not, grumble not; do not murmur through impatience; and let not any ill treatment which you receive, induce you to vent your feelings in imprecations against your oppressors. Leave all this in the hands of God.

Lest ye be condemned] By giving way to a spirit of this kind, you will get under the condemnation of the wicked.

The judge standeth before the door] His eye is upon every thing that is wrong in you, and every wrong that is done to you; and He is now entering into judgment with your oppressors.

10. Take—the prophets] The prophets who had spoken to their forefathers by the authority of God, were persecuted by the very people to whom they delivered the Divine message; but they suffered affliction and persecution with patience, commending their cause to Him who judgeth righteously; therefore, imitate their example.

11. We count them happy which endure] According to that saying of our blessed Lord, Blessed are ye when men shall persecute and revile you—for so persecuted they the prophets which were before you. Matt. v. 11, &c.

Ye have heard of the patience of Job] Stripped of all his worldly possessions, deprived of a stroke of all his children, tortured in body with sore disease, tempted by the devil, harassed by his wife, and calumniated by his friends, he nevertheless held fast his integrity, resigned himself to the Divine dispensations, and charged not God foolishly.

And have seen the end of the Lord] The issue to which God brought all his afflictions and trials, giving him children, increasing his property, lengthening out his life, and multiplying to him every kind of spiritual and secular good. This was God's end with respect to him; but the devil's end was to drive him to despair, and to cause him to have been a real person; This mention of Job shows him to have been produced as an example of a virtue so highly important as that of patience and perseverance. The end of the Lord is a Hebrewism for the issue to which God brings any thing or business.

The Lord is very pitiful, and of tender mercy] Instead of εὐσπλαγχνος, which we translate very pitiful, and which might be rendered of much sympathy, from σπλάγχνος, a bowel, (because any thing that affects us with commiseration, causes us to feel an indescribable emotion of the bowels,) several MSS. have πλεουσπλαγχνος, from πλεον, much, or, easily, and σπλαγχνος, a bowel, a word not easy to be translated; but it signifies one whose commiseration is easily excited, and whose commiseration is great, or abundant.

12. Above all things—swear not] What relation this exhortation can have to the subject in question, I confess, I cannot see. It may not have been designed to stand in any connexion, but to be a separate piece of advice, as in the several cases which immediately follow. That the Jews were notoriously guilty of common swearing is allowed on all hands: and that swearing by heaven, earth, Jerusalem, the temple, the altar, different parts of the body, was not considered by them as binding oaths, has been sufficiently proved. Rabbi Akiba taught that "a man might swear with his lips, and annul it in his heart:" and then the oath was not binding.—See the notes on Matt. v. 33, &c. where the subject is considered in great detail.

Let your yea be yea, &c.] Do not pretend to say yea with your lips, and annul it in your heart; let the yea or the nay which you express be, bona fide, such: do not imagine that any mental reservation can cancel any such expressions of obligation, in the sight of God.

Lest ye fall into condemnation] Ἴνα μὴ ὄνο ἐπιπίπτωσθε, lest ye fall under judgment. Several MSS. join ὄνο and ἐπιπίπτωσθε together, ὄνο ἐπιπίπτωσθε, into, which makes a widely different reading; lest ye fall into hypocrisy. Now, as it is a fact, that the Jews did teach that there might be mental reservation, that would annul the oath, how solemnly soever it was taken; and the object of St. James, if the last reading be genuine, and it is supported by a great number of excellent MSS. some Versions, and some of the most eminent of the fathers

15 And the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up; and if he have committed sins, they shall be forgiven him.

16 Confess your faults one to another, and pray one for another, that ye may be healed. The effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much.

was to guard against that Apocritical method of taking an oath, which is subversive of all moral feeling, and must make conscience itself callous.

13. Is any among you afflicted? let him pray! The Jews taught that the meaning of the ordinance, Lev. xiii. 45, which required the leper to cry unclean! unclean! was, "that, thus making known his calamity, the people might be led to offer up prayers to God in his behalf."—Sota, pag. 683. ed. Wagena. They taught also, that when any sickness or affliction entered a family, they should go to the wise men, and implore their prayers.—Bava Bathra, fol. 116. 1.

In Nedarim, fol. 40. 1. We have this relation: "Rabba, as often as he fell sick, forbade his domestics to mention it for the first day: if he did not then begin to get well, he told his family to go and publish it in the highways, that they who hated him might rejoice: and they that loved him might intercede with God for him."

Is any merry? let him sing psalms. These are all general but very useful directions. It is natural for a man to sing, when he is cheerful and happy. Now, no subject can be more noble than that which is divine: and as God alone is the Author of all that good which makes a man happy, then His praise should be the subject of the song of him who is merry. But where persons rejoice in iniquity, and not in the truth; and God and sacred things can never be the subject of their songs.

14. Is any sick among you? let him call for the elders! This was also a Jewish maxim. Rabbi Simeon, in Sepher Ha Chayim, said, "What should a man do who goes to visit the sick?—Ans. He who studies to restore the health of the body, should first lay the foundation in the health of the soul. The wise men have said, No healing is equal to that which comes from the word of God and prayer." Rabbi Phineas, the son of Chamma, hath said, "When sickness or disease enters into a man's family, let him apply to a wise man, who will implore mercy in his behalf."—See Schoettgen.

St. James, very properly, sends all such to the elders of the church, who had power with God through the great Mediator, that they might pray for them.

Anointing him with oil! That St. James neither means any kind of incantation, any kind of miracle, or such extreme unction as the Romish church prescribes, will be sufficiently evident from these considerations: 1. He was a holy man, and could prescribe nothing but what was holy. 2. If a miracle was intended; it could have been as well wrought without the oil, as with it. 3. It is not intimated that even this unction is to save the sick man; but the prayer of faith, ver. 15. 4. What is here recommended, was to be done as a natural means of restoring health; which, while they used prayer and supplication to God, they were not to neglect. 5. Oil, in Judea, was celebrated for its sanative qualities; so that they scarcely ever took a journey without carrying oil with them, (see in the case of the Samaritan, with which they anointed their bodies, healed their wounds, bruises, &c. 6. Oil was, and is, frequently used in the East as a means of cure in very dangerous diseases; and in Egypt it is often used in the cure of the plague. Even in Europe it has been tried with great success in the cure of the dropsy. And pure olive oil is excellent for recent wounds and bruises; and I have seen it tried in this way, with the best effects. 7. But that it was the custom of the Jews to apply it as a means of healing, and that St. James refers to this custom, is not only evident from the case of the wounded man, ministered to by the good Samaritan, Luke x. 34. but from the practice of the Jewish rabbins. In Midrash Kohelet, fol. 73. 1. It is said, "Chanina, son of the brother of the Rabbi Joshua, went to visit his uncle at Capernaum; he was taken ill; and Rabbi Joshua went to him and anointed him with oil, and he was restored." They had, therefore, recourse to this as a natural remedy; and we find that the disciples used it also in this way to heal the sick; not exerting the miraculous power but in cases where natural means were ineffectual. And they cast out many devils, and anointed with oil many that were sick, and healed them. Mark vi. 13. On this latter place I have supposed that it might have been done symbolically, in order to prepare the way for a miraculous cure: this is the opinion of many commentators; but I am led, on more mature consideration, to doubt its propriety; yet dare not decide. In short, anointing the sick with oil, in order to their recovery, was a constant practice among the Jews.—See Lightfoot and Wetstein on Mark vi. 13. And here I am satisfied, that it has no other meaning than as a natural means of restoring health; and that St. James desires them to use natural means while looking to God for an especial blessing. And no wise man would direct otherwise.

not on the earth by the space of three years and a half. 18 And he prayed again, and the heaven gave rain, and earth brought forth her fruit.

19 Brethren, if any of you do err from the truth, convert him;

20 Let him know, that he which converteth the sinner from the error of his way shall save a soul from death, and shall hide a multitude of sins.

1 Acts 14. 15. & 1 Kings 17. 1. & Or, in a soul.— Luke 4. 18. & 41. & Matthew 18. 18. & Romans 11. 14. 1 Cor. 9. 22. 1 Timothy 4. 10. 1 Pet. 4. 5.

scripture, and it is on this passage principally that their sacrament of extreme unction, is evident considerations: 1. St. James orders the sick to be anointed in reference to his cure: but they anoint in the agonies of death, when there is no prospect of recovery; and never administer that sacrament, as while there is any hope of life. 2. St. James anointing for the cure of the body: but they apply cure of the soul; in reference to which use of it gives no directions: and what is said of the forgiveness in ver. 15. is rather to be referred to faith at which are often the means of restoring lost health, preventing premature death, when natural means, though fully used, have been useless. 3. The anointing never used as a means of symbol, in working cures, was only applied in some cases, perhaps very few; but the Romish church uses it in every makes it necessary to the salvation of every dependent. Therefore, St. James's unction, and the extreme the Romish church, are essentially different.—See

15. And the prayer of faith shall save the sick! God will often make these the means of a sick man's recovery; but there often are cases where faith and both ineffectual; because, God sees it will be the patient's salvation to be restored; and, therefore, and prayer, on such occasions, should be exerted ground: "If it be most for thy glory, and the glory of this man's soul, let him be restored; if otherwise, don, purify him, and take him to Thy glory."

The Lord shall raise him up! Not the elders, but and fervently soever they have prayed.

And if he have committed sins! So as to have his present malady, they shall be forgiven him: the cause of the affliction, it is natural to conclude effect be to cease, the cause must be removed. We in the miraculous restoration to health, under the hand of Christ, the sin of the party is generally forgiven; and this also before the miracle was wrought on the body: hence there was a maxim among the Jews, seems to be founded in common sense and reason, never restores a man miraculously to health, till he has done his sins; because it would be incongruous exert His miraculous power in saving a body, which was in a state of condemnation to eternal cause of the crimes it had committed against its Judge. Here, then, it is God that remits the sin, in reference to the unction, but in reference to the cure of which he is miraculously to effect.

16. Confess your faults one to another! This is a general direction to Christians, who endeavour to among themselves, the communion of saints. confession tends much to humble the soul, and watchful. We naturally wish that our friends and our religious friends in particular, should thus us: and when we confess to them offences, while this confession, they could never have known, we bled, are kept from self-applause, and induced to pray, that we may not increase our offences before be obliged any more to undergo the painful but acknowledging our weakness, fickleness, or infidel religious brethren.

It is not said, confess your faults to the elders, may forgive them, or prescribe penance, in order them. No; the members of the church were to confess to each other: therefore, curricular confession, such as is prescribed by the Romish church, foundation in this passage. Indeed, had it any here, it would prove more than they wish; for require the priest to confess his sins to the people: the people to confess theirs to the priest.

And pray one for another! There is no particular confession, where the penitent and the together for pardon; but here the people are each pray for each other, that they may be healed.

The effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much! The words deprecatur signify implication; or, such a prayer as is suggested to be wrought in it by a Divine energy. When God does some particular work in His church, He pours out lowers the Spirit of grace and supplication; and sometimes when He is about to do some especial individual. When such a power of prayer is granted, should be immediately called into exercise, that it may be given: the spirit of prayer is the proof that of God is present to heal. Long prayers give no evidence of Divine inspiration: the following was among the ancient Jews, תפילות עמיתיות the prayers of a righteous are short. This is exemplified in almost every instance in the Old Testament.

17. Elijah was a man subject to like passions.) This was lijah; and a consistency between the names of the same name, as expressed in the Old and the New Testaments, could be kept up.

The word παρομοιωθης, signifies of the same constitution, a man being just as ourselves are.—See the same phrase, and explanation, in Acts xv. 15 and the note there. There is some reason to apprehend that, because Elijah was translated, that therefore he was more than human; and if so, his ample could be no pattern for us: and, as the design of St. James was to excite men to pray, expecting the Divine intercession whenever that should be necessary, therefore he tells us, that Elijah was a man like themselves; of the same constitution, liable to the same accidents, and needing the me supports.

And he prayed earnestly) Προσευχῆν προσηύξατο, he prayed this prayer, a Hebraism; for, he prayed fervently. That it might not rain See this history, 1 Kings xvii. 1, &c. And it rained not on the earth) Ἐν τῷ ἔτει, on that land; i. the land of Judea; for this drought did not extend elsewhere.

Three years and six months.] This is the term mentioned our Lord, Luke iv. 25. but this is not specified in the original history. In 1 Kings xvii. 1. it is said, in the third year: word of the Lord came to Elijah, that is, concerning the in: but this third year is to be computed from the time his going to live at Zarephath, which happened many days er the drought began; as is plain from this, that he retired at the brook Cherith, till it was dried up, and then went to Zarephath, in the country of Sidon, 1 Kings xvii. 7—9. Therefore, the three years and six months must be computed on his denouncing the drought, at which time that judgment commenced.—Macknight.

8. And he prayed again) This second prayer is not mentioned in the history, in express words; but, as in 1 Kings ii. 42. it is said, he cast himself down upon the earth, and his face between his knees; that was probably the time of second praying; namely, that rain might come, as this is the proper posture of prayer.

9. Err from the truth.) Stray away from the Gospel of right; and one convert him, reclaim him from his error, and ng him back to the fold of Christ.

0. Let him know) Let him duly consider, for his encouragement, that he who is the instrument of converting a sinner; shall save a soul from eternal death, and a body from sin, and shall hide a multitude of sins: for, in being the ans of his conversion, we bring him back to God, who, in infinite mercy, hides or blots out the numerous sins which had committed during the time of his backsliding. It is the man's sins who is the means of his conversion, but sins of the backslider, which are here said to be hidden, more below.

Many are of opinion that the hiding a multitude of sins, ere to be understood of the person who converts the backer: this is a dangerous doctrine, and what the Holy Spirit er taught to man. Were this true, it would lead many a er to endeavour the reformation of his neighbour, that ight itself continue under the influence of his own bed sins: and conversion to a particular creed would be in the place of conversion to God; and thus the substance out in the shadow. Bishop Atherbury, (Ser. Vol. I. p. 46.)

Scott, (Christian Life, Vol. I. p. 368.) contend, "that the ering a multitude of sins, includes also that the pious on of which the apostle speaks, engages God to look with iter indulgence on the character of the person that perns it; and to be less severe in marking what he has done as."—See Macknight. This, from such authorities, may considered doubly dangerous; it argues, however, great rance of God, of the nature of Divine justice, and of the ulness of sin. It is, besides, completely anti-angelical; aches, in effect, that something besides the blood of the canant, will render God propitious to man; and that the performance of a pious action will induce God's justice to show iter indulgence to the person who performs; and to be severe in marking what he has done amiss.

On the end of this doctrine, we might confide that, had we a cerquantum of pious acts, we might have all the sins of our forgiven, independently of the sacrifice of Christ; for, ne pious act can procure pardon for a multitude of sins, it may not be expected from many.

The Jewish doctrine to which it is possible St. James may de, was certainly more sound than that taught by these isian divines. They allowed, that the man who was the ns of converting another, had done a work highly pleasing to God, and which should be rewarded; but they never nate that this would atone for sin: I shall produce a few nyles:—

Synopsis Schar, p. 47. n. 17. it is said, Great is his exultion, who persuades a sick person to turn from his sins.

id, p. 92. n. 18. Great is his reward who brings back the s into the way of the blessed Lord.

oma, fol. 87. 1. By his hands iniquity is not committed, turns many to righteousness; i. e. God does not permit to fall into sin. What is the reason? Ans. Let those should be found in Paradise, while their instructor is found in hell.

This doctrine is both innocent and godly in comparison of the other. It holds out a motive to diligence and zeal, but nothing farther. In short, if we allow any thing to cover our sins, besides the mercy of God in Christ Jesus, we shall err most dangerously from the truth; and add this moreover to the multitude of our sins, that we maintained that the gift of God could be purchased by our puny acts of comparative righteousness.

3. As one immortal soul is of more worth than all the material creation of God, every man who knows the worth of his own, should labour for the salvation of others. To be the means of depriving hell of her expectation, and adding even one soul to the church triumphant, is a matter of infinite moment; and he who is such an instrument, has much reason to thank God that ever he was born. He who lays out his accounts to do good to the souls of men, will ever have the blessing of God in his own. Besides, God will not suffer him to labour in vain, or spend his strength for nought. At first, he may see little fruit; but the bread cast upon the water shall be found after many days: and if he should never see it in this life, he may take for granted that whatsoever he has done for God, in simplicity and godly sincerity, has been less or more effectual.

After the last word of this epistle, ἀμενων, of sins, some Versions add his, others theirs; and one MS. and the latter Syriac, have Amen. But these additions are of no authority.

The most ancient MSS. have little or an subscription. Two opinions relative to the author are expressed in these MSS. One copy of the Itala, the Codex Corbejensis, at Paris, which contains this epistle only, attributes it to James the Son of Zebedee: and two, comparatively recent, attribute it to James, our Lord's brother. The former testimony, taken in conjunction with some internal evidences, led Michælis, and some others, to suppose it probable that James the elder, or the son of Zebedee, was the author. I should give it to this apostle in preference to the other, had I not reason to believe that a James different from either, was the author. But who, or what he was, at this distance of time, it is impossible to say. Having now done with all comments on the text, I shall conclude with some particulars relative to James, our Lord's brother; and some general observations on the structure and importance of this epistle.

I have entered but little into the history of this James, because I was not satisfied that he is the author of this epistle: however, observing that the current of modern authors are decided in their opinion that he was the author, I perceive I may be blamed unless I be more particular concerning his life, as some of the ancients have related several circumstances relative to him that are very remarkable, and, indeed, singular. Dr. Lardner has collected the whole; and although the same authors from whom he has taken his accounts are before me, yet, not supposing that I can at all mend either his selections or arrangement, I shall take the accounts as he states them.

"I should now proceed," says this learned man, "to write the history of this person (James) from ancient authors; but that is a difficult task, as I have found, after trying more than once, and at distant spaces of time, I shall, therefore, take brevis passages of Eusebius and others, and make such reflections as offer for finding out as much truth as we can.

"Eusebius in his chapter concerning our Saviour's disciples, (Ecl. Hist. lib. i. cap. 12.) speaks of James, to whom our Lord showed Himself after his resurrection, 1 Cor. xv. 7. as being one of the seventy disciples.

"The same author has another chapter, (Hist. Ecl. lib. ii. cap. 1.) intitled, Of things constituted by the Apostles after our Saviour's Ascension, which is to this purpose—

"The first is the choice of Matthias, one of Christ's disciples, into the apostleship, in the room of Judas; then the appointment of the seven deacons, one of whom was Stephen, who, soon after his being ordained, was stoned by those who had killed the Lord, and was the first martyr for Christ; then James, called the Lord's brother, because he was the son of Joseph, to whom the Virgin Mary was espoused. This James, called by the ancients the Just on account of his eminent virtue, is said to have been appointed the first bishop of Jerusalem; and Clement, in the sixth book of his Institutions, writes after this manner—That, after our Lord's ascension, Peter, and James, and John, though they had been favoured by the Lord above the rest, did not contend for honour, but chose James the Just to be bishop of Jerusalem; and, in the seventh book of the same work, he says, that after His resurrection the Lord gave to James the Just, and Peter, and John, the gift of knowledge; and they gave it to the other apostles; and the other apostles gave it to the seventy, one of whom was Barnabas; for there were two named James, one the Just, who was thrown down from the battlement of the temple, and killed by a fuller's staff; the other is he who was beheaded. Of him who was called the Just, Paul also makes mention, saying, Other of the apostles saw I none, save James the Lord's brother.

"I would now take a passage from Origen, in the tenth vol. of his Commentaries upon St. Matt. xiii. 55, 56. Is not this the carpenter's son? Is not his mother called Mary? And his brethren James, and Joseph, and Simon, and Judas? And his sisters, are they not with us? These thought, says Origen, that he was the son of Joseph and Mary. The brethren of Jesus, some say, upon the ground of tradition, particularly what is said in the Gospel according to Peter, or the book of James, were the sons of Joseph by a former wife, who cohabited with him before Mary. They who say this are desirous of maintaining the honour of Mary's virginity to the last, (or her perpetual virginity,) that the body chosen to fulfill what is said, The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee, Luke i. 35, might not know man after that: and I think it very reasonable that, as Jesus was the first fruits of virginity among men, Mary should be the same among women; for it would be very improper to give that honour to any beside her. This James is he whom Paul mentions in his Epistle to the Galatians, saying, Others of the apostles saw I none, save James, the Lord's brother. This James was in so great repute with the people for his virtue, that Josephus, who wrote twenty books of the Jewish antiquities, desirous to assign the reason of their suffering such things, so that even the temple was destroyed, says, that those things were owing to the anger of God, for what they did to James, the brother of Jesus, who is called Christ. And it is wonderful that he, who did not believe our Jesus to be the Christ, should bear such a testimony to James. He also says that the people thought they suffered those things on account of James. Jude wrote an epistle, of few lines indeed, but filled with the powerful word of the heavenly grace, who says at the beginning, Jude, a servant of Jesus Christ, and brother of James. Of James and Simon we know nothing.

"Origen, in his books against Celsus, quotes Josephus again, as speaking of James, to the like purpose: but there are not now any such passages in Josephus, though they are quoted as from him by Eusebius also. As the death of James has been mentioned, I shall now immediately take the accounts of it, which are in Eusebius; and I will transcribe a large part of the twenty-third chapter of the second book of his Ecclesiastical History: "But when Paul had appealed to Cæsar, and Festus had sent him to Rome, the Jews being disappointed in their design against him, turned their rage against James, the Lord's brother, to whom the apostles had assigned the episcopal chair of Jerusalem; and, in this manner, they proceeded against him; having laid hold of him, they required him, in the presence of all the people, to renounce his faith in Christ; but he, with freedom and boldness beyond expectation, before all the multitude, declared our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ to be the Son of God. They not enduring the testimony of a man, who was in high esteem for his piety, laid hold of the opportunity, when the country was without a governor, to put him to death; for, Festus having died about that time in Judea, the province had in it no procurator. The manner of the death of James, was shown before, in the words of Clement, who said that he was thrown off the battlement of the temple, and then bent to death with a club. But no one has so accurately related this transaction, as Hegesippus, a man in the first succession of the apostles, in the fifth book of his Commentaries, whose words are to this purpose, 'James, the brother of our Lord, undertook, together with the apostles, the government of the Church. He has been called the Just, by all, from the time of our Saviour to ours; for many have been named James. But he was holy from his mother's womb. He drank neither wine nor strong drink; nor did he eat any animal food: there never came a razor upon his head; he neither anointed himself with oil, nor did he use a bath. To him alone was it lawful to enter the holy place. He wore no woollen, but only linen garments. He entered into the temple alone, where he prayed upon his knees; inasmuch that his knees were become like the knees of a camel, by means of his being continually upon them, worshipping for the forgiveness of the people. Upon account of his virtue, he was Just, and Oblivis; that is, the defence of the people, amongst. Some, therefore, of the seven sects, who, among the Jews, of whom I spoke in the former part of my Commentaries, asked him, Which is the gate of What is the gate of salvation? and he said, Jesus, viz, or the way of salvation. Some of them, who believed that Jesus is the Christ. And many of them, who also believing, there was a disturbance among them, among the scribes and Pharisees, who said, there was lost all the people should think Jesus to be the Christ; therefore, to James, they said, We beseech thee to error of this people; we entreat thee to persuade come hither at the time of pass-over, to think concerning Jesus; for all the people, and all of us, put in thee. Stand, therefore, on the battlement of that, being placed on high, thou mayest be conspicuous; thy words may be easily heard by all the people: for of the pass-over, all the tribes are come hither, Gentiles. Therefore, the scribes and Pharisees beset James upon the battlement of the temple, and to him, and said, O Justus, whom we ought all since the people are in an error, following Jesus crucified; tell us what is the gate of Jesus. And he with a loud voice, Why do ye ask me concerning man? He even sitteth in the heaven, at the right hand of Great Power; and will come in the clouds of heaven; many were fully satisfied, and well pleased with the words of James, saying, Hosanna to the Son of David! The scribes and Pharisees said one to another, We wrong in procuring such a testimony to Jesus. We and throw him down, that the people may be turning credit to him. And they went up presently him down, and said, Let us stone James the Just; began to stone him, because he was not killed. But he turning himself, kneeled, saying, I entreat Lord God, the Father, forgive them, for they know they do. As they were stoning him, one said, What do ye? The just man prays for you. And one fuller, took a pole, which was used to beat clothes struck him on the head. Thus his martyrdom was. And they buried him in that place; and his name remains near the temple. This James was a true both to Jews and Gentiles, that Jesus is the Christ; for, Judea was invaded by Vespasian, and the people carried captive.' So writes Hegesippus at large, a Clement. For certain, James was an excellent much esteemed by many for his virtue; inasmuch as most thoughtful men among the Jews were of his death was the cause of the siege of Jerusalem, followed soon after his martyrdom; and that it was something else but the wickedness committed against Josephus says the same in these words: 'These were the Jews in vindication of James the Just, who was of Jesus, called the Christ. For the Jews killed him a most righteous man.'

"The time of the death of James, may be determined out much difficulty: he was alive when Paul came to Jerusalem at the Pentecost, in the year of Christ, 58; and that he was dead when St. Paul wrote the Epistle to the Hebrews, at the beginning of the year 63. Theodoret, xlii. 7, supposes the apostle there to refer to the name of Stephen, James, the brother of John, and James. According to Hegesippus, the death of James happened at the time of pass-over, which might be that of the year, if Festus was then dead, and Albinus not arrived, that was without a governor. Such a season, left the people very likely to gratify their licentious and turbulent customs, and they were very likely to embrace it."

"I have said but little relative to the controversy of the apostleship of James, our Lord's brother; for, I am in doubt whether he were the author of this epistle; I judge it necessary to enter into the question. I refer to some general observations on the epistle itself, which I find it affords of the learning and science of its author. I have already conjectured, that this epistle is the most ancient of the Christian writings; its reference to the great facts which distinguish the history of the Church, viz. the calling of the Gentiles, the circumcision, and the obligation of the law in conformity with the Gospel, &c. &c., show that it must have been written before those things took place; or, that they must wholly unknown to the author: which is incredible. I have been a Christian writer.

2. The style of this epistle is much more elevated than other parts of the New Testament. It abounds with metaphors, at once bold, dignified, just, and many parts of it are in the genuine prophetic style, after the manner of the prophet Zephaniah, to which it bears a near resemblance, in several passages.

3. An attentive reader of this epistle, will perceive that it is written by a man of deep thought, and considerable knowledge. He had studied the Jewish prophets closely, and imitated their style; but he appears also to have read the Greek language as such as we might expect from one who had made it his study, but who avoided to quote them.

perfect Greek hexameter, in chap. I. ver. 17. and another may be perceived in chap. iv. 4; but these are probably not borrowed, but are the spontaneous, undesigned effort of his own well-cultivated mind. His science may be noted in several places, but particularly in chap. I. ver. 17; on which, see the note and the diagram, and its explanation, at the end of the chapter. Images from natural history, are not unfrequent; and that in chap. I. H. 15. is exceedingly correct and appropriate, but will not bear a closely literal translation.

4. His constant attention and reference to the verities and maxims of his own countrymen, is peculiarly observable. Several of his remarks, tend to confirm the antiquity of the Talmud; and the parallel passages in the different tracts of that work, cast much light on the allusions of St. James. Without constant reference to the ancient Jewish rabbins, we should have sought for the meaning of several passages in vain.

5. St. James is, in many places, obscure: this may arise partly from his own deep and strong conceptions, and partly from allusions to arts or maxims which are not come down to us; or which lie yet undiscovered in the Mishna or Talmud. To elucidate this writer, I have taken more than common pains; but dare not say, that I have been always successful, though I have availed myself of all the help within my reach. To Schoettgen's Horæ Hebraicæ, I am considerably indebted; as, also, to Dr. Macknight, Kypke, Rosenmüller, &c.; but, in many cases, I have departed from all these, and others of the same class, and followed my own light.

6. On the controversy relative to the doctrine of justification, as taught by Paul and James, I have not entered deeply: I have produced, in the proper places, what appeared to me to be the most natural method of reconciling those writers. I believe St. James not to be in opposition to St. Paul; but to a corrupt doctrine taught among his own countrymen, relative to this important subject. The doctrine of justification by faith in Christ Jesus, as taught by St. Paul, is both rational and true. St. James shows, that a bare belief in the God of Israel, justifies no man; and that the genuine faith that justifies, works by love, and produces obedience to all the precepts contained in the moral law; and that this obedience is the evidence of the sincerity of that faith which professes to have put its possessor in the enjoyment of the peace and favour of God.

7. This epistle ends abruptly, and scarcely appears to be a finished work. The author probably intended to have added more; but may have been prevented by death. James, our Lord's brother, was murdered by the Jews; as we have already seen. James, the son of Zebedee, had, probably, a short race; but whether either of these were its author, we know not. The work was, probably, posthumous, not appearing till after the author's death; and this may have been one reason why it was so little known in the earliest ages of the primitive Church.

8. The spirit of Antinomianism, is as dangerous in the Church, as the spirit of Pharisaism: to the former, the epistle of James is a most powerful antidote; and the Christian minister, who wishes to improve and guard the morals of his flock, will bring its important doctrines, in due proportion, into his public ministry. It is no proof of the improved state of public morals, that many who call themselves evangelical teachers, scarcely ever attempt to instruct the public by texts selected from this epistle.

For other particulars, relative to the time of writing this epistle, the author, his inspiration, apostleship, &c., I must refer to Michaelis and Lardner, and to the Preface.

PREFACE TO THE FIRST AND SECOND EPISTLES OF PETER.

DR. LARDNER, and Professor Michaelis, have done much to remove several difficulties connected with the person of St. Peter, the people to whom he wrote, the places of their dispersion, and the time of writing. I shall extract what makes more immediately for my purpose.

"The land of Palestine," says Cave, "at and before the coming of our blessed Saviour, was distinguished into three several provinces, Judea, Samaria, and Galilee. In the Upper, called also Galilee of the Gentiles, within the division belonging to the tribe of Naphthali, stood Bethsaida, formerly an obscure and inconsiderable village, till lately re-edified and enlarged by Philip the Tetrarch; and, in honour of Julia, daughter of Augustus, called by him Julia. It was situated upon the banks of the sea of Galilee, called also the lake of Tiberias, and the lake of Genesareth, which was about forty furlongs in breadth, and a hundred in length, and had a wilderness on the other side, called the desert of Bethsaida, whither our Saviour used often to retire.

"At this place was born Simon, surnamed Cephas, or Peter, Petrus, Peter, signifying a stone, or fragment of a rock. He was a fisherman upon the fore-mentioned lake, or sea, as was also in all probability his father Jonas, or John. He had a brother named Andrew; which was the eldest of the two is not certain; for, concerning this, there were different opinions among the ancients. Epiphanius supposed Andrew to be the elder; but, according to Chrysostom, Peter was the first-born. So likewise Bede and Cassian, who even made Peter's age the ground of his precedence among the apostles; and Jeron himself has expressed himself in like manner, saying, 'that the keys were given to all the apostles alike, and the church was built upon all of them equally; but, for preventing dissension, precedence was given to one. John might have been the person, but he was too young; and Peter was preferred on account of his age.'

"The call of Andrew and Peter to a stated attendance on Jesus, is recorded in three evangelists. Their father Jonas seems to have been dead; for there is no mention of him, as there is of Zebedee, when his two sons were called. It is only said of Andrew and Peter that, when Jesus called them, 'they left their nets, and followed him. Follow me,' said He, and 'I will make you fishers of men.'

"Simon Peter was married when called by our Lord to attend upon Him; and upon occasion of that alliance, it seems, had removed from Bethsaida to Capernaum, where was his wife's family. Upon her mother our Saviour wrought a great miracle of healing. And I suppose, that when our Lord 'left Nazareth, and came and dwelt at Capernaum,' He made Peter's house the place of His usual abode when He was in those parts. I think we have a proof of it in the history just noticed. When Jesus came out of the synagogue at Capernaum, He 'entered into Simon's house,' Luke iv. 38. Compare Mark I. 29. which is well paraphrased by Dr. Clarke: 'Now when Jesus came out of the synagogue, He went home to Peter's house; and there it was that the people resorted unto Him.'

"Some time after this, when our Lord had an opportunity of private conversation with the disciples, He inquired of them what men said of Him; and, then, whom they thought Him to be? 'Simon Peter answered and said, Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God,' Matt. xvi. 13-16. So far likewise in Mark viii. 27-29. and Luke ix. 18-20. Then follows, in Matthew, ver. 17-19. 'And Jesus answered and said unto him, Blessed art thou, Simon Bar-Jona, for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven; that is, 'It is not a partial affection for me, thy Master, nor a fond and inconsiderate regard for the judgments of others, for whom thou hast a respect, that has induced thee to think thus of me; but it is a just persuasion formed in thy mind by observing the great works thou hast seen me do by the power of God, in the confirmation of my mission and doctrine.'

"And I say unto thee, thou art Peter, and upon this rock will I build my church—and I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven." By which many of our interpreters suppose that our Lord promised to Peter that he should have the honour of beginning to preach the Gospel after his resurrection to Jews and Gentiles, and of receiving them into the church; if so, that is personal. Nevertheless what follows. 'And whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth, shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth, shall be loosed in heaven;' this, I say, must have been the privilege of all the apostles, for the like things are expressly said to them, Luke xxii. 28, 30. John xv. 21-23. Moreover, all the apostles concurred with Peter in the first preaching both to Jews and Gentiles. As he was president in the college of the apostles, it was very fit, and a thing of course, that he should be primarily concerned in the first opening of things. The confession now particularly before us was made by him; but it was in answer to a question that had been put to all; and he spoke the sense of all the apostles, and in their name. I suppose this to be as true in this instance, as in the other before-mentioned, which is in John vi. 68, 69. In the account which St. John has given us of our Saviour's washing the disciples' feet, Peter's modesty and fervour are conspicuous. When the Jewish officers were about to apprehend our Lord, 'Peter having a sword, drew it, and smote a servant of the high-priest, and cut off his right ear.' Our Lord having checked Peter, touched the servant's ear, and healed him. So great is Jesus every where! They that laid hold of Jesus, led Him away to the house of Caiaphas; the rest of the disciples now forsook Him, and fled: 'but Peter followed him afar off, unto the high-priest's palace; and went in and sat with the servants to see the end.' Here Peter thrice disowned his Lord, peremptorily denying that he was one of the disciples, or had any knowledge of Him, as related by all the evangelists; for which he soon after humbled himself, and wept bitterly. We do not perceive that Peter followed our Lord any farther; or that he at all attended the crucifixion. It is likely that he was under too much concern of mind to appear in public; and that he chose retirement, as most suitable to his present temper and circumstances.

"On the first day of the week, early in the morning, when Mary Magdalene and other women came to the sepulchre, bringing sweet spices, which they had prepared, 'they saw an angel, who said unto them, Be not affrighted; ye seek Jesus who was crucified: he is not here, for he is risen: Go quickly, and tell his disciples that he is risen from the dead.' As in Matthew, 'Tell his disciples and Peter.' As in Mark, 'Behold he goeth before you into Galilee.' That was a most gracious disposal of Providence to support the disciples, Peter in particular, in their great affliction.

"Our Lord first showed Himself to Mary Magdalene, and afterwards to some other women. On the same day, likewise, on which he arose from the dead, He showed Himself to Peter, though the circumstances of this appearance are nowhere related. And it has been observed, that, as Mary Magdalene was the first woman, so Peter was the first man, to whom Jesus showed Himself after He was risen from the dead.

"We have nowhere any distinct account of this apostle's travels; he might return to Judea, and stay there a good while after having been at Antioch, at the time spoken of by St. Paul in the Epistle to the Galatians. However, it appears from Epiphanius, that Peter was often in the countries of Pontus and Bithynia; and by Eusebius, we are assured that Origen, in the third tome of his Exposition of the Book of Genesis, writes to this purpose: Peter is supposed to have preached to the Jews of the dispersion in Pontus, Galatia, Bithynia, Cappadocia, and Asia; who, at length coming to Rome, was crucified with his head downwards, himself having desired it might be in that manner. For the time of Peter's coming to Rome, no ancient writer is now more regarded by learned moderns than Lactantius, or whoever is the author of the book of the deaths of persecutors; who says, that Peter came thither in the time of Nero. However, it appears to me very probable, that St. Peter did not come to Rome before the year of Christ, 63, or 64, nor till after St. Paul's departure thence, at the end of his two years' imprisonment in that city. The books of the New Testament afford a very plausible, if not certain argument, for it. After our Lord's ascension we find Peter, with the rest of the apostles, at Jerusalem. He and John were sent by the apostles from Jerusalem to Samaria, whence they returned to Jerusalem. When Paul came to Jerusalem, three years after his conversion, he found Peter there. Upon occasion of the tranquillity of the churches in Judea, Galilee, and Samaria, near the end of the reign of Caligula, Peter left Jerusalem, and visited the churches in several parts of that country, particularly at Lydda and Joppa, where he tarried many days. Thence he went to Caesarea, by the sea-side, where he preached to Cornelius and his company. Thence he returned to Jerusalem; and some time afterwards was imprisoned there by Herod Agrippa. This brings down the history of our apostle to the year 44. A few years after this he was present at the council of Jerusalem, nor is there any evidence that he came there merely on that occasion. It is more probable that he had not yet been out of Judea: soon after that council he was at Antioch, where he was reproved by St. Paul.

"The books of the New Testament afford no light for determining where Peter was for several years after that. But to me it appears not unlikely that he returned after a short time to Judea, from Antioch, and that he staid in Judea a good while before he went thence any more; and it seems to me, that, when he left Judea, he went again to Antioch, the chief city of Syria. Thence he might go to other parts of the continent, particularly Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia, which are expressly mentioned in the beginning of his first epistle. In those countries he might stay a good while; and it is very likely that he did so; and that he was well acquainted with the Christians there, to whom he afterwards wrote two epistles. When he left those parts, I think he went to Rome, but not till after Paul had been in that city, and was gone from it. Several of St. Paul's epistles furnish out a cogent argument of Peter's absence from Rome for a considerable space of time. St. Paul, in the last chapter of his Epistle to the Romans, written, as we suppose, in the beginning of the year 63, salutes many by name, without mentioning Peter; and the whole tenor of the epistle makes it reasonable to think that the Christians there had not yet had the benefit of the apostle's presence and instructions. During his two years' confinement at Rome, which ended, as we suppose, in the spring of the year 63, St. Paul wrote four or five epistles; those to the Ephesians, the Second Epistle to Timothy, to the Philippians, the Colossians, and Philemon: in none of which is any mention of Peter, nor is any thing said, or hinted, whence it can be concluded that he had ever been there. I think, therefore, that Peter did not come to Rome before the year 63, or, perhaps, 64. And, as I suppose, obtained the crown of martyrdom in the year 64, or 65; consequently, St. Peter could not reside very long at Rome before his death.

"Cave likewise, in his life of St. Peter, written in English in 1676, places his death in 64, or 65; nor was his mind much altered when he published his Historia Literaria, in 1688; for there also, he supposes, that St. Peter died a martyr at Rome, in the year of Christ 64, at the beginning of Nero's persecution; and, indeed, he expresses himself with a great deal of assurance and positiveness. Jerom concludes his article of St. Peter, saying, 'He was buried at Rome, in the Vatican, near the triumphal way; and is in veneration all over the world.'

"It is not needful to make but it is easy to observe it interested, testimony of this tradition: dictated, dis- several parts of the world; Greeks, Latins, and Syrians. As prediction, concerning the death of Peter, a record of the four Gospels, it is very likely that Christians serve the accomplishment of it; which must have some place; and about this place there is no different Christian writers of ancient times; never any other named besides Rome; nor did any other city ever martyrdom of Peter. There were, in the second centuries, disputes between the bishop of Rome, bishops and churches, about the time of keeping about the baptism of heretics; yet none denied that Rome was what they called the chair of Peter. It is honour, or interest, either as Christians or Protestants the truth of events ascertained by early and well-dition. If any make an ill use of such facts, we countable for it. We are not, from the dread of a to overthrow the credit of all history; the consequences which would be fatal. Fables and fictions have with the account of Peter's being at Rome; but in the most early writers, but have been added since well known that fictions have been joined with the most certain and important facts.

"Having written the history of the apostle Peter proceed to his epistles: concerning which three or are to be considered by us;—their genuineness, the whom they were sent, the place where, and the they were written:—

"The first epistle was all along considered, Christians, as authentic and genuine; this we learn sebus, who says, 'Of the controverted books of the tament, yet well known and approved by many, are the Epistle of James, and that of Jude, and the second and the second and third of John.' And in an 'One Epistle of Peter, called the first, is universal. This the presbyters of ancient times have quoted things as undoubtedly genuine; but that called his have been informed, (by tradition,) has not been a part of the New Testament: nevertheless, appears to be useful, it has been carefully studied with the regard.' By which, I think, we may be assured, it was shown to this epistle by many Christian time of our learned ecclesiastical historian. Jerom wrote two epistles, called Catholic, the second denied by many to be his, because of the different style from the former. And Origen, before them mentaries upon the Gospel of St. Matthew, as Clement, says, 'Peter, on whom the church is built, epistle universally acknowledged; let it be granted also wrote a second, for this has been doubted.'

"What those learned writers of the third and series say of those two epistles, we have found agree testimony of more ancient writers, whom we have for the first epistle seems to be referred to by Rome; it is plainly referred to by Polyeyr several is also referred to by the martyrs at Lyons; it was by Theophilus bishop of Antioch; it was quoted it is quoted in the remaining writings of Irenaeus, Alexandria, and Tertullian; consequently, it was ceived. But we do not perceive the second epistle by Papias, nor by Irenaeus, (though in Grabe's epistle is twice quoted,) nor Tertullian, nor Cyprian, ever, both these epistles were generally received; and following centuries by all Christians, except for they were received by Athanasius, Cyril of the council of Laodicea, Epiphanius, Jerom, Rufine, and others.

"The first epistle being allowed to be St. Peter argue in favour of the other also; in this manner the inscription the name of the same apostle; for 'Simon Peter, a servant and an apostle of Jesus C in chap. i. 14. are these words: 'Knowing that I put off this my tabernacle, even as our Lord Jesus showed me.'

"The writer of this epistle may have had a particular concern concerning the time of his death not long before this. But it is probable that here is a reference to prediction concerning St. Peter's death, and the names which are recorded in John xxi. 18, 19. From ch. 18. it appears that the writer was one of the disciples who were with Jesus in the mount, when He was taken up in a glorious manner. This certainly leads us to conclude, that the name of the epistle bears in relation: chap. iii. 1. 'This second epistle, beloved, unto you; in both which I stir up your pure mind, to remembrance; plainly referring to the former epistle has been always acknowledged to be Peter's. These are express. But it might have been argued, with agree of probability, from chap. i. 12, 13, that he was written by the same persons. Once more, chap. i. calls Paul brother, and otherwise so speaks of his epistles, as must needs be reckoned most suitable titles. The writer, therefore, is the apostle Peter, the epistle bears in the inscription. We are led to observation which Wall placed at the head of his this second epistle: 'It is,' says he, 'a good proof of the genuineness of the ancient Christians, in receiving canonical, that they not only rejected all those ly heretics, under the name of apostles; but also if any good book, affirmed by some men, or some churches, to have been written and sent by some apostles, were offered to them, they would not, till fully satisfied of the fact, receive it into their anon." He adds, "There is more hazard in denying this to be Peter's, than in denying some other books to be of that author, to whom they are by tradition ascribed. For they, if they be not of that apostle to whom they are imputed, yet may be of some other apostle, or apostolical man; but this author is either the apostle, or else by setting his name, and by other circumstances, he does designedly personate him, which no man of piety and truth would do." And then he concludes: "This epistle being written by him but a little before his death, chap. i. 14. and perhaps no more than one copy sent, it might be a good while before a number of copies, well attested, came broad to the generality of the Christian churches."

"Certainly these epistles, and the discourses of Peter, recorded in the Acts, (together with the effects of them, are monuments of a Divine inspiration, and of the fulfilment of the promise which Christ made to him, when He saw him and his brother Andrew employed in their trade, and casting a net into the sea; 'follow me, and I will make you fishers of men,' Matt. iv. 19.

"Concerning the persons to whom these epistles were sent, there have been different opinions among both ancient and moderns. Mr. Wetstein argues from divers texts that the first epistle was sent to the Gentiles. Mr. Hallett, in his learned introduction to the Epistle to the Hebrews, observes, 'Some upon the supposition that St. Peter's epistles were written to the Jews; but it seems to me more natural to suppose that they were written to Gentile Christians, if we consider many passages of the epistles themselves.' Where he proceeds to allege many passages; and, in my opinion, very pertinently; one of which will be also alleged by me by and by.

"To me it seems that St. Peter's epistles were sent to all Christians in general, Jews and Gentiles, living in Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia; the greatest part of whom must have been converted by Paul, and had been before involved in ignorance and sin, as all people in general were till the manifestation of the Gospel of Christ. That St. Peter wrote to all Christians in those countries is apparent, from the valedictory blessing, or wish, at the end of the epistle, 1 Epist. v. 14. 'Peace be with you all that are in Christ Jesus.' Lewis Capellus, who thought that St. Peter's first epistle was written to Jewish believers, allows that the second epistle was written to all Christians in general, and particularly to Gentiles, induced thereto by the comprehensiveness of the address, at the beginning of that epistle. 'To them that we obtained like precious faith with us.' He should have included as much of the first epistle likewise, for they were both sent to the same people, as is evident from St. Peter's own words, 2 Epist. iii. 1. Moreover, the inscription of the first epistle seems to be as general as that of the second. Let us observe it distinctly: to the Elect, ἐλεκτοῖς, says Wall, upon the place; 'He uses the word ἐλεκτοῖς, choice ones, just as St. Paul does the word αἱολοί, saints, for the word Christians: and as St. Paul directs almost all his epistles to the σάντες, that is, the Christians of such a place; so St. Peter writes, to the elect, or choice ones; that is, Christians, sojourning in the dispersions of Pontus, Galatia, and Bithynia. Στράνητες, παροπίστοι; good men, though at home, are strangers, especially if they meet with opposition, trouble, and affliction, as those Christians did to whom St. Peter is here writing; for he speaks of their trials and temptations, chap. i. 6, 7. and exhorts them, ii. 11. as sojourners and strangers, ως παροπίστοι ή παροπίστοι; to obtain from fleshy lusts. Says Ciceronius upon chap. i. 1, 2. 'He calls them strangers, either a account of their dispersion, or because all that live remotely are called strangers on this earth: as David also says, I am a sojourner with thee, and a stranger, as all my fathers are.' Psa. cxxxix. 12. 'Scattered throughout Pontus;' or, 'of the dispersion of Pontus, Galatia;' so he calls them, not because they had been driven out from their native country, but because he writes to the Christians of divers countries, who also were but a few, and a small number in every place, here they dwelt. I shall now show that these Christians were, for the most part, of the Gentile stock and original. Pet. i. 14. 'As obedient children, not fashioning yourselves according to the former lusts in your ignorance.' This might very pertinently said to men converted from Gentilism to Christianity; but no such thing is ever said by the apostles concerning the Jewish people, who had been favoured with divine revelation, and had the knowledge of the true God. And, ver. 20, 21, he says, 'that through Christ they did now believe in God;' therefore they were not worshippers till they were acquainted with the Christian revelation. In like manner, chap. ii. ver. 9. St. Peter speaks of those to whom he writes, as having been 'called out of darkness into God's marvellous light.' Moreover, they were not once God's people, ver. 10. 'Which in times past were not a people, but are now a people of God; which had not obtained mercy, but now are obtained mercy.' Words, resembling those of St. Paul, Rom. chap. ix. ver. 24, 25. where he is unquestionably speaking of Gentile converts. There are also other expressions, which plainly show that these persons had been Gentiles, and did live in the sins of Gentilism, chap. i. ver. 18. 'Forasmuch as ye know that ye were redeemed from your vain conversation, received by tradition from your fathers.' And, chap. iv. ver. 3. 'For the time past may suffice us to have wrought the will of the Gentiles; when we walked in lasciviousness, lusts, excess of wine, revellings, banquetings, and abominable idolatries.' St. Peter does not charge himself with such things; but they to whom he writes had been guilty in those respects; and, by way of condescension, and for avoiding offence, and for rendering his argument more effectual, he joins himself with them. And more, when St. Peter represents the dignity of those to whom he writes, upon account of their Christian vocation, chap. ii. ver. 9. as 'a chosen generation, a peculiar people, a royal priesthood;' certainly the expressions are most pertinent and emphatical, if understood of such as had been brought from Gentilism to the faith of the Gospel, as indeed they plainly were. For he there says, 'they were to show forth the praises of him who had called them out of darkness into his marvellous light.' To all which might be added, what was hinted before, that the persons to whom Peter writes, were, for the most part, the apostle Paul's converts. This must be reckoned probable, from the accounts which we have in the Acts, of St. Paul's travels and preaching. Whence we know that he had been in Galatia, and the other countries mentioned by St. Peter, at the beginning of his first epistle. Moreover, he observes, 2 Ep. iii. 15. that 'his beloved brother Paul had written unto them.' We may reasonably suppose that he thereby intends St. Paul's Epistles to the Galatians, the Ephesians, and Colossians, all in those countries, and for the most part, Gentile believers. Nor do I see reason to doubt, that Peter had, before now, seen and read St. Paul's Epistles to Timothy; and if we should add them, as here intended also, it would be no prejudice to our argument. For those epistles, likewise, were designed for the use and benefit of the churches in those parts. To me these considerations appear unanswerable: I shall, therefore, take notice of but one objection, which is grounded upon chap. ii. 12. 'Having your conversation honest among the Gentiles; that whereas they speak against you as evil-doers, they may by your good works, which they shall behold, glorify God in the day of visitation.' Upon the first clause in that verse, Beza says, that this place alone is sufficient to show that this epistle was sent to Jews. But I think not. From St. Paul may be alleged a text of the like sort, 1 Cor. x. 32. 'Give no offence, neither to the Jews, nor to the Gentiles (καὶ Ἕλληνας) nor to the church of God.' It might be as well argued from that text, that the Corinthians were by descent neither Jews nor Greeks, as from this, that the persons to whom St. Peter wrote were not originally Gentiles. In the text of St. Paul, just quoted, by Jews and Gentiles, or Greeks, are intended such as were unbelievers. So it is likewise in the text of St. Peter, which we are considering; as apparent from the latter part of the verse above transcribed at large. St. Peter had a right to distinguish those to whom he writes, from the Gentile people among whom they lived; as he had at the beginning of the epistle called them elect, or choice ones, and strangers; and they likewise went by the name of Christians, as we perceive from chap. iv. 16.

"St. Peter's two epistles, then, were sent to all Christians in general, living in those countries; the greatest part of whom had been converted from Gentilism or heathenism.

"Our next inquiry is, concerning where these epistles were written.

"At the end of the first epistle, St. Peter says, 'The church that is at Babylon, elect'd together with you, saluteth you;' which text, understood literally, has been thought by some to denote, 1. Babylon, in Assyria; or, 2. Babylon in Egypt. 3. By others it is interpreted figuratively, and is supposed to denote Jerusalem; or, 4. Rome. So that there are four opinions concerning the place where this epistle was written.

"If St. Peter had read St. Paul's Epistles to the Romans before he wrote his first epistle, it was written after St. Paul's journey from Corinth to Jerusalem, described in Acts xx. xxi. for the Epistle to the Romans was written from Corinth. How much later than the time of this journey the First Epistle of Peter was written, it is very difficult, for want of sufficient data, to determine. The epistle itself has hardly any marks which can guide us in deciding the year of its composition; and we know nothing of the history of St. Peter from the time of the apostolic council at Jerusalem, Acts xv. which is the last place where St. Luke mentions him, till his arrival, many years afterward, at Rome, where, according to the accounts of ecclesiastical writers, he suffered martyrdom. However, a comparison of the first with the Second Epistle of St. Peter, will enable us to form at least an opinion on this subject. St. Peter says, in his second epistle, chap. iii. 1. Ταύτας ἡδὲ ἀπακητοῦ, δευτέρως ὑμῖν γραφῆς ἐκείνης, whence we may conclude, that his first epistle was written to the same persons as the second. But if the second epistle was written fifteen or twenty years after the first, they who received the one, were not the same persons as they who received the other; and we might rather expect, that in this case, St. Peter would have called his first epistle, an epistle which he had written to their fathers. It appears, then, that the interval between the dates of the two epistles could not have been very long; and as the second epistle was written shortly before St. Peter's death, we may infer, that the first epistle, was written either not long before, or not long after the year 60. On the other hand, Lardner assigns this epistle too late a date; for he is of opinion, that it was written between 63 and 65. This reason for supposing that it was not written till after 63, is, that an earlier date cannot be assigned for St. Peter's arrival at Rome; and as he takes the word Babylon, whence St. Peter dates his epistle, not in its proper, but in a mystical sense, as denoting Rome, he concludes that the epistle was not written before the time above mentioned. But if we take Babylon in its proper sense, the argument not only proves not what Lardner intended, but the very reverse; for if St. Peter's arrival in Rome is to be dated about the year 63, an epistle written by St. Peter, in Babylon, must have a date prior to that year.

"St. Peter, in the close of his epistle, sends a salutation from the church in Babylon, which, consequently, is the place where he wrote his epistle. But commentators do not agree in regard to the meaning of the word Babylon, some taking it in its literal and proper sense, others giving it a figurative and mystical interpretation. Among the advocates for the latter sense have been men of such learning and abilities, that I was misled by their authority in the younger part of my life to subscribe to it: but, at present, as I have more impartially examined the question, it appears to me very extraordinary, that when an apostle dates his epistle from Babylon, it should ever occur to any commentator to ascribe to this word a mystical meaning, instead of taking it in its literal and proper sense. For, in the first century, the ancient Babylon, on the Euphrates, was still in existence; and there was likewise a city on the Tigris, Seleucia, not far distant from the ancient Babylon, to which the name of modern Babylon was given: but through some mistake it has been supposed that the ancient Babylon, in the time of St. Peter, was no longer in being; and, in order to furnish a pretence for a mystical interpretation, it has been denied that Seleucia was ever so called.

"It is true, that the ancient Babylon, in comparison of its original splendour, might be called in the first century, a desolated city; yet it was not wholly a heap of ruins, nor wholly destitute of inhabitants. This appears from the account which Strabo, who lived in the time of Tiberius, has given of it: for he says, that Alexander, (who died at Babylon, and who intended, if he had lived, to have made it the place of his residence,) proposed to rebuild there a pyramid, which was a stadium in length, in breadth, and in height; but that his successors did not put the design into execution: that the Persians destroyed a part of Babylon, and that the Macedonians neglected it; but that Babylon had suffered the most from the building of Seleucia, by Seleucus Nicator, at the distance of three hundred stadia from it, because Seleucia then became the capital of the country, and Babylon was drained of its inhabitants. Strabo then adds, at present Seleucia is greater than Babylon, which last city has become a great desert.' If this be not sufficient proof that Babylon was still in existence in the first century, the reader may consult Cellærii Geographia, Tom. II. page 747, and Assemanii Bibliotheca Orientalis, Tom. III. Par. II. page 7.

"It will be objected, perhaps, that if Babylon still existed in the time of St. Peter, it was yet in such a state of decay, that an apostle would hardly have gone to preach the Gospel there. But I can see no reason why he should not; especially as Babylon was at that time so far from being literally destitute of inhabitants, that Strabo draws a parallel between this city and Seleucia, saying, at present Babylon is not so great as Seleucia, which was then the capital of the Parthian empire, and, according to Pliny, contained six hundred thousand inhabitants. To conclude, therefore, that Babylon, whence St. Peter dates his epistle, could not have been the ancient Babylon, because this city was then in a state of decay; and thence to argue that St. Peter used the word mystically to denote Rome, is nearly the same as if on the receipt of a letter dated from Ghent, or Antwerp, in which mention was made of a Christian community there, I concluded that because these cities are no larger than what they were in the sixteenth century, the writer of the epistle meant a spiritual Ghent or Antwerp, and that the epistle was really written from Amsterdam.

"It is therefore, at least possible, that St. Peter wrote his first epistle in the ancient Babylon, on the Euphrates. But before we conclude that he really did write there, we must first examine whether he did not mean Seleucia on the Tigris, which was sometimes called the modern Babylon. According to Strabo, Seleucia was only three hundred stadia distant from the ancient Babylon; and it was separated by the Tigris from Ctesiphon, the winter residence of the Parthian kings. At present it is not called Bagdad, as some have supposed, which is a very different city; but in conjunction with Ctesiphon, is named by Syrian and Arabic writers Medinothe, Medain, Madain, under which name it appears in D'Anville's maps in the latitude of 33° 7'.

"Since then the name of Babylon was given actually to Seleucia, it is not impossible that St. Peter thus understood the word Babylon, and that his first epistle, therefore, was written at Seleucia, on the Tigris. But I have shown, in the preceding part of this section, that there is likewise a possibility of its having been written in Babylon, properly so called; or in the ancient Babylon, on the Euphrates. The question, therefore, is, which of these two senses shall we give to the word Babylon? For one of these two we must give it, to it, unless we give it, without any notion. In the two last editions of the former sense; but, after a think it much more probable at the ancient Babylon. It is true, Ilinria, and Stephanus Byzantinus to Seleucia: but the two last of the fifth century; and, therefore not sufficient to prove that St. Peter wrote the first century. Lucan, indeed St. Peter; but then he uses which a writer is not bound and it is not improbable that because, partly, its celebrity add partly, because neither Ctesiphon suited the verse. The writer of can allow himself so such latitude that in the date of his epistle he to it. If, therefore, St. Peter ha he would have hardly called this though this name was sometimes it is most probable, that St. Peter cient Babylon, on the Euphrates.

"Before I conclude this section age in Josephus, which not or spiritual or mystical Babylon, bu present inquiry; and this passage portance, because Josephus was same age with St. Peter; and th event which took place thirty-si tern, namely, the delivery of Hyrc from imprisonment, by order of with permission to reside in Bab siderable number of Jews. "The third argument on which is, that, in the accounts which we St. Peter's history, no mention is lon. Now this argument would p knowledge of St. Peter's life and in fact than it really is. Let us sup eminent man in modern times, in t mention is made, that, during his Vienna; but that among his letters notwithstanding the silence of his Vienna. In this case, unless we l the whole epistle was a forgery, or a false date, we should immediat authority of this single epistle, the Vienna; and we should hardly thi Vienna. Lardner himself has arg with respect to Paul, though his known than that of St. Peter; an single passage, Tit. i. 5. 'For this t that St. Paul made a voyage into Cr his voyage is mentioned neither by St. Luke, nor by any other historian. No reason, therefore, can be assigned why we should refuse to argue in the same manner, with respect to St. Peter. In fact, Lardner's argument could no where have been more unfortunately applied than in the present instance.

"From the time of the apostolic council at Jerusalem, in the year 49, at which St. Peter was present, till the time of his arrival in Rome, which Lardner acknowledges was not before 63, there is an interval of fourteen years, during which we have no history of him whatsoever. How then can we form a judgment of his transactions during that period, except from his own writings? and how can the silence of history, a respect to his journey to Babylon, afford an argument that he never there, in contradiction to his own epistle; when he fact is, we have no history at all of St. Peter during this period? We cannot, therefore, talk of his silence in respect to any one particular transaction, since every transaction of St. Peter, throughout the whole of this interval, is unrecorded.

Lardner indeed conjectures, as the epistle is addressed to the inhabitants of Pontus, Galatia, &c. that St. Peter spent a part of his time in these countries, though he denies that St. Peter ever was in Babylon, whence the epistle is dated. Now this mode of arguing is nearly the same, as if I concluded from a letter dated from Vienna, and addressed to a person in Venice, that the writer of that letter had been in Venice; but not that he ever was at Vienna. Lardner supposes also, that St. Peter spent a part of this time in Jerusalem. Now it is impossible for us to determine what stay St. Peter made in Jerusalem, after the holding of the apostolic council; or whether he remained there at all; but this I think is certain, that he was not at Jerusalem when St. Paul returned thither for the last time; since St. Luke makes particular mention of St. James, and describes him as the head of the Christian community at Jerusalem, but says nothing of St. Peter, whom he would hardly have passed over in perfect silence, if he had been here. Now St. Paul's last visit to Jerusalem happened in the year 60; and since I have shown that the First Epistle of St. Peter was written about this time, it is not at all improbable that St. Peter, who was absent from Jerusalem, was then engaged in preaching the Gospel to the Babylonians.

"The last argument in favour of the opinion that the Babylon where Peter wrote was not Babylon properly so called, is derived from chap. ii. 13. where St. Peter commands obedience to the king; and from chap. ii. 17. where he says, 'Honour the king.' Hence Lardner concludes, that St. Peter must have written in a place which was subject to the same king or emperor as the people to whom he sent the epistle. But these were subject to the Roman emperor; whereas Babylon with its whole territory, was then subject, not to the Romans but the Parthians; and therefore, according to Lardner, could not have been the place where St. Peter wrote. Now this argument rests on a supposition which is contradicted by the common usage of every language; the expression, 'the king,' in a letter from a person in one country to a person in another country, may, according to circumstances, denote the king to which the reader is subject, as well as the king to which the writer is subject.

"It appears, then, that the arguments which have been alleged to show that St. Peter did not write his first epistle in the country of Babylon, are devoid of foundation; and, consequently, the notion of a mystical Babylon, as denoting either Jerusalem or Rome, loses its whole support. For in itself the notion is highly improbable; and, therefore, the bare possibility that St. Peter took a journey to Babylon, properly so called, renders it inadmissible. The plain language of epistolatory writing does not admit of the figures of poetry; and though it would be very allowable in a poem, written in honour of Göttingen, to style it another Athens; yet, if a professor of this university should, in a letter written from Göttingen, date it Athens, it would be a greater piece of pedantry than ever was laid to the charge of the learned. In like manner, though a figurative use of the word Babylon is not unsuitable to the animated and poetical language of the Apocalypse; yet St. Peter, in a plain and unadorned epistle, would hardly have called the place where he wrote, by any other appellation than that which literally and properly belonged to it."

That many persons, both of learning and eminence, have been of a different opinion from professor Michaelis, the intelligent reader is well aware; but Dr. Lardner, of all others, has written most argumentatively in vindication of the Mystical Babylon, i. e. Rome, as being the place from which the apostle wrote this epistle. His weightiest arguments, however, are here answered by Michaelis; and to me it appears that there is a great balance in favour of the opinion that Babylon, on the Euphrates, is the place intended. The decision of this question, although not an article of faith, is, nevertheless, of some importance.

CHAPTER I.

Of the persons to whom this epistle was directed, and their spiritual state, 1, 2. He describes their privileges, and thanks God for the grace by which they were preserved faithful in trials and difficulties, 3-5. The spiritual benefit they were to receive out of their afflictions, 6, 7. Their love to Christ, 8. And the salvation they received through believing, 9. This salvation was predicted by the prophets, who only saw it afar off, and had only a foretaste of it, 10-12. They should take encouragement, and be obedient and holy, 13-16. They should pray, and deeply consider the price at which they were purchased, that their faith and hope might be in God, 17-21. As their souls had been purified, by obeying the truth through the Spirit; they should love each other with a pure and fervent love, 22, 23. The strangers scattered throughout] Jews first, who had believed the Gospel, in the different countries here specified; and converted Gentiles also. Though the word strangers may refer to all truly religious people, see Gen. xiv. 9. Isa. xxxix. 12. in the Septuagint, and Heb. xi. 13. yet the inscription may have a special reference to those who were driven by persecution to seek refuge in those heathen provinces, to which the influence of their persecuting brethren did not extend.

Pontus] An ancient kingdom of Asia Minor, originally a part of Cappadocia, bounded on the east by Colchis; on the west, by the river Halys; on the north, by the Euxine Sea; and on the south, by Armenia Minor. This country probably derived its name from the Pontus Euxinus, on which it was partly situated. In the time of the Roman emperors, it was divided into three parts:—1. Pontus Cappadocicus. 2. Pontus Galaticus; and 3. Pontus Polemoniacus. The first extended from the Pontus Polemoniacus to Colchis, having Armenia Minor and the upper stream of the Euphrates for its southern boundary. The second extended from the river Halys to the river Thermodoon. The third extended from the river Thermodoon to the borders of the Pontus Cappadocicus.

this country was David Comnenus, who was taken prisoner, with all his family, by Mohammed II. in the year 1462, and carried to Constantinople; since which time, this country, (then called the empire of Trebizond, from Trapezund, a city founded by the Grecians, on the uttermost confines of Pontus,) has continued under the degrading power of the Turks.

Galatia] The ancient name of a province of Asia Minor, now called Amasia. It was called also Gallogracia, and Gallicia Parva. It was bounded on the east by Cappadocia; on the south, by Pamphylia; on the north, by the Euxine Sea; and on the west, by Bithynia.—See the Preface of the Epistle to the Galatians.

Cappadocia] An ancient kingdom of Asia, comprehending all the country lying between Mount Taurus and the Euxine Sea.

Asia] This word is taken in different senses:—(1.) It signifies one of the three general divisions of our continent; and one of the four of the whole earth. It is separated from Europe by the Mediterranean Sea, the Archipelago, the Black Sea, the Falus Maotic, the rivers Don and Donina; and from Africa, by the Arabic Gulf, or Red Sea; it is every where else surrounded by water. It is situated between 29° and 77° latitude N. and between longitude 29° E. and 170° W. and is about 7563 miles in length, and 5300 miles in breadth.

(2.) Asia Minor, that part of Turkey in Asia, now called Naxolia; which comprehends a great number of provinces, situated between the Euxine, Mediterranean, and Archipelago.

(3.) For that province of Asia Minor, of which Ephesus was the capital. It appears, says Calmet, that it is in this latter sense that it is used here by St. Peter, because Pontus, Galatia, and Bithynia, are comprised in the provinces of Asia Minor.—See Calmet.

Bithynia An ancient kingdom of Asia, formerly called Myria, Mydomia, Bebrystia, and Bithonia. It was bounded on the west by the Bosphorus Thracicus, and part of the Propontis; on the south, by the river Rhyndacus and Mount Olympus; on the north, by the Euxine Sea; and on the east, by the river Parthenius. This place is, in some sort, rendered infamous, by the conduct of Prusias, one of its kings, who delivered up Hannibal into the hands of the Romans, who had fled to him for protection. Nicomedes IV. bequeathed it to the Romans; and it is now in the hands of the Turks.

2. Elect according to the foreknowledge of God If the apostle had directed his letter to persons elected to eternal life, no one, as Drs. Lardner and Macknight properly argue, could have received such a letter; because no one could have been sure of his election in this way till he had arrived in heaven. But the persons to whom the apostle wrote were all, with propriety, said to be elect according to the foreknowledge of God; because, agreeably to the original purpose of God, discovered in the prophetic writings, Jews and Gentiles, indiscriminately, were called to be the visible church, and entitled to all the privileges of the people of God, on their believing the Gospel. In this sense the word elected is used in other places of Scripture; see 1 Thess. i. 4. and the note there.

The Rev. J. Wesley has an excellent note on this passage, which I shall transcribe for the benefit of those of my readers who may not have his works at hand:—

“Strictly speaking, there is no foreknowledge, no more than afterknowledge, with God; but all things are known to Him as present, from eternity to eternity. Election, in the scriptural sense, is God’s doing any thing that our merit or power has no part in. The true predestination, or foreappointment of God, is—1. He that believeth, shall be saved from the guilt and power of sin. 2. He that endureth to the end shall be saved eternally. 3. They who receive the precious gift of faith, thereby become the sons of God; and being sons, they shall receive the Spirit of holiness, to walk as Christ also walked. Throughout every part of this appointment of God, promise and duty go hand in hand. All is free gift; and yet, such is the gift, that it depends, in the final issue, on our future obedience to the heavenly call. But other predestination than this, either to life or death eternal, the Scripture knows not of: moreover, it is—1. Cruel respect of persons; an unjust regard of one, and an unjust disregard of another; it is mere creature partiality, and not infinite justice. 2. It is not plain Scripture doctrine, (if true,) but rather inconsistent with the express written word that speaks of God’s universal offers of grace; His invitations, promises, threatenings, being all general. 3. We are bid to choose life, and reprehended for not doing it. 4. It is inconsistent with a state of probation in those that must be saved, or must be lost. 5. It is of fatal consequence; all men being ready, on very slight grounds, to fancy themselves of the elect number. But the doctrine of predestination is entirely changed from what it formerly was: now, it implies neither faith, peace, nor purity: it is something that will do without them all. Faith is no longer, according to the modern predestination scheme, a Divine evidence of things not seen, wrought in the soul by the immediate power of the Holy Ghost; not an evidence at all, but a mere notion: neither is faith made any longer a means of holiness, but something that will do without it. Christ is no more a Saviour from sin, but a defence and a countenance of it. He is no more a Fountain of spiritual life in the soul of believers, but leaves his elect inwardly dry, and outwardly unprofitful; and is made little more than a refuge from the image of the heavenly: even from righteousness, peace, and joy, in the Holy Ghost.

“Through sanctification of the Spirit: through the renewing and purifying influences of His Spirit on their souls, unto obedience: to engage and enable them to yield themselves up to all holy obedience, the foundation of all which is the sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ. The atoning blood of Jesus Christ, which was typified by the sprinkling of the blood of sacrifices under the law; in allusion to which it is called the blood of sprinkling.”

3. Blessed be the God and Father Εὐλογῆσθαι τὸ Θεὸν καὶ Πατέρα; blessed be God even the Father, or blessed be God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. The cat, and, is omitted by the Syriac, Erpen’s Arabic, and the Ethiopic. But if we translate cat, even, a meaning which it frequently has in the New Testament, then we have a very good sense: let that God have praise who is the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, and who deserves the praise of every human being, for his infinite mercy to the world, in its redemption by Christ Jesus.

Begotten us again into a lively hope I think the apostle

6 Who are kept by the power of God through salvation, ready to be revealed in the last time: 6 Who are kept by the power of God through salvation, ready to be revealed in the last time: 6 Who are kept by the power of God through salvation, ready to be revealed in the last time: 6 Who are kept by the power of God through salvation, ready to be revealed in the last time: 6 Who are kept by the power of God through salvation, ready to be revealed in the last time:

has reference here to his own case, and that of his fellow-ties, at the time that Christ was taken by the Jews, and death. Previously to this time, they had strong confidence that he was the Messiah, and that it was he who should redeem Israel; but when they found that He actually expired on the cross, and was buried, they appear to have lost the great things which before they had in prospect, feelingly expressed by the two disciples, whom our Lord, after His resurrection, overtook on the road, going to see Luke xxiv. 13—24. And the hope that, with the with their Master, and seemed to be buried in His grave, restored by the certainty of His resurrection. From preaching miracles, &c. they had a hope of eternal life, and all other blessings promised by Him: by His death and this hope became nearly, if not altogether, extinct. His resurrection, the hope was revived. This is very expressed here by being begotten again to a living ἀκαίριτος ζωῆς; or, as some MSS. and Versions have ἀκαίριτος ζωῆς, to the hope of life; which one copy of with Augustin, Gildas, Vigilius of Tapscum, and Crus, have considered as meaning eternal life, agreeably to context; and, therefore, they read vita eterna.

The expressions, however, may include more part than what are above specified: as none can inherit life, except those who are children in the heavenly and none are children but those who are born again. Peter may be considered as laying here the foundation of hope of eternal life in the regeneration of the soul; can legally inherit but the children: and none are children till they are spiritually begotten and born again.

It is the Gospel alone that gives the well-grounded eternal life; and the ground on which this hope rests is the resurrection of Christ Himself. The certainty of resurrection, is the great seal of the Gospel. What is vision, what is prophecy, what is promise, even miracles, to that unbelief which is natural to such a subject as this? But the resurrection of the nature of Christ, the incontestable proofs of this Resurrection, and the ascension of our nature to heaven in His Person, such evidences of the possibility and certainty of the Resurrection, for ever to preclude all doubt from the heart of those who believe in Him.

4. To an inheritance Called an inheritance, because it belongs to the children of God. Eternal life cannot be any but these; for, even in heaven, the lot is dealt out to law; if children, then heirs; if not children, heirs.

Incorruptible ἀθάρατος: It has no principles of corruption or decay in it; and, therefore, must be totally free from this earth.

Undefiled ἁγίαστος: nothing impure can enter into it; no principles or seeds of dissolution in it; can never admit any; therefore its deterioration is impossible.

Fadeth not away ἀναφανῆσθαι, it cannot wither, it is in bloom; a metaphor taken from those flowers that lose their hue, nor their fragrance. From the Greek we have our flowers called amaranths, because they are long and odour for a long time.

Reserved in heaven Such a place as that described is not to be expected on earth: it is that which was by the earthly Canaan; and in reference to which, arches endured all trials and difficulties in this life. Him who is invisible.

5. Who are kept ἑφύλακται, who are defended, fortress, or castle. There is a remarkable correspondence between the two verbs used in this sentence; and the verb signifies to keep, watch, guard; and ἑφύλακται, is a platitude, or prison. And ἑφύλακται, from ἑφύλαξ, a sentinel to keep as under a military guard.—See on 22, 23. The true disciples of Christ are under the watchful care of God; and the inheritance is given them. In some countries, military posts are stationed on the confines, in order to prevent intrusions from neighbouring people: and in many cases, heirs, while in minority, are kept in fortified places, under military guard.

By the power of God Ἐν δυναμει Θεου, by the miracle working power of God; for nothing less is to keep and preserve, in this state of continual trial from the contagion that is in the world. But this power is interested in the behalf of the soul by faith; to our work, the exertion of the Almighty power is of persevering without the power, and no power with it.

Ready to be revealed Or rather, prepared to be revealed. The inheritance is prepared for you; but its glories are revealed till the last time, till ye have done with passed through your probation; having held fast your good consciences. Some by salvation understand the entrance of the Christians from the bondage of Judaism and of the Jewish polity being called the last time.

than of gold that perisheth, though * it be tried with fire, * might be found unto praise and honour and glory at the appearing of Jesus Christ.

9 Receiving * the end of your faith, even the salvation of your souls.

10 * Of which salvation the prophets have inquired and searched diligently, who prophesied of the grace that should come unto you:

suppose it to refer to the day of judgment, and the glorification of the soul in heaven.

6. Wherein ye greatly rejoice Some refer wherein, in eo, to the salvation mentioned above; to others, to the last time, καίρῳ σήμερου, in ver. 5: others think that it applies to the being kept by the power of God through faith; and others, that it refers to all the preceding advantages and privileges. It was in the present salvation of God that they rejoiced or gloried; though not without having an eye to the great recompense of reward.

Though now for a season Ολίγον ἄρτι, a little while yet; during your pilgrimage here below: which is but a point when compared with eternity.

If need be Ἐὰν δεῖ εἶναι, if it be necessary; if your situation and circumstances be such that you are exposed to trials and persecutions, which you cannot avoid, unless God were to work a miracle for your deliverance, which would not be for your ultimate good; as He purposes to turn all your trials and difficulties to your advantage.

Sometimes there is a kind of necessity that the followers of God should be afflicted: when they have no trials, they are apt to get careless; and when they have secular prosperity, they are likely to become worldly-minded. "God," said a good man, "can neither trust me with health nor money; therefore I am both poor and afflicted." But the disciples of Christ may be very happy in their souls, though grievously afflicted in their bodies and in their estates. Those to whom St. Peter wrote rejoiced greatly, danced for joy, (αἰνῶντες ὡς ἄνθρωποι) while they were grieved (ἀνὰ ψυχῆς) with various trials. The verb ἠνέχετο signifies to grieve, to make sorrowful: perhaps heaviness is not the best rendering of the original word, as this can scarcely ever consist with rejoicing; but to be sorrowful on account of something external to ourselves, and yet exulting in God from a sense of His goodness to us, are quite compatible: so that we may say with St. Paul, always sorrowing, yet still rejoicing.

7. That the trial of your faith being much more precious than of gold As, by the action of fire, gold is separated from all alloy and heterogeneous mixtures, and is proved to be gold by its enduring the action of the fire without losing any thing of its nature, weight, colour, or any other property; so genuine faith is proved by adversities, especially such as the primitive Christians were obliged to pass through. For, the word was then, "Renounce Jesus, and live;" "cleave to Him, and die;" or every Christian was in continual danger of losing his life. He then who preferred Christianity to his life, gave full proof, not only of his own sincerity, but also of the excellency of the principle by which he was influenced: as his religion put him in possession of greater blessings, and more solid comforts, than any thing the earth could afford.

Though it be tried with fire That is, though gold will bear the action of the fire for any given time, even millions of years, were they possible, without losing the smallest particle of weight or value; yet even gold, in process of time, will wear away by continual use: and the earth, and all its works, will be burnt up by that supernatural fire whose action nothing can resist. But on that day the faith of Christ's followers will be found brighter, and more glorious. The earth, and universal nature, shall be dissolved: but he who doeth the will of God shall abide for ever; and his faith shall then be found to the praise of God's grace, the honour of Christ, and the glory or glorification of his own soul throughout eternity. God Himself will praise such faith; angels and men will hold it in honour; and Christ will crown it with glory.—For some remarks on the nature and properties of gold, see at the end of the chapter.

8. Whom having not seen, ye love Those to whom the apostle wrote had never seen Christ in the flesh; and yet, such is his realizing nature of faith, they loved Him as strongly as any of His disciples could, to whom He was personally known. For faith in the Lord Jesus brings Him into the heart; and by His indwelling all His virtues are proved, and an excellence discovered beyond even that which His disciples beheld, when conversant with Him upon earth. In short, here is an equality between believers in the present time, and those who lived in the time of the incarnation: for Christ, to believing souls, is the same to-day that he was yesterday; and will be for ever.

Ye rejoice with joy unspeakable Ye have innumerable happiness through believing; and ye have the fullest, clearest, strongest evidence of eternal glory. Though they did not see Him on earth, and men could not see Him in glory; yet by that faith, which is the evidence of things not seen, and the subsistence of things hoped for, they had the very highest persuasion of their acceptance with God, their relation to Him as their Father, and their sonship with Christ Jesus.

9. Receiving the end of your faith Ye are put in possession of the salvation of your souls, which was the thing presented to your faith when ye were called by the Gospel of Christ. Your faith has had a proper issue, and has been crowned with a proper recompense. The word τέλος, end, is often used so as to imply the issue or reward of any labour or action.

Salvation of your souls The object of the Jewish expectations, in their Messiah, was the salvation or deliverance of their bodies from a foreign yoke; but the true Messiah came to save the soul from the yoke of the devil and sin. This glorious salvation these believers had already received.

10. Of which salvation the prophets have inquired The incarnation and suffering of Jesus Christ, and the redemption procured by Him for mankind, were made known, in a general way, by the prophets: but they themselves did not know the time when these things were to take place: nor the people among, and by whom, he was to suffer, &c.; they, therefore, inquired accurately, or earnestly, εὐσυνεργῶς, and searched diligently, εὐσυνεργῶς, inquiring of others who were then under the same inspiration, and carefully searching the writings of those who had, before their time, spoken of those things. The prophets plainly saw that the grace which was to come under the Messiah's kingdom was vastly superior to any thing that had ever been exhibited under the law; and, in consequence, they made all possible inquiry, and searched as after grains of gold, hidden among sand, or compacted with ore, (for such is the meaning of the original word,) in order to ascertain the time, and the signs of that time, in which this wondrous display of God's love and mercy to man was to take place: but all that God thought fit to instruct them in was what is mentioned in ver. 12.

11. The glory that should follow. Not only the glory of His resurrection, ascension, exaltation, and the effusion of His Spirit; but that grand manifestation of God's infinite love to the world, in causing the Gospel of His Son to be every where preached; and the glorious moral changes which should take place in the world under that preaching; and the final glorification of all them who had here received the report, and continued faithful unto death. And, we may add to this, the ineffable glorification of the human nature of Jesus Christ; which, throughout eternity, will be the glorious Head of His glorified body, the church.

12. Unto whom it was revealed We may presume that, in a great variety of cases, the prophets did not understand the meaning of their own predictions. They had a general view of God's designs; but of particular circumstances, connected with those great events, they seem to have known nothing; God reserving the explanation of all particulars to the time of the issue of such prophecies. When they wished to find out the times, the seasons, and the circumstances, God gave them to understand that it was not for themselves, but for us that they did minister the things which are now reported unto us by the preaching of the Gospel. This was all the satisfaction they received in consequence of their earnest searching: and this was sufficient to repress all needless curiosity, and to induce them to rest satisfied that the Judge of all the earth would do right. If all succeeding interpreters of the prophecies had been contented with the same information relative to the predictions still unaccomplished, we should have had fewer books, and more wisdom.

Angels desire to look into. Παρρησια, to stoop down to, the posture of those who are earnestly intent on finding out a thing, especially a writing difficult to be read; they bring it to the light, place it so that the rays may fall on it as collectively as possible, and then stoop down in order to examine all the parts, that they may be able to make out the whole. There is evidently an allusion here to the attitude of the cherubim who stood at the ends of the ark of the covenant, in the inner tabernacle, with their faces turned towards the mercy-seat, or propitiatory, in a bending posture, as if looking attentively; or, as we term it, peering upon it. Even the holy angels are struck with astonishment at the plan of human redemption; and justly wonder at the incarnation of that infinite Object of their adoration. If, then, these things be objects of deep consideration to the angels of God, how much more so should they be

14 As obedient children, not fashioning yourselves according to the former lusts in your ignorance:

15 But as he which hath called you is holy, so be ye holy in all manner of conversation;

16 Because it is written, Be ye holy; for I am holy.

17 And if ye call on the Father, who without respect of persons judgeth according to every man's work, pass the time of your sojourning here in fear:

18 Forasmuch as ye know that ye were not redeemed with corruptible things, as silver and gold, from your vain conversation received by tradition from your fathers;

19 But with the precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb, without blemish and without spot:

20 Who verily was fore-ordained before the foundation of the world, but was manifest in these last times for you, to us; in them, angels can have no such interest as human beings have.

We learn from the above, that it was the Spirit of Christ in the Jewish prophets, that prophesied of Christ; it was that Spirit which revealed Him; and it is the same Spirit which takes of the things of Christ, and shows them unto us. Christ was never known by prophecy but through His own Spirit; and He never was known nor can be known, to the salvation of any soul, but by a revelation of the same Spirit. It is He alone that bears witness with our spirits that we are the children of God.

13. Gird up the loins of your mind] Take courage from this display of God's love, now made known to you; and, though you must expect trials, yet fortify your minds with the consideration, that He who has given you His Son Jesus, will withhold from you no manner of thing that is good. The allusion here is to the long robes of the Asiatics; which, when they were about to perform any active service, they tucked in their girdles: this they did also when they waited on their superiors at meals.

Hope to the end for the grace] Continue to expect all that God has promised; and particularly that utmost salvation, that glorification of body and soul, which ye shall obtain at the revelation of Christ, when He shall come to judge the world.

But if the apostle alludes here to the approaching revelation of Christ, to inflict judgment on the Jews, for their final rebellion and obstinacy; then the grace, your benefit, may intend their preservation from the evils that were coming upon that people, and their wonderful escape from Jerusalem at the time that the Roman armies came against it.

14. Not fashioning yourselves] As the offices of certain persons are known by the garb, or livery, they wear; so transgressors: where we see the world's livery, we see the world's servants; they fashion or habit themselves according to their lusts; and we may guess that they have a worldly mind by their conformity to worldly fashions.

15. But as he which hath called you] Heathenism scarcely produced a god whose example was not the most abominable; their greatest gods, especially, were paragons of impurity: none of their philosophers could propose the objects of their adoration, as objects of imitation. Here, Christianity has an infinite advantage over heathenism. God is holy, and He calls upon all who believe in Him, to imitate his holiness; and the reason why they should be holy is, that God who has called them, is holy.

17. And if ye call on the Father] Seeing ye invoke the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, and your Father through Christ, and profess to be obedient children and sojourners here below for a short time only; see that ye maintain a godly reverence for this Father, walking in all His testimonies blameless.

Who, without respect of persons] God is said to be no respecter of persons; for this reason, among many others, that, being infinitely righteous, He must be infinitely impartial. He cannot prefer one to another, because He has nothing to hope or fear from any of his creatures. All partialities among men spring from one or other of these two principles, hope or fear: God can feel neither of them, and therefore God can be no respecter of persons: He approves or disapproves of men according to their moral character. He pities all, and provides salvation for all; but He loves them in proportion to that resemblance; i. e. the more of His Image He sees in any, the more He loves him, & contra. And every man's work will be the evidence of his conformity, or non-conformity to God, and according to this evidence, will God judge him. Here, then, is no respect of persons: God's judgment will be according to a man's work; and a man's work or conduct, will be according to the moral state of his mind. No favouritism can prevail in the day of judgment; nothing will pass there but holiness of heart and life. A righteousness imputed, and not possessed and practised, will not avail where God judgeth according to every man's work. It would be well that those sinners and spurious believers, who fancy themselves safe and complete in the righteousness of Christ, while impure and unholty in themselves, would think of this testimony of the apostle.

18. Ye were not redeemed with] Things] To re-

21 Who by him do believe in God, that raised the dead, and gave him glory; that your faith and be in God.

23 Being born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the word of God, which liveth and abideth ever.

24 For of all flesh is as grass, and all the glory of man as the flower of grass. The grass withereth, and the flower falleth away:

25 But the word of the Lord endureth forever; and this is the word which by the Gospel is preached unto you.

deem, Arpou, signifies to procure life for a captive for a slave, by paying a price; and the precious blood is here stated to be the price at which the souls of men and Gentiles were redeemed: it was a price paid in price which God's righteousness required.

Corruptible things mean here, any thing that gives in exchange for another; but the term excludes all created things, as all these are corruptible. The meaning of the apostle is evidently, things could not purchase the souls of men: else if Christ had not been offered: could any thing less God would not have given up His only begotten Son, silver and gold, the most valuable medium of exchange among men, bear no proportion in their value to the lost world; for there should be a congruity between the thing purchased and the valuable consideration given for it; and the laws and customs of nature on this ground, perishable things, or things which must be infinitely less than the worth of the men, cannot purchase those souls. Nothing, therefore, but such a ransom price as God provided, could be ransom, oblation, and satisfaction, for the sins of men. [Vain consecration] Empty foolish, and unproductive; full of vain hopes, vain fears, and vain vain. Received by tradition from your fathers] The innumerable burthens of empty ceremonies, and rites, and nances, which they received by tradition from their rabbins, or doctors. The Gentiles were not less burdened with such than the Jews; all were wedded to them because they received them from their forefathers, due from theirs. And this antiquity and tradition, the ground-work of many a vain ceremony and usage; and of numerous doctrines which have not in their behalf but this mere antiquity. But we seem not to consider that error and sin are nearly the world itself.

19. The precious blood of Christ] Τιμοσ ἀγαπώμενον blood; how valuable, neither is nor could be as of a lamb] Such as was required for a sacrifice to God: and τὰς Λαμβ of God that takes away the world.

Without blemish] In Himself; and without spot: being perfectly pure in His soul, and right life.

20. Who verily was fore-ordained] Προπερογνωστων: appointed in the Divine purpose to be the world; because infinitely approved by the Divine will.

Before the foundation of the world] Before given, or any sacrifice prescribed by it; and its final system was appointed in reference to this Lamb; and, consequently, from him they derive significance and virtue. The phrase καταβολή κτίσεως of the world, occurs often in the New Testament, supposed, by some learned men, and good critics, commencement of the Jewish state. Perhaps it means in Matt. xiii. 35. Luke xl. 50. Eph. 1. 4. R. ix. 26. But if we take it here in its common signification, creation of universal nature, then it shows, that seeing the fall and ruin of man, appointed the way to cure the disease. It may here have a reference to the opinion of the Jewish doctors, who maintain that the world existed before the creation of the world, one of the Mosaic.

Last times] The Gospel dispensation, called that as we have often seen, because never to be succeeded by another.

21. Who by him do believe in God] This is superior to the Gentiles, who never knew the true God, heard the preaching of the Gospel: the Jews had long before, but the Gentiles had every thing to the first preachers of the Gospel arrived amongst them. Gave him glory] Rated Him to His right hand as a Prince and a Saviour, He gives repentance and life.

That your faith] In the fulfilment of all His promises your hope of eternal glory, might be in God, who is able in His counsels, and infinite in His mercies.

22. Seeing ye have purified your souls] Having purified your souls in obeying the truth, by believing in Christ Jesus, through the influence and teaching of the Spirit; and giving full proof of it by unfeigned love to the brethren; ye love one another, or ye will love each other with a pure heart fervently. These persons—First, Heard the truth, that is, the Gospel; thus called in a variety of places in the New Testament, because it contains the truth without mixture of error; and is the truth and substance of all the preceding dispensations by which it was typified. Secondly, They obeyed that truth, by believing on Him who came into the world to save sinners. Thirdly, Through this believing on the Son of God, their hearts were purified by the word of truth applied to them by the Holy Spirit. Fourthly, The love of God being shed abroad in their hearts by the Holy Ghost, they loved the brethren with pure hearts; fervently, καρπῶς, intently, or continually: the full proof that their brotherly love was unfeigned: φιλᾶλθιαν ἀνυπόκριτον, a fraternal affection without hypocrisy.

23. Being born again] For, being born of Abraham's seed, will not avail to the entering of the kingdom of heaven.

Not of corruptible seed] By no human generation, or earthly means; but of incorruptible, a Divine and heavenly principle, which is not liable to decay, nor to be affected by the changes and chances to which all subinary things are exposed.

By the word of God] Δια λόγου ζωντος Θεου, by the doctrine of the living God, which remaineth for ever; which doctrine shall never change, no more than the Source shall, whence it proceeds.

24. For all flesh is as grass] Earthly seeds, earthly productions, and earthly generations, shall fall and perish like as the grass, and flowers of the field; for the grass withereth, and the flower falleth off; though, in the ensuing spring and summer, they may put forth new verdure and bloom:

25. But the word of the Lord] The doctrine delivered by God concerning Christ, endureth for ever; having, at all times, and in all seasons, the same excellence and the same efficacy.

And this is the word] To πῶς, what is spoken by the Gospel preached unto you. "This is a quotation from Isa. xl. 6—8, where the preaching of the Gospel is foretold; and recommended from the consideration that every thing which is merely human, and, among the rest, the noblest races of mankind, with all their glory and grandeur, their honour, riches, beauty, strength, and eloquence; as also the arts which men have invented, and the works they have executed, shall decay as the flowers of the field. But the Gospel, called by the prophet the word of the Lord, shall be preached while the world standeth."—Macknight. All human schemes of salvation, and plans for the melioration of the moral state of man, shall come to nought; and the doctrine of Christ crucified, though a stumbling-block to the Jews, and foolishness to the Gentiles, shall be alone the power of God for salvation to every soul that believeth.

As the apostle, on ver. 7. mentions gold, and gold chymically examined and tried; and as this figure frequently occurs in the Sacred Writings; I think it necessary to say something here of the nature and properties of that metal.

Gold is defined by chymists to be the most perfect, the most luctile, the most tenacious, and the most unchangeable of all metals. Its specific gravity is about 19.3. A cubic foot of pure gold, cast and not hammered, weighs 1348lb. In its native state, without mixture, it is yellow; and has no perceptible smell nor taste. When exposed to the action of the fire, it becomes red hot before it melts; but in melting suffers no alteration: but if a strong heat be applied while in fusion, it becomes of a beautiful green colour. The continual action of my furnace, howsoever long applied, has no effect on any of its properties. It has been kept in a state of fusion for several months, in the furnace of a glass-house, without suffering the smallest change. The electric and galvanic fluids inflame and convert it into a purple oxyd, which is volatilized in the form of smoke. In the focus of a very powerful burning-glass it becomes volatilized, and partially vitrified; so that we may say with the apostle, that, though gold is tried by the fire, abides the action of all culinary fires, howsoever applied, yet it perisath by the celestial fire and the solar influence: the rays of the sun, collected in the focus of a powerful burning-glass, and the application of the electric fluid, destroy its colour, and alter and impair all its properties. This is but a late discovery; and, previously to it, a philosopher would have ridiculed St. Peter for saying, gold that perisatheth. Gold is so very tenacious that a piece of it drawn into wire, one tenth of an inch in diameter, will sustain a weight of 500lb. without breaking. One grain of gold may be so extended, by its great malleability, as to be easily divided into two millions of parts; and a cubic inch of gold into nine thousand five hundred and twenty-three millions eight hundred and nine thousand five hundred and twenty-three parts; each of which may be distinctly seen by the naked eye! A grain and a half of gold may be beaten into leaves of one inch square; which, if intersected by parallel lines, drawn at right angles to each other, and distant only the 100th part of an inch, will produce twenty-five millions of little squares, each of which may be distinctly seen without the help of glasses! The surface of any given quantity of gold, according to Mr. Magellan, may be extended by the hammer 159,092 times! Eighty books, or two thousand leaves, of what is called leaf-gold, each leaf measuring 3.3 square inches, viz. each leaf containing 10.89 square inches, weighs less than 384 grains; each book, therefore, or twenty-five leaves, is equal to 272.23 inches, and weighs about 4.8 grains; so that each grain of gold will produce 56,713, or nearly fifty-seven square inches! The thickness of the metal thus extended, appears to be no more than the one 282,000th of an inch! One pound, or sixteen ounces of gold, would be enough to gild a silver wire sufficient, in length, to encompass the whole terraqueous globe, or to extend 25,000 miles!

Notwithstanding this extreme degree of tenacity, or thinness, which some carry much higher, no pore can be discerned in it by the strongest magnifying powers; nor is it pervious to the particles of light; nor can the subtlest fluids pass through it! Its ductility has never yet been carried to the uttermost pitch; and to human art and ingenuity is, probably, unlimited. Sulphur, in the state of a sulphuret, dissolves it; tin and lead greatly impair its tenacity; and zinc hardens and renders it very brittle. Copper heightens its colour, and renders it harder, without greatly impairing its ductility. It readily unites with iron, which it hardens in a remarkable manner. The oxygenated muriatic acid, and the nitromuriatic acid, dissolve gold. In this state it is capable of being applied, with great success, to the gilding of steel. The process is very simple, and is instantaneously performed; viz.—To a solution of gold in the nitro-muriatic acid, add about twice the quantity of sulphuric ether:—In order to gild either iron or steel; let the metal be well polished, the higher the better:—the ether which has taken up the gold, may be applied by a camel hair pencil, or small brush; the ether then evaporates, and the gold becomes strongly attached to the surface of the metal. I have seen lancets, penknives, &c. gilded in a moment, by being dipped in this solution. In this manner all kinds of figures, letters, mottoes, &c. may be delineated on steel, by employing a pen, or fine brush. The nitro-muriatic acid, formerly called aqua regia, is formed by adding muriatic acid, vulgarly spirit of salt, to the nitric acid, formerly aqua fortis. Two parts of the muriatic acid to one of the nitric constitute this solvent of gold and platina, which is called the nitro-muriatic acid. Gold was considered the heaviest of all metals, till the year 1748, when the knowledge of platina was brought to Europe by Don Antonio Ulloa: this, if it be a real metal, is the hardest and weightiest of all others. The specific gravity of gold is, as we have seen, 19.3; that of platina, is from 20.6 to 23; but gold will ever be the most valuable of all metals, not merely from its scarcity, but from its beautiful colour and great ductility, by which it is applicable to so many uses; and its power of preserving its hue and polish without suffering the least tarnish or oxydation from the action of the air.

 6 Wherefore also it is contained in the scripture, <sup>m</sup> Behold, I lay in Zion a chief corner-stone, elect, precious: and he that believeth on him shall not be confounded.
 7 Unto you therefore which believe as is <sup>n</sup> precious: but unto ed to their new nature; and this the apostle calls the sincere milk of the word, το γάλακτος ἀδόλου γάλα; or, as some translate, the rational unadulterated milk; i. e. the pure doctrines of the Gospel, as delivered in the Epistles and Gospels: and as preached by the apostles and their successors. The rabbins frequently express learning to know the law, &c. by the term sucking; and their disciples are often denominated those that suck the breast. The figure is very expressive: as a child newly born shows an immediate desire for that nourishment, and that only, which is its most proper food; so they, being just born of God, should show that the incorruptible seed abides in them; and that they will receive nothing that is not suited to that new nature; and, indeed, they can have no spiritual growth but by the pure doctrines of the Gospel.

That ye may grow thereby Εἰς ἐκτρέψιν, unto salvation; is added here by ABC, and about forty others; both the Syriac, the Arabic of Erpen, Coptic, Ethiopic, Armenian, Slavonic, Vulgate, and several of the ancient Fathers. The reading is undoubtedly genuine, and is very important. It shows why they were regenerated, and why they were to desire the unadulterated doctrines of the Gospel; viz. that they might grow up unto salvation. This was the end they should always have in view; and nothing could so effectually promote this end as continually receiving the pure truth of God, claiming the fulfilment of its promises, and acting in under its dictates.

3. If so be ye have tasted) Εἰς τὸ γευσαθε: seeing ye have tasted. There could be no doubt that they had tasted the goodness of Christ, who were born again of incorruptible seed; and whose hearts were purified by the truth; and who had like precious faith with the apostles themselves.

That the Lord is gracious Οὐκ ἔστις ὁ Χριστός; from the similarity of the letters, many MSS and several of the Fathers, have read Χριστός ὁ κριπτός, the Lord is Christ, or Christ is the Lord.

This seems to refer to Psa. xxiv. 8. O taste and see that the Lord is good, γευσαθε καὶ ἴδετε οὐκ ἔστις ὁ κριπτός, Sept. And there is still a reference to the sucking child, that, having once tasted its mother's milk, ever after desires and longs for it. As they were born of God, and had tasted His goodness, they would naturally desire the same pure unadulterated milk of the word.

4. To whom coming as unto a living stone) This is a reference to Isa. xxviii. 16. Behold I lay in Zion for a foundation, a stone, a tried stone, a precious corner-stone, a sure foundation. Jesus Christ is in both the prophet and apostle, represented as the foundation on which the Christian church is built, and on which it must continue to rest: and the stone or foundation is called here living, to intimate that he is the Source of life to all His followers; and that it is in union with him that they live, and answer the end of their regeneration; as the stones of a building are of no use but as they occupy their proper places in a building, and rest on the foundation.

Disallowed indeed of men) That is, rejected by the Jews. This is a plain reference to the prophecy, Psa. cxviii. 22. The stone which the builders rejected is become the head-stone of the corner.

Chosen of God) To be the Saviour of the world, and the Founder of the church, and the foundation on which it rests. As Christ is the choice of the Father, we need have no doubt of the efficacy and sufficiency of all that He has suffered and done for the salvation of a lost world. God can never be mistaken in His choice; therefore, he that chooses Christ for his portion, shall never be confounded.

Precious) Εἰσπονος, honourable: howsoever despised and rejected by men, Jesus, as the Sacrifice for a lost world, is infinitely honourable in the sight of God; and those who are united by faith to Him, partake of the same honour, being members of that great and glorious body of which He is the head; and are stones in that superb building of which he is the foundation.

5. Ye also, as lively stones) Αἱ βολίθωνες, living stones; each being instinct with the principle of life, which proceeds from Him who is the foundation, called above λαθὼν ζωῆς, a living stone.

The metaphor, in this and the following verse, is as bold as it is singular; and commentators and critics have found it difficult to hit on any principle of explanation. In all metaphors there is something in the natural image that is illustrative of some chief moral property in the thing to be represented. But what analogy is there between the stones of a building, and a multitude of human beings? We shall soon see: the church of C them which be disobedient, the stone which they allowed, the same is made the head of the corner.

8 And a stone of stumbling, and a rock of offence, them which stumble at the word, being disobedient unto also they were appointed.

9 But ye are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a peculiar people; that ye should shew forth the praises of him who hath called you out of darkness into his marvellous light:

10 Which in time past were not a people, but have now obtained mercy, through the blood of Jesus Christ, the precious blood, shed for us, that we should purify to ourselves a zealous and good conversation.

figure of a house, or rather household; and, as a family, must have place of residence; hence by the house itself, or material building, is put for the family which occupies it; the corner-stone being contained. This point will receive the fullest illustration we have recourse to the Hebrew: in this language signifies both a house and a family; בנין, a son; daughter: and אבן, a stone. Of all these names, he built, is, I believe, the common root.

beit, a house, is built of בנין abenim, stones; banah, he built, is a proper radix for both building; and, בנין beit, a family or household, (He is constituted or made up of בנין banim, sons, and daughters, hence the same root בנין banah, he built, is common to all; for sons and daughters build up the family, as stones do a building. Here, then, is the metaphor: the spiritual house is the holy family or household; this family, or household, of the sons and daughters of God Almighty; a propriety of living stones, because this is the spiritual family. As a building rests upon a foundation, so the spiritual family is its support; so a family rests on the Father, who is properly considered the head or support of the building. But as every father and transitory, none can be called a living stone or support, but Him who liveth for ever, and is independent; so none but Jesus, who hath life in himself, and who is the Way, the Truth, and the Life, can be a permanent foundation or support to the spiritual house. And as all the stones, sons and daughters, constitute the spiritual building, are made part of the life of Christ; consequently, they may, with great propriety, be called living stones; that is, sons and daughters who live by Christ Jesus, because He lives in them, following the metaphor, these various living stones, one grand temple, in which God is worshipped, and He manifests Himself, as He did in the temple of stone, son and daughter, being a spiritual sacrifice, they all offer up praise and thanksgiving to Christ; and such sacrifices being offered up in truth, through the merit of His Son, are all acceptable.

This is the true metaphor, and which has not been known, ever been properly traced out. To talk of living said to be alive as long as they are not a quarry, but continue to partake of that nourishment circulates from vein to vein: it is an unsatisfactory philosophical; the other is the true metaphor, and every thing.

6. Behold, I lay in Zion) This intimates that the foundation of the Christian church should be laid at Jerusalem; there it was laid, for there Christ suffered, and the preaching of the Gospel commenced.

A chief corner-stone) This is the same as the stone; and it is called here the chief corner-stone is laid in the foundation, at an angle of the building two sides form the ground-work of a side and end; this might probably be designed to show that, in the Jews and Gentiles were to be united; and this is the reason why it was called a stone of stumbling, or offence; for, nothing stumbled, nothing offended much as the calling of the Gentiles into the church, and admitting them to the same privileges which before peculiar to the Jews.

Elect, precious) Chosen and honourable.—See Isa. xxviii. 16. but rather more from the Septuagint the Hebrew text. The latter we translate, he shall not make haste. He who comes to God, that for salvation, shall never be confounded; he shall flee away, for no enemy shall ever be able to attack him.

7. Unto you therefore which believe) You, both Jews and Gentiles.

Ye are precious) Υμῶν οὐκ ἔστι τιμιότης: it is to you who believe; i. e. the honour of being united, and of having your souls saved through the Lamb; and becoming sons and daughters of God.

Them which be disobedient) The Jews, who reject the Gospel; that very Person whom they reject of the corner, is Lord over all, and has all power in heaven and the earth.

8. A stone of stumbling) Because in Him a Gentiles, who believe, are united; and because they are admitted into the church, and called by the name people of God: which had not obtained mercy, but now have obtained mercy.

11 Dearly beloved, I beseech you * as strangers and pilgrims, abstain from fleshly lusts, * which war against the soul;

12 Having your conversation honest among the Gentiles:

* 1 Cor. xii. 13, Ps. xli. 12 & 19. 13. Heb. ii. 13. Ch. i. 17. — Rom. xiii. 14. Gal. ii. 14. James 4. 4.

Some privileges which the Jews, as the peculiar people of God, had enjoyed for two thousand years before; therefore they rejected the Christian religion, they would have no parallels with themselves in the salvation of God. This was the true cause why the Jews rejected the Gospel; and they rejected Christ because He did not come as a secular Prince. In the one case He was a stone of stumbling. He was poor, and affected no worldly pomp; in the other, He was a rock of offence, for His Gospel called the Gentiles to be a peculiar people, whom the Jews believed to be everlastingly reprobated, and utterly incapable of any spiritual good.

Whereunto also they were appointed. Some good critics and the verse thus, carrying on the sense from the preceding: As a stone of stumbling, and a rock of offence: The disobedient stumble against the word, (or doctrine,) to which ye they were appointed.—Macknight.

St. Wakefield, leaving out, with the Syriac, the clause—The stone which the builders disallowed, the same is made the head of the corner, reads the 7th and 8th verses thus: To you, therefore, who trust therein, this stone is honourable; but, to those who are not persuaded, (αὐθιγῶν), it is a stone to stumble upon, and to stumble against, at which they stumble do believe not the word; and unto this indeed they were appointed: that is, they who believe not the word were appointed to stumble and fall by it, not to disbelieve it; for the word of the Lord is either a savour of life unto life, or death unto death, to all them that hear it; according as they receive it by faith, or reject it by unbelief. The phrase πίπτειν τῶν ἁγίων is very frequent among the purest Greek writers, and signifies to attribute any thing to another, or to speak a thing of them; in which Kypke gives several examples from Plutarch; and paraphrase the words thus: This stumbling and offence, particularly of the Jews, against Christ, the true stone, was long ago asserted and predicted by the prophets, by Christ, and by others; compare Isa. viii. 14, 15. Matt. xxi. 42, 44. Luke ii. 34. and Rom. ix. 32, 33. Now, this interpretation of the word is more likely, because it is evident that St. Peter refers to Isa. viii. 14, 15. And he shall be for a sanctuary; but for a stone of stumbling, and for a rock of offence to both the houses of Israel, for a gin and for a snare to the inhabitants of Jerusalem; and many among them shall stumble, and fall, and be broken, &c. The disobedient, therefore, being appointed to stumble against the word, or being prophesied of, as persons that should stumble, necessarily mean, in the connexion in which it stands, and from the sense in the prophet, that their stumbling, falling, and being broken, is the consequence of their disobedience or unbelief; but there is no intimation that they were appointed or decreed to disobey, that they might stumble, and fall, and be broken. They stumbled and fell through their obstinate unbelief; and thus their stumbling and falling, as well as their unbelief, were of themselves: in consequence of this they were appointed to be broken: this was God's work of judgment. This seems to be the meaning which our Lord attaches to this very prophecy, which he quotes against the chief priests and elders, Matt. xxi. 44. On the whole of these passages, see the notes on Matt. xxi. 42—44.

9 Ye are a chosen generation. The titles formerly given to the whole Jewish church, i. e. to all the Israelites without exception, all who were in the covenant of God by circumcision, whether they were holy persons or not, are here given to Christians in general, in the same way; i. e. to all who believed in Christ, whether Jews or Gentiles, and who received baptism in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost.

The Israelites were a chosen or elected race, to be a special people unto the Lord their God, above all people that were upon the face of the earth, Deut. vii. 6.

They were also a royal priesthood, or what Moses calls a kingdom of priests, Exod. xix. 6. For all were called to sacrifice to God; and He is represented to be the King of that people, and Father of those of whom He was King; therefore they were all royal.

They were a holy nation, Exod. xix. 6. for they were separated from all the people of the earth, that they might worship the one only true God, and abstain from the abominations that were in the heathen world.

They were also a peculiar people, λαός τις περίσπριτος, a purified people: ἁγία σκευή, a private property, belonging to God Almighty, Deut. vii. 6. none other having any right in them; and they being under obligation to God alone. All these things the apostle applies to the Christians, to whom, indeed, they belong, in their spirit and essence, in such a way as they could not belong to the Hebrews of old. But they were called to this state of salvation out of darkness, idolatry, superstition, and ungodliness, into His marvelous light. The Gospel dispensation, which, in reference to the discoveries it has made of God, His nature, will, and gracious promises towards mankind, differed so much from the preceding dispensation of the Jews, as the light of the meridian sun from that, * whereas they speak against you as evil doers, † they may by your good works, which they shall behold, glorify God in the day of visitation.

the faint twinkling of a star. And they had these privileges that they might show forth the praises of Him who had thus called them; apart, the virtues, those perfections of the wisdom, justice, truth, and goodness of God, that shone most illustriously in the Christian dispensation. These they were to exhibit in a holy and useful life, being transformed into the image of God, and walking as Christ Himself walked.

10 Which is time past were not a people. This is a quotation from Hosea i. 9, 10. and ii. 23. where the calling of the Gentiles, by the preaching of the Gospel, is foretold. From this it is evident, that the people to whom the apostle now addresses himself, had been Gentiles, covered with ignorance and superstition; and now had obtained mercy by the preaching of the Gospel of Christ.

11. As strangers and pilgrims. See the note on Heb. xi. 13. These were strangers and pilgrims in the most literal sense of the word; see chap. i. 1. for they were strangers scattered through Asia, Pontus, &c.

Abstain from fleshly lusts. As ye are strangers and pilgrims, and profess to seek a heavenly country, do not entangle your affections with earthly things. While others spend all their time, and employ all their skill, in acquiring earthly property, and totally neglect the salvation of their souls. They are not strangers, they are here at home; they are not pilgrims, they are seeking an earthly possession; Heaven is your home, seek that; God is your portion, seek Him. All kinds of earthly desires, whether those of the flesh or of the eye, or those included in the pride of life, are here comprised in the words fleshy lusts.

Which war against the soul. Αἰτίαι στρατεύονται κατὰ τὴν ψυχῆς, which are marshalled and drawn up in battle array, to fight against the soul; either to slay it, or to bring it into captivity. This is the object and operation of every earthly and sensual desire. How little do those who indulge them, think of the ruin which they produce!

12 Having your conversation honest. Living in such a manner among the Gentiles, in whose country you sojourn, as becomes the Gospel which ye profess.

That, whereas they speak against you as evil doers. In all the heathen countries, in the first age of the church, the Christians and the Jews were confounded together; and, as the latter were every where exceedingly troublesome and seditious, the Christians shared in their blame; and suffered no small measure of obloquy and persecution on this very account. It was doubly necessary, therefore, that the Christians should be exceedingly cautious; and that their conduct should prove that, although many of them were of the same nation, yet they who had embraced Christianity differed widely in their spirit and conduct from those, whether Jews or Gentiles, who had not received the faith of Christ.

In the day of visitation. I believe this refers to the time when God should come to execute judgment on the disobedient Jews, in the destruction of their civil polity, and the subversion of their temple and city. God did at that time put a remarkable difference between the Jews and the Christians. all the former were either destroyed or carried into slavery, not one of the latter: nor did they deserve it, for not one of them had joined in the sedition against the Roman government. That the day of visitation means a time in which punishment should be inflicted, is plain, from Isa. x. And what will ye do in the day of visitation, and in the desolation which shall come from afar? To whom will ye flee for help? And where will ye leave your glory? Some think that, by the phrase in this place, is meant, the time in which they should be brought before the heathen magistrates, who, after an impartial examination, should find them innocent, and declare them as such; by which God would be glorified; the work appearing to be His own. Others think that it signifies the time in which God should make them the offer of mercy by Jesus Christ. The words, however, may refer to the time in which the Christians should be called to suffer for the testimony of Christ: the heathens seeing them bear their sufferings with unconquerable patience, were constrained to confess that God was with them; and not a few, from being spectators of their sufferings became converts to Christianity.

13. Submit yourselves to every ordinance of man. In every settled state, and under every form of political government, where the laws are not in opposition to the laws of God, it may be very soundly and rationally said, "Genuine Christians have nothing to do with the laws but to obey them." Society, and civil security, are in a most dangerous state when the people take it into their heads that they have a right to re-model and change the laws. See the whole of this subject fully handled in the notes on Rom. xiii. 1, &c. to which I beg every reader, who may wish to know the political sentiments of this work, to have recourse.

The words ἀρραβώνος τροπῆς, literally signify, not every ordinance of man, but every human creature; yet τροπῆς signifies sometimes to arrange, order, as well as to create, and therefore our translation may do: but, as the apostle to evidently speaking here of magistracy, or legislative authority, and as the appointment of magistrates was created a creating of them, it is better to understand the words thus: all the constituted authorities; so, Decem tribunos plebis per pontificem creaverunt.—Cor. Nep. They created ten tribunes of the plebeians, by the high-priest. Carthagine quotannis annui bini reges creabantur.—Cesur. They create two kings every year at Carthage. Consules creantur Cesar et Servilius.—Sallust. Cesar and Servilius were created consuls. Creare duces gerendo bello.—To create a general to conduct the war. The meaning of St. Peter appears to be this: the Jews thought it unlawful to obey any ruler that was not of their own stock. The apostle tells them they should obey the civil magistrate, let him be of what stock he may, whether a Jew or a Gentile; and let him exercise the government in whatsoever form. This is the general proposition: and then he instances emperors and their deputies; and, far from its being unlawful for them to obey a heathen magistrate, they were to do it for the Lord's sake, dia tou Kyriou, on account of the Lord; whose will it was, and who commanded it.

14. Or unto governors] By king as supreme, the Roman emperor is meant; and by governors, hypocritas, is meant leaders, governors, presidents, proconsuls, and other chief magistrates, sent by him into the provinces dependant on the Roman empire.

For the punishment of evil doers] This was the object of their mission; they were to punish delinquents, and encourage and protect the virtuous.

15. For so is the will of God] God, as their supreme Governor, shows them that it is His will that they should act uprightly and obediently at all times; and thus confound the ignorance of foolish men, who were ready enough to assert that their religion made them bad subjects. The word φίλους, which we translate put to silence, signifies to muzzle.—i. e. stop their mouths, leave them nothing to say;—let them assert, but ever be unable to bring proof to support it.

16. As free] The Jews pretended that they were a free people, and owed allegiance to God alone; hence they were continually rebelling against the Roman government, to which God had subjected them, because of their rebellion against Him: thus they used their liberty for a cloak of maliciousness, for a pretext of rebellion; and, by it, endeavoured to vindicate their seditious and rebellious conduct.

But as the servants of God] These were free from sin and Satan; but they were the servants of God, bound to obey Him; and, as He had made it their duty to obey the civil magistrate, they served God by submitting to every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake.

17. Honour all men] That is, give honour to whom honour is due, Rom. xiii. 7. Respect every man as a fellow creature, and as one who may be a fellow-heir with you in eternal life: and therefore be ready to give him every kind of succour in your power.

Love the brotherhood] All true Christians, who form one great family of which God is the Head.

Fear God] Who gives you these commandments, lest He punish your disobedience.

Honour the King] Pay that respect to the emperor which his high authority requires; knowing that civil power is of God: that the authority with which He, in the course of His Providence, has invested him, must be respected, in order to its being obeyed; and that if the man be even bad, and, as a man, be worthy of no reverence; yet he should be respected on account of his office. If respect be banished, subordination will flee with it; and anarchy and ruin will rise up in their place. Truly religious persons are never found in seditions. Hypocrites may join themselves with any class of the workers of iniquity, and say, Hail, brethren!

18. Servants, be subject] See the notes on Eph. vi. 5. Colos. iii. 22. and Tit. ii. 9.

With all fear] With all submission and reverence.

The good and gentle] Those who are ever just in their commands; never requiring more work than is necessary or proper; and always allowing sufficient food, and sufficient time.

The froward] Ξεστους; the crooked, perverse, unreasonable, morose, and unreasoning. Your time belongs to your master; obey him in all things; let him answer for faults, ye shall take it patiently; but if, when ye suffer for it, ye take it patiently, this is acceptable to God.

21 For ye even hereunto were ye called: because ye suffered for us, leaving us an example, that ye should follow.

22 Who did no sin, neither was guile found in his mouth:

23 Who, when he was reviled, reviled not again; when he suffered, he threatened not; but committed himself to him that judgeth righteously:

24 Who his own self bore our sins in his own body on the tree, that we, being dead to sins, should live unto righteousness: by whose stripes ye were healed.

25 For ye were as sheep going astray: but are now returned unto the Shepherd and Bishop of your souls:

verright, it can convey to us no meaning of the original.— Jesus Christ is the Overseer of souls; He has them continually under His eye; He knows their wants, wishes, dangers, &c. and provides for them. As their Shepherd, He leads them to the best pastures, defends them from their enemies, and feeds them by His eye. Jesus is the good Shepherd that laid down His life for the sheep.—All human souls are inexpressibly dear to Him, as they are the purchase of His blood. He is still Supreme Bishop or Overseer in His church. He alone is Episcopus episcoporum, "the Bishop of bishops;" a title which the Roman pontiffs have blasphemously usurped. But this is not the only attribute of Jesus, on which they have laid sacrilegious hands. And besides this, with force, and with cruelty have they ruled the sheep; but the Lord is breaking the staff of their pride, and delivering the nations from the bondage of their corruption. Lord, let thy kingdom come.

How to obtain happiness, and live a long and useful life, 8.—11. God loves and succours them that do good; but His face is against the wicked, 12, 13. They should suffer persecution patiently, and be always ready to give a reason of the hope that is in them; and preserve a good conscience, though they suffered for righteousness, 14.—17. not corruptible, even the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, which is in the sight of God of great price. For after this manner in the old time the holy women also, who trusted in God, adorned themselves, being in subjection unto their own husbands: Even as Sara obeyed Abraham, calling him lord: whose daughters ye are, as long as ye do well, and are not afraid with any amazement. Likewise, ye husbands, dwell with them according to the Lord, as the church, which is the body of Christ, which is His flesh, and His bone, which He Himself saved with His blood, that He might purify unto Himself the peculiar vessel of Himself, that He might present it to Himself, gloriously, without spot, and wrinkle, or anything of the kind: that He might sanctify and cleanse it with the word of water by the word, that He might present it to Himself, glorious in holiness, without spot, or anything of the kind: that He might sanctify and cleanse it with the word of water by the word, that He might present it to Himself, glorious in holiness, without spot, or anything of the kind.

NOTES.—Verse 1. Ye wives, be in subjection] Consider that your husband is, by God's appointment, the head and ruler of the house; do not, therefore, attempt to usurp his government; for, even though he obey not the word, is not a sinner in the Christian doctrine, his rule is not thereby impaired; for Christianity never alters civil relations: and your feignate, obedient conduct, will be the most likely means of convincing him of the truth of the doctrine which you have received.

vil. Phoc. How few Christian women act this part! Women are in general at so much pains and cost in their dress, as if by it they were to be recommended both to God and man. It is, however, in every case, the argument either of a shallow mind, or of a vain and corrupted heart.

Without the word] That your holy conduct may be the means of begetting in them a reverence for Christianity, the reaching of which they will not hear.—See the notes on Cor. xiv. 34, and the other places referred to in the margin. Chaste conversation—with fear.] While they see that you join modesty, chastity, and the purest manners, to the fear of God.—Or, perhaps, fear, φόβος, is taken, as in Eph. v. 33, for the reverence due to the husband.

4. The hidden man of the heart] Ο κρυπτός της καρδίας άνθρωπος. This phrase is of the same import with that of St. Paul, Rom. vii. 22. δ εσω άνθρωπος, the inner man: that is, the soul, with the whole system of affections and passions. Every part of the Scripture treats man as a compound being; the body is the outward, or visible man; the soul the inward, hidden, or invisible man. The term άνθρωπος, man, is derived, according to the best etymologists, from ανα ψαλασσα, turning the face upward. This derivation of the word is beautifully paraphrased by Ovid. The whole passage is beautiful; and, though well known, I shall insert it. After speaking of the creation, and formation of all the irrational animals, he proceeds thus:—

3. Whose adorning] Κοσμος.—See the note on Heb. ix. 1. here the word κοσμος, world or ornament, is defined: and see the note on Gen. ii. 1.

"Sanctius his animal, mentisque capaxius alta Deerat alhuc, et quod dominari in cetera posset, Natus homo est: sive hunc divino semine fecit Ille ipse rerum, mundi melioris origo: Sive recens tellus, seductaque nuper ab alto Ethere, cognati retinebat semina celi.— Pronaque cum spectent animalia cetera terram, Os homini sublimis dedit; Oculumque turbi Jusit, et erectos ad sidera tollere vultus."

Plaiting the hair, and of wearing of gold] Plaiting the hair, and variously folding it about the head, was the most ancient, and most simple mode of disposing of this chief ornament of the female head. It was practised anciently in every part of the East; and is so to the present day, in India, in China, and also in Barbary. It was also prevalent among the Greeks and Romans; as ancient gems, busts, and statues, still remaining, sufficiently declare. We have a remarkable instance of the plaiting of the hair in a statue of Agrippina, wife of Germanicus, an exact representation of which may be seen in the work of André Leno, intitled, Le Costume des Peuples de l'Antiquité, p. 33. Many plates in the same work show the different modes of dressing the hair which obtained among the Egyptians, Greeks, Romans, Persians, and other nations. This plates of gold were often mixed with the hair, to make it appear more ornamental by the reflection of light, and of the solar rays. Small golden buckles were also used in different parts; and among the Roman ladies, pearls, and precious stones of different colours. Pliny assures us, Hist. Nat. l. ix. c. 36. that these latter ornaments were not introduced among the Roman women till the time of Sylla, about 110 years before the Christian era. But it is evident from many remaining monuments, that, in numerous cases, the hair, differently plaited and curled, was the only ornament of the head. Often a simple pike, sometimes of ivory, pointed with gold, seemed to connect the plaits. In monuments of antiquity, the heads of the married and single women may be known, the former by the hair being parted from the forehead over the middle of the top of the head; the latter by being quite close, or being plaited and curled, all in a general mass.

METAM. lib. l. ver. 76. "A creature of a more exalted kind Was wanting yet, and then was Man design'd. Conscious of thought, of more capacious breast, For empire form'd, and fit to rule the rest. Whether with particles of heavenly fire The God of nature did his soul inspire; Or earth, but new divided from the sky, Which still retained th' ethereal energy.— Thus while the mute creation downward bend Their sight, and to their earthly mother tend, Man looks aloft: and with erected eyes Beholds his own hereditary skies."

There is a remarkable passage in Plutarch, Conjugalia Præcept, c. xxvi. very like that in the text; Κοσμος γαρ γυναικας ομοιωσιν ποσει δε ταυτης δε χρυσους, ουτε σφραγιδος, ουτε κοσμου, αλλ' οσα ανωστρατος, ενωχλιας, αιδους, ερφασις περιβουρας.— Opera à Wittenb. Vol. I. pag. 320. "An ornament, as Crates said, is that which adorns. The proper ornament of a woman is, that which becomes her best. This is neither gold, nor pearls, nor scarlet, but those things which are an evident proof of gravity, regularity, and modesty." The wife of Phocion, a celebrated Athenian general, receiving a visit from a lady who was elegantly adorned with gold and jewels, and her hair with pearls; took occasion to call the attention of her guest to the elegance and coarseness of her dress; "My ornaments," said the wife of Phocion, "is my husband, now for the twentieth year general of the Athenians."—Plut. in DRYDEN. The word άνθρωπος, man, is frequently applied to the soul; but, generally, with some epithet. Thus, δ εσω άνθρωπος, the inner man, Rom. vii. 22 to distinguish it from the body, which is called δ εξω άνθρωπος, the outer man, 2 Cor. iv. 16.—δ κρυπτός άνθρωπος, the hidden man us in the text; δ καινος άνθρωπος, the new man; the soul renewed in righteousness, Eph. ii. 15. to distinguish him from δ παλαιος, άνθρωπος, the old man; that is, man unregenerate: or in a state of sin, Rom. vi. 6. And the soul is thus distinguished by the Greek philosophers. A meek and quiet spirit] That is, a mind that will not give provocation to others; nor receive irritation by the provocation of others. Meekness will prevent the first; quietness will guard against the last.

Great price.] All the ornaments placed on the head and body of the most illustrious female, are, in the sight of God, of no worth: but a meek and silent spirit are, in His sight, invaluable; because proceeding from, and leading to, Himself; being incorruptible; surviving the ruins of the body, and the ruins of time; and enduring eternally.

6. For after this manner] Simplicity reigned in primitive times; natural ornaments alone were then in use. Trade and commerce brought in luxuries; and luxury brought pride, and all the excessive nonsense of dress. No female had ever looks so well as when adorned with its own hair alone. This is the ornament appointed by God. To cut it off, or to cover it, is an unnatural practice; and to exchange the hair which God has given, for hair of some other colour, is as to knowledge, giving honour unto the wife, as unto the weaker vessel, and as being heirs together of the grace of life; that your prayers be not hindered.

6 Finally, be ye all of one mind, having compassion one of another, as love as brethren, be pitiful, be courteous:

9 Not rendering evil for evil, or railing for railing: but contrariwise blessing; knowing that ye are thereunto called, that ye should inherit a blessing.

10 For he that will love life, and see good days, let him refrain his tongue from evil, and his lips that they speak no guile:

1 Cor. 12. 13. 1 Thess. 4. 4.—See Job 28. 4. Matt. 5. 23, 24. & 18. 19.—m Rom. 12. 16. & 15. 6. Phil. 3. 16.—a Rom. 12. 10. Heb. 13. 1. Ch. 2. 17.—or, loving in the brethren.—p Col. 3. 12. sult to the Creator. How the delicacy of the female character can stoop to the use of false hair, and especially when it is considered that the chief part of this kind of hair was once the natural property of some ruffian soldier, who fell in battle by many a ghastly wound! is more than I can possibly comprehend.—See the notes on 1 Cor. xi. 14—16. and 1 Tim. ii. 9.

Who trusted in God? The women who trust not in God, are fond of dress and frippery: those who trust in God, follow nature and common sense.

Being in subjection unto their own husbands? It will rarely be found that women who are fond of dress, and extravagant in it, have any subjection to their husbands but what comes from mere necessity. Indeed, their dress, which they intend as an attractive to the eyes of others, is a sufficient proof that they have neither love nor respect for their own husbands. Let them who are concerned refute the charge.

6. Even as Sarah obeyed? Almost the same words are in Rab. Tanchum, fol. 9. 3. "The wife of Abraham revered him, and called him lord, as it is written, Gen. xviii. 12. And way lord is old." The words of the apostle imply, that she acknowledged his superiority, and her own subjection to him, in the order of God.

Whose daughters ye are? As Abraham is represented the father of all his male believing descendants; so Sarah is represented as the mother of all her believing female posterity. A son of Abraham is a true believer: a daughter of Sarah is the same.

As long as ye do well? For you cannot maintain your relationship to her longer than ye believe; and ye cannot believe longer than ye continue to obey.

And are not afraid with any amazement? It is difficult to extract any sense out of this clause. The original is not very easy; μη φοβησθετα μηδετα κταναται may be rendered, And not fearing with any terror. If ye do well, and act conscientiously your part as faithful wives, ye will at no time live under the distressing apprehension of being found out; or terrified at very appearance of the discovery of infidelities or improper conduct. Being not guilty of these, you will not have occasion to fear detection. On this subject a learned man has quoted these words which I have produced elsewhere, Eph. vi. 14.

Nil concire sibi, nullâ pellescere culpâ.

"Let this be my brazen wall, to be self-convicted of no private delinquency, nor to change colour at being charged with a fault."

Happy is the wife, and happy is the husband, who can conscientiously adopt the saying.

7. Dwelt with them according to knowledge? Give your wives, by no species of unkind carriage, any excuse for delinquency. How can a man expect his wife to be faithful to him, if he be unfaithful to her? and vice versa.

Giving honour unto the wife? Using your superior strength and experience in her behalf: and thus honouring her by becoming her protector and support. But the word, τιμη, honour, signifies maintenance as well as respect;—maintain, provide for the wife.

As—the weaker vessel? Being more delicately, and consequently more slenderly, constructed. Roughness and strength go hand in hand: so likewise do beauty and frailty. The female has what the man wants, beauty and delicacy. The male has what the female wants, courage and strength. The one is as good in its place as the other: and by these things God has made an equality between the man and the woman, so that there is properly, very little superiority on either side.—See the note on 1 Thess. iv. 4.

Being heirs together? Both the man and woman being equally called to eternal glory; and as prayer is one great means of obtaining a meetness for it; it is necessary that they should live together in such a manner, as to prevent all family contentions, that they may not be prevented, by disputes or misunderstandings, from uniting daily in this most important duty—family and social prayer.

6. Be ye all of one mind? Unity, both in the family and in the church, being essentially necessary to peace and salvation.—See on Rom. xii. 16. and xv. 5.

Having compassion? Συμπαθεις; being sympathetic; feeling for each other: bearing each other's burdens.

Love as brethren? Φιλadelphois; be lovers of the brethren.

Friendly? Ευφραδιστοι; tender-hearted; let your bowels yearn over the distressed and afflicted.

Courteous? Φιλοφρονης; be friendly-minded; acquire and 11 Let him eschew evil, and do good; let him seek peace, and ensue it.

13 And who is he that will harm you, if ye be followers of that which is good?

14 But if ye suffer for righteousness' sake, happy are ye: and ye shall not be afraid of their terror, neither be troubled;

cultivate a friendly disposition. But instead of this word, φιλοφρονης, be humble-minded, is the reading of ABC. more than twenty others, with the Syriac, Arabic of Erpen, Coptic, Armenian, Slavonic, and some of the Fathers. This is probably the true reading; and Griesbach has admitted it to the text.

9. Not rendering evil for evil? Purposing, saying, doing nothing but good; and invariably returning good for evil.

Ye are thereunto called? This is your calling, your business in life; to do good, and to do good for evil; and to implore God's blessing even on your worst enemies. And this is not only your duty, but yr interest; for in so doing, you shall obtain God's blessing, even life for evermore.

10. For he that will love life? This is a quotation from Psa. xxxiv. 12—16. as it stands in the Septuagint; only the imperative is changed into the aorist of the imperfect, &c. He who wishes to live long and prosperously, must act as he is here directed. 1. He must refrain from evil-speaking, envy, and slandering. 2. He must avoid flattery, and fair speeches which cover hypocritical or wicked intentions. 3. He must avoid evil, keep going away, εκλιναται, from evil. 4. He must do good; he must walk in the way of righteousness.

5. He must live peaceably with all men; seek peace where it has been lost; restore it where it has been broken; and pursue it where it seems to be flying away. He who lives thus, must live happy in himself. And, as excess in action and passion always tends to the shortening of life, and nothing preys on the constitution more than disorderly passions; he must live not only happiest, but longest, who avoids them. It is an edifying story that is told in the book of Maccas, chap. l. quoted by Rosenmuller: "A certain person travelling through the city, continued to call out, Who wants the finer of life? The daughter of Rabbi Joda heard him, and told her father. He said, Call the man in. When he came in, the Rabbi said, What is that ellir of life thou sellest? He answered, It is not written, What man is he that breatheth and desireth to see good days, let him refrain his tongue from evil, and his lips from speaking guile. This is the finer of life, and is found in the mouth of man."

12. The eyes of the Lord are over the righteous? That he is continually under God's notice and His care; God continually watches for him, and watches over him: and he is under His constant protection.

And his ears are open unto their prayers? The original is very emphatic. The eyes of the Lord are upon the righteous; and his ears to their prayers. The righteous man ever attracts the Divine notice; and wherever he is, there is the ear of God: for, as every righteous man is a man of prayer, wherever he prays, there is the ear of God, into which the prayer, as soon as formed, enters.

But the face of the Lord? Far from His eye being upon them, or His ear to their requests; for prayer they have none; His face, His approbation, His providence, and blessing, are turned away from them; and He only looks upon them to abhor them, and to turn the arm of His justice against them.

13. Who is he that will harm you? Is it possible that a man can be wretched, who has God for his friend? "All the devices which the devil or wicked men work against such, must be brought to nought; and by the providence of His goodness, be dispersed."

If ye be followers, &c.? Εαυ του αγαθου μιμηταις γινεσθε. If ye be imitators of the Good One, i. e. of God. O αγαθος, The Good One, is one of God's prime epithets, see Matt. xii. 17. and Satan is distinguished by the reverse, ο κακος, the evil one, Matt. xxiii. 19. where see the notes.

Followers, or rather imitators, ζηλωται, zealous of what is good, is the reading of ABC. fifteen others, both the Syriac, Erpen's Arabic, the Coptic, Ethiopic, Armenian, and Vulgate, with some of the fathers. This is a very probable reading; and Griesbach has placed it in the margin, as a candidate for the place of that in the text.

14. But and if ye suffer? God may permit you to be tried and persecuted for righteousness' sake; but this cannot essentially harm you: He will press even this into your service, and make it work for your good.

Happy are ye? This seems to refer to Matt. v. 10. &c. Blessed, or happy, are ye when men persecute you, &c. It is a happiness to suffer for Christ; and it is a happiness, because if a man were not holy and righteous, the world would persecute him: so he is happy in the very course of his sufferings.

Be not afraid of their terror? Τον δε φοβου ανθρωπων μη φοβησθε, fear not their fear; see Isa. viii. 12. Sometimes fear always to give an answer to every man that asketh you a reason of the hope that is in you with meekness and fear: 16 Having a good conscience: * that whereas they speak evil of you, as of evil-doers, they may be ashamed that falsely accuse your good conversation in Christ.

17 For it is better, if the will of God be so, that ye suffer for well doing, than for evil doing.

But their punishment was delayed, to see if they would repent; and the long-suffering of God waited one hundred and twenty years, which were granted to them for this purpose; during which time, as criminals tried and convicted, they are represented as being in prison, detained under the arrest of Divine Justice, which waited either for their repentance, or the expiration of the respite, that the punishment pronounced might be inflicted. This I have long believed to be the sense of this difficult passage; and no other that I have seen is so consistent with the whole scope of the place. That the Spirit of God did strive with, convict, and reprove, the antediluvians, is evident from Gen. vi. 3. My Spirit shall not always strive with man, forasmuch as he is flesh; yet his days shall be one hundred and twenty years. And it was by this Spirit that Noah became a preacher of righteousness and condemned that ungodly world, Heb. xi. 7. who would not believe, till wrath, Divine punishment, came upon them to the uttermost. The word πνεύματα, spirits, is supposed to render this view of the subject improbable, because this must mean disembodied spirits; but this certainly does not follow, for the spirits of just men made perfect, Heb. xii. 23. certainly means righteous men, and men still in the church militant; and the Father of spirits, Heb. xii. 9. means men still in the body; and the God of the spirits of all flesh, Numb. xvi. 22. and xxvii. 16. means men not in a disembodied state.

But even on this word there are several various readings. some of the Greek MSS. read πνεύματα, in spirit, and one Πνεύματα Αγία, in the Holy Spirit. I have before me one of the first, if not the very first edition of the Latin Bible; and in it the verse stands thus—In quo et his qui in carcere erant spiritu sancto ventiens predicavit; "by which he came spiritually, and preached to them that were in prison."

In two very ancient MSS. of the Vulgate before me, the clause is thus—In quo et his qui in carcere erant spiritu ventiens predicavit; "in which, coming by the Spirit, He preached to those who were in prison." This is the reading also in the Complutensian Polyglot.

Another ancient MS. in my possession has the words nearly as in the printed copy—In quo et his qui in carcere conclusi erant, spiritaliter ventiens predicavit; "in which, coming spiritually, he preached to those who were shut up in prison."

Another MS. written about A. D. 1370, is the same as the printed copy.

In my old MS. Bible, which contains the first translation into

s put for the object of a man's religious worship, see Gen. xli. 42. Prov. i. 26. and the place in Isaiah just quoted. The exhortation may mean, fear not their gods; they can do you no hurt: and, supposing that they curse you by them, yet be not troubled—"He who fears God, needs have no other fear."

15. But sanctify the Lord God in your hearts] To sanctify God, may signify to offer Him the praises due to His grace; or, as to sanctify literally signifies to make holy, it is impossible that God should be thus sanctified. We have often already seen that αγιασις, signifies to separate from earth, that is, from any common use or purpose; that the thing or person thus separated may be devoted to a sacred use. Perhaps we should understand Peter's words thus: entertain just notions of God, of His nature, power, will, justice, goodness, and truth; do not conceive of Him as being actuated by such passions as men; separate Him in your hearts from every thing earthly, human, fleshly, rigidly severe or capriciously merciful. Consider that He can neither be like man, feel like man, nor act like man. Ascribe no human passions to Him, or this would desecrate, not sanctify Him. Do not confine Him in your conceptions to place, space, vacuity, heaven, or earth: endeavour to think worthy of the immensity and eternity of His nature, of His omniscience, omnipresence, and omnipotence. Avoid the error of the heathens, who would even their Dii majores, their greatest gods, by fate, is many well-meaning Christians do the true God by decree; conceive of Him as infinitely free to act, or not act, as He pleases. Consider the goodness of His nature, for goodness, is every possible state of perfection and infinitude, belongs to Him. Ascribe no malevolence to Him; nor any work, purpose, or decree, that implies it: this is not only a human passion, but a passion of fallen man. Do not suppose that He can do evil, or that He can destroy when he might save: that He ever did, or ever can, hate any of those whom He made in His own image, and in His own likeness; so as, by a positive decree, to doom them, unborn, to everlasting perdition; or, what is of the same import, pass them by without affording them the means of salvation, and consequently rendering it impossible for them to be saved.—Thus endeavour to conceive of Him; and, by so doing, you separate Him from all that is imperfect, human, evil, capricious, changeable, and unkind. Ever remember that he has wisdom without error; power, without limits; truth, without falsity; love, without hatred; holiness, without evil; and justice, without rigour or severity on the one hand, or capricious tenderness on the other. In a word, that He neither can be, say, purpose, or do any thing that is not infinitely just, holy, wise, true, and gracious; that He hates nothing that He has made; and has so loved the world, the whole human race, as to give His only begotten Son to die for them, that they might not perish, but have everlasting life. Thus sanctify the Lord God in your hearts; and you will ever be ready to give a reason of the hope that is in you, to every serious and candid inquirer after truth.

Most religious systems and creeds are incapable of rational explanation, because founded on some misconception of the Divine nature.

"They set at odds heaven's jarring attributes;

And with one excellence another wound."

The system of humanizing God, and making Him, by our unjust conceptions of Him, in not as ourselves would, in certain circumstances, has been the bane both of religion and piety; and, on this ground, infidels have laughed us to scorn.

It is high time that we should no longer know God after the flesh; for, even if we have known Jesus Christ after the flesh, we are to know Him so no more.

What I have written above is not against any particular sect: of religious people; it is against any or all to which it may justly apply; it may even be against some portions of my own; for, even in this respect, I am obliged daily to labour to sanctify the Lord God in my heart; to abstract Him from every thing earthly and human, and apprehend Him, as far as possible, in His own essential nature and attributes, through the light of His Spirit, and the medium of His own revelation. To act thus, requires no common effort of soul; and just apprehensions of this kind are not acquired without much prayer, much self-reflection, much time, and much of the grace and mercy of God.

Instead of ros Greco, Gon, ABC, four others, both the Syriac, Ercpen's Arabic, the Coptic, Vulgate, and Armenian, with Clement and Fulgentius, read ros Xpistos, Christus.—Sanctify Christ in your hearts. This reading is at least equal to the other, in the authorities by which it is supported: but which was written by St. Peter we know not.

A reason of the hope] An account of your hope of the resurrection of the dead, and eternal life in God's glory. This was the great object of their hope, as Christ was the grand Object of their faith.

21 The like figure whereunto even baptism doth also now save us (not the putting away of the filth of the flesh, but the answer of a good conscience toward God,) by the resurrection of Jesus Christ:

p Eph. 5.26-q Tit. 2.5-r Rom. 10.10-s Ch. 1.3-t Pau. 110.1.

English ever made, the clause is the following—Et quibus tunc et tunc quibus tunc clauditur in prison, et committitur in Spiritu, preceptum. The copy from which this translation was taken evidently read concessit erant, with one of the MSS. quoted above, as clauditur toggetur provo.

I have quoted all these authorities from the most authentic and correct copies of the Vulgate, to show that from them there is no ground to believe that the text speaks of Christ's going to hell to preach the Gospel to the damned; or of His going to some feigned place where the souls of the patriarchs were detained, to whom He preached, and whom He delivered from that place, and took with him to Paradise: which the Romish church holds as an article of faith.

Though the judicious Camel holds with his church this opinion, yet he cannot consider the text of St. Peter as a proof of it. I will set down his own words:—Le sentiment qui veut que Jesus Christ soit descendu aus enfers pour annoncer sa venue aux anciens patriarches, et pour les tirer de celle espece de prison, où ils l'attendoient si long tems, est indubitable: et nous le regardons comme un article de notre foi: mais on peut douter que ce soit le sens de saint Pierre en cet endroit.—"The opinion which states that Jesus Christ descended into hell, to announce His coming to the ancient patriarchs, and to deliver them from that species of prison where they had so long waited for Him, is incontrovertible: and we, (the Catholics,) consider it as an article of our faith: but we may doubt whether this be the meaning of St. Peter in this place."

Some think the whole passage applies to the preaching of the Gospel to the Gentiles; but the interpretation given above appears to me, after the fullest consideration, to be the most consistent and rational, as I have already remarked.

20. When once the long-suffering of God waited. In Pirkey Aboth, cap. v. 2. we have these words:—"There were ten generations from Adam to Noah, that the long-suffering of God might appear; for each of these generations provoked Him to anger, and went on in their iniquity, till at last the deluge came."

Were saved by water.] While the ark was preparing, only Noah's family believed; these amounted to eight persons; and these only were saved from the deluge, Et salvatos, on the water; the rest all perished in the water; though many of them, while the rains descended, and the waters daily increased, did undoubtedly humble themselves before God, call for mercy, and receive it; but, as they had not repented at the preaching of Noah, and the ark was now closed, and the fountains of the great deep broken up, they lost their lives, though God might have extended mercy to their souls.

21. The like figure whereunto, &c.] Dr. Macknight has translated this verse so as to make the meaning more clear:—By which (water), the antitype baptism, (not the putting away of the filth of the flesh, but the answer of a good conscience towards God,) now saveth us also, through the resurrection of Jesus Christ.

He remarks, that the relative quod being in the neuter gender, its antecedent cannot be salvatos, the ark, which is feminine, but advap, water, which is neuter.

There are many difficulties in this verse; but the simple meaning of the place may be easily apprehended. Noah believed in God, walked uprightly before Him, and found grace in His sight; he obeyed Him in building the ark, and God

22 Who is gone into heaven, and is on the right hand of angels and authorities and powers being made subject unto Him.

Rom. 8.34. Eph. 1.20. Col. 3.1. Heb. 1.3-s Rom. 8.39. I Cor. 15.25. E.

made it the means of his salvation from the water deluge. Baptism implies a consecration and dedication of the soul and body to God the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit; and is the seal of the covenant, and the pledge of His promise, that He who is faithful to his baptismal covenant, and who is faithful to the Eternal Spirit, for his portion here from his sins; and through the resurrection from the dead, has the well-grounded hope of eternal life. This is all plain; but was it the deluge itself, or the being saved by that ark from the deluge, the antitype of which St. Peter speaks? Noah and his family, had they not made use of the ark; so that baptism saves no man, but as it is the means of his heart purified by the Holy Spirit, and typifying for purification. The ark was not immersed in the water; but they must all have perished; but it was on the water, and sprinkled with the rains that fell then. This text, as far as I can see, says nothing of immersion in baptism; but is rather, from the circumstances mentioned above, in favour of sprinkling. In civil life is not the sprinkling, washing, or cleansing that can be of any avail to the salvation of the soul, but the external proof that the soul is purified in the laver of truth; and the person enabled to walk in newness of life. We are, therefore, strongly cautioned here not to letter, but to look for the substance.

22. Who is gone into heaven.] Having given proof of his resurrection from the dead, and of His accomplishing the end for which He came into the world, He is seated on the right hand of God. In the place of the humanity, honour, and influence.

The Vulgate, one copy of the Itala, Augustin, Cassiodorus, and Bede, have the following remark upon the above words: De gloriis mortem ut non heredes efficeremur. "Having abolished (down) death, that we might be made heirs of eternal life, we are not to be made heirs of death." But this addition is found in no Greek copy, nor in any of the ancient Versions.

Angels and authorities and powers.] That is, all orders and beings, both in the heavens and in the earth, under subjection to Jesus Christ. He has all power given unto Him in the earth. He alone can save; and He alone can destroy. None need fear who put their trust in Him, for He can do whatsoever He will in behalf of His followers; and He can overcome all evil spirits under His absolute command; His enemies tremble, while His friends exult; He can raise the dead; and save to the uttermost all who will be saved by the Father through Him.

If He have all power; if angels, and authorities, and powers, be subject to Him; then He can do what He will, He can employ whom He will. To raise the dead can be no more to Him, because He has power over all things. He can create what He will; He can destroy it, and He can create it again; He can conceive nothing too difficult for Omnipotent Being is the Friend of man. We are not come to Him with confidence, and expect His assistance, and His salvation of which our souls and bodies are capable.

CHAPTER IV.

are embittered to him through the apprehension of death and judgment; and, on his application to God, he is delivered from his sin.

Some suppose the words are to be understood that who have firmly resolved, if called to it, to suffer a martyr's death, than apostatize from Christianity, have consequently, from, or are delivered from, the sin of saving the expense of their faith. Others think that it is a passage to Rom. vi. 7. and interpret it thus: "He mortified the flesh, hath ceased from sin." Dr.

wrought the will of the Gentiles, when we walked in lasciviousness, lusts, excess of wine, revellings, banquetings, and abominable idolatries :

4 Wherein they think it strange that ye run not with them to the same excess of riot, speaking evil of you :

5 Who shall give account to him that is ready to judge the quick and the dead.

6 For this cause was the Gospel preached also to them that are dead, that they might be judged according to men in the flesh, but live according to God in the spirit.

7 But the end of all things is at hand : be ye therefore sober, and watch unto prayer.

pires the whole to our redemption by Christ : He that hath sinned in the flesh hath died for our sins. But this seems a very constrained sense.

2. That he no longer should live—in the flesh] Governed by the base principles of giving up his faith to save his life, to the lusts of men, according to the will of his idolatrous persecutors, but to the will of God; which will of God is, that he should retain the truth, and live according to its dictates, though he should suffer for it.

3. The time past of our life] This a complete epitome of the Gentile or heathen state; and a proof that these had been Gentiles to whom the apostle wrote.

(1.) They walked in lasciviousness, ev acaivaias, every species of lechery, lewdness, and impurity.

(2.) In lusts, επιθυμιας; strong irregular appetites and desires of all kinds.

(3.) In excess of wine, ανεφελγας, from οινος, wine, and φλυα, to be hot, or to boil; to be inflamed with wine; they were in continual debauches.

(4.) In revellings, καυσις, lascivious feasting, with drunken songs, &c.—See the note on Rom. xiii. 13.

(5.) In banquetings, ποσεις; winces, feasts, drinking matches, &c.

(6.) In abominable idolatries, αβιμοις ειδωλοκραταις; that is, the abominations practised at their idol feasts; where they not only worshipped the idol, but did it with the most impure, obscene, and abominable rites. This was the general state of the Gentile world; and with this monstrous wickedness Christianity had every where to struggle.

4. They think it strange] επιζουσαι; they wonder and are astonished at you, that ye can renounce these gratifications of the flesh, for a spiritual something, the good of which they cannot see.

Excess of riot] ακαρτας αναχοις, food of profligacy; bearing down all rule, order, and restraints before it.

Speaking evil of you] βλασφημιουσι; literally, blaspheming : i. e. speaking impiously against God, and calumniously of you.

5. To the judge of the quick and the dead] They shall give account of these irregularities to Him who is prepared to judge both the Jews and the Gentiles. The Gentiles, previously to the preaching of the Gospel among them, were reckoned to be dead in trespasses and sins, Eph. ii. 1—5, under the sentence of death, because they had sinned. The Jews had at least, by their religious profession, a name to live; and, by that profession, were bound to live to God.

6. Was the Gospel preached also to them that are dead] This is a most difficult verse : the best translations I have seen of it are the following :—

“For this indeed was the effect of the preaching of the Gospel to the dead, (the unconverted Gentiles,) that some will be punished as carnal men; but others, (those converted to Christianity,) lead a spiritual life unto God.”—WALKERFIELD.

“For this purpose hath the Gospel been preached even to the dead, (i. e. the Gentiles,) that although they might be condemned, indeed, by men in the flesh, (their persecutors;) yet they might live eternally by God in the Spirit.”—MACKNIGHT.

“For this cause was the Gospel preached to them that were dead; that they who live according to men in the flesh, may be condemned; but that they who live according to God in the Spirit, may live.”—KNIGHTSHELL.

There are as many different translations of this verse, and comments upon it, as there are translators and commentators. That of Sir Norton Knatchbull, could the Greek text bear it, appears the most simple; but that of Dr. Macknight, which is nearly the sense of Mr. Wesley in his paraphrase, is more likely to be the true one among those already proposed.

But, if the apostle has the same fact in view which he mentions, chap. iii. 19, 20, then the antediluvians are the persons intended : for this cause, that Christ is prepared to judge the quick and the dead, and to dispense righteous judgment in consequence of having afforded them every necessary advantage, was the Gospel preached by Noah to them also who are dead, the antediluvian world, then dead in trespasses and sins, and condemned to death by the righteous judgment of God; but, in His great compassion, He afforded them a respite, that though they were condemned as men in the flesh, (for this was their character,) my Spirit will not always strive with man, forasmuch as he is flesh, Gen. vi. 3. yet, hearing this Gospel by Noah, they may believe, and live according to God in the Spirit, live a blessed life in eternity, according to the 8 And above all things have fervent charity among yourselves : for charity shall cover the multitude of sins.

9 Use hospitality one to another without grudging.

10 As every man hath received the gift, even so minister the same one to another, as good stewards of the manifold grace of God.

11 If any man speak, let him speak as the oracles of God; if any man minister, let him do it as of the ability which God giveth : that God in all things may be glorified through Jesus Christ; to whom be praise and dominion for ever and ever. Amen.

12 Beloved, think it not strange concerning the fiery trial

Or, will.—Rom. 12. 13. Heb. 13. 2.—2 Cor. 9. 7. Phil. 2. 16. Philem. 14.—Rom. 12. 6. 1 Cor. 4. 7.—Matt. 26. 45. & 25. 14, 21. Luke 12. 42. 1 Cor. 4. 12. Th. 1. 7.—1 Cor. 12. 4. mercy of God, who sent His Spirit to strive with them. This appears to me to be the most consistent sense; especially as the apostle seems to refer to what he had said of the Spirit of Christ in Noah, preaching to the spirits in prison; the rebellions that lived before the flood.—See the notes on chap. iii. 19. and 20.

7. But the end of all things is at hand] I think that here also St. Peter keeps the history of the diluge before his eyes; finding a parallel to the state of the Jews in his own time, to that of the antediluvians in the days of Noah. In Gen. vi. 13. God said unto Noah, The end of all flesh is come before me.

This was spoken at a time when God had decreed the destruction of the world by a flood. Peter says, The end of all things is at hand : and this he spoke when God had determined to destroy the Jewish people and their polity, by one of the most signal judgments that ever fell upon any nation or people.

In a very few years after St. Peter wrote this epistle, evasting it at the lowest computation, viz. A. D. 60, or 61. Jerusalem was destroyed by the Romans. To this destruction, which was literally then at hand, the apostle alludes, when he says, The end of all things is at hand : the end of the temple, the end of the Levitical priesthood, the end of the who's Jewish economy, was then at hand.

If these words could be taken in any general sense, then we might say to every present generation, The end of all things is at hand; the end of all the good which the wicked enjoy, and the end of all the evil which the righteous suffer.

Be—sober, and watch unto prayer] Be sober; make a prudent and moderate use of all you possess; and watch against all occasions of sin : and pray for the supporting hand of God to be upon you for good, that ye may escape the destruction that is coming upon the Jews; and that ye may be saved from among them when the scourge come.

8. Have fervent charity] Αγαπησθε αλληλους, intense love; for love shall cover a multitude of sins. A loving disposition leads us to pass by the faults of others; to forgive offences against ourselves; and to excuse and lessen, as far as is consistent with truth, the transgressions of men. It does not mean that our love to others will induce God to pardon our offences. See the note on James v. 20.

9. Use hospitality] Be ever ready to divide your bread with the hungry, and to succour the stranger.—See on Heb. xiii. 2.

Without grudging] Ανευ γογγυσμου, without grumblings Do nothing merely because it is commanded; but do it from love to God and man; and then it will be without grudging.

10. Hath received the gift] Χαρισμα, a gift; any blessing of Providence, or grace. I cannot think that the word means here the Holy Ghost, or any of His supernatural gifts or influences; it may include those; but it signifies any thing given by the mere mercy and bounty of God; but perhaps in this place it may signify some or any office in the church; and this sense, indeed, the connexion seems to require.

Stewards of the manifold grace] Whatever gifts or endowments any man may possess, they are, properly speaking, not his own; they are the Lord's property, and to be employed in His work, and to promote His glory.

11. If any man speak] In order to explain, or enforce God's word, and edify his neighbour, let him do it as those did to whom the living oracles were committed: they spoke as they were inspired by the Holy Ghost. Those, therefore, at Pontus, &c. who undertook to teach others, should speak by the same influence; or, if not under this immediate influence, should speak as, or according to the oracles already delivered; grounding all their exhortations and doctrines on some portion of that revelation already given. This command is sent to every man upon earth, in holy orders, pretended holy orders, or pretending to holy orders. Their teaching should be what the oracles of God, the Holy Scriptures, teach and authenticate.

Of the ability which God giveth] Perhaps the ministering here may refer to the care of the poor; and the ability is the quantum of means which God may have placed in their hands; and they are to minister this as coming immediately from God, and lead the minds of the poor to consider Him as their Benefactor; that He in all things may be glorified through Christ Jesus. This is implied in the essence of any charitable act: the actor is not the author; God is the author; and the poor man should be taught to consider Him as his immediate Benefactor. Those who give any thing as from themselves, rob

13. <sup>4</sup> But rejoice, inasmuch as ye are partakers of Christ's sufferings: that when his glory shall be revealed, ye may be glad also with exceeding joy.

God; and for Him the praise for all good, and the dominion over all men and things, belong for ever and ever.

12. Think it not strange concerning the fiery trial (Πεπρωσι, the burning). The metaphor is old, but noble; it represents the Christians at Pontus as having fire cast upon them, for the trying of their faith, as gold is tried by fire, chap. i. 7. to which the apostle alludes.—Macknight.

St. Peter returns here to what he had often touched upon in this epistle; namely, to exhort the Christians to behave with patience and integrity under their present severe persecution: to which purpose he uses the following arguments:

First, He intimates, that it was not a strange or unusual thing for the people of God to be persecuted.

Secondly, That if they suffered here as Christ did, they should hereafter be glorified with Him.

Thirdly, Besides the prospect of that future glory, they had at present the Spirit of God for their support and comfort.

Fourthly, That it was an honour for any of them to suffer; not as a malefactor, but as a Christian.

Fifthly, Though the afflictions began with the Christians, yet the weight of the storm would fall upon the unbelievers. From these considerations, he exhorted them to persevere in their duty, and trust all events with God.—See Dodd.

14. If ye be reproached for the name of Christ To be reproached for the name of Christ, is to be reproached for being a Christian; that is, for being like Christ. This is the highest honour to which any man can arrive in this world; and therefore the apostle says to such, happy are ye.

The spirit of glory and of God resteth upon you] As this Divine Spirit rested upon Jesus, so does it rest upon His persecuted followers. There is a various reading here, καὶ δυναμῶς, and of power, which is found in some of the chief MSS. (the Codex Alexandrinus, and above twenty others,) the latter Syriac, all the Arabic, Coptic, Ethiopic, Armenian, Vulgate, some copies of the Itala, Athanasius, Theophylact, Cyprian, and Cassiodorus. And in them the whole verse reads thus—If ye be reproached for the name of Christ, happy are ye: for the Spirit of glory, and of power, and of God, resteth upon you. This is agreeable to our Lord's words, Matt. v. 11, 12. So that what constituted them unhappy in the sight of the world, was their chief happiness in the sight of God: they carried Christ, the Fountain of blessedness, in their heart; and therefore could not be unhappy.

On their part he is evil spoken of] Κατὰ μὲν αὐτοῦ βλασφημῆσαι, κατὰ δὲ θεοῦ δοξάζεσθαι, by them, he is blasphemed; by you, he is honoured.

15. But let none of you suffer—as a busy-body in other men's matters.] Ἀλλ' ὁποῦτος ἄλλοῦ, the inspector of another; meddling with other people's concerns, and forgetting their own: such persons are hated of all men. But some think that meddling with those in public office is here intended—as if he had said, Meddle not with the affairs of state; leave public offices and public officers to their own master; strive to live peaceably with all men: and show yourselves to be humble and unassuming.

16. Yet if—as a Christian] If he be persecuted, because he has embraced the Christian faith, let him not be ashamed, but let him rather glorify God on this very account. Christ suffered by the Jews, because He was holy; Christians suffer, because they resemble Him.

The word Χριστιανός, Christian, is only used here, and in Acts xi. 26. xxvi. 28.—See the note on the former passage.

17. Judgment must begin at the house of God] Our Lord had predicted that, previously to the destruction of Jerusalem, His own followers would have to endure various calamities; see Matt. xxiv. 9, 21, 22. Mark xiii. 12, 13. John xvi. 2, &c. Here His true disciples are called the house or family of God. That the converted Jews suffered much from their own brethren, the zealots or factions into which the Jews were at that time divided, needs little proof: and some interpreters think that this was in conformity to the purpose of God, Matt. xxiii. 36. (That on you may come all the righteous blood shed from the foundation of the world)—“That the Jewish Christians were to be involved in the general punishment; and that it was proper to begin at them as a part of the devoted Jewish nation, notwithstanding they were now become the house of God; because the justice of God would, thereby, be more illustriously displayed.”—See Macknight. But, probably, the word οἶκος, which we here translate judgment, may mean no more than affliction and distress; for it was a Jewish maxim that, when God was about to pour down some general judgment, He began with afflicting His own people, in order to correct and amend them; that they might be prepared for the

16. Yet if any man suffer as a Christian, let him not be ashamed; but let him glorify God on this behalf.

17. For the time is come, that judgment must begin at the house of God: and if it first begin at us, what shall the end be of them that obey not the Gospel of God?

18. And if the righteous scarcely be saved, where shall the ungodly and the sinner appear?

19. Wherefore let them that suffer according to the will of God, commit the keeping of their souls to him in well doing unto a faithful Creator.

overflowing scourge. In Bava Kama, fol. 60. 1. we have same sentiment, and in nearly the same words as in Luke. “God never punishes the world but because of the sinners; but He always begins with the righteous first. The transgressor makes no difference between the just and unjust; he begins first with the righteous.”—See Ezech. ix. 1-7. God orders the destroyers to slay both old and young in the city; but, said He, Begin at my sanctuary.

And if it first begin at us] Jews who had repented, believed on the Son of God. What shall the end be of the Jews who continue impenitent, and obey not the Gospel of God?—Here is the plainest reference to the above Jer. xxix. 10. and this, it appears, was founded upon the text of St. Peter immediately quotes.

18. And if the righteous scarcely be saved] If it shall with extreme difficulty that the Christians shall escape Jerusalem, when the Roman armies shall come against it, the full commission to destroy it, where shall the ungodly sinner appear? Where shall the proud Pharisee boast in his own outside holiness, and the profligate transgressor of the laws of God, show themselves, as having escaped Divine vengeance? The Christians, though with difficulty did escape every man; but not one of the Jews escaped, whether found in Jerusalem, or elsewhere.

It is rather strange, but it is a fact, that this verse in the Septuagint translation of Prov. xi. 31. Behold, the righteous shall be recompensed in the earth; much more the wicked the sinner. For this, the Septuagint, and St. Peter have the righteous scarcely be saved, where shall the ungodly the sinner appear? Such a latitude of construction scarcely be accounted for. The original is—וְיָשׁוּבֵם יְשׁוּבֵם הֵן לַדָּבָר הַבְּרָאֵת יִשְׁלַחֵם יְשׁוּבֵם הֵן לַדָּבָר הַבְּרָאֵת יִשְׁלַחֵם Behold, to the righteous it shall be return on the earth; and also to the wicked and the transgressor.

The Chaldee Paraphrast has given this a different turn. Behold, the righteous shall be strengthened in the earth, the ungodly and the sinner shall be consumed from the earth.

The Syriac thus:—If the righteous scarcely live, the ungodly and the sinner where shall he stand?

The Arabic is nearly the same as the Septuagint; the apostle and the Vulgate follow the Hebrew.

I have, on several occasions, shown, that when Celsus came against Jerusalem, many Christians were up in it: when he strangely raised the siege, the Christians immediately departed to Pella, in Cœle Syria, into the dominions of king Agrippa, who was an ally of the Romans; and there they were in safety: and it appears from the ecclesiastical historians, that they had, but barely time to leave the city before the Romans returned under the command of Titus; never left the place till they had destroyed the temple, razed the city to the ground, slain upwards of a million of that wretched people, and put an end to their civil polity and ecclesiastical state.

19. Suffer according to the will of God] A man suffering according to the will of God, who suffers for righteousness sake; and who, being reviled, reviles not again.

Commit the keeping of their souls] Place their lives confidently in His hand; who, being their Creator, will also be their Preserver, and keep that safely which is committed to His trust. God is here represented as faithful, because He will always fulfil His promises, and withhold no good thing from them that walk uprightly.

But they had no reason to hope that He would care for their lives and souls, unless they continued in well-doing, who is employed in God's work will have God's protection. The path of duty ever was, and ever will be, the only way of safety.

1. The apostle recommends fervent charity; unfeigned both to God and man. It is well said of this grace, that it is universal virtue, which ought to precede, accompany, and follow all others. A charity which has God for its principle, and Jesus Christ for its pattern, never faileth. If our charity be extensive enough to cover all the defects of our neighbours in bearing with them; that of God is sufficient to cover all our sins of a sincere penitent, by blotting them out. If we are to be charitable to all, it is after the example of our heavenly Father, who is loving to every man, and hateth nothing. He has made.

2. The difficulty of escaping the corruption that is in the world is great; and, consequently, the danger of losing souls. In this great work, watchfulness, prayer, faith, obedience, are indispensably necessary. He who does not walk with God here, cannot see nor enjoy Him hereafter.

7 * Casting all your care upon him; for he careth for you.

he desires them to put on humility, as the encombola, or servants' dress, that they may appear to be such as were ready to serve; and that he cannot refer to this article of clothing as an ornament, the next words sufficiently prove—God resisteth the proud, and giveth grace to the humble: The proud, with all their ornaments, God resists; while those who are clothed with the humble garment, He adorns.

6. Humble yourselves] Those who submit patiently to the dispensations of God's providence, He lifts up; those who lift themselves up, God thrusts down.

If we humble not ourselves under God's grace, He will humble us under His judgments. Those who patiently submit to Him, He exalts in due time: if His hand be mighty to depress, it is also mighty to exalt.

7. Casting all your care] Τῷ κυρίῳ, your anxiety, your distracting care, on him, for he careth for you, οὐ μελει περὶ ὑμῶν, for he meddles, or concerns himself, with the things that interest you. Whatever things concern a follower of God, whether they be spiritual or temporal, or whether in themselves great or small, God concerns Himself with them; what affects them, affects Him: in all their afflictions, He is afflicted. He who knows that God cares for him, need have no anxious cares about himself. This is a plain reference to Psal. 1v. 22. Cast thy burden upon the Lord, and he will sustain thee. He will bear both thee and thy burden.

8. Be sober] Avoid drunkenness of your senses, and drunkenness in your souls: be not overcharged with the concerns of the world.

Be vigilant] Awake, and keep awake: be always watchful; never be off your guard; your enemies are alert, they are never off theirs.

Your adversary the devil] This is the reason why ye should be sober and vigilant; ye have an ever active, implacable, subtle enemy to contend with. He walketh about: he has access to you every where; he knows your feelings and your propensities; and informs himself of all your circumstances: only God can know more, and do more than he; therefore your care must be cast upon God.

As a roaring lion] Satan tempts under three forms:—1. The subtle serpent; to beguile our senses, pervert our judgment, and enchain our imagination. 2. As an angel of light; to deceive us with false views of spiritual things, refinements in religion, and presumption on the providence and grace of God. 3. As a roaring lion; to bear us down, and destroy us by violent opposition, persecution, and death. Thus he was acting towards the followers of God at Pontus, &c. who were now suffering a grievous persecution.

Walketh about] Traversing the earth: a plain reference to Job ii. 2. which see.

Seeking whom he may devour] Τίνα καταψύχων ἡμὲν γουλὴν. It is not every one that he can swallow down: those who are sober and vigilant are proof against him: these he MAY NOT swallow down: those who are drunken with the cares of this world, &c. and are UNWATCHFUL, these he MAY swallow down. There is a beauty in this verse, and a striking opposition between the first and last words, which I think has not been noticed:—Be sober, ὑμῶν, from ὑμῶν, not, and πίνω, to drink; do not drink, do not swallow down; and the word καταψύχων, from κατα, down, and ψύω, to drink. If you swallow strong drink down, the devil will swallow you down. Hear this! ye drunkards, toppers, and tipplers, or by whatsoever name you are known in society, or among your fellow-sinners. Strong drink is not only the way to the devil, but the devil's way into you; and ye are such as the devil particularly MAY swallow down.

9. Whom resist] Stand against him, ἀντιστά. Though invulnerable, he is not unconquerable: the weakest follower of God can confound and overpower him, if he continue steadfast in the faith, believing on the Son of God, and walking uprightly before Him. To a soul thus engaged he can do no damage.

The same afflictions are accomplished in your brethren] It is the lot of all the disciples of Christ to suffer persecution. The brotherhood, ἀδελφότης, the Christian church, every where is exposed to the assaults of men and devils; you are persecuted by the heathen, among whom ye live, and from among whom ye are gathered into the fold of Christ: but even those who profess the same faith with you, and who are resident among the Jews, (for so I think ἐκκοσμοί, in the world, is here to be understood,) are also persecuted: both heathens and Jews being equally opposed to the pure and holy doctrines of the Gospel. Any man who has read the Greek Testament with any attention, must have observed a vast number of places in which the word κοσμος, which we translate world, means the Jewish people, and the Jewish state, and nothing else.

10. But the God of all grace] The Fountain of compassion, mercy, and goodness. Mahammed has this fine description of the Divine Being in the work which he commences every sura, or chapter, of his two excepted; viz. بِسْمِ اللّٰهِ الرَّحْمٰنِ الرَّحِیْمِ, Bismillahi, as arrahameehi. Of which the best translation that can be made is that of the apostle; in the name of the God of the God who is the most merciful and the most compassionate: who is an exuberant Fountain of love and compassion: His intelligent offspring.

Who hath called us] By the preaching of the Gospel. Unto his eternal glory] To the infinite felicity of a heavenly state.

By Christ Jesus] Through the merit of His precious death, by the influence of His Holy Spirit, by the power of His Gospel, and by the splendour of his own example.

After ye have suffered awhile] Ολιγον θαλασσαν, suffered a little time; that is, while ye are enduring persecutions, God will cause all to work together for good.

Make you perfect] Καταρτισει, καταρτιζει, οὐκ ἔσονται: all these words are read in the future tense in the best MSS. and Versions.

He will make you perfect] Καταρτισει, put you in joint, as the timbers of a building.

Establish] Σταθισει, make you firm in every part; you strongly to each other, so that you may be imperturbable: the whole building being one in the Lord.

Strengthen] Ενδυνασει, cramp and bind every part; there shall be no danger of warping, splitting, or falling.

Stable] Σταθισαι, cause all to rest so evenly as upon the best and surest foundation, that ye may together to a holy temple in the Lord;—in a word, that ye be complete in all the mind that was in Christ; and in all your trials and difficulties; strengthened to overcome all your enemies; and, after all, abide founded, in the truth of grace. All these phrases are factural; and the apostle has again in view the foundation which he produced chap. ii. 5. where see the notes.

11. To him] The God of all grace, be glory: and praise be ascribed; and dominion: the government of heaven, earth, and hell; for ever, through time, and through eternity.—Amen. So be it, so let it be, and so be. Amen and amen!

12. By Silvanus, a faithful brother unto you, as I have written briefly, exhorting, and testifying, of the true grace of God wherein ye stand, and in which ye should persevere to the end. 13. The church that is at Babylon] After consideration has been said by learned men and critics on this article of opinion that the apostle does not mean Egypt, nor Jerusalem, nor Rome, as figurative Babylon; the ancient celebrated Babylon in Assyria: which Mr. Benson observes, the metropolis of the eastern diocese of the Jews: but, as I have said so much on this subject in my Preface, I beg leave to refer the reader to that place. Instead of Babylon, some MSS. mentioned by St. Chrysostom in his Chronicon, have Iorxa, Joppa, and one has Rome, in the margin; probably as the meaning according to the writer, of the word Babylon.

Elected together with you] Συνεκλεκται, fellow-elected jointly with you. Probably meaning that the believers at Babylon, received the Gospel about time. On the election of those to whom St. Peter wrote, see the notes on chap. 1. 2.

And—Marcus my son) This is supposed to be the same person who is mentioned Acts xii. 12. and who is known by the name of John Mark; he was sister's son to Barnabas, Coloss. iv. 25. his mother's name was Mary; and the same who wrote the Gospel that goes under his name. He is called here Peter's son, i. e. according to the faith, Peter having probably the means of his conversion. This is very likely, as Peter seems to have been intimate at his mother's house.—See the account Acts xii. 6—17.

14. Great one another with a kiss of charity) See the notes on Rom. xvi. 16. and on 1 Cor. xvi. 20. In the above places the kiss is called a holy kiss; here, φιληματι αγαπης, a kiss of love; i. e. as a mark of their love to each other, in order that misunderstandings might be prevented. But ten or twelve MSS. with the Syriac, Arabic, Armenian, and Vulgate, have αγιω, holy, salute one another with a holy kiss. The difference is not great.

As the true church of Christ has generally been in a state of suffering, the epistles of St. Peter have ever been most highly prized by all believers. That which we have just finished is an admirable letter, containing some of the most important maxims and consolations for the church in the wilderness. No Christian can read it without deriving from it both light and life. Ministers, especially, should study it well, that they may know how to comfort their flocks when in persecution or adversity. He never speaks to good effect in any spiritual case who is not furnished out of the Divine treasure. God's words invite, solicit, and command assent: on them a man may confidently rely. The words of man may be true, but they are not infallible. This is the character of God's word alone.

I shall sum up the contents of this chapter in the words of a good commentator: "Because the knowledge and good behaviour of the people depend, in a great measure, upon the kind of instruction which they receive from their teachers; the apostle in this chapter, addressed the elders, that is, the bishops, pastors, rulers, and deacons, among the brethren of Pontus, &c. ver. 1. exhorting the bishops in particular, to feed the flock of God committed to their care, faithfully; and to exercise their episcopal office, not as by constraint, but willingly; not from the love of gain, but from love to their Master and to the flock, ver. 2; and not to lord it over God's heritage, but to be patterns of humility and disinterestedness to the people, ver. 3. This exhortation to bishops, to feed Christ's flock, was given with much propriety by Peter, who had himself been appointed by Christ to feed his lambs and his sheep. Next because the faithful performance of the bishop's office was, in that age, attended with great difficulty and danger, the apostle to encourage the bishops, assured them that when the chief Shepherd shall appear, they shall receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away, ver. 4. The distinguished reward which Christ is to bestow on those who have suffered for His sake, being a favourite topic with our apostle, he introduces it often in this epistle.

"Having thus exhorted the pastors, the apostle turned to discourse to the people, charging them to be subject to their elders, and to one another; that is, to be of a teachable disposition, and to receive instruction from every one capable of giving it; and to do all the duties which they could to each other, according to their different stations and relations, ver. 5. But especially to be subject to God, by humbly submitting themselves to the judgments which were coming upon them, that God might exalt them in due time, ver. 6. Casting all their anxious care on God, because He cared for them, ver. 7. And to watch against the devil, who went about as a roaring lion seeking to destroy them, by instigating the wicked to persecute them, and drive them into apostasy, ver. 8. But they were to resist that terrible enemy by steadfastness in the faith, and not to think themselves hardly dealt with when persecuted, knowing that their brethren, every where, were exposed to the same temptations of the devil, ver. 9. In the meantime, to give them all the assistance in his power, the apostle prayed earnestly to God to establish and strengthen them, ver. 10. And ended his prayer with a doxology to God expressive of his supreme dominion over the universe, and all the things it contains.

"The apostle informed the brethren of Pontus that he had sent this letter to them by Silvanus, whom he praised for his fidelity to Christ, ver. 12. Then giving them the salutation of the church in Babylon, where it seems he was when he wrote this letter, he added the salutation of Mark, whom he called his son, either because he had converted him, or on account of the great attachment which Mark bore to him, ver. 13. And having desired them to salute one another, he concluded with giving them his apostolical benediction, ver. 14."—See Dr. Macknight.

INTRODUCTION TO THE SECOND EPISTLE OF PETER.

As the Preface to the preceding epistle embraces the question of the authenticity of both epistles, and also considers several matters common to both, I need not take up the subject here afresh; but simply consider those matters which are peculiar to the epistle before me, and which have not been examined in the foregoing preface.

"This epistle, as appears from chap. iii. 1. (says Michaelis;) was written to the same communities as the first epistle; and the author gives us thus to understand, that he was the person who wrote the first epistle; that is, the apostle Peter. He calls himself, likewise, chap. i. 1. Ευαγγελιστρος, δευτερος και αποστολος Ιησου Χριστου, Symeon Peter, a servant and apostle of Jesus Christ; and chap. i. 16—18. says that he was present at the transfiguration of Christ on the mount. The notion, therefore, entertained by Grotius, that this epistle was written by a bishop of Jerusalem, of the name of Simeon, is absolutely inadmissible; and we have no other alternative than this, either it was written by the apostle St. Peter, or it is a forgery in his name.

"The ancients entertained very great doubts whether St. Peter was really the author. Eusebius, in his chapter, where he speaks of the books of the New Testament in general, reckons it among the αριστεργημενα, those not canonical. He says, that tradition does not reckon, as a part of the New Testament, the second epistle ascribed to Peter; but that, as in the opinion of most men, it is useful, it is therefore much read. Origen had said, long before, that Peter had left behind him one epistle universally received, and perhaps a second, though doubts are entertained about it.

"The old Syriac Version, though it contains the Epistle of St. James, which Eusebius likewise reckons among the αριστεργημενα, does not contain the Second Epistle of St. Peter. Now it cannot be said that the other books of the New Testament were translated into Syriac before St. Peter's second epistle was written; for St. Paul's Second Epistle to Timothy was written certainly as late, and yet is contained in this very version. And if an epistle, addressed only to an individual, was known to the Syriac translator, it may be thought that a circular epistle, addressed to communities dispersed in several countries in Asia, would hardly have escaped his notice. The circumstance, therefore, that the old Syriac translator did not translate the Second Epistle of St. Peter, as well as the first, may be used as an argument against its antiquity, and of course against its authenticity.

"It appears, then, that if the authenticity of this epistle were to be determined by external evidence, it would have less in its favour than it would have against it. But, on the other hand, the internal evidence is greatly in its favour; and, indeed, so much so, that the epistle gains in this respect more than it loses in the former. Wetstein, indeed, says that, since the ancients themselves were in doubt, the moderns cannot expect to arrive at certainty, because we cannot obtain more information on the subject in the eighteenth, than ecclesiastical writers were able to obtain in the third and fourth centuries. Now, this is perfectly true, as far as relates to historical knowledge, or to the testimony of others in regard to the matter of fact, whether St. Peter was the author or not. But when this question is to be decided by an examination of the epistle itself, it is surely possible that the critical skill and penetration of the moderns may discover in it proofs of its having been written by St. Peter, though these proofs escaped the notice of the ancients. After a diligent comparison of the First Epistle of St. Peter, with that which is ascribed to him as his second, the agreement between them appears to me to be such, that if the second was not written by St. Peter, as well as the first, the person who forged it not only possessed the power of imitation in a very unusual degree; but understood likewise the design of the first epistle, with which the ancients do not appear to have been acquainted. Now, if this be true, the supposition that the second epistle was not written by St. Peter himself, involves a contradiction. Nor is it credible that a pious impostor of the first or second century should have imitated St. Peter so successfully as to betray no marks of a forgery; for the spurious productions of those ages, which were sent into the world in the name of apostles, are, for the most part, very unhappy imitations, and discover very evident marks that they were not written by the persons to whom they were ascribed. Other productions of this kind betray their origin by the poverty of their materials, or by the circumstance that, instead of containing original thoughts, they are nothing more than a rhapsody of sentiments collected from various parts of the Bible, and put together without plan or order.

"This charge cannot possibly be laid to the Second Epistle of St. Peter, which is so far from containing materials derived from other parts of the Bible, that the third chapter exhibits the discussion of a totally new subject. Its resemblance to the Epistle of Jude will hardly be urged as an argument against it: for no doubt can be made that the Second Epistle of St. Peter was, in respect to the Epistle of St. Jude, the original, and not the copy. Lastly, it is extremely difficult, even for a man of the greatest talents, to forge a writing in the name of another, without sometimes inserting what the pretended author either would not, or could not, have said; and support the imposture in no complete a manner as to militate, in not a single instance, either against his character, or against the age in which he lived. Now, in the Second Epistle of St. Peter, though it has been a subject of examination full seven-hundred years, nothing has hitherto been discovered which is unsuitable, either to the apostle, or to the apostolic age. Objections, indeed, have been made on account of its style: but the style of the second epistle, when compared with that of the first, warrants rather the conclusion that both were written by the same person. We have no reason, therefore, to believe, that the Second Epistle of St. Peter is therefore spurious, especially as it is difficult to comprehend what motive could have induced a Christian, whether orthodox or heretic, to attempt the fabrication of such an epistle, and then falsely ascribe it to St. Peter.

"Having shown that the supposition that this epistle is spurious, is without foundation; I have, in the next place, to show that there are positive grounds for believing it to be genuine. The arguments in favour of its genuineness are of two kinds, being founded on the similarity of the two epistles, either in respect to their sentiments, or in respect to their style. The arguments of the former kind are as follow:—

"1. The design of the first epistle was to assure the uncircumcised Christians that they stood in the grace of God. Now, it was not generally known that this was the design of it; and, therefore, we cannot suppose that any person whose object was to forge an epistle in St. Peter's name should have observed it. But the design of the second epistle was certainly the same as that of the first, as appears from the address, chap. i. 1. Τοις ισθητον ημιν λαχουσι κειρι εν δικαιοσυνη το θρω, 'to them who have obtained like precious faith with us, through the righteousness of God.' If we explain ημιν, as denoting 'us apostles,' the address will imply what was wholly unnecessary, since no one could doubt that the faith of other Christians might be as good as the faith of the apostles; and it will sound likewise rather haughty and assuming; but if we explain ημιν as denoting 'us who were born Jews,' and consider that the second epistle, as well as the first, was directed to persons who were born heathens, the address becomes clear and consistent: δικαιοσυνη το θρω, will then signify the impartiality of God, in estimating the faith of native heathens as highly as the faith of native Jews, which St. Peter has extolled in other places. We shall likewise be able to explain chap. i. 8–10, which appears to contain the tautology that those who are diligent in good works are not idle; whereas, if this epistle be explained from the design of the first, we shall perceive the meaning of the passage to be this; that they who are diligent in good works, need not fear the reproach that they observe not the Levitical law, since their good works, which are the fruit of their religious knowledge, will be the means of making their calling and election sure.—See the note on this place.

"The deluge, which is not a common subject in the apostolic epistles, is mentioned both in 1 Pet. iii. 20, and in 2 Pet. ii. 5, and in both places the circumstance is noted, that eight persons only were saved; though in neither place does the subject require that the number should be particularly specified. Now it is true, that St. Peter was not the only apostle who knew how many persons were saved in the ark; but he only, who, by habit, had acquired a familiarity with the subject, would ascertain the precise number, where his argument did not depend upon it. The author of the first epistle had read St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans; and the author of the second epistle speaks in express terms, chap. iii. 15, 16, of the epistles of St. Paul. Now, no other writer of the New Testament has quoted from the New Testament; consequently, we have in these epistles a criterion from which we may judge that they were written by the same author.

"Before I consider the arguments which the style of these epistles, I must observe, commentators have, on the contrary, contended very different; and since have inferred that by different authors: but it is extremely from a single epistle; so complete a judgment of style and manner, as to enable us to pronounce, that he was not the author of another to him. The style of the same writer is not at every period of his life; especially when in his native, but in a foreign language.

"From what has been said in the course appears, that even the second chapter of has some resemblance, both in its style and first epistle. This is to be particularly noted by the advocates for the second epistle have that the style of this chapter is not the usual Bishop Sturrock, for instance, acknowledges I contend that there is some similarity, as assert, that there is no difference. But it will follow, that the whole epistle was not written and if it is allowable to draw a conclusion passages, it will be no other than this, that is spurious, because the style of it is said from the first and third chapters as it is from This conclusion, however, no one will deny the connexion of the whole epistle: in question is rather of a negative kind; unable to discover any remarkable agreement between the first epistle and the second chapter, I do not perceive any remarkable second chapter has indeed several words in other parts of the New Testament; but said of the first epistle; and some of the to us appear extraordinary, were borrowed, Gnostics, whose doctrines are here confuted, in combating the opinions of a particular their peculiar errors. Thus, in 2 Pet. ii. 1, called 'clouds, agitated by a tempest;' and Manichæans, who had many doctrines in Gnostics, taught that there were five elements, and that one of the latter was called in like manner the frequently speak of the name of ζωον, which occurs more than in The Epistle of St. Jude has a still greater figurative expressions; and it is not impossible were borrowed from the Gnostics. The Second Peter must have been written only a short death; for he says, chap. i. 14, 'shortly I may tabernacle, even as our Lord Jesus Christ.' St. Peter here alludes to his conversion after the resurrection, recorded in John Christ had foretold his death in the following: 'When thou shalt be old, thou shalt stretch and another shall gird thee, and carry thou wouldst not.' Hence St. Peter might have that he would not survive the coming of Christ. But Christ has declared that Jesus stayed before one generation passed away before, after a lapse of thirty years, that is, necessarily considered his death as an event to the design of this epistle, it appears that against certain persons, who, though members denied the doctrine of a general judgment of the world. They inferred that this event been long delayed, would never take place St. Peter replies, by saying—That our Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand that the Lord is not slack concerning His men count slackness, but is long-suffering any man should perish, but that all should have. Farther, St. Peter argues, that as the undergone a great revolution at the deluge, equally great, is not incredible: and that event was, at the time when it happened, the latter will be, we ought to believe in that the world will one day be totally destroyed, St. Peter says, will be effected, not by deluge, but by fire. 'The elements shall be dissolved; the earth also, and the works that are burned up.' Now, a general conflagration admitted by those who are unacquainted with earth, than an universal deluge; for, though difficult to comprehend whence a sufficient could be brought to cover the whole earth, that the bowels of the earth abound with fire, and that fiery eruptions may spread themselves the surface of the globe.—See the notes on

"It must be observed, that St. Peter's argument in the time of Noah, implies that the adversar combatants, admitted that the Mosaic account it would have been useless to have argued they denied. This must be kept in view, we are in determining who those adversaries were.

"St. Peter describes these false teachers, as 'calculators of the angels;' which the absurd, even though the calumny should be the fallen angels; since some respect is due to their former greatness and power. St. Peter says, 'angels themselves, which are greater in power and might, bring not railing accusations against them before the Lord; but these, as natural brute beasts, made to be taken and destroyed, speak evil of the things which they understand not.' Here we have a description of these false teachers, which points them out more distinctly than any of the preceding accounts, and shows they were Gnostics. For the ecclesiastical history furnishes many examples of improper adoration paid to the angels. I know of no sect which calumniated them, except that of the Gnostics. Now, the Gnostics calumniated the angels by their doctrine in respect to the creation of the world. They raised certain angels to the rank of creators; but described the creation as very imperfect, and the authors of it as wicked and rebellious against the Supreme Being.

"Having thus shown that St. Peter, in his second epistle, combats the opinion of a Gnostic sect, I will now venture to go a step further, and attempt to determine the name which the orthodox gave to this particular sect, in the first century. St. Peter describes them, chap. ii. 15. as 'following the way of Balaam, that is, as following the religious doctrine of Balaam.' The doctrine of Balaam, as St. John says, Apoc. ii. 14. was, 'to eat things sacrificed to idols, and to commit fornication.' And since Nicolaus, in Greek, has the same meaning as Balaam, in Hebrew, the followers of Balaam are called by St. John, Apoc. ii. 15. 'Nicolaitans.' Now, it is well known, that the Nicolaitans were a set of the Gnostics: and, therefore, it was probable that this was the sect against which St. Peter wrote. To this opinion, it has been objected, that if St. Peter had meant the Nicolaitans, he would have called them, not 'followers of Balaam,' but by their proper name, Nicolaitans; first, because, in general, proper names are retained, and not translated; and, secondly, because, in the present instance, no one before Cocceius observed the analogy between the Hebrew word Balaam, and the Greek word Nicolaus. But neither of these reasons is true. For, to say nothing of the general custom which once prevailed among the literati of Germany, of translating their names into Greek or Latin; I could produce examples of such translations amongst the Jews, of which it will be sufficient to mention that which occurs in Acts ix. 36. And the derivation of the Nicolaitans from Balaam must have been long known, at least in Asia; for, in the Arabic Version published by Erpenius, we find an instance of it in Apoc. ii. 6. where ra taya tau Nicolaou, is rendered شعبه النصارى that is 'works of the Shuabites.' Now the Arabic word شعبي (Shuab) is equivalent to the Hebrew Balaam. Shuab is mentioned in the Koran (Surat vii. 36. xxvi. 176. and in other places) as the prophet of the Midianites. Some suppose that by Shuab is meant Jethro: but, in my opinion, no other person is meant but Balaam, who was sent for by the Midianites, as well as by the Moabites. At least I cannot comprehend how the Nicolaitans, or any other heretics, could be considered as followers of Jethro. The Arabic verb شاهد shahada, signifies he destroyed, and the noun شعبه shabdon, the people. It is not improbable, therefore, that the Arabs adapted the word شعبي shuab as corresponding to the Hebrew word בַּלְאָם Balaam, which is compounded of בָּלַע bulh, he swallowed up, or destroyed, and עַם am, the people.—See Nicolaus, Nicolaus, is from νικαω, to overcome, and λαος, the people."—See Michaelis's Introduction.

I shall not attempt to dispute the propriety of these derivations and etymologies; but I must make one remark on the Shuabites. In general, the Arabic writers say that Shuab was Jethro, the father-in-law of Moses; and that God had sent him, according to the Koran, to preach pure morality to the Midianites; but I do not remember to have met with a sect of idolaters, or heretics, called Shuabites. In both the places of the Koran, mentioned above, Shuab is spoken of with respect. But the conjecture that Shuab and Balaam are the same, is exceedingly probable; and this makes the etymology the more likely.

We may safely conclude, from all the evidence before us,— 1. That St. Peter the apostle, was the author of this, as well as of the other epistle. 2. That it was written to the same persons. 3. That they were in a state of persecution; and had also to contend with Gnostics or other heretics, in the church. 4. That it was written a short time after the first epistle, and not long before St. Peter's martyrdom; but the precise year cannot be ascertained.

SIMON * PETER, a servant and an apostle of Jesus Christ, to them that have obtained like precious faith with us, through the righteousness * of God and our Saviour Jesus Christ.

a Or, Symeon. Acts 15 14.—b Rom. 1. 12. c Cor. 4. 13. Eph. 4. 5. Tit. 1. 4.

NOTES.—Verse 1. Simon Peter] Simeon, Συμων, is the reading of almost all the Versions, and of all the most important MSS. And this is the more remarkable, as the surname of Peter occurs upwards of seventy times in the New Testament, and is invariably read Petrus, Simon; except here, and in Ac. xv. 14. where James gives him the name of Symeon. Of all the Versions, only the Armenian and Vulgate have Simon.

A servant] Employed in his Master's work:— And an apostle] Commissioned immediately by Jesus Christ Himself, to preach to the Gentiles, and to write those epistles for the edification of the church. As the writer was an apostle, the epistle is therefore necessarily canonical. All the MSS. agree in the title epistle; and of the Versions, only the Syriac omits it.

Precious faith] βραβεως πισως, valuable faith; faith worth a great price; and faith which cost a great price. The word precious is used in the low religious phraseology, for dear, comfortable, delightful, &c. but how much is the dignity of the subject let down by expressions and meanings more proper for the nursery than for the noble science of salvation. It is necessary, however, to state, that the word precious literally signifies valuable, of great price, costly; and was not used in that sense in which it is now employed, when our translation was made. That faith must be of infinite value, the grace of which Christ purchased by His blood; and it must be of infinite value also, when it is the very instrument by which the soul is saved unto eternal life.

With us] God having given to you, believing Gentiles, the same faith and salvation which he had given to us believing Jews.

Through the righteousness of God] Through His method of bringing a lost world, both Jews and Gentiles, to salvation by Jesus Christ; through His gracious impartiality, providing for Gentiles as well as Jews.—See the notes on Rom. iii. 21-24.

2 * Grace and peace be multiplied unto you through the knowledge of God, and of Jesus our Lord, 3 According as his divine power hath given unto us all things a Or, of our God and Saviour. Tit. 2. 13.—b Dan. 4. 1. & 6. 5. 1 Pet. 1. 2. Jude 2.

Of God and our Saviour Jesus Christ] This is not a proper translation of the original τῶ θεῷ καὶ σωτῆρι ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστῷ, which is literally, of our God and Saviour Jesus Christ; and this reading which is indicated in the margin, should have been received in the text: and it is an absolute proof that St. Peter calls Jesus Christ God, even in the proper sense of the word, with the article prefixed. It is no evidence against this doctrine that two MSS. of little authority, and the Syriac version, have Κεσοῦ, Lord, instead of Θεοῦ, God, as all other MSS. and Versions agree in the other reading, as well as the Fathers; (the uncertain author of the uncertain work intitled De Vocatione Gentium, excepted).—See in Griesback.

2. Grace] God's favour: peace, the effects of that favour in the communication of spiritual and temporal blessings.

Through the knowledge of God] ἐκ ἐπιγνωσεως, by the acknowledging of God and of Jesus our Lord. For those who acknowledge Him in all their ways, He will direct their steps. Those who know Christ, and do not acknowledge Him before men, can get no multiplication of grace and peace.

3. As his divine power] His power, which no power can resist, because it is Divine; and which properly belongs to the Infinite Godhead.

Hath given unto us] ἀποδωκεν ἡμῖν, hath endowed us with the gifts; or, hath gifted us, as Dr. Macknight translates it: who observes that it refers to the gifts which the Holy Spirit communicated to the apostles, to enable them to bring men to life and godliness: which were—1. A complete knowledge of the doctrines of the Gospel. 2. Power to preach, and defend their doctrines in suitable language, which their adversaries were not able to gainsay or resist. 3. Wisdom to direct them how to behave in all cases; where and when to labour; and the matter suitable to all different cases and variety of persons. 4. Miraculous powers, so that on all proper and ne-

4 * Whereby are given unto us exceeding great and precious promises : that by these ye might be <sup>β</sup> partakers of the divine nature, <sup>κ</sup> having escaped the corruption that is in the world through lust.

5 And besides this, <sup>λ</sup> giving all diligence, add to your faith virtue ; and to virtue <sup>μ</sup> knowledge ;

6 And to knowledge temperance ; and to temperance patience ; and to patience godliness ;

7 And to godliness brotherly kindness ; and <sup>ν</sup> to brotherly kindness charity.

cessary occasions they could work miracles for the confirmation of their doctrines and mission.

By life and godliness we may understand, 1. A godly life; or, 2. Eternal life as the end, and godliness the way to it; or, 3. What was essentially necessary for the present life, food, raiment, &c. and what was requisite for the life to come. As they were in a suffering state, and most probably many of them strangers in those places, one can scarcely say that they had all things that pertained to life: and yet so had God worked in their behalf, that none of them perished, either through lack of food or raiment. And as to what was necessary for godliness, they had that from the Gospel ministry, which it appears was still continued among them; and the gifts of the Holy Spirit, which were not withdrawn: and what was farther necessary in the way of personal caution, comfort, and instruction, was supplied by means of these two epistles.

That hath called us to glory and virtue] To virtue or courage, as the means; and glory, the kingdom of heaven, as the end. This is the way in which these words are commonly understood; and this sense is plain enough; but the construction is harsh. Others have translated δια της κας αγωγης, by His glorious benignity; a Hebrewism for δια της ενδοξου σωτηριας; and read the whole verse thus, God, by His own power, hath bestowed on us every thing necessary to a happy life and godliness, having called us to the knowledge of Himself by His own infinite goodness. It is certain that the word αγωγη, which we translate virtue or courage, is used 1 Pet. ii. 9. to express the perfection of the Divine nature: that ye may show forth, res aperas, the virtues or perfections of Him who hath called you from darkness into his marvellous light.

But there is a various reading here, which is of considerable importance; and which, from the authorities by which it is supported, appears to be genuine, res αλας αγωγης κας ιδεα δευρ κας αγωγη, through the knowledge of Him who hath called us by His own glory and power; or by His own glorious power. This is the reading of A.C. several others; and, in effect, of the Coptic, Armenian, Syriac, Ethiopic, Vulgate, Cyril, Cassiodorus, &c.

4. Whereby are given unto us] By His own glorious power He hath freely given unto us exceeding great and invaluable promises. The Jews were distinguished in a very particular manner by the promises which they received from God: the promises to Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Moses, and the prophets. God promised to their God, to protect, support, and save them; to give them what was emphatically called the Promised Land; and to cause the Messiah to spring from their race. St. Peter intimates to these Gentiles that God had also given unto them exceeding great promises; indeed all that He had given to the Jews, the mere settlement in the Promised Land excepted: but this also He had given in all its spiritual meaning and force. And besides τα μεγα εναγγελια, these superlatively great promises which distinguished the Mosaic dispensation, He had given them τα ρηια εναγγελια, the valuable promises, those which came through the Great Price; enrolment with the church of God, redemption in and through the blood of the cross, the continual indwelling influence of the Holy Ghost, the resurrection of the body, and eternal rest at the right hand of God. It was of considerable consequence to the comfort of the Gentiles that these promises were made to them; and that salvation was not exclusively of the Jews.

That by these ye might be partakers] The object of all God's promises and dispensations was to bring fallen man back to the image of God, which he had lost. This, indeed, is the sum and substance of the religion of Christ. We have partaken of an earthly, sensual, and devilish nature: the design of God by Christ, is to remove this, and make us partakers of the Divine nature; and save us from all the corruption in principle and fact which is in the world: the source of which is lust, tribulation, irregular, unreasonable, inordinate, and impure desire: desire to have, to do, and to be what God has prohibited; and what would be ruinous and destructive to us were the desire to be granted.

Lust, or irregular, impure desire, is the source whence all the corruption which is in the world springs. Lust conceives and brings forth sin; sin is finished or brought into act, and then brings forth death. This destructive principle is to be rooted out; and love to God and man is to be implanted in its place. This is every Christian's privilege; God has promised to purify our hearts by faith: and that, as sin hath reigned unto death, even εσ shall grace reign through righteousness

8 For if these things be in you, and abound, the that ye shall neither be barren nor unfruitful of the seed of the word of life of our Lord Jesus Christ.

9 But he that lacketh these things is blinded, and is far off, and hath forgotten that he was purged from sins.

10 Wherefore the rather, brethren, give diligence to your calling and election sure: for if ye do these things, ye shall never fall:

11 For so an entrance shall be ministered unto you abundantly into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ.

unto eternal life: that here, we are to be delivered from all our enemies, and have even "the thoughts of our hearts so cleansed by the inspiration of God's Holy Spirit, that we shall perfectly love Him, and worthily magnify His name."

This blessing may be expected by those who are escaping, αποφυγεις, flying from, the corruption of the world, and in themselves. God purifies no heart that is indulged. Get pardon through the blood of Christ; feel your need of being purified in heart; seek to purify your soul: plead the exceeding great and invaluable merit refer to this point; abhor your inward self; every appearance of evil; flee from self and sin to the very God of peace will sanctify you through His Spirit; make you burning and shining lights (a proof that He can save to the uttermost all that will be saved by Christ;) and afterward, having guided you by His Spirit, will receive you into His eternal glory.

5. And besides (this) Notwithstanding what God has said to you, in order that ye may not receive the grace of God, give diligence.] Furnishing all earnestness; to the original is very emphatic.

Add to your faith] επιπροσηγορευς, lead up he alluding, as most think, to the chorus in the Greek, who danced with joined hands.—See the note on 2 Cor. ix. 10.

Your faith] That faith in Jesus by which ye have embraced the whole Gospel, and by which ye have evidence of things unseen.

Virtue] απερη, courage, or fortitude, to enable you to face the faith before men, in these times of persecution.

Knowledge] True wisdom, by which your faith is directed, and your courage directed, and preserving you from being carried into rashness.

6. Temperance] A proper and limited use of all enjoyments: keeping every sense under proper restraint, never permitting the animal part to subjugate the rational.

Patience] Bearing all trials and difficulties with calmness; enduring in all, and persevering through all. Godliness] Piety towards God; a deep reverence and fear; not only worshipping God with every becoming act, but adoring, loving, and magnifying Him in all your actions, in a disposition indispensably necessary to salvation, and which is to be maintained by regular prayer among professors.

7. Brotherly kindness] φιλadelphια, love of the brethren, the strongest attachment to Christ's flock; feeling that you are members of His body.

Charity] αγαπη, love to the whole human race, and to your persecutors: love to God and the brethren that is to all mankind they must also have. True religion is not selfish nor insulated; where the love of God cannot exist. Narrow, selfish people, and people who scarcely have any hope of the salvation of those who do not believe as they believe, and who do not follow the same religion; though, in their own opinions, none are so truly orthodox or religious as themselves.

After αγαπη, love, one MS. adds these words, επι ταυτων εναγγελιων, and to this love consolation: idle and useless addition.

8. For if these things be in you, and abound] All these graces, and which increase and abound in you, they will make you to be neither barren, nor unfruitful of the seed of the word of life of our Lord Jesus Christ. The common translation is here very uncorrect and unfruitful certainly convey the same idea or inactive, which is the proper sense of απογεννησει in this tautology, and restores the sense. The graces mentioned by the apostle, are in themselves active; he who was possessed of them, and had them in his heart, could not be inactive; and he who is not in the way of life, must be fruitful. I may add, that he who is active, and consequently fruitful, will ever be ready to acknowledge his Lord and Saviour, by whom he has been brought into the state of salvation.

9. But he that lacketh these things] He, who lacks these things, who professes to have faith in God, and to have faith, fortitude, knowledge, temperance, patience, brotherly kindness, and universal love, understanding is darkened, and cannot see afar off, shutting his eyes against the light, unwilling to look truth in the face; nor to behold that God whom he once knew was reconciled to him: and thus it is 12 Wherefore I will not be negligent to put you always in remembrance of these things, though ye know them, and be established in the present truth.

 13 Yes, I think it meet, as long as I am in this tabernacle, to stir you up by putting you in remembrance;
 14 Knowing that shortly I must put off this my tabernacle, even as our Lord Jesus Christ hath showed me.
 15 Moreover I will endeavour that ye may be able after my decease to have these things always in remembrance.
 16 For we have not followed cunningly-devised fables, when we made known unto you the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, but were eye-witnesses of his majesty.
 17 For he received from God the Father honour and glory, when there came such a voice to him from the excellent glory, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased.

 18 And this voice which came from heaven we heard, when we were with him in the holy mount,
 19 We have also a more sure word of prophecy; whereunto ye do well that ye take heed, as unto a light that shineth in a dark place, until the day dawn, and the day-star arise in your hearts:
 20 Knowing this first, that no prophecy of the scripture is of any private interpretation.
 21 For the prophecy came not in old time by the will of man; but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost.

erificially blind, and hath forgotten that he was purged from his old sins; has, at last, through his non-improvement of the grace which he received from God, his faith ceasing to work by love, lost the evidence of things not seen; for, having grieved the Holy Spirit, by not showing forth the virtues of Him who called him into His marvellous light, he has lost the testimony of his sonship; and then, darkness and hardness having taken place of light and filial confidence, he first calls all his former experience into doubt, and questions whether he had not put enthusiasm in the place of religion. By these means his darkness and hardness increase, his memory becomes indistinct and confused; till, at length, he forgets the work of God on his soul; next denies it; and at last asserts that the knowledge of salvation, by the remission of sins, is impossible; and that no man can be saved from sin in this life. Indeed, some go so far as to deny the Lord that bought them; to renounce Jesus Christ as having made atonement for them; and finish their career of apostasy by utterly denying His Godhead. Many cases of this kind have I known; and they are all the consequence of believers not continuing to be workers together with God, after they had experienced His pardoning love.

written one epistle; this is the second; and probably he meditated more, should he be spared. He plainly saw that there was no way of entering into eternal life, but that which he described from the 6th to the 10th verse; and, although they knew, and were established in the present truth, yet he saw it necessary to bring these things frequently to their recollection.

Reader, see that the light that is in those become not darkness; for if it do, how great a darkness!

13. As long as I am in this tabernacle. By tabernacle, we are to understand his body; and hence several of the Versions have σώματι, body, instead of σκηναίω, tabernacle. Peter's mode of speaking is very remarkable: no long as I am in this tabernacle; so then, the body was not Peter, but Peter dwelt in that body. Is not this a proof that St. Peter believed his soul to be very distinct from his body? As a man's house is the place where he dwells, so the body is the house where the soul dwells.

10. Wherefore seeing the danger of apostasy, and the fearful end of them who obey not the Gospel, and thus receive the grace of God in vain; give all diligence, σπουδαίωτε, hasten, be deeply careful, labour with the most intense purpose of soul: To make your calling. From deep Gentile darkness into the marvellous light of the Gospel:—

14. Knowing that shortly I must put off. St. Peter plainly refers to the conversation between our Lord and himself, related John xxi. 18, 19. And it is likely that he had now a particular intimation that he was shortly to seal the truth with his blood. But as our Lord told him that his death would take place when he should be old, being aged now, he might, on this ground, fairly suppose that his departure was at hand.

And election. Your being chosen, in consequence of obeying the heavenly calling, to be the people and church of God. Instead of κλήσις, calling, the Codex Alexandrinus has κατάκλησις, consecration.

15. Moreover I will endeavour. And is not this endeavour seen in these two epistles? By leaving these among thou, even after his decease, they had these things always in remembrance.

Surely Βεβαίαν, firm, solid. For, your calling to believe the Gospel, and your election to be members of the church of Christ, will be ultimately unprofitable to you, unless you hold fast what you have received, by adding to your faith virtue, knowledge, temperance, &c.

After my decease. Μετὰ τὴν ἐμὴν ἐξόδον, after my going out, i. e. of his tabernacle. The real Peter was not open to the eye, nor palpable to the touch; he was concealed in that tabernacle, vulgarly supposed to be Peter. There is a thought very similar to this in the last conversation of Socrates with his friends. As this great man was about to drink the poison to which he was condemned by the Athenian judges, his friend Crito said, "But how would you be buried?" Socrates said, "Just as you please, if you can but catch me, and I do not elude your pursuit. Then, gently smiling, he said, I cannot persuade Crito, ἀδύνατον ἐστὶν ἐμὴν διαλύειν, that I am that Socrates who now converses with you; but he thinks that I am he, σὺ οὕτως εἶπὼν ἑώραν νεκρῶν, καὶ ἐπορεύθη μετὰ τῶν βαπτῶν, whom he shall shortly see dead; and he asks how I would be buried?—I have asserted, that after I have drunk the poison, I should no longer remain with you, but shall depart to certain felicities of the blessed." PLATO'S Phædo, Oper. Vol. I. edit. Bipont. p. 260.

For if ye do these things. If ye be careful and diligent to work out your own salvation, through the grace which ye have already received from God, ye shall never fall: οὐ μὴ τραπεύετε πῶτε, ye shall at no time stumble, or fall, as the Jews have done, and lost their election, Rom. xi. 11. where the same word is used; as apostates do, and lose their peace and salvation. We find, therefore, that they who do not these things shall fall: and thus we see that there is nothing absolute and unconditional in their election. There is an addition here in some MSS. and Versions which should not pass unnoticed: the Codex Alexandrinus, nine others, with the Syriac, Erpen's Arabic, Coptic, Ethiopic, Armenian, latter Syriac with an asterisk, the Vulgate, and Bede, have ἢ ἡμεῖς τῶν κλησίων ἐργῶν, THAT BY (YOUR) GOOD WORKS ye may make your calling and election firm. This clause is found in the edition of Colineus, Paris, 1634; and has been probably omitted by more recent editors, on the supposition that the addition does not make a very orthodox sense. But, on this ground, there need be no alarm; for it does not state that the good works thus required, merit either the calling and election, or the eternal glory, of God. He who does not by good works, confirm his calling and election, will soon have neither: and although no good works ever did purchase, or ever can purchase, the kingdom of God; yet no soul can ever scripturally expect to see God, who has them not. I was hungry, and ye gave me no meat; thirsty, and ye gave me no drink; go, ye cursed! I was hungry, and ye gave me meat, &c. &c. come, ye blessed.

16. Cunningly-devised fables. ἑσθησιγενεῖς φησὶς. I think with Macknight and others, from the apostle's using σῶματα, eyeitnesses, or rather holders, in the end of the verse, it is probable that he means those cunningly-devised fables among the heathens, concerning the appearance of their gods on earth in human form. And, to gain the greater credit to these fables, the priests and statesmen instituted what they called the mysterics of the gods; in which the fabulous appearance of the gods was represented in mystic shows. But one particular show none but the fully initiated were permitted to behold: hence they were entitled, σῶματα, holders. This show was probably some resplendent image of the god imitating life; which, by its glory, dazzled the eyes of the beholders; while their ears were ravished by hymns sung in its praise; to this it was natural enough for St. Peter to allude, when speaking about the transfiguration of Christ. Here the indescribably resplendent majesty of the Great God was manifested, as far as it could be, in conjunction with that human body in which the fulness of the Divinity dwelt. And see, says the apostle, σῶματα, holders, τῆς αἰωνίου μεγαλειότητος, of his own Majesty. Here was no trick, no feigned show; we saw Him in His glory, whom thousands saw before and afterward; and we have made known to you the power and coming, καρποῦσινα, the appearance and presence, of our Lord Jesus; and we call you to feel the exceeding greatness of this power in your conversion, and the glory of this appearance, in His revelation, by the power of His Spirit to your souls. These things we have witnessed, and these things ye have experienced; and therefore we can confidently say, that neither you nor we have followed cunningly-devised fables; but that blessed Gospel which is the power of God to the salvation of every one that believes.

11. For so an entrance shall be ministered to you into the everlasting kingdom. There seems to be here an allusion to the triumphs granted by the Romans to their generals, who had distinguished themselves by putting an end to a war, or doing some signal military service to the state.—See the whole account of this military pageant in the note on 2 Cor. ii. 14. "Ye shall have a triumph, in consequence of having conquered your foes, and led captivity captive."
 Instead of everlasting kingdom, αἰωνίων βασιλείαν, two MSS. have ἐσθραίων, heavenly kingdom; and several MSS. omit the words καὶ ἑσθραίων, and Saviour.

17. For he received honour and glory. In his transfiguration, our Lord received from the Father, honour, in the voice or declaration, which said, This is my Son, the beloved One, in whom I have delighted. And he received glory, when penetrated with, and involved in that excellent glory, the fashion of his countenance was altered; for his face did shine as the sun, and his raiment was white and glistening; exceeding white like snow: which most glorious, and preternatural appearance, was a confirmation of the supernatural voice; as the voice was of this preternatural appearance; and thus his Messiahship was attested in the most complete and convincing manner.

18. And this voice—we heard! That is, himself, James, and John, heard it, and thus saw this glory; for these only were the electus, beholders, on the holy mount. It is worthy of remark, that our blessed Lord, who came to give a new law to mankind, appeared on this holy mount, with splendour and great glory; as God did, when He came on the holy Mount Sinai, to give the old law to Moses. And when the voice came from the excellent glory, This is my Son, the beloved One, in whom I have delighted; hear Him: the authority of the old law was taken away. Neither Moses nor Elijah, the law nor the prophets, must tabernacle among men, as teaching the whole way of salvation, and affording the means of eternal life: these things they had pointed out, but these things they did not contain; yet the fulfilment of their types and predictions rendered their declarations more firm and incontestable.—See below.

19. We have also a more sure word of prophecy) Ἐξουσι βιβαιοτέρων τῶν προφητικῶν λόγων, we have the prophetic doctrine more firm, or more confirmed; for in this sense the word βιβαιοτέρων is used in several places in the New Testament: see 1 Cor. i. 1. Even as the testimony of Christ, ἐββαιοτέρων, was confirmed among you. 2 Cor. i. 21.—Now he which establisheth us, ὁ βιβαιοτέρων ἡμῶν, who CONFIRMS US. Col. ii. 7. Rooted and built up in him, and established in the faith; βιβαιοτέρων, CONFIRMED IN THE FAITH. Heb. ii. 3. How shall we escape if we neglect so great salvation; ἡμῶν βιβαιοτέρων, which was CONFIRMED TO US. Heb. vi. 16.—And an oath, τῶν βιβαιοτέρων, FOR CONFIRMATION. This is the literal sense of the passage in question; and this sense removes that ambiguity from the text which has given rise to so many different interpretations. Taken, according to the common translation, it seems to say that prophecy is a surer evidence of Divine revelation than miracles; and so it has been understood. The meaning of the apostle appears to be this: the law and the prophets have spoken concerning Jesus Christ; and Isaiah has particularly pointed Him out in these words, Behold my servant whom I uphold, my CHOSEN IN WHOM MY SOUL DELIGHTETH: I have put my Spirit upon him, and he shall bring forth judgment to the Gentiles; to open the blind eyes, to bring out the prisoners from the prison, and THEM THAT SIT IN DARKNESS out of the prison-house, Isa. xlii. 1, 7. Now both at His baptism, Matt. iii. 17. and at His transfiguration, Jesus Christ was declared to be this chosen person, God's only Son, the beloved One IN WHOM HE DELIGHTED. The voice, therefore, from heaven, and the miraculous transfiguration of His Person, have confirmed the prophetic doctrine concerning Him. And to this doctrine, thus confirmed, you do well to take heed; for it is that Light that shines in the dark place, in the Gentile world, as well as among the Jews; giving light to them that sit in darkness; and bringing the prisoners out of the prison-house: and this ye must continue to do till the day of His second, last, and most glorious appearing to judge the world comes; and the Day-star, Φωσφορος, this Light-bringer, arise in your hearts, manifests Himself to your eternal consolation. Or perhaps the latter clause of the verse might be thus understood: the prophecies concerning Jesus, which have always been as a light shining in a dark place, from the time of their delivery to the time in which the bright day of Gospel light and salvation dawned forth, and the Sun of righteousness has arisen in our souls, with healing in His rays. And to this all who waited for Christ's appearing have taken heed. The word Φωσφορος, phosphorus, generally signified the planet Venus, when she is the morning-star; and thus she is called in most European nations.

20. Knowing this first) Considering this as a first principle; that no prophecy of the Scripture, whether that referred to above, or any other, is of any private interpretation, proceeds from the prophet's own knowledge or invention: or was the offspring of calculation or conjecture. The word ἄλλοις ἑαίμαται ἀλλο, impetus, impulse; and in the best sense here;—not by the mere private wish of his own mind.

21. For the prophecy came not in old time) To former time, by the will of man, by a man's own conjecture, or calculation; but holy men of God separated from the world, and devoted to God's service, by the Holy Ghost. So far were they from these prophetic declarations concerning Christ, that event, that they were passives, carried along by themselves, and out of the whole region, as it were, of knowledge and conjecture, by the Holy Ghost, out their knowing any thing of the matter, then what to speak, and what to write; and their knowledge were the words of the prophet did not even know the intent of those words, what, or what manner of time, the Spirit of God was in them did signify, when it testified his sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow. Pet. i. 11, 12 and the notes there.

1. As the writer of this epistle asserts that the holy mount with Christ when he was transfigured, was either Peter, James, or John, for there was some present on that occasion except Moses as their glorious bodies. The epistle was written by James nor John; but the uninterrupted current of Divine inspiration was granted, gave it to Peter the Preface.

2. It is not unrequit for the writers of the present to draw a comparison between the Mosaic dispensations; and the comparison generally shew as the former was, it had no glory in comparison that excelleth. St. Peter seems to touch some point; the Mosaic dispensation, with all the glory by which it was illustrated, was only as a lamp in a dark place. There is a propriety, and design in language that are not generally noticed; a lamp in the dark, but a very small portion of light, and only to the very near to it; yet it always gives light enough to be visible, even at a great distance. Though not the space between it and the beholder, it is the lamp shining in a dark place. Such was dispensation: it gave a little light to the Jews, to the Gentile world, any farther than to make. This is compared with the Gospel under the sun break, and the rising of the sun. When the eight-on degrees below the horizon, day-break, as the rays of light begin then to diffuse themselves there, by which they are reflected upon the earth, means a whole hemisphere is enlightened, though to that degree; yet this, increasing every moment, approaches the horizon, prepares for the full moon, his resplendent orb; so the ministry of John Baptist ministry of Christ Himself, prepared believers for His full manifestation on the day, and afterward. Here the Sun rose in His strength, light, heat, and life, to all the inhabitants of the far, then, as a lantern, carried in a dark night, and inferior to the beneficial effects of day's full light and heat of a meridian sun: so far was dispensation, in its beneficial effects, inferior to dispensation.

3. Perhaps there is scarcely any point of view can consider prophecy, which is so satisfactory, give as that which is here stated; that is, far from the subject of their own predictions, the ancient not even know the meaning of what themselves were carried beyond themselves by the influence Spirit; and after ages were alone to discover the prophecy; and the fulfillment was to be proof that the prediction was of God; and that private invention, no discovery made by him and wisdom, but by the especial revelation of God. This is sufficiently evident in all the prophecies that have been already fulfilled; and will be equally yet to be fulfilled, the events will point out the prophecy will be seen to be fulfilled in that phets, whose prophecies were from their own invention, and perverted many.

As there shall be false teachers among you) no of whom the way of truth shall be evil spoken of. 3 And through covetousness shall they with feigned words make merchandise of you: whose judgment now of a long time lingereth not, and their damnation slumbereth not. 4 For if God spared not the angels that sinned, but cast them down to hell, and delivered them into chains of darkness, to be reserved unto judgment;

5 And spared not the old world, but saved Noah the eighth person, a preacher of righteousness, bringing in the flood upon the world of the ungodly;

6 For if God spared not the angels that sinned, but cast them down to hell, and delivered them into chains of darkness, to be reserved unto judgment; or, sinking them into Tartarus, delivered them over to be kept to judgment; or, sinking them into Tartarus, delivered them over into custody for punishment, to chains of darkness. As the word Tartarus is found nowhere else in the New Testament, nor does it appear in the Septuagint, we must have recourse to the Greek writers for its meaning. Mr. Parkhurst, under the word ταρταρος, has made some good collections from those writers, which I here subjoin:—

The Scholiast on Ἐσθίου, Βυμων. says Pindar, "relates that Apollo overcame the Python by force; wherefore the earth endeavoured, ταρταρωσα, to cast him into Tartarus." Ζητεται uses the same word ταρταρος, for casting or sending into Tartarus; and the compound verb καταταρταρων is found in Apollodorus, in Didymus's Scholia on Homer, in Pharusus, De Nat. Deor. p. 11. edit. Gale, and in the book Ilia Horacum, which is extant among the works of Pistarch. And those whom Apollodorus styles καταταρταρωμενοι, he, in the same breath, calls πυθωνιας εἰς Τάρταρον, cast into Tartarus. Thus the learned Windet, in Poole's Synopsis. We may then, I think, safely assert that ταρταρος, in St. Peter, means not as Mede, (Works, fol. p. 22.) interprets it, to adjudge to, but to cast into Tartarus, πυρρις εἰς Τάρταρον, as in Homer, cited below. And in order to know what was the precise intention of the apostle by this expression, we must inquire what is the accurate import of the term Ταρταρος. Now it appears from a passage of Lucian, that by Ταρταρος was meant in a physical sense, the bounds, or verge, of this material system; for addressing himself to ΕΡΩΣ, Cupid, or Love, he says, Ὑψ' ἄγ' ἀφανες καὶ ἀκρυβητος ἀφορμῆς ΤΟ ΠΑΝ τρωποςως, κ. τ. λ.—Thou formedst it from its confused and chaotic state; and after separating and dispersing the circumfused chaos, in which, as in one common sepulchre, the whole world lay buried, Thou drovest it to the confines or recesses of outer Tartarus.—

Where iron gates, and bars of solid brass, Keep it in durance irrefragable; And its return prohibit.

The ancient Greeks appear to have received by tradition, an account of the punishment of the fallen angels, and of bad men after death; and their poets did, in conformity, I presume, with that account, make Tartarus the place where the giants who rebelled against Jupiter, and the souls of the wicked were confined. 'Here,' saith Hesiod, Theogon. line 720. l. the hellous Titans were bound in penal-chains.

Τοσσην εὐρηθ' ἔσω γης ὄσον ἄρανος ἐσ' ἄω γαίης, Ἴσση γὰρ τ' ἀνω γης ἐς ΤΑΡΤΑΡΟΝ ἠερουρα.

As far beneath the earth, as earth from heaven; For such the distance thence to Tartarus.

Which description will very well agree with the proper sense of Tartarus; if we take the earth for the centre of the material system, and reckon from our zenith, or the extremity of the heavens that is over our heads. But as the Greeks imagined the earth to be of a boundless depth; so it must not be dissembled that their poets speak of Tartarus as a vast pit, or gulf in the bowels of it. Thus Hesiod, in the same poem, line 119. calls it—

ΤΑΡΤΑΡΑ τ' ἠερουρα πύλον χθονος ἐροδοιους, Ἰβλακ Tartarus, within earth's spacious womb.

And Homer, Iliad, vill. line 13, &c. introduces Jupiter threatening any of the gods who should presume to assist either the Greeks or the Trojans, that he should either come back wounded to heaven, or be sent to Tartarus.

Ἡ μιν Ἰδων πύλον ἐς ΤΑΡΤΑΡΟΝ ἠερουρα, Τῆλη μάλ' ἤχι βαθίον ἔσω χθονος ἐς ἑσπέρου, Ἐνθα εὐρηθῆαι τ' ἑλκός, καὶ χαλκός ἰδός, Τοσσην εὐρηθ' αἰδέου, δού ἄρανος ἐσ' ἄω γαίης.

Or far, O far from steep Olympus thrown, Low in the deep Tartarean gulf shall groan That gulf which iron gates and brazen ground Within the earth inexorable bound;

As deep beneath the infernal centre hurl'd As from that centre to the ethereal world.

Where, according to Homer's description, Iliad viii. line 480. l.

Ὀν' ἀνω γης ἐροδοιους ἠελίου Τερπυρ' ἐρ' ἀνιποιοι: βαθός δε τ' ΤΑΡΤΑΡΟΣ ἀφός.

No sun e'er gilds the gloomy horrors there, No cheerful gales refresh the lazy air; But murky Tartarus extends around.

Or, in the language of the old Latin poet, (cited by Cicero, Tuscul. lib. l. cap. 15.)

Ubi rigida constat crassa caligo inferum.

On the whole, then, Ταρταρον, in St. Peter, is the same as μικρὴν εἰς Τάρταρον, to throw into Tartarus, in Homer; only rectifying the poet's mistake of Tartarus being in the bowels of the earth, and recurring to the original sense of that word above explained; which, when applied to spirits, must them down to hell, and delivered them into chains of darkness, to be reserved unto judgment;

5 And spared not the old world, but saved Noah the eighth person, a preacher of righteousness, bringing in the flood upon the world of the ungodly;

6 For if God spared not the angels that sinned, but cast them down to hell, and delivered them into chains of darkness, to be reserved unto judgment; or, sinking them into Tartarus, delivered them over to be kept to judgment; or, sinking them into Tartarus, delivered them over into custody for punishment, to chains of darkness. As the word Tartarus is found nowhere else in the New Testament, nor does it appear in the Septuagint, we must have recourse to the Greek writers for its meaning. Mr. Parkhurst, under the word ταρταρος, has made some good collections from those writers, which I here subjoin:—

The Scholiast on Ἐσθίου, Βυμων. says Pindar, "relates that Apollo overcame the Python by force; wherefore the earth endeavoured, ταρταρωσα, to cast him into Tartarus." Ζητεται uses the same word ταρταρος, for casting or sending into Tartarus; and the compound verb καταταρταρων is found in Apollodorus, in Didymus's Scholia on Homer, in Pharusus, De Nat. Deor. p. 11. edit. Gale, and in the book Ilia Horacum, which is extant among the works of Pistarch. And those whom Apollodorus styles καταταρταρωμενοι, he, in the same breath, calls πυθωνιας εἰς Τάρταρον, cast into Tartarus. Thus the learned Windet, in Poole's Synopsis. We may then, I think, safely assert that ταρταρος, in St. Peter, means not as Mede, (Works, fol. p. 22.) interprets it, to adjudge to, but to cast into Tartarus, πυρρις εἰς Τάρταρον, as in Homer, cited below. And in order to know what was the precise intention of the apostle by this expression, we must inquire what is the accurate import of the term Ταρταρος. Now it appears from a passage of Lucian, that by Ταρταρος was meant in a physical sense, the bounds, or verge, of this material system; for addressing himself to ΕΡΩΣ, Cupid, or Love, he says, Ὑψ' ἄγ' ἀφανες καὶ ἀκρυβητος ἀφορμῆς ΤΟ ΠΑΝ τρωποςως, κ. τ. λ.—Thou formedst it from its confused and chaotic state; and after separating and dispersing the circumfused chaos, in which, as in one common sepulchre, the whole world lay buried, Thou drovest it to the confines or recesses of outer Tartarus.—

Where iron gates, and bars of solid brass, Keep it in durance irrefragable; And its return prohibit.

The ancient Greeks appear to have received by tradition, an account of the punishment of the fallen angels, and of bad men after death; and their poets did, in conformity, I presume, with that account, make Tartarus the place where the giants who rebelled against Jupiter, and the souls of the wicked were confined. 'Here,' saith Hesiod, Theogon. line 720. l. the hellous Titans were bound in penal-chains.

Τοσσην εὐρηθ' ἔσω γης ὄσον ἄρανος ἐσ' ἄω γαίης, Ἴσση γὰρ τ' ἀνω γης ἐς ΤΑΡΤΑΡΟΝ ἠερουρα.

As far beneath the earth, as earth from heaven; For such the distance thence to Tartarus.

Which description will very well agree with the proper sense of Tartarus; if we take the earth for the centre of the material system, and reckon from our zenith, or the extremity of the heavens that is over our heads. But as the Greeks imagined the earth to be of a boundless depth; so it must not be dissembled that their poets speak of Tartarus as a vast pit, or gulf in the bowels of it. Thus Hesiod, in the same poem, line 119. calls it—

ΤΑΡΤΑΡΑ τ' ἠερουρα πύλον χθονος ἐροδοιους, Ἰβλακ Tartarus, within earth's spacious womb.

And Homer, Iliad, vill. line 13, &c. introduces Jupiter threatening any of the gods who should presume to assist either the Greeks or the Trojans, that he should either come back wounded to heaven, or be sent to Tartarus.

Ἡ μιν Ἰδων πύλον ἐς ΤΑΡΤΑΡΟΝ ἠερουρα, Τῆλη μάλ' ἤχι βαθίον ἔσω χθονος ἐς ἑσπέρου, Ἐνθα εὐρηθῆαι τ' ἑλκός, καὶ χαλκός ἰδός, Τοσσην εὐρηθ' αἰδέου, δού ἄρανος ἐσ' ἄω γαίης.

Or far, O far from steep Olympus thrown, Low in the deep Tartarean gulf shall groan That gulf which iron gates and brazen ground Within the earth inexorable bound;

As deep beneath the infernal centre hurl'd As from that centre to the ethereal world.

Where, according to Homer's description, Iliad viii. line 480. l.

Ὀν' ἀνω γης ἐροδοιους ἠελίου Τερπυρ' ἐρ' ἀνιποιοι: βαθός δε τ' ΤΑΡΤΑΡΟΣ ἀφός.

No sun e'er gilds the gloomy horrors there, No cheerful gales refresh the lazy air; But murky Tartarus extends around.

Or, in the language of the old Latin poet, (cited by Cicero, Tuscul. lib. l. cap. 15.)

Ubi rigida constat crassa caligo inferum.

On the whole, then, Ταρταρον, in St. Peter, is the same as μικρὴν εἰς Τάρταρον, to throw into Tartarus, in Homer; only rectifying the poet's mistake of Tartarus being in the bowels of the earth, and recurring to the original sense of that word above explained; which, when applied to spirits, must

6 And, turning the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah into ashes, condemned them with an overthrow, making them an ensample unto those that after should live ungodly;

7 And delivered just Lot, vexed with the filthy conversation of the wicked:

8 (For that righteous man dwelling among them, in seeing and hearing, vexed his righteous soul from day to day with their unlawful deeds.)

9 The Lord knoweth how to deliver the godly out of temptations, and to reserve the unjust unto the day of judgment to be punished:

10 But chiefly to them that walk after the flesh in the lust of uncleanness, and despise government. Presumptuous are they, self-willed, they are not afraid to speak evil of dignities.

11 Whereas angels, which are greater in power and might, bring not railing accusation against them before the Lord.

12 But these, as natural brute beasts, made to be destroyed, speak evil of the things that they understand, and shall utterly perish in their own corruption;

13 And shall receive the reward of unrighteousness, that count it pleasure to riot in the day time. Spots they are and blemishes, sporting themselves with their own deceits while they feast with you;

14 Having eyes full of adultery, and that cannot cease sin; beguiling unstable souls: a heart they have exercised with covetous practices; cursed children:

15 Which have forsaken the right way, and are gone following the way of Balaam the son of Bosor, who was taught to sell the wages of unrighteousness;

16 But was rebuked for his iniquity; the dumb ass spake with man's voice forbad the madness of the prophet;

17 & these are wells without water, clouds that are driven about with a tempest:

18 Whom the restraints laid upon men by the laws, and would have government destroyed, that they might live as they list.

Presumptuous are they) Τολμασταί. They are bold; headstrong, regardless of fear.

Self-willed) Αυθαίετοι. Self-sufficient, presuming on selves; following their own opinions, which no authority induce them to relinquish.

Are not afraid to speak evil of dignities.) They are less and disobedient; spurn all human authority, and contemptuously of all legal and civil jurisdiction. The general despise governments, and speak evil of dignities wish to be under no control, that they may act as free in the community.

11. Whereas angels, &c.] This is a difficult verse, but meaning seems to be this: The holy angels, who were sent as bringing an account of the actions of the fallen angels before the Lord in judgment, simply state the facts out exaggeration, and without permitting any thing of a reviling, or railing spirit, to enter into their accusation.

Zech. iii. 1. and Jude 9. to the former of which St. Peter distinctly alludes. But these persons not only speak of actions of men which they conceive to be wrong; but do untrue colourings, and the greatest malevolence. Michael arch-angel, treated a damned spirit with courtesy; he said, The Lord rebuke thee, Satan! but these treat the God's appointment with disrespect and cadumny.

Before the Lord) Προς Κεφαί, is wanting in a number MSS. and most of the Versions.

12. But these, as natural brute beasts) Ης αλογα σκευα, as those natural animals void of reason; following the gross instinct of nature; being governed neither by a nor religion.

Made to be taken and destroyed) Intended to be taken nets and gins, and then destroyed, because of their destructive nature; so these false teachers and impostors must be treated: first incarcerated, and then brought to ment, that they may have the reward of their doings.

thus, by blaspheming what they do not understand, it last perish in their own corruption; i. e. their corrupt and vicious practices.

13. They that count it pleasure to riot in the day.) Most sinners, in order to practise their abominable pleasures seek the secrecy of the night; but these, bidding decorum all decorum, decency, and shame, take the open day, and proclaim their impurities to the sun.

Spots—and blemishes) They are a disgrace to the Christian name.

Sporting themselves) Forming opinions which give life to sin; and then acting on those opinions; and thus their own deceits.

With their own deceivings) Εν ταις απισταις.—But of this, AB and almost all the Versions, and several of the Fathers, have εν ταις αγαταις, in your love-feats; which probably the true reading.

While they feast with you) It appears they held a koinonion with the church, and attended sacred feasts, which they desecrated with their own unhalloved opinion and conduct.

14. Having eyes full of adultery) Μοιχαλιδος, of an interest; being ever bent on the gratification of their sensuality; so that they are represented as having an adult constantly before their eyes; and that their eyes can take no other object but her. But, instead of μοιχαλιδος, of an interest, the Codex Alexandrinus, three others, with the title, Vulgate, and one copy of the Itala, together with some of the Fathers, have ποικιλιας, of adultery.

Cannot cease from sin.) Which cease not from sin; might cease from sin, but they do not; they love and prize it. This figure of speech is very common in the Greek text; and Kypke gives many instances of it; which, to carry the image too far to be here translated.

Beguiling unstable souls.) The metaphor is taken adulterers seducing unwary, inexperienced, and light women: so do those false teachers seduce those who are established in righteousness.

Exercised with covetous practices.) The metaphor is taken from the agonists in the Grecian games; who exert themselves in those feats, such as wrestling, boxing, be interpreted spiritually: and thus Ταπαρωσας, will import, that God cast the apostate angels out of His presence, into that φοβος τα σκοτα, blackness of darkness, (2 Pet. ii. 17. Jude, ver. 13.) where they will be for ever banished from the light of His countenance, and from the beatifying influence of the ever-blessed Three; as truly as a person plunged into the torpid boundary of this created system would be from the light of the sun, and the benign operations of the material heavens.

By chains of darkness we are to understand a place of darkness and wretchedness from which it is impossible for them to escape.

5. Spared not the old world.] The apostle's argument is this: If God spared not the rebellious angels, nor the sinful antediluvians, nor the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah, He will not spare those wicked teachers who corrupt the pure doctrines of Christianity.

Saved Noah the eighth.) Some think that the words should be translated, Noah the eighth preacher of righteousness; but it seems most evident, from 1 Pet. iii. 20. that eight persons are here meant, which were the whole that were saved in the ark, viz. Shem, Ham, Japhet, and their three wives, six; Noah's wife, seven; and Noah himself, the eighth. The form of expression, οσδοον Νωε, Noah the eighth, i. e. Noah and seven more, is most common in the Greek language. So in APPIAN, Bell. Pun. p. 12. Τριτος δε ποτε εν σπηλαιω κρυπτομενος Δαβη, sometimes he the third (i. e. he with two others,) lay hid in a cave. ANTOCICUS, Orat. lv. p. 295. Απεβη εν τω νηο οκαρος αυτος, he himself the tenth, (i. e. he and nine others,) were chosen to this. See a number of other examples in Kypke.

World of the ungodly.) A whole race without God; without any pure worship, or rational religion.

6. The cities of Sodom and Gomorrah.) See the notes on Gen. xix. for an account of the sin and punishment of these cities.

Making them an ensample.) These three words, προδειγμα, παραδειγμα, and δευγμα, are used to express the same idea; though the former may signify an example to be shunned; the second, an example to be followed; and the third a simple exhibition. But these differences are not always observed.

7. Vexed with the filthy conversation.) Καταπορευομενος εν ταις τωσ αποβρωσ εν ασυλεια αναστροφης, being exceedingly pained with the unclean conduct of those lawless persons. What this was, see in the history, Gen. xix. and the notes there.

8. That righteous man dwelling among them.) Lot, after his departure from Abraham, A. M. 2386, lived at Sodom till A. M. 2416, a space of about twenty years: and as he had a righteous soul, he must have been tormented with the abominations of that people from day to day.

The word βασανιζομενος, tormented, is not less emphatic than the word καταπορευομενος, grievously pained, in the preceding verse; and shows what this man must have felt in dwelling so long among a people so abandoned.

9. The Lord knoweth how to deliver the godly.) The preservation and deliverance of Lot gave the apostle occasion to remark, that God knew as well to save as to destroy; and that His goodness led Him as forcibly to save righteous Lot, as His justice did to destroy the rebellious in the instances already adduced. And the design of the apostle, in producing these examples, is to show to the people to whom he was writing, that, although God would destroy those false teachers, yet He would powerfully save His faithful servants from their contagion, and from their destruction. We should carefully observe—1. That the godly man is not to be preserved from temptation. 2. That he will be preserved in temptation. 3. That he will be delivered out of it.

10. But chiefly them that walk.) That is, God will, in the most signal manner, punish them that walk after the flesh; addit themselves to sodomitical practices, and the lust of palatious: probably alluding to those most abominable practices where men abuse themselves, and abuse one another.

Despise government.) They brave the power and authority of the civil magistrate; practising their abominations so as to keep out of the reach of the letter of the law: and they speak evil of dignities; they blaspheme civil government, they abhor with a tempest; to whom the mist of darkness is reserved for ever.

15 For when they speak great swelling words of vanity, they abuse through the lusts of the flesh, through much wantonness, those that were clean escaped from them who live in error.

19 While they promise them liberty, they themselves are the servants of corruption: for of whom a man is overcome, of the same is he brought in bondage.

20 For, if after they have escaped the pollutions of the world through the knowledge of the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ; they are again entangled therein, and overcome, the latter end is worse with them than the beginning.

21 For it had been better for them not to have known the way of righteousness, than, after they have known it, to turn from the holy commandment delivered unto them.

22 But it is happened unto them according to the true proverb, "The dog is turned to his own vomit again; and the sow that was washed to her wallowing in the mire."

23 The world is here represented as one large putrid marsh, or corrupt body, sending off its destructive miasmata every where, and in every direction, so that none can escape its contagion, and none can be healed of the great epidemic disease of sin, but by the mighty power and skill of God.

24 The son of Balaam. Instead of Balaam, Boscra, two ancient cities, and some of the Versions, have Balaam, Balaam, to accommodate the word to the Hebrew text and the Septuagint. The difference in this name seems to have arisen from mistaking one letter for another in the Hebrew name, Balaam, for Balaam or Balaam; (saddi, x, and ain, y, which are very like each other, being interchanged.

16. The dumb ass speaking with man's voice] See the note on Numb. xxii. 28.

The madness of the prophet.] Is not this a reference to the speech of the ass, as represented in the Targums of Jonathan ben Uzziel and Jerusalem? "Wo to thee, Balaam, thou sinner, thou madman; there is no wisdom found in thee." These words contain nearly the same expressions as those in St. Peter.

17. These are wells without water] Persons who, by their profession, should furnish the water of life to souls athirst for salvation: but they have not this water; they are teachers without ability to instruct; they are sowers, and have no seed in their basket. Nothing is more cheering in the deserts of the East than to meet with a well of water; and nothing more distressing, when parched with thirst, than to meet with a well that contains no water.

Clouds that are carried with a tempest] In a time of great drought, to see clouds beginning to cover the face of the heavens, raises the expectation of rain; but to see these carried off by a sudden tempest, is a dreary disappointment. These false teachers were equally as unprofitable as the empty well, or the light dissipated cloud.

To whom the mist of darkness is reserved] That is, an eternal separation from the presence of God, and the glory of His power. They shall be thrust into outer darkness, Matt. viii. 12 into the utmost degrees of misery and despair. False and corrupt teachers will be sent into the lowest hell; and be the most downcast, underfoot vassals of perdition."

It is scarcely necessary to notice a various reading here; which though very different in sound, is nearly the same in sense. Instead of νεφελαι, clouds, which is the common reading, καυματα, and mists, or perhaps more properly thick darkness, from ουσ, together, and αχλος, darkness, is the reading in ABC sixteen others, Erpen's Arabic, latter Syriac, Coptic, Ethiopic, and Vulgate; and several of the Fathers. This reading Griesbach has admitted into the text.

18. They speak great swelling words of vanity] The word μεγαλαυται signifies things of great magnitude; grand, superb, sublime: it sometimes signifies inflated, tumid, bombastic.—These false teachers spoke of great and high things, and no doubt promised their disciples the greatest privileges, as they themselves pretended to a high degree of illumination. But they were all false and vain, though they tickled the fancy, and excited the desires of the flesh; and indeed this appears to have been their object. And hence, some think that the impure sect of the Nicolaitans is meant.—See the Preface.

Those that were clean escaped] Those who, through hearing the doctrines of the Gospel, and had been converted, were perverted by those false teachers.

19. While they promise them liberty] Either to live in the highest degrees of spiritual good, or a freedom from the Roman yoke; or, from the yoke of the law, or what they might term needless restraints. Their own conduct showed the falsity of their system; for they were slaves to every disagreeable lust.

For of whom a man is overcome] This is an allusion to the ancient custom of selling for slaves those whom they had conquered and captivated in war. The ancient law was, that a man might either kill him whom he overcame in battle, or keep him for a slave. These were called servi, slaves, from the verb servare, to keep, or preserve. And they were also called mancipia, from manus captivatus, they were taken world through the knowledge of the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ; they are again entangled therein, and overcome, the latter end is worse with them than the beginning.

21 For it had been better for them not to have known the way of righteousness, than, after they have known it, to turn from the holy commandment delivered unto them.

22 But it is happened unto them according to the true proverb, "The dog is turned to his own vomit again; and the sow that was washed to her wallowing in the mire."

q. Mat. 23. Luke 11. 22. 14. 4. 4. 2. 10. 27. 2. 1. Luke 12. 48. John 9. 41. & 1. 10. 2. 11. Ch. 1. Ver. 11. — Ch. 1.

captivity by the hand of their enemy. Thus the person who is overcome by his lusts, is represented as being the slave of those lusts.—See Rom. vi. 18, and the notes there.

23. The pollutions of the world] Sin, in general; and particularly superstition, idolatry, and lasciviousness. These are called miasmata, miasmata, things that infect, pollute, and defile. The word was anciently used, and is in use to the present day, to express those noxious particles, or effluvia, proceeding from persons infected with contagious and dangerous diseases; or from dead and corrupt bodies, stagnant and putrid waters, marshes, &c. by which the sound and healthy may be infected and destroyed.

The world is here represented as one large putrid marsh, or corrupt body, sending off its destructive miasmata every where, and in every direction, so that none can escape its contagion, and none can be healed of the great epidemic disease of sin, but by the mighty power and skill of God. St. Augustin has improved on this image: "The whole world," says he, "is one great diseased man, lying extended from east to west, from north to south; and to heal this great sick man, the Almighty Physician descended from heaven." Now, it is by the knowledge of the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, as says St. Peter, that we escape the destructive influence of these contagious miasmata. But if, after having been healed, and escaped the death to which we were exposed, we get again entangled, we are worse, unfolded, enveloped with them; then the latter end will be worse than the beginning, forasmuch as we shall have sinned against more light, and the soul, by its conversion to God, having had all its powers and faculties greatly improved, is now, being repolluted, more capable of iniquity than before, and can bear more expressively the image of the earthly.

21. For it had been better for them not to have known] For the reasons assigned above; because they have sinned against more mercy; are capable of more sin; and are liable to greater punishment.

The holy commandment] The whole religion of Christ is contained in this one commandment, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, with all thy soul, with all thy mind, and with all thy strength; and thy neighbour as thyself." He who obeys this great commandment, and thus by the grace of Christ, is possible to every man; is saved from sinning either against his God or against his neighbour. Nothing less than this, does the religion of Christ require.

22. According to the true proverb] This seems to be a reference to Prov. xxvi. 11. וּפֶה כַּדָּבָר יִשְׁבַּח אֶת-עַצְמוֹ כַּאֲשֶׁר יִשְׁבַּח אֶת-עַצְמוֹ כַּאֲשֶׁר יִשְׁבַּח אֶת-עַצְמוֹ כַּאֲשֶׁר יִשְׁבַּח אֶת-עַצְמוֹ. As the dog returneth to his vomit, so a fool repeateth his folly. In substance this proverb is found among the rabbins; so Midrash Ruth, in Sohar Chidash, fol. 62. Orphan is returned to her mire, Ruth persevered in spirit: and again, ibid. fol. 64. "Orphan, which is returned to her mire, the bestial soul, is returned to her mire."

The Greeks have something like it: so Arrian, Dissert. Epict. l. iv. c. 11. says, Αγαθε και χοιρον διαλογον, εν εν βορβορον μη κληισται, "Go and reason with the swine, lest he be rolled in the mire." This is called a true proverb: for it is a fact, that a dog will eat up his own vomit; and a swine, however carefully washed, will again wallow in the mire. As applied here, it is very expressive: the poor sinner, having heard the Gospel of Christ, was led to leads and reject his sin; and on his application to God for mercy, was washed from his unrighteousness. But he is here represented as taking up again what he had before rejected; and defiling himself with that from which he had been cleansed.

Here is a sad proof of the possibility of falling from grace, and from very high degrees of it too. These had escaped from the contagion that was in the world: they had had true repentance, and cast up "their sour sweet morsel of sin;" they had been washed from all their filthiness, and this must have been through the blood of the Lamb; yet, after all, they went back, got entangled with their old sins, swallowed down their formerly rejected lusts, and re-wallowed in the mire of corruption. It is no wonder that God should say, the latter end is worse with them than the beginning: reason and nature say it must be so; and Divine Justice says it ought to be so; and the person himself must confess that it is right that it should be so. But how dreadful is this state! How dangerous when the person has abandoned himself to his old sins! Yet it is not said that it is impossible for him to return to his Maker: though his case be deplorable, it is not utterly hopeless; the leper may yet be made clean, and the dead may be raised. Reader, is thy backsliding a grief and burthen to thee? Then thou art not far from the kingdom of God: believe on the Lord Jesus, and thou shalt be saved.

CHAPTER III.

The apostle shows his design in writing this and the preceding epistle, 1, 2. Describes the nature of the things that should take place in the last times, 3-5. A thousand years with the Lord are but as a day, 9. He will visit the world as He has promised: and the heavens and the earth shall be burnt up, 10. How those should regard these things, 11, 12. Of the new heavens and the new earth; and the necessity of being prepared for the same, 13, 14. Concerning some difficult things in St. Paul's epistles, 15, 16. We must watch against the error which grows in grace, and give all glory to God, 17, 18. [A. M. cir. 4064. A. D. cir. 60. An. Olymp. cir. CCIX. 4.]

THE second epistle, beloved, I now write unto you; in both which I stir up your pure minds by way of remembrance:

2 That ye may be mindful of the words which were spoken before by the holy prophets, and of the commandment of us the apostles of the Lord and Saviour:

3 Knowing this first, that there shall come in the last days scoffers, walking after their own lusts,

4 And saying, Where is the promise of his coming? for since the fathers fell asleep, all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation.

a Ch. 1. 12.—b Jude 17.—c 1 Tim. 4. 1. 2 Tim. 3. 1. Jude 18.—d Ch. 2. 10.—e Isa. 5. 19. Jer. 17. 15. Ezek. 12. 28. 27. Matt. 24. 42. Luke 12. 46.—f Rom. 1. 23.—g Heb. 11. 3.

NOTES.—Verse 1. This second epistle] In order to guard them against the seductions of false teachers, he calls to their remembrance the doctrine of the ancient prophets, and the commands or instructions of the apostles, all founded on the same basis.

He possibly refers to the prophecies of Enoch, as mentioned by Jude, ver. 14, 15, of David, Psa. 1. 1, &c. and of David, xii. 2, relative to the coming of our Lord to judgment; and he brings in the instructions of the apostles of Christ, by which they were directed how to prepare to meet their God.

3. Knowing this first] Considering this in an expectant manner, that those prophets predicted the coming of false teachers; and their being now in the church, proved how clearly they were known to God; and showed the Christians at Pontus the necessity of having no intercourse or connexion with them.

There shall come—scorners] Persons who shall endeavour to turn all religion into ridicule; as this is the most likely way to depreciate truth in the sight of the giddy multitude. The scoffers, having no solid argument to produce against revelation, endeavour to make a scaramog of some parts; and then affect to laugh at it, and get superficial thinkers to laugh with them.

Walking after their own lusts] Here is the true source of all infidelity. The Gospel of Jesus is pure and holy; and requires a holy heart, and holy life. They wish to follow their own lusts, and consequently cannot brook the restraints of the Gospel: therefore, they labour to prove that it is not true, that they may get rid of its injunctions, and at last succeed in persuading themselves that it is a forgery; and then throw the reins on the neck of their evil propensities. Thus their opposition to revealed truth began and ended in their own lusts.

There is a remarkable addition here in almost every MS. and Version of note; there shall come in the last days in mockery, or εἰρωνίαν, scoffers, walking after their own lusts. This is the reading of ABC. eleven others, both the Syriac, all the Arabic, Coptic, Ethiopic, Vulgate, and several of the Fathers. They come in mockery; this is their spirit and temper; they have no desire to find out truth; they take up the Bible merely with the design of turning it into ridicule.

The last days] Probably refer to the conclusion of the Jewish polity, which was then at hand.

4. Where is the promise of his coming] Perhaps the false teachers here referred to, were such as believed in the sterility of the world: the prophets and the apostles had foretold its destruction; and they took it for granted, if this were true, that the terrestrial machine would have begun long ago to have shown some symptoms of decay; but as they found that, since the patriarchs died, all things remained as they were from the foundation of the world; that is, men were propagated by natural generation: one was born and another died, and the course of nature continued regular in the seasons, succession of day and night, generation and corruption of animals, vegetables, &c. but they did not consider the power of the Almighty, by which the whole can be annihilated in a moment, as well as created. As, therefore, they saw none of these changes, they presumed that there would be none; and they intimated that there never had been any. The apostle combats this notion in the following verse.

5. For this they willingly were ignorant of] They shut their eyes against the light, and refuse all evidence: what does not answer their purpose they will not know. And the apostle refers to a fact that militates against their hypothesis, with which they refused to acquit themselves; and their ignorance he attributes to their unwillingness to learn the true state of the case.

By the word of God the heavens were of old] I shall set down the Greek text of this extremely difficult clause:—Ὁραὸν ἡμῶν ἀρχαῖα, καὶ γῆ ἐξ ὕδατος καὶ δι' ὕδατος συστροφῆσα, τὸν ἅπαντα ὕδατος ἕως οὐρανόθεν; translated thus by Mr. Wakefield—A heaven and an earth formed out of water, and by means of water, by the appointment of God, had continued from old time. Dr. Mosheim thus—The heavens were anciently, and the

5 For this they willingly are ignorant of, of God the heavens were of old, and the earth of the water and in the water:

6 Whereby the world that then was, being water, perished:

7 But the heavens and the earth, which same word are kept in store, reserved unto day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men:

8 But, beloved, be not ignorant of this one thing, that the heavens and the earth were of old, and the earth of water; and through water the earth was of God. Kypke thus—The Heavens and the earth, which is framed, by the word of God, and between the waters. However they seem to refer to the origin of the earth, the remotest antiquity that the earth of water, or a primitive moisture, which

Hyd, a first matter, or nutriment, for all things pointedly taught, ἄρχη δὲ ὕδατος ὡς ἀρχὴ ὅλων, things derive their existence from water, as it expresses the sentiment of Peter, and not terms too. But is this doctrine true? It seems to be the doctrine of Moses: for he says, God made the heavens and the earth without form, and void; and darkness was upon the deep. Now, these heavens and earth were made in the beginning, and he says without form, and void, and which he calls the deep next verse called waters; from which it is taught that the earth was made out of some to which the name of water is properly given; earth was at first in a fluid mass, is most form; it is not round, as has been demonstrating some degrees near the north pole, and tor; the result of which proved that the earth was that of an oblate spheroid, a figure nearly of an orange. And this is the form that a body would assume, if whirled rapidly round earth is around its axis. The measurements referred, shows the earth to be flatted at the equator. And by this measurement, it is ted, that the diameter of the earth at the equator by about twenty-five miles than at the poles.

Now, considering the earth to be thus formed water, we have next to consider what the δι' ὕδατος, variously translated by, out of, between the water.

Standing out of the water gives no sense abandoned. If we translate between the waters some resemblance to Gen. 1. 6, 7. And God a firmament in the midst of the waters, and let it divide the waters from the waters, ded the waters which were under the first waters which were above the firmament; to the whole of the atmosphere, with which where surrounded; and which contains all that belong to our globe; and without which we have animal nor vegetative life. Thus, the aqueous globe, which was originally formed subsists by water; and by means of that water compacted with the earth, the firmament deep; and the waters in the atmosphere, the

Gen. vii. 11. the aqueous earth, the water, as St. Peter states in the next verse, globe, which was formed originally of water, the chaos or first matter, and was heavens, the atmosphere enveloped with water which water it was preserved; yet, because of its inhabitants, it was destroyed by waters out of which it was originally made subsisted.

7. But the heavens and the earth which are left destruction, because the same means still still water enough to drown the earth, and enough to induce God to destroy it and its nevertheless kept in store, ἠσθησάμενοι kept in God's storehouse to be destroyed, not fire at the day of judgment.

From all this it appears, that those mockers ignorant of the Mosaic account of the formation and its destruction by the waters of the deep this is implied in their stating, that all this they were from the creation. But St. Peter to the Mosaic account, to prove that this earth, &c. which were then formed, had perished by the flood; and that the present earth, &c. which were formed out of the preceding, should, at the day of judgment, perish by the fire of God's wrath.

8. Be not ignorant] Though they are wilfully ignorant, neglect not ye the means of instruction.

One day is with the Lord as a thousand years] That is, all time is as nothing before Him: because, in the presence, as in the nature of God, all is eternity; therefore nothing is any thing short before Him; no lapse of ages impair His purposes; nor does He wait to find convenience to execute those purposes. And when the longest period of time has passed by, it is but as a moment, or indivisible point, in comparison of eternity. This thought is well expressed by PUNTAUGH, Consol. ad Apoll. "If we compare the time of life with eternity, we shall find no difference between long and short. Τα γὰρ χιλιά, καὶ τὰ μύρια ἐτη, στήναι τῆς ἐπιβ. αἰῶνος, ἰσὺν δὲ μορίου τῆ ἀρχαίουτων ὀμίαν; for a thousand, or ten thousand years, are but a certain indefinite point; or rather the smallest part of a point." The words of the apostle seem to be a quotation from Psal. xc. 4.

9. The Lord is not slack] They pr bably in their mocking said, "either God had made no such promise to judge the world, destroy the earth, and send ungodly men to perdition; or, if He had, He had forgotten to fulfil it, or had not convenient time or leisure." To some such mocking the apostle seems to refer: and he immediately shows the reason why deserved punishment is not inflicted on a guilty world:—

But is long-suffering] It is not slackness, remission, nor want of due displacement at sin, that induced God to prolong the repitance of ungodly men; but His long-suffering, His unwillingness, that any should perish: and therefore He spared him, that they may have additional offers of grace, and be led to repentance; to deplore their sins, implore God's mercy, and find redemption through the blood of the Lamb.

As God is unwilling that any should perish, and as He is willing that all should come to repentance, consequently, He as never devised nor decreed the damnation of any man; nor as He rendered it impossible for any soul to be saved; either y necessitating him to do evil, that he might die for it, or refusing him the means of recovery, without which he could not be saved.

10. The day of the Lord will come] See Matt. xxiv. 43, to which the apostle seems to allude.

The heavens shall pass away with a great noise] As the avens mean here, and in the passages above, the whole atmosphere, in which all the terrestrial vapours are lodged; and as water itself is composed of two gases, eighty-five parts in weight of oxygen and fifteen of hydrogen; or two parts in volume of the latter, and one of the former: (for if these quantities be put together, a several electric sparks passed through them, a chymical union takes place, and water is the product; and, vice versa, if the galvanic spark be made to pass through water, a portion of the fluid is immediately decomposed into its two constituent gases, oxygen and hydrogen;) and as the electric, or æthereal fire, is that which, in all likelihood, God will use in the general conflagration; the noise occasioned by the application of this fire to such an immense angeries of aqueous particles as float in the atmosphere, must be terrible in the extreme. Put a drop of water on an anvil, place over it a piece of iron red hot, strike the iron with a hammer on the part above the drop of water, and the report will be as loud as a musket: when, then, the whole strength of those opposite agents is brought together into a state of conflict, the noise, the thunderings, the innumerable explosions, till every particle of water on the earth, and in the atmosphere, is, by the action of the fire, reduced into its component gaseous parts, will be frequent, loud, confounding, and terrific, beyond every comprehension but that of God Himself.

The elements shall melt with fervent heat] When the fire was conquered and decomposed the water, the elements, erogica, the Hydrogen and oxygen air, or gases, (the former of which is most highly inflammable, and the latter an eminent supporter of all combustion,) will occupy distinct regions of the atmosphere, the hydrogen by its very great levity ascending to the top, while the oxygen from its superior specific gravity will keep upon or near the surface of the earth: and thus, if different substances be once ignited, the fire, which is supported in this case not only by the oxygen, which is one of the constituents of atmospheric air, but also by a great additional quantity of oxygen obtained from the decomposition of all aqueous vapours, will rapidly seize on all other substances, on all terrestrial particles, and the whole frame of nature will 13 Nevertheless we, according to his promise, look for * new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness.

14 Wherefore, beloved, seeing that ye look for such things, be diligent, * that ye may be found of him in peace, without spot, and blameless.

15 And account that * the long-suffering of our Lord is salvation; even as our beloved brother Paul also, according to the wisdom given unto him, hath written unto you;

be necessarily torn in pieces; and thus the earth and its works be burnt up.

11. All these things shall be dissolved] They will all be separated, all decomposed; but none of them destroyed. And as they are the original matter out of which God formed the terraqueous globe, consequently they may enter again into the composition of a new system: and therefore the apostle says, ver. 13. We look for a new heaven and a new earth; the others being decomposed, a new system is to be formed out of their materials. There is a wonderful philosophic propriety in the words of the apostle in describing this most awful event.

What manner of persons ought ye to be] Some put the ngis of interrogation at the end of this clause, and join the remaining part with the 12th verse, thus—Seeing then that all these things shall be dissolved, what manner of persons ought ye to be? By holy conversation and godliness, expecting and earnestly desiring the coming of the day of God, &c. Only those who walk in holiness, who live a godly and useful life, can contemplate this most awful time with joy.

The word ευδοκίας, which we translate hasting unto, should be rendered earnestly desiring, or wishing for; which is a frequent meaning of the word in the best Greek writers.

12. The heavens being on fire] See on ver. 10. It was an ancient opinion among the heathens, that the earth should be burnt up with fire: so OVID, Met. lib. l. v. 256.

Esse quoque in fatie reminciatur, adfore tempus Quo mare, quo tellus corraepata regie cali Ardeat; of mundi moles operosa laborat.

"Remembering in the fate, a time when fire Should to the battlements of heaven aspire, And all his blazing world above should burn,

And all the inferior globe to cinders turn." DAVEN.

Minucius Felix tells us, xxxiv. 2. that it was a common opinion of the Stoics, that the moisture of the earth being consumed, the whole world would catch fire. The Epicureans held the same sentiment; and indeed it appears in various authors, which proves that a tradition of this kind has pretty generally prevailed in the world. But it is remarkable that none have fancied that it will be destroyed by water. The tradition, founded on the declaration of God, was against this: therefore it was not received.

13. We, according to his promise, look for new heavens] The promise to which it is supposed the apostle alludes, is found Isa. lxxv. 1st. Behold I create new heavens and a new earth, and the former shall not be remembered nor come into mind; and chap. lxxvi. 22. For as the new heavens and the new earth which I shall make shall remain before me, saith the Lord, so shall your seed, &c. Now, although these may be interpreted of the glory of the Gospel dispensation; yet, if St. Peter refer to them, they must have a more extended meaning.

It does appear from these promises, what the apostle says here, and what is said Rev. xxi. 27. xxi. 14, 15, that the present earth, though destined to be burnt up, will not be destroyed, but be renewed and refined, purged from all moral and natural imperfection, and made the endless abode of blessed spirits. But this state is certainly to be expected after the day of judgment; for, on this, the apostle is very express, who says the conflagration and renovation are to take place in the judgment of the great day; see ver. 7, 8, 10, and 12. That such an event may take place is very possible; and, from the terms used by St. Peter, it is very probable. And, indeed, it is more reasonable and philosophical to conclude that the earth shall be refined and restored, than finally destroyed. But this has nothing to do with what some call the millenium state; as this shall take place when time, with the present state and order of things, shall be no more.

14. Seeing that ye look for such things] As ye profess that such a state of things shall take place, and have the expectation of enjoying the blessedness of it, be diligent in the use of every means and influence of grace, that ye may be found of him, the Lord Jesus, the Judge of quick and dead: without spot, any contagion of sin in your souls: and blameless, being not only holy and innocent, but useful in your lives.

15. And account that the long-suffering of our Lord] Conclude that God's long-suffering with the world is a proof that He designs men to be saved; even as our beloved brother Paul. "This epistle being written to those to whom the first epistle was sent, the persons to whom the apostle Paul wrote concerning the long-suffering of God were the Jewish and Gentile Christians in Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia. Accordingly, we know he wrote to the Ephesians.

16 As also in all his epistles, speaking in them of these things; in which are some things hard to be understood, which they that are unlearned and unstable wrest, as they do also the other Scriptures, unto their own destruction.

17 Ye therefore, beloved, seeing ye know these things be-

(chap. ii. 3, 4, 5.) to the Colossians, (chap. i. 21.) and to Timothy, (1 Epist. chap. iii. 3, 4.) things which imply that God's bearing with sinners is intended for their salvation. The persons to whom Peter's epistles were sent were, for the most part, Paul's converts."—Macknight.

According to the wisdom given unto him] That is, according to the measure of the Divine inspiration, by which he was qualified for the Divine work; and by which he was so capable of entering into the deep things of God. It is worthy of remark, that Paul's epistles are ranked among the Scriptures; a term applied to those writings which are divinely inspired; and to those only.

16. As also in all his epistles, speaking in them of these things] Paul, in all his epistles, says Dr. Macknight, has spoken of the things written by Peter in this letter. For example, he has spoken of Christ's coming to judgment, 1 Thess. ii. 13. iv. 14.—18. 2 Thess. i. 7.—10. Titus ii. 13. And of the resurrection of the dead, 1 Cor. xv. 22. Phil. iii. 20, 21. And of the burning of the earth, 2 Thess. i. 8. And of the heavenly country, 2 Cor. v. 1.—10. And of the introduction of the righteous into that country, 1 Thess. iv. 17. Heb. iv. 9. xii. 14, 18, 24. And of the judgment of all mankind by Christ, Rom. xiv. 10.

In which are some things hard to be understood] Ανοσιγήτητα; that is, if we retain the common reading εὐσιγή, in or among which things, viz. what he says of the day of judgment, the resurrection of the body, &c. &c. there are some things difficult to be comprehended, and from which a wrong or false meaning may be taken. But if we take the reading of AB. twelve others, with both the Syriac, all the Arabic, and Theophylact, εὐσιγή, the meaning is more general, as εὐσιγή must refer to εὐσολογία, epistles, for this would intimate that there were difficulties in all the epistles of St. Paul; and indeed, in what ancient writings are there not difficulties? But the papists say that the decision of all matters relative to the faith is not to be expected from the Scriptures on this very account, but must be received from the church; i. e. the papish or Romish church. But what evidence have we that that church can infallibly solve any of those difficulties? We have none! And till we have an express unequivocal revelation from heaven that an unerring Spirit is given to that church; I say, for example, to the present church of Rome, with the pope, called Pius VII. at its head, we are not to receive its pretensions; any church may pretend the same, or any number of equally learned men as there are of cardinals and pope in the conclave. And, after all, it would be but the opinion of so many men, to which no absolute certainty or infallibility could be attached.

This verse is also made a pretext to deprive the common people of reading the word of God; because the unlearned and unstable have sometimes wrested this word to their own destruction: but if it be human learning, and stability in any system of doctrine, that qualifies men to judge of these difficult things; then we can find many thousands even in Europe, that have as much learning and stability as the whole college of cardinals, and perhaps ten thousand times more; for that conclave was never very reputable for the learning of its members; and to other learned bodies we may, with as much propriety, look up as infallible guides as to this conclave.

Besides, as it is only the unlearned, and the unestablished, (that is, young Christian converts,) that are in danger of wresting such portions; the learned, that is, the experienced and the established in the knowledge and life of God, are in no such danger; and to such we may safely go for information; and these abound every where, especially in Protestant countries; and by the labours of learned and pious men on the Sacred Writings there is not one difficulty relative to the things which concern our salvation left unexplained. If the members of the Romish church have not these advantages, let them go to those who have them: and if their teachers are afraid to trust them to the instruction of the Protestants, then let them who pretend to have infallibly written their exposition of those difficult places, also put them with the wholesome text in the vulgar language, into the hands of their people, and then the appeal will not lie to Rome, but to the Bible; and those interpretations will be considered according to their worth, being weighed with other Scriptures, and the expositions of equally learned and equally infallible men.

We find, lastly, that those who wrest such portions, are those which wrest the other Scriptures to their destruction; therefore, they are no patterns, nor can such form any precedent for withholding the Scriptures from the common people; most of whom, instead of wresting them to their destruction, would become wise unto salvation by reading them. We may defy the Romish church to adduce a single instance of any soul that was perverted, destroyed, or damned, by reading of the Bible; and the insinuation that they may, is blasphemous. I may just add that the verb σπειρώω, which the apostle uses here, signifies to distort, to put to the rack, to torture, to overstretch and dislocate the limbs; and hence the persons here intended are those who proceed according to interpretation; but force unnatural meanings on the word of God: a practice which the apostle Christien is in no danger of following; this by a multitude of interpretations from

17. Seeing ye know—before] Seeing that the apostles you have been thus forewarned, keep watch, be on your guard; cleave to the word of His grace, lest ye be led away from the truth by the prophets and apostles; by the enemies, of the lawless, those who wrest the truth; them countenance their lusts, exorbitant and less practices.

Fall from your own steadfastness] From which has put you in possession of that grace the heart.

18. But grow in grace] Increase in the word of God: every grace and Divine influence received, is a seed, a heavenly seed, which, if the dew of heaven from above, will endow and multiply itself. He who continues to believe will grow in grace, and continually increase of Jesus Christ, as His Sacrifice, Sanctification, and final Saviour. The life of a Christian is at first born of God, and is a little young man, and a father in Christ. Even an infant; and had he not grown, he would be a man. Those who content themselves with the grace received when converted to God, are, at state of infancy: but we find, in the order of the infant that does not grow, and grows daily soon dies; so in the order of grace, those who do not increase in Jesus Christ, are sickly, and soon die, and influence of heavenly things.

There are many who boast of the grace persons who were never more than babes, lost even that grace, because they did not that readeth understand.

To him] The Lord Jesus, be glory, a glory, attributed; both now, in this present age, and to the day of eternity; and misery, and trial, and darkness, and self, are, to the righteous, for ever at an end, and this eternity is one unalterable, interminable and unchangeable DAY!

Amen] So let it be! and so it shall be, as we want in some reputable MSS. yet it as it has here more than usual authority.

PREFACE TO THE FIRST EPISTLE OF JOHN.

As the author of this epistle is the same who wrote the Gospel, I need not detain the reader with any particulars of his life; having taken up the subject pretty much at large in my preface to his Gospel; to which I must refer for that species of information.

Two questions have been urged relative to this epistle, which are very difficult to be solved:—1. When was it written?—2. To whom was it sent? The precise year it is impossible to determine; but it was probably written before the destruction of Jerusalem; and perhaps about the year 68 or 69, though some think not before 50. The second question, Miscellaneous answers thus:—

"This question is still more difficult to decide than the preceding. In the Latin version it was formerly called The Epistle of St. John to the Parthians; and this title was adopted by some of the ancient fathers; and in modern times has been defended by Grotius. But if St. John had intended this epistle for the use of the Parthians, he would hardly have written it in Greek, but would have used either the language of the country, or, if he was unacquainted with it, would have written at least in Syriac, which was the language of the learned in the Parthian empire, and especially of the Christians. We know, from the history of Manes, that even the learned in that country were, for the most part, unacquainted with the Greek language; for, to Manes, though he united literature with genius, his adversaries objected that he understood only the barbarous Syriac. That a Grecian book would not have been understood in the Parthian empire, appears from what Josephus says in the Preface to his History of the Jewish War, where he declares, that a work intended for Parthian Jews, must be written, not in Greek, but Hebrew. However, it is worth while to examine whence the superscription 'ad Parthos,' took its rise. Whiston conjectures, that an ancient Greek superscription of this epistle was, ἄρως ῥαβδῶν, (to virgins), because this epistle is chiefly addressed to uncorrupted Christians, and that this title was falsely copied ῥως Παρθῶν, whence was derived the Latin superscription, ad Parthos. But this conjecture is without foundation: for, since the faithful are not called in a single instance throughout the whole epistle by the name of ῥαβδῶν, it is very improbable that the title ἄρως ῥαβδῶν, was ever affixed to it. I would rather suppose, therefore, that the frequent use in this epistle of the words 'light,' and 'darkness,' which occur in the Persian philosophy, and on the same occasions as those on which St. John has used them, gave rise to the opinion, that St. John wrote it with a view of correcting the abuses of the Persian philosophy; whence it was inferred, that he designed it for the use of the Christians in the Parthian empire. That St. John really designed his epistle as a warning to those Christians who were in danger of being infected with Zoroastrian principles, is very probable, though the language of the epistle will not permit us to place St. John's readers in a country to the east of the Euphrates.

"LAMPÉ, who appeals to Theodoret, contends, that it was not designed for any particular community, but that it was written for the use of Christians of every denomination; and this is really the most probable opinion, since the epistle contains no reference to any individual Church. The only difficulty attending this opinion, lies in the name 'epistle,' because so frequent use, in an epistle, of the terms 'light and darkness,' taken in the Persian sense of these words, seems to imply, that it was written to persons of a particular description. But if we call it a treatise, this difficulty will cease; and, in fact, the name 'epistle,' is improperly applied to it, since it has nothing which entitles it to this appellation. It does not begin with the salutation which is used in Greek letters, and with which St. John himself begins his two last letters; nor does it contain any salutations, though they are used in almost all the epistles of the apostles. It is true, that St. John addresses his readers in the second person; but his mode of writing is frequently adopted in books, and especially in prefaces: for instance, in Wolfe's Elements of arithmetic, the reader is addressed, throughout, in the second person. I consider, therefore, that, which is commonly called the First Epistle of St. John, as a book, or treatise, in which the apostle declared to the whole world his disapprobation of the doctrines maintained by Cerinthus and the Gnostics. However, as I do not think it worth while to dispute our words, I have retained the usual title, and have called it the First Epistle of St. John.

"That the design of this epistle was to combat the doctrine delivered by certain false teachers, appears from chap. ii. 18.—iii. 7. iv. 1—3; and what this false doctrine was, may be inferred from the counter doctrine delivered by St. John, ch. i. 10.

"The apostle here asserts, that 'Jesus is the Christ,' and that He was the Christ, 'not by water only, but by water and blood.' Now, these words, which are not in themselves very intelligible, become perfectly clear, if we consider them opposed to the doctrine of Cerinthus, who asserted, that Jesus was, by birth, a mere man; but that the Æon Christ, descended on him at his baptism, and left him before his death. But if what St. John says, chap. v. 1, 6. was opposed to Cerinthus, the antichrists of whom he speaks, ch. ii. 18, 19, and who, according to ver. 22, denied that Jesus was the Christ, as, also, the false prophets, mentioned chap. iv. 1, 3. must be Cerinthians, or, at least, Gnostics. That they were neither Jews, nor heathens, may be inferred from chap. ii. 19, where St. John says—'They went out from us.' Farther, he describes them, ch. ii. 18, as persons who had lately appeared in the world. But this description suits neither Jews nor heathens, who, when this epistle was written, had not lately begun to deny that Jesus was the Christ. Lastly, in the same verse, he describes them as tokens of the last time, saying, 'As ye have heard that antichrist shall come, even now there are many antichrists, whereby we know that it is the last time.' But this inference could not be drawn from the refusal of the Jews to acknowledge that Jesus was the Messiah. Now as soon as we perceive that the position, 'Jesus is the Christ,' is a counter-position against Cerinthus, we may infer, as I have already observed, that the antichrists who denied that Jesus was the Christ, or who denied that Christ had appeared in the flesh, were Cerinthians: or, perhaps, the later were Docetes. It is, therefore, highly probable, that the whole epistle, which, in various places, discovers an opposition to false teachers, was written against Cerinthians, or at least against Gnostics and Magi. A proposition can never be completely understood, unless we know the author's design in delivering it. For instance, 'God is light, and in him is not darkness,' appears to contain a tautology, if we consider it as a detached dogma; and if it be considered as an admonitory proposition, it may be thought to contain a severe reproof. But, if we regard it in a polemical view, it will present itself under a very different form. This epistle abounds with exhortations: but no man, who wishes to understand it, will be satisfied without asking the following questions:—Why did St. John give these admonitions? Why has he so frequently repeated them? Why has he admonished, if he thought admonition necessary, merely, in general terms, to holiness and brotherly love? And why has he not, 'sometimes, descended to particulars, as other apostles have done?' An answer to these questions, will throw great light on the epistle; and this light I will endeavour to procure for the reader, by pointing out the several propositions, which, in my opinion, are laid down in opposition to Gnostic errors.

"1. In the first chapter, the four first verses are opposed to the following assertion of the Gnostics: 'That the apostles did not deliver the doctrine of Jesus as they had received it, but made additions to it, especially in the commandments, which were termed legal wisdoms, they themselves, (the Gnostics,) retained the genuine and uncorrupted mystery.' St. John, therefore, says—'That he declared that which was from the beginning, which he himself had seen and heard.' That is, that he taught the doctrine of Christ as it was originally delivered; as he had heard it from Christ's own mouth, whose Person he had seen and felt; and that he made no additions of his own, but only reported as a faithful witness. In like manner he speaks, ch. ii. 13, 14, to the elder Christians, whom he calls fathers, 'because they knew him, who was from the beginning'; that is, because they knew how Christ had taught from the beginning; and, ver. 24, he says, 'Let that abide in you which ye have heard from the beginning.' Farther, he says, chap. ii. 7. 'Brethren, I write no new commandment unto you, but an old commandment, which ye had from the beginning.' In the next verse he adds, 'Again a new commandment I write unto you, which thing is true in him and in you, because the darkness is past, and the light now shineth.' Now, Christ Himself had given His disciples a commandment, which He called a new commandment, and this was, 'That they should love one another.' The term 'new commandment,' therefore, St. John borrowed from Christ; but in the present instance, he appears to have applied it to a different subject, because the special command which Christ gave to His disciples, that they should love one another, and which He called a new commandment, could not well be called an old commandment, being very different from the general commandment, that we should love our neighbour. St. John, therefore, very probably meant, that the commandment of love and sanctification was no new commandment, as the Gnostics contended; but the old commandment which the Christians had heard from the beginning. It was, indeed, become a new commandment, in consequence of the false doctrines which then prevailed; or, rather, it appeared to be so, because the Gnostics had endeavoured to banish it from their system of theology. But whether a new, or an old commandment, St. John thought proper to enforce it.

"2. The Gnostics, who contended that three commandments which were legal were not given by Christ, but were added by the apostles, without His authority; counteracted, by so doing, the whole doctrine of sanctification. St. John, therefore, devotes the greatest part of his epistle to the confirmation and enforcement of this doctrine. In the first chapter, ver. 6, 7, he asserts, as a principal part of the message which he had heard from Christ, that no one who does not walk in the light, has fellowship with God. In the three following verses he limits this proposition in such a manner as was necessary, in arguing with an adversary; and ch. iii. 1, 2 he removes the objection, that, according to his doctrine, a Christian, who was guilty of wilful sins, lost thereby all hopes of salvation. He then maintains, ver. 3-5, and apparently in allusion to the word gnosis, (knowledge), the favourite term of the Gnostics, that he who boasted of profound knowledge, and, at the same time, rejected the commandments of Christ, had not a real, but only a pretended knowledge; and that in him only the love of God is perfected, (τελειωται), who keeps God's word. The expression τελειωται, is a term which was used in the schools of the philosophers, and applied to the scholars called esoteric, who had made a considerable progress in the inner school. Now, the Gnostics were, in their own opinion, scholars of this description: but since they, whose imaginary system of theology annuls the commands of God, are so far from being perfect, that they are not even beginners in the science, St. John very properly refuses to admit their pretensions, and opposes to them others, who were perfect in a different way, and who were more justly entitled to the appellation. With respect to the expressions, 'keeping the commandments of God,' or, 'not keeping His commandments,' it must be observed, that when used in a polemical work, they denote, not merely the observance, or violation, of God's commands, in our own practice, but the teaching of others, that they are to be observed or rejected. What St. John says, ver. 7, 8, has been already explained in the preceding paragraph.

"The whole of the third chapter, and part of the fourth, are devoted to the doctrine of sanctification, on which I have to make the following remarks: When St. John says, ch. iii. 7.—'Let no man deceive you; he who doeth righteousness is righteous,' he probably intends not merely to deliver a precept, but to oppose the doctrine of those who asserted that a man though he sinned, might be righteous in respect to his spiritual soul, because sin proceeded only from the material body. A similar observation may be applied to ver. 4. 'Whosoever committeth sin, transgresseth also the law;' which, considered by itself, appears to be an identical proposition; but when considered as an assertion opposed to the Gnostics, it is far from being superfluous, because, evident as it appears to be, they virtually denied it. From the passage above quoted from the works of Irenæus, we have seen that they rejected the legal commandments as parts of the Christian religion which were not warranted by the authority of Christ; consequently, they denied that sin was a transgression of the law. Farther, it was consistent with their principles to regard sins as diseases: for they believed in a metempsychosis, and imagined that the souls of men were confined in their present bodies as in a prison, and as a punishment for having offended in the region above. According to this system, the violent and irregular passions of anger, hatred, &c. were tortures for the soul; they were diseases, but not punishable transgressions of the law. I will not assert, that all who believed in a transmigration of souls argued in this manner; but some of them certainly did so; and against these it was not superfluous to write, 'Whosoever committeth sin transgresseth also the law, for sin is the transgression of the law.'

"The love of the brethren, which St. John enforced as a chief commandment, is generally understood of that special love, which Christ commanded His disciples to have towards each other. But I rather think, that St. John means the love of our neighbour in general; which Christ commanded, as comprehending the half of the law; for this general love St. John might very properly call the love of our brother, since God has created us all, and is our common Father. Besides, as St. John calls Cain Abel's brother, he could not intend to signify by this term a person of the same religious sentiments. Nor would it have been consistent with conduct to have censured the Gnostics for not having Christian brotherly love towards St. John, and other true believers: for in this particular sense they were not brethren; and St. John himself, in his second epistle, ver. 10, forbids the exercise of Christian brotherly love towards those who teach false doctrines. I believe, therefore, that the brotherly love of which St. John speaks, in the third chapter of this epistle, is not confined to that special love which we owe to those who are allied to us by religion; but denotes the love of our neighbour in general. Nor do I except even the 16th verse, where some think that St. John would require too much, if he meant brotherly love in general, or charity towards all men. But are there not certain cases in which it is our duty to hazard, and even sacrifice our lives, in order to rescue our neighbour? Is not this duty performed by the soldier? And is it not performed by him who visits those who are infected with contagious diseases? It is true, that this is not a duty which every man owes, in all cases, to his neighbour;—but then, on the other hand, is it not a duty which every man owes to his spiritual brother? Nor was it St. John's design so much to enforce this duty, and to recommend the exercise of it, as to argue from the acknowledgment of this duty, in certain cases, to the necessity of performing the less painful duty of supporting our brethren in distress, by a participation of our temporal possessions. But, though I believe, that, in the third chapter, St. John speaks of the love of our neighbour in general; I do not mean to affirm, that he nowhere understands that special love which Christians owe one to another of which we meet with an instance in ch. v. 1, 2.

"With respect to the moral conduct of the Gnostics, whom St. John wrote, we may infer, therefore, that he found more reason to censure them for their conduct towards their neighbours, than for dissimulation. This want of charity they probably displayed towards the true believers.

"What St. John says, ch. v. 3. That God's love is not grievous, appears in the clearest light, when considered as it is opposed to the Gnostics, to whom the commandments, as delivered by the apostles, appear legal.

"St. John declares, chap. i. 5. as the meek and lowly Jesus had heard from Christ, 'That God is light, and darkness is not in him.' Now, if this proposition had been generally admitted as it is at present, there could not have been any necessity for declaring it at the very beginning of the Gospel, with so much energy, to be the grand message of the new dispensation, which it was opposed to. It was opposed to persons who delivered a contrary doctrine. Farther, the terms 'light and darkness,' which are here applied to God, in a manner which is not usual in the Bible, reminding us of the terms used by the Persian Magi, and of the Manichæans. It is true, that in the Bible we find expressions, 'works of the light,' 'children of the light,' 'walk in the light,' and others of the same kind. But in these instances, the term 'light' is not synonymous with the works of the light denoting nothing more than the good works of the man who is not ashamed to perform openly, and before the world. This explanation of the term 'light,' is inapplicable in the proposition 'God is light,' because it would be an impropriety in representing God either as not fearing, to act in the face of the whole world, or, therefore, uses the term 'light' as equivalent to 'good.'

"Now, the Gnostics admitted that the Supreme Being was perfectly holy and pure light; but they denied that the Supreme Being was the God, whom the Jews and Christians worshipped. For the Jews and the Christians considered the Creator of the world; and the Gnostics considered the Creator of the world as either a spirit of darkness, or a spirit of light, that He was not free from sin.

"From ch. ii. 23, where St. John says, that the Son, rejects also the Father, it appears that he did not deny the Father in positive terms; but argued only that they virtually did so by denying Him. Now, the Gnostics did not positively deny the Father whom they allowed to be the Supreme Being; but they did not allow that He was the Creator. The term 'God,' and the 'Father of Christ,' though they signify the same Person, must not be considered as synonymous terms; since the adversaries of St. John, denied, that the Father of Christ was the Supreme Being; but denied that the Creator, who is, in fact, light without darkness.

"4. In some places, especially ch. iv. 2, 3, 8, St. John speaks of false teachers of another description, namely, those who denied that Christ was come in the flesh. Now, these were not Cerinthians, but another kind of heretics called Docetes. For as, on the one hand, Cerinthians held that Jesus was a mere, and therefore, real man; on the other hand, costended, that He was a phantom, in which the Æon, Christ, or Divine Being, appeared itself to mankind, ch. i. 1. Our hands appear likewise to be opposed to this error of the Docetes.

"The doctrines which St. John has delivered, he has not supported either by arguments drawn or by quotations from the Old Testament; for these are unnecessary, since the bare assertion of an apostle is sufficient authority. It is true, that in one place he has less energy than St. John's Gospel; he warrants his doctrines by the spirit of prophecy. But then, on the other hand, St. John declares, ch. iii. 24, iv. 4, v. 14, 16, that God sent His Spirit to testify of the church, and heard their prayers. And St. John alludes to the extraordinary gifts of the Spirit, and to the miraculous powers obtained by prayer. The close of this epistle, 'keep yourselves from idolatry,' has no immediate connexion with the preceding; and therefore, in doubt, whether St. John meant to rebuke the idolaters against taking part in heathen sacrifices, or whether he meant to describe the idolatry of these Gnostics, who are called Nicolaitans in the Apocalypse; or, whether he meant to describe the idolatry of the Gnostics in general as a system of idolatry, which is the most judicious observation.

"Dr. Macknight has some judicious observations on the authenticity of this epistle, from the similarity of the Gospel of John.

"The authenticity of any ancient writing is supported by the testimony of contemporary and succeeding works have come down to us; and which writing as known to be the work of the person who bears it. Secondly, by the suitability of the style in such writing, to the character and circumstances of the proposed author; and by the similarity of its style to the other acknowledged writings of that author. These proofs is called the external evidence of a writing; the latter, its internal evidence. These two kinds of evidence are found in the Gospel of John, they render its genuineness indubitable.

"The external evidence of the authenticity of John's First Epistle has been amply detailed by Dr. Lardner, who shows that the earliest and best Christian writers have, all with one consent, and without any hesitation, ascribed the first epistle to him. And their testimony is confirmed by this circumstance, that the Syriac translator, who omitted the Second Epistle of Peter, the Second and Third Epistles of John, and the Epistle of Jude, because some doubts were entertained concerning them in the first age, or perhaps because they had not come to his knowledge; has translated John's First Epistle, as an apostolical writing, of which there never was any doubt in that nor in any other Christian church.

"In this preface, therefore, we shall state the internal evidence of the authenticity of John's First Epistle, by showing—first, that in respect of its matter;—and, secondly, in respect of its style, it is perfectly suitable to the character and circumstances of its supposed author. In respect of the matter or subject of the epistle under consideration, the writer of it has discovered himself to be John the apostle, by introducing a number of sentiments and expressions found in the Gospel, which all Christians, from the beginning, have acknowledged to be the work of John the apostle.

"From the above comparison of the First Epistle of John with his Gospel, there appears such an exact agreement of sentiment in the two writings, that no reader, who is capable of discerning what is peculiar in an author's turn of thinking, can entertain the least doubt of their being the productions of one and the same writer. Further, since John has not mentioned his own name in his Gospel, the want of his name in the epistle is no proof that it was not written by him; but rather a presumption that it is his; especially as he has sufficiently discovered himself to be an apostle, by affirming to the beginning of the epistle that he was an eye and an ear witness of the things he has written concerning the living Word.

"The style of this epistle being the same with the style of the Gospel of John, it is, by that internal mark likewise, denoted to be his writing. In his Gospel, John does not content himself with simply affirming or denying a thing; but, to strengthen his affirmation, he denies the contrary. In like manner, to strengthen his denial of a thing, he affirms its contrary.—See John i. 20. iii. 33 v. 22. 'The same manner of expressing things strongly, is found in this epistle: for example, ch. ii. 4. 'He who saith, I have known him, and doth not keep his commandments, is a liar, and the truth is not in him.' Ver. 27. 'The same unction teacheth you concerning all things, and is truth, and is no lie.' Ch. iv. 2. 'Every spirit which confesseth that Jesus Christ hath come in the flesh, is from God.' Ver. 3. 'And every spirit which doth not confess that Jesus Christ hath come in the flesh, is not from God.'

"In his Gospel likewise, John, to express things emphatically, frequently uses the demonstrative pronoun this. Ch. i. 19. Avrō, 'This is the testimony.' Ch. iii. 19. Avrō, 'This is the condemnation, that light, &c. Chap. vi. 29. Tērō, 'This is the work of God.' Ver. 40. Tērō, 'This is the will of him.' Ver. 50. Ovrōs, 'This is the bread which cometh down from heaven.' Chap. xvii. 3. Avrō, 'This is the eternal life.' In the epistle the same emphatical manner of expression is found, ch. i. 5. ii. 25. 'This is the promise.' Chap. iii. 23. Avrō, 'This is the commandment.' Chap. v. 3. Avrō, 'This is the love of God.' Ver. 4. 'This is the victory.' Ver. 6. Ovrōs, 'This is he who came by water.' Ver. 14. Avrō, 'This is the boldness which we have with him.'

"Such is the internal evidence on which all Christians, from the beginning, have received the First Epistle of John, as really written by him, and of Divine authority, although his name is not mentioned in the inscription, nor in any part of the epistle."

On the term epistle, as applied to this work of St. John, it may be necessary to make a few remarks. There is properly nothing of the epistolary style in this work: it is addressed neither to any particular person, nor to any church.

The writer does not mention himself either in the beginning or ending; and, although this can be no objection against its authenticity, yet it is some proof that the work was never intended to be considered in the light of an epistle.

1. Is it a tract, or dissertation, upon the more sublime parts of Christianity? 2. Is it a polemical discourse against heretics, particularly the Gnostics, or some of their teachers, who were disturbing the churches where John dwelt? 3. Is it a sermon, the subject of which is God's love to man in the mission of Jesus Christ; from which our obligations to love and serve Him are particularly inferred? 4. Or is it a collection of Christian aphorisms, made by John himself; and put together as they occurred to his mind, without any intended order or method? Much might be said on all these heads of inquiry; and the issue would be that the idea of its being an epistle of any kind, must be relinquished; and yet epistle is its general denomination through all antiquity.

It is a matter, however, of little importance, what its title may be, or to what species of literary composition it belongs; while we know that it is the genuine work of St. John; of the holiest man who ever breathed; of one who was most intimately acquainted with the doctrine and mind of his Lord; of one who was admitted to the closest fellowship with his Saviour; and who has treated of the deepest things that can be experienced or comprehended in the Christian life.

As to distinct heads of discourse, it does not appear to me that any were intended by the apostle; he wrote just as the subjects occurred to his mind; or rather as the Holy Spirit gave him utterance; and, although technical order is not here to be expected, yet nothing like disorder or confusion can be found in the whole work.

As professor Michaelis has considered it in the light of a polemical treatise, written against the Gnostics, and other false teachers of that time, I have thought it right to give his view of the work considered in this light; but as I, in general, pursue another plan of interpretation in the notes, I have inserted his elucidation in the preceding pages of this preface.

On the controverted text of The Three heavenly Witnesses I have said what truth, and a deep and thorough examination of the subject, has obliged me to say. I am satisfied that it is not genuine; though the doctrine in behalf of which it has been originally introduced into the epistle is a doctrine of the highest importance, and most positively revealed in various converse with God, and God with them.—What John says is no figure: God and a holy heart are in continual correspondence.

The blood of Jesus Christ! The meritorious efficacy of His passion and death, has purged our consciences from dead works; and cleanseth us, καθαρῶς ἡμᾶς, continues to cleanse us; i. e. to keep clean what He has made clean; for it requires the same merit and energy to preserve holiness in the soul of man, as to produce it: or as several MSS. and some Versions read, καθαρῶς, and καθαρῶς, will cleanse; speaking of those who are already justified, and are expecting full redemption in His blood.

And being cleansed from all sin is what every believer should look for, what he has a right to expect, and what he must have in this life, in order to be prepared to meet His God; Christ is not a partial Saviour; He saves to the uttermost, and he cleanses from ALL sin.

8. If we say that we have no sin! This is tantamount to ver. 10. If we say that we have not sinned. All have sinned, and come short of the glory of God; and, therefore, every man needs a Saviour, such as Christ is. It is very likely that the heretics, against whose evil doctrines the apostle writes, denied that they had any sin, or needed any Saviour. Indeed, the Gnostics even denied that Christ suffered; the Zéon, or Divine Being that dwelt in the man Christ Jesus, according to them, left Him when He was taken by the Jews; and He, being but a common man, His sufferings and death had neither merit nor efficacy.

We deceive ourselves! By supposing that we have no guilt, no sinfulness; and consequently, have no need of the blood of Christ as an atoning sacrifice; this is the most dreadful of all deceptions, as it leaves the soul under all the guilt and pollution of sin: exposed to hell and utterly unfit for heaven.

The truth is not in us. We have no knowledge of the Gospel of Jesus; the whole of which is founded on this most awful truth—all have sinned; all are guilty; all are unholly; and none can recover himself. Hence, it was necessary that Jesus Christ should become incarnated, and suffer, and die, to bring men to God.

9. If we confess our sins! If, from a deep sense of our guilt, impurity, and helplessness, we humble ourselves before God, acknowledging our iniquity, His holiness, and our own utter helplessness, and implore mercy for His sake who has died for us: He is faithful, because to such He has promised mercy, Psa. xxxiii. 5. Prov. xxviii. 13. and just, for Christ has died for us, and thus made an atonement to the Divine Justice; so that God can now be just, and yet the Justifier of him who believeth in Jesus.

And to cleanse us from all unrighteousness. Not only to forgive the sin, but to purify the heart.

Observe here—1. Sin exists in the soul after two modes or forms: 1. In guilt, which requires forgiveness, or pardon; 2. In pollution, which requires cleansing.

2. Guilt, to be forgiven, must be confessed; and pollution, to be cleansed, must be also confessed. In order to find mercy, a man must know and feel himself to be a sinner, that he may fervently apply to God for pardon. In order to get a clean heart, a man must know and feel its depravity, acknowledge and deplore it before God, in order to be fully sanctified.

3. Few are pardoned, because they do not feel and confess their sins: and few are sanctified or cleansed from all sin, because they do not feel and confess their own sore, and the plague of their hearts.

4. As the blood of Jesus Christ, the merit of His passion and death, applied by faith, purges the conscience from all dead works; so the same cleanses the heart from all unrighteousness.

5. As all unrighteousness is sin; so he that is cleansed from all unrighteousness is cleansed from all sin. To attempt to evade this, and plead for the continuance of sin in the heart, through life, is ungrateful, wicked, and even blasphemous: for, as he who says he has not sinned, ver. 10. makes God a liar, who has declared the contrary through every part of His revelation; so he that says the blood of Christ either cannot or will not cleanse us from all sin in this life, gives also the lie to his Maker, who has declared the contrary; and thus shows that the word, the doctrine of God, is not in him.

Reader, it is the birthright of every child of God to be cleansed from all sin, to keep himself unspotted from the world, and so to live as never more to offend his Maker. All things are possible to him that believeth; because all things are possible to the infinitely meritorious blood, and energetic Spirit of the Lord Jesus.—See the notes on the parallel passages in the margin; and particularly in St. John's Gospel, chap. 1.

CHAPTER II.

He exhorts them not to sin; yet encourages those who may have fallen, by the hope of mercy through Christ, who is a propitiation for the sins of the whole world, 1, 2. He who knows God, keeps His commandments; and he who professes to abide in Christ, ought to walk as Christ walked, 3-6. The old and new commandment, that we should walk in the light, and love the brethren, 7-11. The apostle's description of the different states in the family of God; little children, young men, and fathers; and directions to each, 12-15. A statement of what prevails in the world, 16, 17. Cautions against antichrists, 18-23. Exhortations to persevere in what they had received, and to continue to follow that anointing of the Divine Spirit by which they could discern all men, and know all things necessary in their salvation, and proper to prepare them for eternal glory, 24-29. [A. M. cir. 4073. A. D. cir. 69. Innp. Galbâ, Othone, Vitellio, et Vespas.]

MY little children, these things write I unto you, that ye sin not. And if any man sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous: 2 And he is the propitiation for our sins: and not for ours only, but also for the sins of the whole world.

NOTES.—Verse 1. My little children! Τετρία ἡν, my beloved children; the address of an affectionate father to children whom he tenderly loves. The term also refers to the apostle's authority as their spiritual father; and their obligation to obey as his spiritual children.

That ye sin not! This is the language of the whole Scripture; of every dispensation, ordinance, institution, doctrine, and word of God. Sin not; do not run into ruin: live not so as to promote your own misery: be happy, for it is the will of God that ye should be so: therefore, He wills that ye should be holy: holiness and happiness are inseparable; sin and misery are equally so.

And if any man sin! If, through ignorance, inexperience, the violence of temptation, unwatchfulness, &c. ye have fallen into sin, and grieved the Spirit of God, do not continue in the sin, nor under the guilt; do not despair of being again restored to the favour of God: your case, it is true, is deeply deplorable, but do not despair: there is still hope, for—

We have an advocate with the Father! We still have Him before the throne who died for our offences, and rose again for our justification; and there he makes intercession for us. He is the righteous; He who suffered the just for the unjust, that He might bring us to God. Do not, therefore, despair, but have immediate recourse to God through Him.

2 And he is the propitiation. Ἰλασιος, the atoning sacrifice for our sins. This is the proper sense of the word, as used in the Septuagint, where it often occurs; and is the translation of עֹשֶׂת אִשָּׁמ, an oblation for sin, Amos viii. 14. רֹצֵחַ חַטָּאת, a sacrifice for sin, Ezek. xlv. 27. כִּפּוּר, atonement, Numb. v. 8.—See the note on Rom. iii. 25. and

3 And hereby we do know that we know him, if we keep his commandments.

4 He that saith, I know him, and keepeth not his commandments, is a liar, and the truth is not in him.

5 But whoso keepeth his word, is in him verily the love of John 1:29 & 4:2. 1 Jn. 1:5, 6, 7. Ch. 4:14.—4 Ch. 1:6 & 4:9.—Ch. 1:8.—1 Jn. 14:21, 27.—Ch. 4:12.

particularly the note on Luke xviii. 13. The word is used only here, and in chap. iv. 10.

And not for ours only! It is not for us apostles that He has died, nor exclusively for the Jewish people, but ὑπὲρ πάντων ἀνθρώπων, for the whole world, Gentiles as well as Jews: all the descendants of Adam. The apostle does not say that He died for any select part of the inhabitants of the earth, or for some out of every nation, tribe, or kindred, but for ALL ΜΑΡΤΥΡΟΙ; and the attempt to limit this is a violent outrage against God and His word.

For the meaning of the word ἰλασιος, which we here translate advocate, see the note on John xiv. 16.

From these verses we learn that a poor backslider need not despair of again finding mercy: this passage holds out sufficient encouragement for his hope. There is scarcely another such in the Bible; and why? That sinners might not presume on the mercy of God. And why this one? That he backslider might utterly despair. Here, then, is a guard against presumption on the one hand, and despondency on the other.

2. And hereby we do know that we know him! If we keep the commandments of God, loving Him with all our heart, and our neighbour as ourselves, we have the fullest proof that we have the true saving knowledge of God and His Christ. The Gnostics pretended to much knowledge, but their knowledge left them in possession of all their bad passions, and unholy habits; they, therefore, gave no proof that they had known either God or his Son Jesus: nor is any man properly acquainted with God, who is still under the power of his sins.

of God perfected: he hereby know we that we are in him. 6 He that saith he abideth in him ought himself also to walk, even as he walked.

7 Brethren, I write no new commandment unto you, but an old commandment which ye had from the beginning. The old commandment is the word which ye have heard from the beginning.

8 Again, a new commandment I write unto you, which thing is true in him and in you: because the darkness is past, and the true light now shineth.

4. He that saith, I know him] This is a severe blow against those false teachers, and against all pretenders to religious knowledge, who live under the power of their sins; and against all Antinomians, and false boasters in the righteousness of Christ, as a covering for their personal unholiness. They are all liars, and no truth of God is in them.

5. But who so keepeth his word] Conscientiously observes his doctrine, the spirit and letter of the religion of Christ.

In the love of God perfected] The design of God's love in sending Jesus Christ into the world to die for the sin of man is τελειωται, accomplished, in that man who receives the doctrine, and applies for the salvation provided for him. This seems to be the meaning of the apostle.

That we are in him] That we have entered into His Spirit and views, received His salvation, have been enabled to walk in the light, and have communion with Him by the Holy Spirit.

6. Abideth in him] He who not only professes to have known Christ, but also that he has communion with Him, and abides in His favour, should prove the truth of his profession, by walking as Christ walked; living a life of devotion and obedience to God, and of benevolence and beneficence to his neighbour. Thus Christ walked; and he has left us an example that we should follow His steps.

To be in Christ, ver. 6. is to be converted to the Christian faith, and to have received the remission of sins. To abide in Christ, ver. 6. is to continue in that state of salvation, growing in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ.

7. Brethren, I write no new commandment] There seems a contradiction between this and the next verse. But the apostle appears to speak not so much of any difference in the essence of the precept itself, but in reference to the degrees of light and grace belonging to the Mosaic and Christian dispensations. It was ever the command of God that men should receive His light, walk by that light and love Him and one another. But this commandment was renewed by Christ with much latitude and spirituality of meaning; and also with much additional light to see its extent, and grace to observe it. It may, therefore, be called the old commandment, which was from the beginning; and also a new commandment revealed afresh, and illustrated by Christ, with the important addition to the meaning of Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself, ye shall love the brethren so as to lay down your lives for each other.—See the note on John xiii. 34.

Instead of ἀδελφοί, brethren, ABC. thirteen others, with both the Syriac, Erpen's Arabic, Coptic, Sahidic, Armenian, Slavonic, and Vulgate, with several of the Fathers, have ἀγαπητοί, beloved. This is, without doubt, the true reading.

8. Which thing is true in him and in you] It is true that Christ loved the world so well as to lay down His life for it: and it was true in them, in all His faithful followers at that time, who were ready to lay down their lives for the testimony of Jesus. There is a saying in Synopsis, Sohar, p. 94. n. 51. that may cast some light on this passage—That way in which the just have walked, although it be old, yet may be said to be new in the love of the righteous. The love that the righteous bear to God and to each other is a renewal of the commandment.

The darkness is past] The total thick darkness of the heathen world, and the comparative darkness of the Mosaic dispensation, are now passing away; and the pure and superior light of Christianity is now diffusing its beams every where. He does not say that the darkness was all gone, but, and παρρησια, it is passing away: he does not say that the fulness of the light had appeared, but ἤδη φάσκει, it is now shining; and will shine more and more to the perfect day: for, the darkness passes away in proportion as the light shines and increases.

9. He that saith he is in the light] He that professes to be a convert to Christianity, even in the lowest degree—and hateth his brother: not only does not love him, but wills and does him evil, as the Jews did the Gentiles—is in darkness; has received no saving knowledge of the truth; and, what ever he may pretend, is in heathen ignorance, or even worse than heathen ignorance, to the present time, notwithstanding the clear shining of the light of the Gospel.

10. He that loveth his brother] That is, his neighbour, his fellow-creature, whether Jew or Gentile, so as to bear him continual good will, and to be ready to do him every kind of good: Abideth in the light; not only gives proof that he has received Christ Jesus the Lord, but that he walks in Him, that he retains the grace of his justification, and grows therein.

And there is none occasion of stumbling in him] Καὶ οὐκ

9 He that saith he is in the light, and hateth his brother, is in darkness even until now.

10 He that loveth his brother, abideth in the light, and there is none occasion of stumbling in him.

11 But he that hateth his brother is in darkness, and knoweth not whither he goeth, because the darkness hath blinded his eyes.

15 Love not the world, neither the things that are in the world. If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him.

stock of spiritual wisdom, and religious experience. All these answer to the component members of a perfect human family. 1. There is the beloved infant, dandled on the knees of its parents. 2. There are the little children that can speak a little, run about, answer to their own names, distinguish and call on their father and mother; and are now put under instruction. 3. There are the youths, those who are grown up to man's estate, are strong to labour, retain the instructions they have received, act upon them; and are occasionally called upon to defend their family, property, and country, against spoilers and oppressors. 4. There are the parents, the father and mother, from whom the family sprang; and who are the governors and directors of the household. To these four classes, in a perfect family, the apostle appears to allude; and we see, considered in this light, with what delicacy and propriety he uses these images.

14. The word of God abideth in you] Ye have not only thoroughly known and digested the Divine doctrine, but your hearts are moulded into it: ye know it to be the truth of God, from the power and happiness with which it inspires you; and from the constant abiding testimony of the spirit of that truth, which lives and witnesses wherever that truth lives and predominates.

15. Love not the world] Though these several classes were so well acquainted with divine things, and had all tested the powers of the world to come; yet, so apt are men to be drawn aside by sensible things, that the Holy Spirit saw it necessary to caution these against the love of the world, the inordinate desire of earthly things. Covetousness is the predominant vice of old age: Ye fathers, love not the world. The things which are in the world, its profits, pleasures, and honours, have the strongest allurements for youth; therefore, ye young men, little children, and babes, love not the things of this world. Let those hearts abide faithful to God, who have taken Him for their portion.

The love of the Father is not in him.] The love of God, and the love of earthly things are incompatible. If you give place to the love of the world, the love of God cannot dwell in you; and if you have not His love, you can have no peace, no holiness, no heaven.

16. For all that is in the world] All that it can boast of, all that it can promise, is only sensual, transient gratification; and even this promise, it cannot fulfil; so that its warmest votaries can complain loudest of their disappointment.

The lust of the flesh] Sensual and impure desires, which seek their gratification in women, strong drink, delicious viands, and the like.

Lust of the eye] Inordinate desires after finery of every kind: gaudy dress, splendid houses, superb furniture, expensive equipage, trappings and decorations of all sorts.

Pride of life] Hunting after honours, titles, and pedigrees. Boasting of ancestry, family connexions, great offices, honourable acquaintance, and the like.

Is not of the Father] Nothing of these inordinate attachments either comes from, or leads to, God. They are of this world; here they begin, flourish, and end. They deprave the mind, divert it from divine pursuits, and render it utterly incapable of spiritual enjoyments.

17. The world passeth away] All these things are continually fading and perishing; and the very state in which they are possessed is changing perpetually; and the earth and its works will be shortly burnt up.

And the lust thereof] The men of this world, their vain pursuits, and delusive pleasures, are passing away in their successive generations; and their very memory perishes: but he that doeth the will of God, that seeks the pleasure, profit, and honour, that come from above, shall abide for ever; always happy, through time and eternity; because God, the unchangeable source of felicity, is his portion.

18. Little children, it is the last time.] This place is variously understood. This is the last dispensation of grace and mercy to mankind: the present age is the conclusion of the Jewish state, as the temple and holy city are shortly to be destroyed. But as there are many who suppose that this epistle was written after the destruction of Jerusalem; consequently the words cannot, on that supposition, refer to this. Others think that καιρος use should be translated the most difficult, perilous, and watched time; a time in which all kinds of vices, heresies, and pollutions, shall have their full reign: that time which our Lord predicted, Matt. vii. 15. when He said, Beware of false prophets. xxiv. 11, 12. Many false

17 And the world passeth away, and the lust thereof: but he that doeth the will of God abideth for ever.

18 Little children, it is the last time: and as ye have heard that antichrist shall come, even now are there many antichrists; whereby we know that it is the last time.

19 They went out from us, but they were not of us; for if they had been of us, they would no doubt have continued with us: but they went out, that they might be made manifest that they were not all of us.

20 But ye have an unction from the Holy One, and ye know all things.

21 I have not written unto you because ye know not the truth, but because ye know it, and that no lie is of the truth.

prophets shall arise, and shall deceive many; and because iniquity shall abound, the love of many shall wax cold. And verse 24. There shall arise false Christs and false prophets, and shall show great signs and wonders. And, verse 26. Behold, I have told you before. Now the apostle may allude to these predictions of our Lord: but all these refer to a time antecedent to the destruction of Jerusalem. I am therefore inclined to think, whatever may be here the precise meaning of the last time, that the epistle before us was written while Jerusalem yet stood. See what is said in the Preface on this head.

Antichrist shall come] Who is this Αντιχριστος, Antichrist? Is he the emperor Domitian, the Gnostics, Nicolaitans, Nazareans, Cerinthians, Romish pontiffs, &c. &c.? Ans. Any person, thing, doctrine, system of religion, polity, &c. which is opposed to Christ, and to the spirit and spread of His Gospel, is antichrist. We need not look for this imaginary being in any of the above exclusively. Even Protestants may have its antichrist as well as Popery. Every man who opposes the spirit of the Gospel, and every teacher and writer who endeavours to lower the Gospel standard to the spirit and taste of the world, is a genuine antichrist, no matter where, or among whom, he is found. The heresies which sprang up in the days of St. John, were the antichrist of that time. As there has been a succession of oppositions to Christianity, in its spirit and spread, through every age since its promulgation in the world; so there has been a succession of antichrists. We may bring this matter much lower: every enemy of Christ, every one who opposes His reign in the world, in others, or in himself, is an antichrist; and, consequently, every wicked man is an antichrist. But the name has been generally applied to whatever person, or thing, systematically opposes Christ and His religion.

Many antichrists] Many false prophets, false Messiahs, heretics, and corruptors of the truth.

Whereby we know that it is the last time.] That time which our Lord has predicted; and of which he has warned us.

19. They went out from us.] These heretics had belonged to our Christian assemblies; they professed Christianity, and do so still; but we, apostles, did not commission them to preach to you, for they have disgraced the Divine doctrine with the most pernicious opinions; they have given up, or explained away, its most essential principles; they have mingled the rest with heathenish rites and Jewish glosses. While, therefore, we acknowledge that they once belonged to us, we assert that they are not of us. They are not Christians; we abhor their conduct and their creed. We never sent them to teach.

They were not of us] For a considerable time before they left our assemblies, they gave proofs that they had departed from the faith; for if they had been of us, if they had been apostles, and continued in the firm belief of the Christian doctrines, they would not have departed from us to form a sect of themselves.

That they were not all of us.] They were not expelled from the Christian church; they were not sent out by us; but they separated from it and us. None of them had been inspired as we apostles were, though they pretended to a very high teaching; but their separating from us manifested that they were not taught, as we were, by the Spirit of God. These false teachers probably drew many sincere souls away with them: and to this it is probable the apostle alludes, when he says, they were not all of us. Some were; others were not.

20. But ye have an unction] The word χρῆμα signifies not an unction, but an ointment; the very thing itself by which anointing is effected; and so it was properly rendered in our former translations. Probably this is an allusion to the holy anointing oil of the law, and to Ps. xlv. 7. God hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness. He hath given thee the plenitude of the Spirit, which none of thy fellows, none of the prophets, ever received in such abundance. By this it is evident, that not only the gifts of the Spirit, but the Holy Spirit Himself, is intended. This Spirit dwelt at that time in a peculiar manner in the church, to teach apostles, teachers, and all the primitive believers, every thing requisite for their salvation; and to make them the instruments of handing down to posterity, that glorious system of truth which is contained in the New Testament. As oil was used among the Asiatics for the inauguration of persons into important offices; and this oil was acknowledged to be an emblem of the gifts and graces of the Holy Spirit, without which the duties of those offices could not be discharged: so it is put here for the Spirit Himself, who presided in the church, and from which all gifts and graces flowed. The χρυσμα, chrism, or ointment here mentioned, is also an allusion to the holy anointing ointment prescribed by God himself, Exod. xxx. 23—25. which was composed of fine myrra, sweet cinnamon, sweet calamus, cassia lignea, or olive oil. This was an emblem of the gifts and graces of the Divine Spirit. See the notes on the above place. And for the reason of this anointing, see the note on Exod. xxix. 7.

Ye know all things.] Every truth of God necessary to your salvation, and the salvation of man in general: and have no need of that knowledge of which the Gnostics boast.

But although the above is the sense in which this verse is generally understood, yet there is reason to doubt its accuracy. The adjective παρα, which we translate all things, is most probably the accusative case singular, having ἀρπαζον, man, or some such substantive, understood. The verse, therefore, should be translated, Ye have an ointment from the Holy One, and ye know, or discern every man. This interpretation appears to be confirmed by τῶν πλῆθυστων, in ver. 26. those who are deceiving, or misleading, you; and in the same sense should πᾶσιν, ver. 27. be understood. But as the same anointing teacheth you, πᾶσιν, not of all things, but of ALL THINGS. It is plain, from the whole tenor of the epistle, that St. John is guarding the Christians against seducers and deceivers, who were even then disturbing, and striving to corrupt the church. In consequence of this, he desires them to try the spirits whether they were of God, Chap. iv. 1. But how were they to try them? Principally by that anointing, that spiritual light and discernment, which they had received from God; and also by comparing the doctrine of these men with what they had heard from the beginning. The anointing here mentioned seems to mean the spirit of illumination, or great knowledge and discernment in spiritual things. By this they could readily distinguish the false apostles from the true.

21. I have not written, &c.] It is not because ye are ignorant of these things that I write to you; but because you know them, and can by these judge of the doctrines of those false teachers, and clearly perceive that they are liars; for they contradict the truth which ye have already received, and consequently their doctrine is a lie; and no lie can be of the truth, i. e. consistent with Christianity.

22. Who is a liar but he that denieth that Jesus is the Christ? Here we see some of the false doctrines which were then propagated in the world. There were certain persons who, while they acknowledged Jesus to be a Divine Teacher, denied Him to be the Christ, i. e. the MESSIAH.

He is antichrist, that denieth the Father and the Son.] He is antichrist who denies the supernatural and miraculous birth of Jesus Christ; who denies Jesus to be the Son of God; and who denies God to be the Father of the Lord Jesus:—thus, he denies the Father and the Son. The Jews in general, and the Gnostics in particular, denied the miraculous conception of Jesus: with both he was accounted no more than a common man, the son of Joseph and Mary. But the Gnostics held that a divine person, Son, or angelical being, dwelt in him; but all things else relative to His miraculous generation and divinity they rejected. These were antichrists, who denied Jesus to be the Christ.

23. Whosoever denieth the Son] He who denies Jesus to be the Son of God, and consequently the Christ or Messiah, he hath not the Father, he can have no birth from above, he cannot be enrolled among the children of God; because none can be a child of God, but by faith in Christ Jesus.

He that acknowledgeth the Son hath the Father also.] This clause is printed by our translators in italics, to show it to be of doubtful authority, as it was probably wanting in the chief of those MSS. which they consulted; as it was in Coverdale's Bible, printed 1535; Tindal's text, printed in 1548; and in all the early printed editions (which I have seen) previously to 1666; the Bible of Richard Cardmarden, printed in English at Rouen, where this clause is inserted in a different letter, between brackets. But that the clause is genuine, and should be restored to the text without any mark of spuriousness, as I have done in the text of this work, is evident, from the authorities by which it is supported. It is found in ABC. and in between twenty and thirty others of the best authority; as also in both the Syriac, Erpen's Arabic, Coptic, Sahidic, Armenian, and Vulgate.—It is also quoted as a part of the text by Origen, Meletius, Athanasius, both the Cyrils, Theophylact, Vigilantius of Tapsum, Pelagius, Cereola, Cassian; and in substance by Euthalius, Epiphanius Cyprian, Hilary,

24. Let that therefore abide in you.] Continues doctrines concerning the incarnation, passion, death, ascension, and intercession, of the Lord: you have heard preached from the beginning and apostles.

Ye also shall continue in the Son, and in the Father who are preachers shall not only be acknowledged, but of the church of Christ, but be genuine children by faith in the Son of His love; and ye all things shall have fellowship with the Father and with the Son.

25. This is the promise.] God has promised to all who believe on Christ Jesus. So they who receive, and continue in communion with the Father and the Son, shall have this eternal life.

26. These things have I written.] Either means epistle, or what is contained in the preceding verse beginning of the 18th to the end of the 26th.

Them that seduce you.] Πειρῶντες πλῆθυστων, the deceivers that were among them; and who were to pervert the followers of Christ.

27. But the anointing which ye have received.] The gifts of the Holy Spirit, mentioned in the preceding verse.

Ye need not that any man teach you.] The Gnostics pretended to the highest illumination, could be taught that they were divinely taught; nor had they their teaching worthy the acceptance of the Messiah: therefore they had no need of that, nor teaching; but that which the same anointing, same Spirit from whom they had already received the glory of God, in the face of Jesus Christ, that taught, they needed; and whatever those teachers were according to the Spirit, they needed: does not say, that those who had once received of the Divine Spirit had no farther need of the same; but he says they had no need of such teachers: their false teachers proposed to them; nor of anything that was different from that anointing, i. e. of the Spirit of God. No man, however holy, can ever be in such a state as to have no need of ministry; they who think so, give the highest praise have never yet learned of Christ, or His Spirit.

And is truth.] Because it is the Spirit of truth. And is no lie.] It has nothing like the fables of the heathen; it can neither deceive, nor be deceived.

28. And now, little children.] Τακια, beloved children in him, in Christ Jesus. Let His word and Spirit abide in you; and have communion with the Father and the Son.

That, when he shall appear.] To judge the world, we have confidence, καρπονια, freedom of speech, ease, boldness, from a conviction that our cause that we had proper ground for exultation. And med—confounded, when it appears that those brought to Christ Jesus have apostatized, and are found in the congregation of the saints, and cannot our crown of rejoicing in the day of the Abide in Him, that this may not be the case.

29. If ye know that he is righteous.] That God ye know also, that every one who doeth righteousness lives a holy life, following the commandments of Him; εὐδοκῶντες of Him; is made a partaker of His nature, without which he could neither have a holy life a holy life.

This verse properly belongs to the following should not be separated from it. The subject is understood not stand in any strict relation to that which 28th verse concludes.

The titles bestowed on Christians in the New Testament have been misunderstood by many. What belonging to the work and not, is often applied though bound by their passion to be such, we from it. This has been strongly denied by writers have known better. Dr. Taylor has handled this in his Key to the Apostolic Writings, from which a copious extract in my Preface to the Epistle to the Romans from the conviction that the subject had been grossly misapprehended: and that several of the titles which disgrace religion, had sprung from the hension. With some, Dr. Taylor's being an Arian was sufficient to invalidate any testimony he might offer: but it is no discovery of Dr. Taylor; it is what every attentive unprejudiced reader finds on reading the Old Testament in connexion with the New. Perhaps the testimony of a judicious Calvinist may be better received; not that this truth needs the testimony of either; because it every where speaks for itself, but because those who have too little grace, sense, and candour, to search for themselves, may be pleased that Dr. Macneight waves them the trouble.

After having remarked that the words born of him, ἐκ αὐτοῦ γεννηται, should be translated hath been begotten of Him, which is the literal signification of the word, from γεννω, genero, gigno, I beget, (sons of God being nowhere found in the Scripture,) he goes on to say:

"To understand the import of the high titles which in the New Testament are given to the disciples of Christ, viz. The begotten of God; as here—children of God, as in the next chapter—Heirs of God, Rom. viii. 17.—Elect of God—adopted of God—saints—a royal priesthood—a holy nation—a peculiar people, 1 Pet. ii. 9. the following observations may be of use.

"1. These high titles were anciently given to the Israelites as a nation, because they were separated from mankind to be God's visible church, for the purpose of preserving the knowledge and worship of Him in the world, as the only true God.

"This appears from God's own words, Exod. xix. 3, &c. Tell the children of Israel, Ye have seen what I did to the Egyptians; and how I bare you on eagles' wings, and brought you unto myself. Now, therefore, if ye will obey my voice indeed, and keep my covenant, then ye shall be a peculiar treasure unto me above all people. And ye shall be unto me a kingdom of priests, and a holy nation.—Deut. xiv. 1, &c. Ye are the children of the Lord your God: for thou art a holy people to the Lord thy God. In particular, the title of God's son, even his first born, was given to the whole Israelitish nation, by God Himself, Exod. iv. 22. chiefly because they were the descendants of Isaac, who was supernaturally begotten by Abraham, through the power which accompanied the promise, Gen. xviii. 10. Lo, Sarah shall have a son. So St. Paul informs us, Rom. ix. 7. Neither because they are the seed of Abraham, are they all children (namely, of God); but in Isaac shall a seed be to thee—the children of the flesh, these are not the children of God: but the children of promise are counted for a seed. The apostle's meaning is, that Ishmael and his posterity, whom Abraham procreated by his own natural strength, being children of the flesh, were not children of God: that is, they were not made the visible church and people of God. But Isaac and his descendants, whom Abraham procreated through the strength which accompanied the promise, being more properly procreated by God than by Abraham, were the children of God, i. e. were made the visible church and people of God, because by their supernatural generation and title to inherit Canaan, they were a fit image to represent the catholic invisible church of God, consisting of believers of all ages and nations, who, being regenerated by the Spirit of God, are the true children of God, and heirs of the heavenly country of which Canaan was a type.

"2. As the promise, Lo, Sarah shall have a son, which was given to Abraham when he was a hundred years old, and Sarah was ninety, implied that that son was to be supernatural; procreated: so the promise given to Abraham, Gen. xvii. 6. A father of many nations have I constituted thee, implied that the many nations of believers who, by this promise, were given to Abraham for a seed, were to be generated by the operation of the Spirit of God; producing in them faith and obedience, similar to those for which Abraham was constituted the father of all believers. This higher generation, by which believers have the moral image of God communicated to them, is well described, John i. 12. As many as received him, to them gave he power to be called the sons of God, even to them who believe on his name: αὐτοὺς ἔθηκεν υἱοὺς, who were ἁγιασθέντες, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God. That is, men become the true sons of God; not by their being naturally descended from this or that father, nor by their being called the sons of God by men like themselves; but by God's bestowing on them that high appellation, on account of their faith and holiness," (which were produced in them by their regeneration, through the Spirit of God.)

"3. If the Israelites, of whom the ancient visible church and people of God were composed, were all called the sons of God, because Isaac, from whom they were descended, was supernaturally begotten by the power of God; certainly the believers of all ages and nations, of whom the visible church is composed, may, with much greater propriety, be called the sons of God, since they are begotten of God, and possess His moral nature.

"4. Thus it appears, that the high titles above-mentioned, viz., the sons of God, the children of God, the elect of God, the adoption of sons, the election, saints, holy nation, royal priesthood, peculiar people, were anciently given to the Israelites as a nation, merely on account of their being the visible church and people of God, without any regard to the personal character of the individuals of whom that nation was composed. Also, it appears, that, under the Gospel, the same high titles were bestowed on whole churches, merely on account of their profession of Christianity, without any regard to the personal character of the individuals who composed these churches. But these high titles, with some others of greater importance, such as the begotten of God, the heirs of God, the adoption, were given in an appropriated sense to individuals likewise, on account of their faith and holiness. When given to whole churches, these titles imported nothing more than that the society to which they were given was a church of Christ, (i. e. professed Christianity); and that the individuals of which that society was composed, were entitled to all the privileges belonging to the visible church of God. But when appropriated to individuals, these titles implied that the persons to whom they were given were really partakers of the nature of God; and that they were the objects of His paternal love, and heirs of His glory.

"Wherefore, in reading the Scriptures, by attending to the different foundations of these titles, and by considering whether they are applied to churches or individuals, we shall easily understand their true import. Thus, when St. Paul, writing to the Thessalonians, says, 1 Thess. i. 4. Knowing, brethren, beloved of God, your election, he could not mean their election to eternal life, since many of them were living disorderly, 2 Thess. iii. 11, but their election to be the visible church of God under the Gospel: whereas, when John speaks in the verse before us, every one who doeth righteousnes hath been begotten of God, by restricting the title to a specific character, he teaches us that the persons of whom he speaks are the sons of God in the highest sense, and heirs of eternal glory."

NOTES.—Verse 1. Behold, what manner of love] Whole volumes might be written upon this and the two following verses, without exhausting the extraordinary subject contained in them: viz. the love of God to man. The apostle himself, though evidently filled with God, and walking in the fullness of His light, does not attempt to describe it: he calls on the world and the church to behold it; to look upon it, to contemplate it, and wonder at it.

What manner of love—Ποσῶν ἀγαπῶν, what great love, both as to quantity and quality; for these ideas are included in the original term.—The length, the breadth, the depth, the height, he does not attempt to describe.

God the Father hath bestowed] For we had neither claim nor merit, that we should be called, that is, constituted, or made the sons of God, who were before children of the wicked one; animal, earthly, devilish: therefore, the love which brought us from such a depth of misery and degradation must appear the more extraordinary and impressive. After ελε-

Therefore the world] The Jews, and all who know not God, and are seeking their portion in this life: knoweth us not; do not acknowledge, respect, love, or approve of us. In this sense the word γινώσκω is here to be understood. The world knew well enough that there were such persons; but they did not approve of them. We have often seen that this is a frequent use of the term know, both in Hebrew and Greek in the Old Testament and also in the New.

Because it knew him not.] The Jews did not acknowledge Jesus: they neither approved of Him, His doctrine, nor His manner of life.

judgy, it is not yet manifest; though we know that we are the children of God, we do not know that state of glorious excellency to which, as such, we shall be raised.

When he shall appear] Eav rparwpdy, when he shall be manifested; i. e. when he comes the second time; and shall be manifested, in His glorified human nature, to judge the world.

We shall be like Him] For our vile bodies shall be made like unto His glorious body; we shall see him as he is, in all the glory and majesty both of the Divine and human nature; see Phil. iii. 21. and John xvii. 24. Father, I will that they also whom thou hast given me, be with me where I am, that they may behold my glory. John had seen His glory on the mount, when He was transfigured; and thus we find was ineffably grand: but even this must have been partially obscured, in order to enable the disciples to bear the sight; for they were not then like Him. But when they shall be like Him, they shall see Him as he is, in all the splendour of His infinite majesty.

3. And every man that hath this hope in Him] All who have the hope of seeing Christ as He is; that is, of enjoying Him in His own glory: purifieth himself; abstains from all evil, and keeps himself from all that is in the world, viz. the lust of the flesh, of the eye, and the pride of life. God having purified his heart, it is his business to keep himself in the love of God, looking for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ, unto eternal life. The apostle does not here speak of any man purifying his own heart, because this is impossible; but of his persevering in the state of purity into which the Lord hath brought him. The words, however, may be understood of a man's anxiously using all the means that lead to purity; and imploring God for the sanctifying Spirit, to cleanse the thoughts of his heart by its inspiration; that he may perfectly love Him, and worthily magnify His name.

As he is pure.] Till he is as completely saved from his sins as Christ was free from sin. Many tell us that "this never can be done, for no man can be saved from sin in this life." Will these persons permit us to ask, How much sin may we be saved from in this life? Something must be ascertained on this subject.—1. That the soul may have some determinate object in view.—2. That it may not lose its time, or employ its faith and energy, in praying for what is impossible to be attained. Now, as He was manifested to take away our sins, ver. 5. to destroy the works of the devil, ver. 8. and as His blood cleanseth from all sin and unrighteousness, chap. i. 7, 9. is it not evident that God means that believers in Christ shall be saved from all sin?—for, if His blood cleanses from all sin, if He destroys the works of the devil, and sin is the work of the devil, and if he who is born of God does not commit sin, ver. 9. then he must be cleansed from all sin; and while he continues in that state, he lives without sinning against God; for the seed of God remaineth in him, and he cannot sin, because he is born or begotten of God, ver. 9. How strangely warped and blinded by prejudice and system must men be, who, in the face of such evidence as this, will still dare to maintain that no man can be saved from his sin in this life; but must daily commit sin, in thought, word, and deed, as the Westminster divines have asserted: that is, every man is laid under the fatal necessity of sinning as many ways against God as the devil does through his natural wickedness and malice; for even the devil himself can have no other way of sinning against God, except by thought, word, and deed. And yet according to these, and others of the same creed, "even the most regenerate, sin thus against God as long as they live." It is a miserable salvo to say, they do not sin so much as they used to do; and they do not sin habitually, only occasionally. Alas for this system! Could not the grace that saved them partially, save them perfectly? Could not that power of God that saved them from habitual sin, save them from occasional or accidental sin? Shall we suppose that sin, how potent soever it may be, is as potent as the Spirit and grace of Christ? And may we not ask, if it was for God's glory and their good that they were partially saved, would it not have been more for God's glory, and their good, if they had been perfectly saved? But the letter and spirit of God's word, and the design and end of Christ's coming, is to save His people from their sins. Dr. Macknight, having stated that αγιζισι, purifich, is in the present tense, most ridiculously draws this conclusion from it: "In this life no one can attain to perfect purity; by this text, therefore, as well as by 1 John i. 8. those fanatics are condemned who imagine they are able to live without sin." Yes, doctor, the men you call fanatics, do most religiously believe that by the grace of Christ cleansing

7 Little children, let no man deceive you: righteous is righteous, even as he is righteous.

8 He that committeth sin is of the devil; for both is the transgression of the law.

9 Whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin; neither shall he see death, because he abideth in Him.

10 In this the children of God are manifest, and the children of the devil; whosoever doeth not righteous works, neither he that loveth not his brother.

11 Whosoever loveth his brother that abideth in Him, and his brother shall have life, and shall not be condemned, because he abideth in the love of God.

and strengthening them, they can love God heart, soul, mind, and strength, and their neighbour as themselves; and live without grieving the Spirit of God, and without sinning against their heavenly Father. And that, if they are not thus saved, it is their own fault, and not God's; for He is not the author of blindness, but man must ever be a bad judge of colours.

4. Sin is the transgression of the law.] The law, as well as of the Gospel, is, that "we shall love all our powers, and our neighbour as ourselves; and disobedience is contrary to love; therefore sin is the transgression of the law, whether the act refer immediately to our neighbour.

5. And ye know that he was manifested to take away our sins] He came into the world to destroy the guilt, and cleanse from the pollution, of the very design of His manifestation in the flesh, born, suffered, and died, for this very purpose supposed that He either cannot or will not be an object of His own coming?

In Him is no sin] And, therefore, properly the atoning Sacrifice for the sins of men.

6. Whosoever abideth in Him] By faith, knowledge, and love.

Sinneth not] Because his heart is purified by the grace of God in vain.—See on ver. 3.

Hath not seen Him] It is no unusual thing with Him in His Gospel and in His epistles, to put the past for the present, and the present for the past; very likely that here he puts, after the manner of the prophets for the present. He who aims at seeing Him, neither doth he know Him. The eye is darkened, so that he cannot see Him as he is, and he has no longer the experimental knowledge of His Father and Father.

7. Let no man deceive you] Either by asserting that he can be saved from sin in this life; or that he has no harm, and cannot alter your state, if you are the family of God; for sin cannot annul this adoption. He that doth righteousness, according to his state, nature, and the extent of his powers.

Even as he is righteous] Allowing for the fact that which is without limits. As God, in His nature, is righteous; so they, being filled with His limited nature righteous.

8. He that committeth sin is of the devil] He who pleads for Baal, and cannot bear the doctrine that states believers are to be saved from sin in this life.—he who committeth sin is a child of the devil; that he has still the nature of the devil in him from the beginning: he was the first brought sin into the world, and maintains sin living in the hearts of his own children, and thus to transgression; and persuading others that they are saved from their sins in this life, that he may increase in their hearts. He knows that if he were to live throughout life, he will probably have it at death throughout eternity.

For this purpose] His rove, for this very design was Jesus manifested in the flesh, to take away our sins, that he might loose the bondage of the power, influence, and connection of sin on ver. 3.

9. Whosoever is born of God] Γεννησθης, born, doth not commit sin: that is, may some, do; he does not sin habitually, as he formerly did, bringing the influence and privileges of the very low indeed. We have the most indubitable evidence, that many of the heathen philosophers had acquired discipline and cultivation, an entire acquiescence in their wonted vicious habits. Perhaps my recollection the story of the physiognomist, who, to place where Socrates was delivering a lecture, wishing to put the principles of the man's character, desired him to examine the face of their master's moral character was. After a full contemplation of Socrates' visage, he pronounced him "the most beautiful, but, and libidinous old man that I ever met." As the character of Socrates was the reverse of what the physiognomist had expected, he interfered, and said, The principles of his science correct, for such I was, but I have conquered it by my philosophy. O ye Christian divines, ye real or pretended Gospel ministers, will ye allow the influence of the grace of Christ a sway not even so extensive as that of the philosophy of a heathen, who never heard of the true God!

10. In this the children of God are manifest! Here is a fearful test. Who is a child of the devil? He that commits sin. Who is a child of God? He that works righteousness. By this text we shall stand or fall before God; whatever our particular creed may say to the contrary.

Neither he that loveth not his brother.] No man is of God, who is not ready on all emergencies to do any act of kindness for the comfort, relief, and support, of any human being. For, as God made of one blood all the nations of men to dwell upon the face of the whole earth: so all are of one family; and consequently, all are brethren; and should love as brethren.

11. For this is the message] See chap. i. 5. From the beginning God hath taught men that they should love one another. How essentially necessary this is to the comfort and well-being of man, in this state of trial and difficulty, every sensible man must see. All are dependant upon all; all upon each; and each upon all. Mutual love makes this dependance pleasant, and doubly profitable. Nothing can be more pleasing to an ingenuous and generous mind than to communicate acts of kindness.

12. Not as Cain] Men should not act to each other as Cain did to his brother Abel. He murdered him because he was better than himself. But who was Cain? Εc του σαρπηρος ης, to was of the devil. And who are they who through pride, lust of power, ambition, gain, &c. murder each other in wars and political contentions? Εc του σαρπηρος εις. To attempt to justify the principle, and excuse the instigators, authors, zeltors, &c. of such wars, is as vain as it is wicked. They are opposed to the nature of God, and to that message which he has sent to man from the beginning—love one another. Love your enemies. Surely this does not mean, blow out their brains, or cut their throats. O how much of the spirit, temper, and letter, of the Gospel have the nations of the world, and particularly the nations of Europe, to learn!

And wherefore slew he him?] What could induce a brother to imbrue his hands in a brother's blood? Why, his brother was righteous, and he was wicked; and they seed of the wicked one which was in him, induced him to destroy his brother, because the seed of God, the Divine nature, was found in him.

Marvel not—if the world hate you.] Expect no better treatment from unconverted Jews and Gentiles than Abel received from his wicked and cruel brother. This was a lesson to the church, preparatory to martyrdom. Expect neither notice nor mercy from the men who are enemies of God. They are either full of malice and envy, hateful, hating one another; or they are specious, hollow, false, and deceitful. 'A foe to God, was never true friend to MAN.'

14. We know that we have passed from death unto life] Death and life are represented here as two distinct territories, states, or kingdoms: to either of which the inhabitants of either may be removed. This is implied in the term μεταβαλεσκαι, from meta, denoting change of place, and βασιυα, I ro. It is the same figure which St. Paul uses, Coloss. i. 13. Who hath delivered us from the power of darkness, and translated us into the kingdom of the Son of his love. The believers to whom St. John writes had been once in the region and shadow of death; in the place where sin and death reigned; whose subjects they were: but they had left that kingdom of oppression, wretchedness, and wo; and come over to the kingdom of life; whose King was the Prince and Author of life; where all was liberty, prosperity, and happiness, where life and love were universally prevalent, and death and hatred could not enter. We know, therefore, says the apostle, that we are passed over from the territory of death, to the kingdom of life, because we love the brethren, which those who continue in the old kingdom, under the old government, can never do: for he that loveth not his brother, abideth in death. He has never changed his original residence. He is still an unconverted, unrenewed sinner.

15. Whosoever hateth his brother is a murderer] He has the same principle in him which was in Cain; and it may lead to the same consequences.

17 But ' whose hath this world's good, and seeth his brother have need, and shutteth up his bowels of compassion from him, ' how dwelleth the love of God in him?

18 My little children, ' let us not love in word, neither in tongue; but in deed and in truth.

19 And hereby we know ' that we are of the truth, and shall assure our hearts before him.

20 ' For, if our heart condemn us, God is greater than our heart, and knoweth all things.

21 ' Beloved, if our heart condemn us not, ' then have we confidence toward God.

22 And ' whatsoever we ask, we receive of him, because we keep his commandments. ' and do those things that are pleasing in his sight.

No murderer hath eternal life] Eternal life springs from an indwelling God; and God cannot dwell in the heart where hatred and malice dwell. This text has been quoted to prove, that no murderer can be saved. This is not said in the text; and there have been many instances of persons who have been guilty of murder, having had deep and genuine repentance; and who, doubtless, found mercy from his hands who prayed for his murderers, Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do! It is, however, an awful test for the consideration of those who shed human blood on frivolous pretences; or in those wars which have their origin in the worst passions of the human heart.

16. Hereby perceive we the love of God] This 16th verse of this 3d chapter of John's First Epistle is, in the main, an exact counterpart of the 16th verse of the third chapter of St. John's Gospel, God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, &c. Here the apostle says, we perceive, εγνωσκαι, we have known the love of God, because He had laid down His life for us. Of God is not in the text; but it is preserved in one MS. and in two or three of the Versions; but though this does not establish its authenticity, yet rov Θεου, of God, is necessarily understood; or rov Χριστου, of Christ, as Erpen's Arabic has it; or ερωσ εις ημας, his love to us, as is found in the Syriac. A higher proof than this, of His love, Christ could not have possibly given to the children of men.

We ought to lay down our lives for the brethren] We should risk our life to save the lives of others; and we should be ready to lay down our lives, to redeem their souls, when this may appear to be a means of leading them to God.

17. But whose hath this world's good] Here is a test of this love: if we do not divide our bread with the hungry, we certainly would not lay down our life for him. Whatever love we may pretend to mankind, if we are not charitable and benevolent, we give the lie to our profession. If we have not bowels of compassion, we have not the love of God in us: if we shut up our bowels against the poor, we shut Christ out of our hearts, and ourselves out of heaven.

This world's good] Τοσ τουσ rov σαρπηρος, the life of this world; i. e. the means of life; for so βιος, is often used.—See Mark xii. 34. — Luke viii. 43. xv. 12, 30. xxi. 4. and other places.

How dwelleth the love of God in him?] That is, it cannot possibly dwell in such a person. Hard-heartedness and God's love never meet together; much less can they be associated.

18. My little children] Τετνια ηου, my beloved children, let us not love in word; in merely allowing the general doctrine of love to God and man to be just and right:—

Neither in tongue] In making professions of love, and of a charitable and humane disposition, and resting there:—but in deed; by humane and merciful acts.

And in truth] Feeling the disposition of which we speak. There is a good saying in Yalcut Rubeni, fol. 145. 4. on this point: "If love consisted in word only, then love ceaseth as soon as the word is pronounced. Such was the love between Balak and Balaam. But, if love consisteth not in word, it cannot be dissolved; such was the love of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and the rest of the patriarchs which were before them."

19. Hereby we know that we are of the truth] That we have the true religion of the Lord Jesus. And shall assure our hearts, be persuaded in our consciences, that we have the truth as it is in Jesus; as no man can impose upon himself by imagining he loves, when he does not; he may make empty professions to others; but if he love either God or man, he knows it, because he feels it; and love itself is not love; it is word or tongue. This the apostle lays down as a test of a man's Christianity; and it is the strongest and most infallible test that can be given. He that loves, feels that he does love; and he who feels that he loves God and man, has true religion; and he who is careful to show the fruits of this love, in obedience to God, and humane acts to man, gives others the fullest proof that he has the loving mind that was in Jesus.

20. If our heart condemn us] If we be conscious that our love is feigned, we shall fell inwardly condemned in professing to have what we have not. And if our heart condemn us, God is greater than our heart, for he knows every hypocritical writing and turning of the soul; He searches the heart, and tries the reins, and sees all the deceitfulness and desperate wickedness of the heart, which we cannot see; and

God is love. An infinite Fountain of benevolence and benevolence to every human being. He hates nothing that He has made. He cannot hate, because He is love. He causes His sun to rise on the evil and the good; and sends His rain on the just and the unjust. He has made no human being for perdition: nor ever rendered it impossible, by any necessitating decree, for any fallen soul to find mercy. He has given the fullest proof of His love to the whole human race, by the incarnation of His Son, who tasted death for every man. How can a decree of absolute, unconditional reprobation of the greater part, or any part of the human race, stand in the presence of such a text this I have been well observed, that although God is holy, just, righteous, &c. He is never called Loveless, Justice, &c. in the abstract, as He is here called Love. This seems to be the essence of the Divine nature; and all other attributes to be only modifications of this.

9. In this was manifested the love of God] The mission of Jesus Christ was the fullest proof that God could give, or that man could receive, of His infinite love to the world.

That we might live through Him.] The whole world was sentenced to death because of sin; and every individual was led in trespasses and sins; and Jesus came to die in the stead of the world, and to quicken every believer, that all might live to Him who died for them and rose again. This is another strong allusion to John iii. 16. God so loved the world, that He gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life. Where the reader is requested to see the note.

10. Not that we loved God] And that He was thereby induced to give His Son to be a propitiation for our sins. No: we were enemies to God, and yet Christ died for our ungodly souls. See Rom. v. 6—11. and the notes there. So it was God's love, not our merit, that induced Him to devise means that He banished might not be expelled from Him.

11. If God so loved us] Without any reason or consideration on our part, and without any desert in us; we ought also, in like manner, to love one another; and not suspend our love to a fellow creature, either on his moral worth, or his love to us. We should love one another for God's sake; and then, no inkind carriage of a brother would induce us to withdraw our love from him: for, if it have God for its motive and end, it will never fail.

12. No man hath seen God at any time] The very words, with the change of passus for rebatas, of this apostle, in his Gospel, chap. i. 18. We may feel Him, though we cannot see Him; and if we love one another, He dwelleth in us, and His love is perfected in us: it has then its full accomplishment, having moulded us according to its own nature.

13. Hereby know we, &c.] See the note on chap. iii. 24.
 14. And we have seen] Jesus Christ manifested in the flesh: see chap. i. 1, &c. And do testify, bear witness in consequence of having the fullest conviction that the Father sent His Son to be the Saviour of the world. We have had the fullest proof of this, from His doctrine and miracles which we heard and saw, during the whole time that He sojourned among men.

15. Whosoever shall confess] Much stress is laid on this confession; because the false teachers denied the reality of the incarnation: but this confession implied also such a belief in Christ as put them in possession of His pardoning mercy and indwelling Spirit.

16. God is love] See on ver. 8. He that dwelleth in love, he who is full of love to God and man, is full of God, for God is love: and where such love is, there is God, for He is the Fountain and Maintainer of it.

17. Herein is our love made perfect] By God dwelling in us, and we in Him; having cast out all the carnal mind that was enmity against Himself, and filled the whole heart with the spirit of love and purity. Thus the love is made perfect: when it thus fills the heart it has all its degrees; it is all in all; and all in every power, passion, and faculty of the soul.

May have boldness in the day of judgment] Happiness, freedom of speech, and liberty of access; seeing, in the person of our Judge, Him who has died for us, regenerated our hearts, and who Himself fills them.

As he is] Pure, holy, and loving: So are we in this world; being saved from our sins, and made like to Himself in righteousness and true holiness. No man can contemplate the day of judgment with any comfort or satisfaction but on this

16 And we have known and believed the love that God hath to us. * God is love; and * he that dwelleth in love dwelleth in God, and God in him.

17 Herein is our love made perfect, that * we may have boldness in the day of judgment: * because as he is, so are we in this world.

18 There is no fear in love; * but perfect love casteth out fear: because fear hath torment. He that feareth is * not made perfect in love.

19 We love him, because he first loved us.

20 * If a man say, I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar: for he that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen?

21 And * this commandment have we from him, That he who loveth God love his brother also.

1 John 1:16. Ch. 1:12. — John 3:17. — Rom. 10:9. Ch. 3:15. — Ver. 8. — Ver. 12. Ch. 2:24. — 4 Th. love with us — James 2:13. Ch. 2:23 & 2:18. — Ch. 2:23 — Ver. 12. — Ch. 2:4 & 2:17. — Ver. 12. — Matt. 23:23. John 12:31 & 12:12. Ch. 2:24.

ground, that the blood of Christ hath cleansed him from all sin; and that he is kept by the power of God, through faith, unto salvation. This will give him boldness in the day of judgment.

18. There is no fear in love] The man who feels that he loves God with all his heart, can never dread Him as his Judge. As he is now made a partaker of His Spirit, and carries a sense of the Divine approbation in his conscience; he has nothing of that fear that produces terror, or brings torment. The perfect love, that fulness of love which he has received, casteth out fear; removes all terror relative to this day of judgment; for it is of this that the apostle particularly speaks. And as it is inconsistent with the gracious design of God to have His followers miserable, and as he cannot be unhappy whose heart is full of the love of his God, this love must necessarily exclude this fear or terror; because that brings torment, and hence is inconsistent with that happiness which a man must have who continually enjoys the approbation of his God.

He that feareth] He who is still uncertain concerning his interest in Christ; who, although he has many heavenly drawings, and often sits with Christ some moments, on a throne of love, yet feels from the evils of his heart a dread of the day of judgment, is not made perfect in love; has not yet received the abiding witness of the Spirit that he is begotten of God; nor that fulness of love to God and man, which excludes the enmity of the carnal mind, and which it is his privilege to receive. But is the case of such a man desperate? No, it is neither desperate nor deplorable; he is in the way of salvation, and not far from the kingdom of heaven. Let such earnestly seek, and fervently believe on the Son of God: and He will soon give them another baptism of His Spirit, will purge out all the old leaven, and fill their whole souls with that love which is the fulfilling of the law. He who is not yet perfect in love may speedily become so, because God can say in a moment, I will, be thou clean; and immediately his leprosy will depart. Among men we find some that have neither love nor fear; others, that have fear without love; others, that have love and fear; and others, that have love without fear.

1. Profligates, and worldly men in general, have neither the fear nor love of God.

2. Deeply awakened and distressed penitents have the fear or terror of God without His love.

3. Babies in Christ, or young converts, have often distressing fear mixed with their love.

4. Adult Christians have love without this fear; because fear hath torment; and they are ever happy, being filled with God.—See Mr. Wesley's note on this place.

1. We must not suppose that the love of God shed abroad in the heart is ever imperfect in itself; it is only so in degree. There may be a less or greater degree of what is perfect in itself; so it is with respect to the love which the followers of God have: they may have measures or degrees of perfect love without its fulness. There is nothing imperfect in the love of God, whether it be considered as existing in Himself, or as communicated to His followers.

2. We are not to suppose that the love of God casts out every kind of fear from the soul; it only casts out that which has torment:—1. A filial fear is consistent with the highest degrees of love; and even necessary to the preservation of that grace. This is properly its guardian; and, without this, love would soon degenerate into listlessness, or presumptive boldness. 2. Nor does it cast out that fear which is so necessary to the preservation of life; that fear which leads a man to flee from danger, lest his life should be destroyed. 3. Nor does it cast out that fear which may be engendered by sudden alarm. All these are necessary to our well-being: but it destroys—1. The fear of want. 2. The fear of death; and, 3. The fear or terror of judgment. All these fears bring torment, and are inconsistent with this perfect love.

19. We love him, because he first loved us.] This is the foundation of our love to God. 1. We love Him because we find He has loved us. 2. We love Him from a sense of obligation and gratitude. 3. We love Him from the influence of His own love: from His love shed abroad in our hearts our love to Him proceeds. It is the seed whence our love springs. The verse might be rendered, Let us therefore love him because he first loved us: thus the Syriac and Vulgate.

20. If a man say, I love God, and hateth his brother] This as well as many other parts of this epistle, seems levelled against the Jews, who pretended much love to God, while they hated the Gentiles; and even some of them who were brought into the Christian church, brought this lesson with them. It required a miracle to redeem St. Peter's mind from the influence of this principle.—See Act x.

Whom he hath seen] We may have our love exerted towards our brother—1. By a consideration of his excellencies, or amiable qualities. 2. By a view of his miseries and distresses. The first will excite a love of complacency and delight; the second, a love of compassion and pity.

Whom he hath not seen] If he love not his brother, it is a proof that the love of God is not in him: as the love of God, he cannot love God; for God, through the influence of His own love; as man who hates his fellow, does not love God, not love God, has not the love of God in him, not the love of God in him, can neither love

21. This commandment have we seen] We see another; and love our neighbour as ourselves; and the love of man, can never be so loves God will love his brother; he who gives this proof that he loves God; because measure of that love, which, in its infinitude

CHAPTER V.

He that believeth is born of God, loves God and His children, and keeps His commandments, which are a Faith in Christ overcomes the world, 4, 5. The three earthly and heavenly witnesses, 6—9. He that sins in himself, 10. God has given unto us eternal life in His Son, 11, 12. The end for which St. John writes, 13—15. The sin unto death, and the sin not unto death, 16, 17. WHOEVER believeth that Jesus is the Christ is born of God: and every one that loveth him that begat, loveth him also that is begotten of him.

2 By this we know that we love the children of God, when we love God, and keep his commandments.

3 For this is the love of God, that we keep his commandments: and his commandments are not grievous.

4 For whatsoever is born of God overcometh the world: and a John 1. 12.—b Ch. 2. 23, 24 & 4. 9. 18.—c John 1. 13.—d John 13. 22.—e John 14. 10, 21, 24 & 15. 10. f John 6.—g Mir. 6. 8. Matt. 11. 33.

NOTE.—Verse 1. Whoever believeth, &c.] Expressions of this kind are to be taken in connexion with the subjects necessarily implied in them. He that believeth that Jesus is the Messiah, and confides in Him for the remission of sins, is begotten of God; and they who are pardoned and begotten of God, love Him in return for His love; and love all those who are His children.

2. By this we know that we love the children of God] Our love of God's followers, is a proof that we love God. Our love to God is the cause why we love His children; and our keeping the commandments of God, is the proof that we love Him.

3. For this is the love of God] This the love of God necessarily produces. It is vain to pretend love to God, while we live in opposition to His will.

His commandments.] To love Him with all our heart, and our neighbour as ourselves, are not grievous; are not burdensome; for no man is burdened with the duties which his own love imposes. The old proverb explains the meaning of the apostle's words, Love feels no loads. Love to God brings strength from God; through His love and His strength, all His commandments are not only easy and light, but pleasant and delightful.

On the love of God, as being the foundation of all religious worship, there is a good saying in Sohar, Erod. fol. 23. col. 91. "Rabbi Jesa said, How necessary is it that a man should love the holy blessed God! For, he can bring no other worship to God than love: and he who loves Him, and worships Him, from a principle of love, him the holy blessed God calls His beloved."

4. Whoever is born of God] Παρ το γεννητων; whoever, (the neuter for the masculine,) is begotten of God, overcometh the world. "I understand by this," says Schoettgen, "the Jewish church, or Judaism, which is often termed התורה בלא חסד hasseth, this world. The reasons which induce me to think so are, 1. Because this σας, world, denied that the Messiah was come; but the Gentiles did not oppose this principle. 2. Because he proves the truth of the Christian religion against the Jews, reasoning according to the Jewish manner; whence it is evident, that he contends not against the Gentiles, but against the Jews. The sense, therefore, is, he who p assesses the true Christian faith, can easily convict the Jewish religion of falsity." That is, he can show the vanity of their expectations, and the falsity of their glosses and prejudices. Suppose we understand by the world the evil principles and practices which are among men, and in the human heart; then the influence of God in the soul, may be properly said to overcome this: and by faith in the Son of God a man is able to overcome all that is in the world, viz. the desire of the flesh, the desire of the eye, and the pride of life.

5. He that believeth that Jesus is the Son of God] That He is the promised Messiah; that He came by a supernatural generation; and although truly man, came not by man, but by the power of the Holy Ghost in the womb of the Virgin Mary. The person who believes this, has the privilege of applying to the Lord for the benefits of the incarnation and passion of Jesus Christ, and receives the blessings which the Jews cannot have, because they believe not the Divine mission of Christ.

6. This is he that came by water and blood] Jesus was attested to be the Son of God, and promised Messiah, by water, i. e. His baptism, when the Spirit of God came down from heaven upon Him, and the voice from heaven said, This is my beloved Son in whom I am well pleased. Jesus Christ came also by blood. He shed His blood for the sins of the world; and this was in accordance with all that the Jewish prophets this is the victory that overcometh the world. 5 Who is he that overcometh the world, he that is the Son of God?

6 This is he that came by water and blood; not by water only, but by water and blood: the Spirit that beareth witness, because the Spirit and the water agree, that Jesus is the Son of God.

a John 10. 33. Ch. 3. 9. 14.—b 1 Cor. 15. 37. Ch. 4. 15.—c 1 Cor. 15. 37. & 15. 13. 1 Tim. 3. 16.—d John 1. 1. Rev. 19. 12.—e had written concerning Him. Here the apostle Spirit witness; this; that He came not by water, but by water and blood; and baptizing men in His own name, as His followers and disciples; but by blood, i. e. His death, without which the world could not be saved. He could have had no disciples. As, therefore, God witnessed His being the Son of God, at His baptism, as the same Spirit in the prophets had witnessed, should die a cruel, yet a sacrificial death: it is the Spirit of truth that beareth witness, because He is the Spirit of truth.

Perhaps St. John makes here a mental connection between Moses, and Aaron; to both of whom water, and shows His superior excellence. water—All the Israelites were baptised unto Moses in the sea, and thus became his flock; and in 1 Cor. x. 1, 2. Aaron came by blood—He is the Holy of Holies with the blood of the victim slain for him. Moses initiated the people into God by bringing them under the cloud, and the Aaron confirmed that covenant by shedding his blood; and both came as types. But Christ came by water and blood, not typically, but really: not of another, but by His own. Jesus initiates the Christian covenant by the baptism of water, and seals to them the blessings of the covenant by the blood of the atonement, thus purifying them, and purifying their souls.

Thus His religion is of infinitely greater value than that of Moses and Aaron were ministers.

It may be said also, that the Spirit bears witness by His testimony in the souls of genuine Christians, the spiritual gifts and miraculous powers bestowed on the apostles and primitive believers, are able to what St. John says in his Gospel, When the Comforter is come, the Spirit of truth shall testify of the Father, he shall testify of the Son, and shall bear witness because he have been with the Father from the beginning. This place the apostle seems to refer to, and this would naturally lead him to speak of three witnesses; the Spirit, the water, and the blood.

7. There are three that bear record] The Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit; the testimony to the Father; and the Holy Spirit; the testimony to the Father and the Son. And one in essence, and agree in the one testimony, came to do for, and give life to, the world. But it is likely this verse is not genuine. every MSS. of this epistle written before printing, one excepted, the Codex Montfortii, leges, Dublin: the others which omit this verse, are Assand and Lucet.

It is wanting in both the Syriac, all the Arabic, Sabidæ, Armenian, Savones, &c. all the ancient Versions; but the Palatine; Version many of the most ancient and correct. It is wanting also, in all the ancient Greek MSS. in most even of the Latin.

The words, as they exist in all the Greek MSS. and in the Codex Montfortii, are the following: Et tres sunt qui testantur, Spiritus, et aqua, et sanguis: et tres unum sunt.

6. This is he that came by water and blood] This is he that came by water and blood; not by water only, but by water and blood: the Spirit that beareth witness, because the Spirit and the water agree, that Jesus is the Son of God. There are three that bear witness, the Spirit, the water, and the blood.

8 And there are three that bear witness in earth, the Spirit, and the water, and the blood; and these three agree in one.

9 If we receive the witness of men, the witness of God is greater: for this is the witness of God which he hath testified of his Son.

10 He that believeth on the Son of God hath the witness in himself: he that believeth not God, hath made him a liar; because he believeth not the record that God gave of his Son.

11 And this is the record that God hath given to us eternal life, and this life is in his Son.

12 He that hath the Son hath life; and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life.

13 These things have I written unto you that believe on the Son of God, that ye may know that ye have eternal life, and that ye may believe on the name of the Son of God.

14 And this is the confidence that we have in him, that, if we ask any thing according to his will, he heareth us:

15 And if we know that he hear us, whatsoever we ask, we know that we have the petitions that we desired of him.

16 If any man see his brother sin a sin which is not unto death, he shall ask, and he shall give him life for them that sin not unto death. There is a sin unto death: I do not say that he shall pray for it.

17 All unrighteousness is sin; and there is a sin not unto death.

18 And it is the Spirit that beareth witness, because the Spirit is truth. For there are three that bear record in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost, and these three are one. And there are three that bear witness in earth, the Spirit and the water, and the blood, and these three agree in one. If we receive the witness of men, the witness of God is greater, &c.

The words that are omitted by the MSS., the above excepted; and all the Versions, the Vulgate excepted, are these: (in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Spirit, and these three are one: and there are three which bear witness in earth.)

To make the whole more clear, that every reader may see what has been added, I shall set down these verses, with the inserted words in brackets.

6. And it is the Spirit that beareth witness, because the Spirit is truth. 7. For there are three that bear record [in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost, and these three are one. 8. And there are three that bear witness in earth,] the Spirit and the water, and the blood, and these three agree in one. 9. If we receive the witness of men, the witness of God is greater, &c.

Any man may see, on examining the words, that if those included in brackets, which are wanting in the MSS. and Versions, be omitted, there is no want of sense; and as to the sense, it is complete and perfect without them; and, indeed, much more so, than with them. I shall conclude this part of the note with observing, with Dr. Dodd, "That there are some internal and accidental remarks, which may render the passage suspected; for the sentence is complete, and the sense more clear and better preserved, without it. Besides, the Spirit is mentioned, both as a witness in heaven, and on earth; so that the six witnesses are thereby reduced to five, and the equality in number, or antithesis between the witnesses in heaven and on earth, is quite taken away. Besides, what need of witnesses in heaven? No one there doubts that Jesus is the Messiah; and if it be said, that Father, Son, and Spirit, are witnesses on earth, then there are five witnesses on earth, and none in heaven; not to say that there is a little difficulty in interpreting how the Word, or the Son, can be a witness to Himself."

It may be necessary to inquire how this verse stood in our earliest English Bibles. In COVERDALE'S Bible, printed about 1535, for it bears no date, the seventh verse is put in brackets thus:

And it is the Spirit that beareth witness; for the Spirit is the truth. For there are three which bear record in heaven: the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost, and these three are one. And there are three which bear record in earth: the Spirit, water, and blood, and these three are one. If we receive, &c.

TUDAL was as critical as he was conscientious; and though he admitted the words into the text of the first edition of his New Testament printed in 1626; yet he distinguished them by a different letter, and put them in brackets as Coverdale has done; and also the words in earth, which stand in ver. 8. without proper authority, and which being enclosed, makes the text the same as in the MSS., &c.

Two editions of this version are now before me; one printed in English and Latin 4to. with the following title:

The New Testament, both in English and Latin, of Master Erasmus translation—and first printed by William Powell—the year of our Lords M.CCCC.XLVII. And the thirde year of the Kinges (Edw. VI.) moste gracious regnne.

In this edition the text stands thus:

And it is the Spirit that beareth witness, because the Spirit is truth (for there are three which bear record in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost, and these three are one.) For there are three which bear record (in earth) the Spirit, water, and blood, and these three are one. If we receive, &c.

The other printed in London, by William Tyllie, 4to. without the Latin of Erasmus in M.CCCC.XLIX. the thirde year of the reign of our most dreade Sovereigne Lorde Kyng Edwarde the Sixte, has, with a small variety of spelling, the text in the same order, and the same words included in brackets as above.

The English Bible, with the book of Common Prayer, printed by Richard Cardmarden, at Rouen in Normandy, 1568, fol. exhibits the text faithfully, but in the following singular manner:—

Vol. VI. 30

name of the Son of God; that ye may know that ye have eternal life, and that ye may believe on the name of the Son of God.

14 And this is the confidence that we have in him, that, if we ask any thing according to his will, he heareth us:

15 And if we know that he hear us, whatsoever we ask, we know that we have the petitions that we desired of him.

16 If any man see his brother sin a sin which is not unto death, he shall ask, and he shall give him life for them that sin not unto death. There is a sin unto death: I do not say that he shall pray for it.

17 All unrighteousness is sin; and there is a sin not unto death.

And it is the Spirit that beareth witness, because the Spirit is truth. (for there are three which bear records in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost; and these Three are One.) And there are three which beare record: (in earth) the Spirit, and water, and the blood; and these three are one.

The first English Bible which I have seen, where these distinctions were omitted, is that called The Bishop's Bible, printed by Jucge, fol. 1568. Since that time, all such distinctions have been generally disregarded.

Though a conscientious believer in the doctrine of the ever-blessed, holy, and undivided Trinity, and in the proper and essential divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ, which doctrines I have defended by many and even new arguments, in the course of this work, I cannot help doubting the authenticity of the text in question; and, for farther particulars, refer to the observations at the end of this chapter.

8. The Spirit, and the water, and the blood.] This verse is supposed to mean "the Spirit, in the word confirmed by miracles; the water, in baptism, wherein we are dedicated to the Son (with the Father and the Holy Spirit, typifying his spotless purity, and the inward purifying of our nature: and the blood, represented in the Lord's supper, and applied to the consciences of believers; and all these harmoniously agree in the same testimony, that Jesus Christ is the Divine, the complete, the only Saviour of the world." Mr. Wesley's Notes.

By the written word, which proceeded from the Holy Spirit, that Spirit is continually witnessing upon earth, that God hath given unto us eternal life.

By baptism, which points out our regeneration, and the renewing of the Holy Ghost, and which is still maintained as an initiatory rite in the Christian church, we have another witness on earth of the truth, certainty, importance, and efficacy, of the Christian religion. The same may be said of the blood, represented by the holy eucharist, which continues to show forth the death and atoning sacrifice of the Son of God, till He comes. See the note on verse 6.

9. If we receive the witness of men.] Which all are obliged to do; and which is deemed a sufficient testimony to truth in numberless cases. The witness of God is greater. He can neither be deceived, nor deceive; but man may deceive, and be deceived.

10. He that believeth on the Son of God.] This is God's witness to a truth, the most important and interesting to mankind. God has witnessed that whosoever believeth on his Son shall be saved, and have everlasting life; and shall have the witness of it in himself; the Spirit bearing witness with his spirit that he is a child of God. To know, to feel his sin forgiven, to have the testimony of this in the heart from the Holy Spirit Himself, is the privilege of every true believer in Christ.

11. This is the record.] The great truth to which the Spirit, the water, and the blood, bear testimony. God hath given us eternal life; a right to endless glory, and a meekness for it. And this life is in his Son. It comes by and through Him. He is its Author and its Purchaser. It is only in and through Him. No other scheme of salvation can be effectual; God has provided none other; and in such a case a man's invention must be vain.

12. He that hath the Son hath life.] As the eternal life is given to the Son of God; it follows, that it cannot be enjoyed without Him. No man can have it without having Christ; therefore, he that hath the Son, hath life; and he that hath not the Son hath not life. It is in vain to expect eternal glory, if we have not Christ in our heart. The indwelling Christ gives both a title to it, and a meekness for it. This is God's record. Let no man deceive himself here: an indwelling Christ and glory. No indwelling Christ, no glory. God's record must stand.

13. That ye may know that ye have eternal life.] I write to show your privileges; to lead you into this holy of holies; to show what believing on the Son of God is, by the glorious effects it produces; it is not a blind reliance for, but an actual enjoyment of, salvation. Christ living, working, and reigning, in the heart.

And that ye may believe.] That is, continue to believe: for Christ dwells in the heart only by FAITH; and faith lives only by LOVE; and love continues only by OBLIVION. He who as LIVES, loves; and he who LOVES, obeys. He who obeys, loves; he who loves, believes; he who believes has this witness: so himself; he who has this witness, has Christ in his heart, (the spoken of glory; and he who believes, loves, and obeys, has Christ in his heart, and is a man of prayer.

14. This is the confidence ἡπαρεια, the liberty of access and speech; that if we ask any thing according to his will; that is, which He has promised in His word; His word is a revelation of His will, in the things which concern the salvation of man. All that God has promised we are justified in expecting; and what He has promised, and we expect, we should pray for. Prayer is the language of the children of God. He who is begotten of God, speaks this language. He calls God, Abba, Father, in the true spirit of supplication.—Prayer is the language of dependance on God; where the soul is dumb, there is neither life, love, nor faith. Faith and prayer are not boldly to advance claims upon God;—we must take heed that what we ask and believe for, is agreeable to the revealed will of God. What we find promised, that we may plead.

15. And if we know that he hear us Seeing we are satisfied that He hears the prayer of faith, requesting the things which Himself has promised; we know, consequently, that we have the petitions, the answer to the petitions, that we desired of him; for He cannot deny himself; and we may consider them as sure as if we had them; and we shall have them as soon as we plead for, and need them. We are not to ask to-day, for mercy that we now need, and not receive it till to-morrow, or some future time. God gives it to him who prays, when it is needful.

16. A sin which is not unto death This is an extremely difficult passage, and has been variously interpreted. What is the sin not unto death, for which we should ask, and life shall be given to him that commits it? And what is the sin unto death, for which we should not pray?

I shall note three of the chief opinions on this subject. (1.) It is supposed that there is here an allusion to a distinction in the Jewish law where there was חַטָּאת לְמֹתָהּ chatah lemothah, "a sin unto death;" and חַטָּאת לְחַיִּים chatah lechaim, "a sin not unto death;" that is, 1. A sin, or transgression, to which the law had assigned the punishment of death; such as idolatry, incest, blasphemy, breach of the Sabbath, and the like. And, 2. A sin not unto death, i. e. transgressions of ignorance, inadvertence, &c. and such as, in their own nature, appear to be comparatively light and trivial.—That such distinctions did exist in the Jewish synagogues, both Schoettgen and Carpzovius have proved.

(2.) By the sin not unto death, for which intercession might be made; and unto death, for which prayer might not be made; we are to understand transgressions of the civil law of a particular place, some of which must be punished with death, according to the statutes; the crime admitting of no pardon; others might be punished with death, but the magistrate had the power of commuting the punishments, i. e. of changing death into banishment, &c. for reasons that might appear to him satisfactory; or at the intercession of powerful friends. To intercede, in the former case, would be useless, because the law would not relax; therefore they need not pray for it; but intercession in the latter case might be prevalent, therefore they might pray; and if they did not, the person might suffer the punishment of death. This opinion, which has been advanced by Rosenmüller, intimates, that men should feel for each other's distresses, and use their influence in behalf of the wretched; nor ever abandon the unfortunate, but where the case is utterly hopeless.

(3.) The sin unto death means a case of transgression, particularly of grievous backsliding from the life and power of godliness, which God determines to punish with temporal death; while at the same time He extends mercy to the penitent soul. The disobedient prophet, 1 Kings xiii. 1—32 is, on this interpretation, a case in point: many others occur in the history of the church, and of every religious community. The sin not unto death, is any sin which God does not choose thus to punish. This view of the subject is that taken by the late Reverend J. Wesley, in a sermon, intitled, A Call to Backsliders.—Worcks, Vol. X. pag. 92.

I do not think the passage has any thing to do with what is termed the sin against the Holy Ghost; much less with the popish doctrine of purgatory; nor with sins committed before and after baptism, the former, pardonable, the latter, unpardonable, according to some of the Fathers. Either of the last opinions, (viz. 2. and 3.) makes a good sense; and the first, (1.) is not unlikely; the apostle may allude to some maxim or custom in the Jewish church, which is not now distinctly known. However, this we know, that any penitent may find mercy through Christ Jesus; for through Him every kind of sin may be forgiven to man, except the sin against the Holy Ghost; which I have proved no man can now commit.—See the note on Matt. xii. 31, 32.

17. All unrighteousness is sin ἡ πάντα ἀδικία, every act contrary to justice:—is sin; is a transgression of the law, which condemns all injustice.

20 And we know that the Son of God is come, as an understanding, that we may know him who are in him that is true, even in his Son.

This is the true God, and eternal life.

21 Little children, keep yourselves from idols.

18. Whosoever is born—begotten of God, since spoken of adult Christians: they are cleansed, righteousness; consequently from all sin, cleanse themselves [that is, in the love of God, building up himself on his most holy faith, and Holy Ghost. And that wicked one, the devil, finds nothing of his own nature in him, or work; Christ dwelling in his heart by faith.

19. We know that we are of God Have the truth of Christianity, and of our own redemption through the death of His Son.

The whole world lieth in wickedness Ev'ry one who is in the world, is embraced in the air, where it lies fast asleep, and carnally secure, and power from its infernal fosterer. What state! And do not the actions, tempers, propensities, and maxims, of all worldly men, prove and confirm this? "In this short expression," says Mr. Wesley, "the state of the world is painted in the most lively manner on which we have in the actions, conversations, quarrels, and friendships, of worldly men." Their passions are opposed to the law of God; their passions are shallow, simulous, and false; their contracts are unsteady, and deceitful; their quarrels, puerile, ferocious; and their friendships, hollow, treacherous, and fickle. All, all, the effect of their love of the wicked one: for thus they become insensible to the love of God; and because they are of their father's nature, they will do so.

20. We know that the Son of God is come This has made His soul an offering for sin. And he who has made His soul an offering for sin, has a more eminent degree of life, and is more enjoyed before; for as He lay in the bosom of the Father, He declared Him unto us; and He hath bestowed upon us a spiritual understanding, that we may know Him, even the True God; and get eternal life from Him, in whom we are by faith, as the branch deriving all our knowledge, light, life, love, and joy from Him. And it is through this revelation we know the ever-blessed and glorious Trinity; Father, Word, and Holy Ghost, in the eternal, and ineffable Godhead.

21. Little children ἡ ταῖς ἀγαπηταῖς, beloved children with the same affectionate feeling with which a parent loves his child. Keep yourselves from idols Avoid the idolatry of the heart; not only have no false gods, but have no idols in your houses; none in your hearts. Have no object of idolatrous pictures, relics, consecrated tapers, scapulars, attending to which your minds may be divided from worshipping the infinite Spirit, in spirit and in truth.

The apostle, says Dr. Macknight, cautions against going with the heathens into the temples, to eat of their feasts upon the sacrifices of these gods; and against being present at ship which they paid them: because, by being present at that worship, as it is plain from what has written on the subject, 1 Cor. viii. 10. when we eat of the idol or god, from which he derives his name, no matter whether it be Jupiter, Jerva, Venus, or Diana; or pleasure, wealth, house, superb furniture, splendid equipage, titles, books, titles, human friendships, or any venal thing, God the supreme good, only except man's idol which prevents him from seeking ALL in God.

Wich's ends his epistle thus, My little children, keep yourselves from idols, i. e. from puppets, dolls, and such things which are esteemed all images employed in religion. They are the dolls of a spurious Christianity, the idols of religion in vanage, and dotage. Keep yourselves from such maxims! Amen, so be it! So let it be! And so it shall be, for ever and ever!

OBSERVATIONS ON THE TEXT OF THE THREE DIVINE WITNESSES.

Accompanied with two very correct fac similes of 1 John, chap. v. ver. 7, 8, and 9, as they stand in the First Edition of the New Testament, printed at Complutum, 1514, and in the Codex Montfortii, a Manuscript marked G. 57, in the Library of Trinity College, Dublin.

Παρτα καταπαζετε, το ελεος ανεργει. 1 Thes. v. 21. The seventh verse of first JOHN, chapter the fifth, has given rise to more theological disputes than any other portion of the Sacred Writings: Advocates and antagonists have arisen in every quarter of the civilised world; but the dispute has been principally confined to the Unitarians of all classes, and those called Orthodox: the former asserting that it is an interpolation, and the latter contending that it is a part of the original text of St. John. It is asserted that (one excepted, which shall be noticed by and by,) all the Greek MSS. written before the invention of printing, omit the passage in dispute. How the seventh and eighth verses stand in these, may be seen in the following view, where the words included between brackets, are those which are wanting in the MSS.

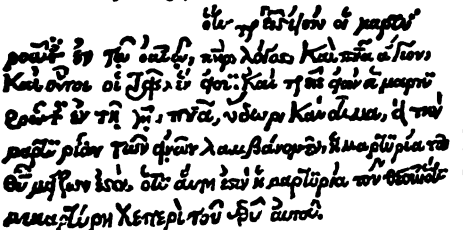

Οτι τρεις εστιν ο μαρτυρουντες εν τω ουρανω, ο πατηρ, ο υιος, και το αγιον πνευμα: και ουτοι, οι τρεις εν εστι. Και τρεις εστιν ο μαρτυρουντες εν τη γη εν ανθρωποις, και το εδωρα, και το εσπας: και οι τρεις ειναι εν εστι.

Of all the MSS. yet discovered which contain this epistle, amounting to one hundred and twelve; three only, two of which are of no authority, have the text, viz.

- 1. The Codex Guelphobrytanus G. which is demonstrably a MS. of the seventeenth century, for it contains the Latin translation of Beza, written by the same hand, and therefore of no use or importance in sacred criticism.
2. The Codex Ravianus, or Berolinensis, which is a forgery, and only a copy of the Greek text in the Complutensian Polyglott, printed in 1514; and so close an imitation of it, that it copies even its typographical errors; hence, and from the similarity of the letters, it appears to have been forged, that it might pass for the original MS. from which the Complutensian text was taken. In this MS. some various readings are inserted from the margin of Stevens's edition of 1650.

3. The Codex Montfortii, or Codex Dubliniensis, cited by Erasmus, under the title of Codex Britannicus, in Trinity College, Dublin. This may be said to be the only genuine MS. which contains this text; as no advocate of the sacred doctrine contained in the disputed passage would wish to lay any stress whatever on such evidence as the two preceding ones afford. Michaelis roundly asserts, Vol. IV. page 417. of his Introductory Lectures, that this MS. was written after the year 1500. This, I scruple not to affirm, is a perfectly unguarded assertion, and what no man can prove. In 1791, I examined this MS. myself; and though I thought it to be comparatively modern, yet I had no doubt that it existed before the invention of printing, and was never written with an intention to deceive. I am rather inclined to think it the work of an unknown bold critic, who formed a text from one or more MSS. in conjunction with the Vulgate, and was by no means sparing of his own conjectural emendations; for it contains many various readings which exist in no other MS. yet discovered. But how far the writer has in any place, faithfully copied the text of any ancient MS. is more than can be determined. To give the reader a fair view of this subject, I here subjoin what I hope I may call a perfect fac simile of the seventh and eighth verses, as they exist in this MS. copied by the accurate hand of the Rev. Dr. Barrett, the present learned Librarian of Trinity College.

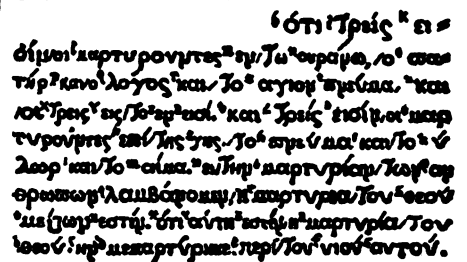

Fac simile of 1 John v. 7, 8, and 9. From the Codex Montfortii in Trinity College, Dublin.

When I examined the original myself, though I took down a transcript, yet I neglected to take a fac simile. That no mistake might be made in a matter of so much importance, I got a fac simile, and after it was engraved, had it collated with the MS. by Dr. Barrett himself, and the plate finished according to his last corrections; so that I hope it may be said every dot and every tittle belonging to the text, are here fairly and faithfully represented; nothing being added, and nothing omitted. I have examined this MS. since, and have not been able to detect any inaccuracy in my fac simile. To it I have annexed a perfect fac simile of the same words, as they stand in the Complutensian Polyglott, which the curious reader will be glad to see associated with the other, as they are properly the only Greek authorities on which the authenticity of the text of the Three Witnesses depends.

Fac simile of 1 John v. 7, 8, and 9, from the Editio Princeps of the Greek Testament, printed at Complutum, in 1514.

It may be necessary to observe, First, That the five first lines of the fac simile of the text in the Complutensian edition are at the top of the opposite page to that on which the other four lines are found. The alphabetical letters, mingled with the Greek text, are those which refer to the corresponding words in the Latin text, printed in a parallel column in the Complutensian Polyglott, and marked with the same letters, to ascertain more easily the corresponding Greek and Latin words, for the benefit, I suppose, of learners. The column containing the Latin text, which is that of the Vulgate, is not introduced here, being quite unnecessary. Secondly—The sixth and seventh lines of the fac simile of the Codex Montfortii belong to the second page of that leaf on which the other five lines are written.

This MS. is a thick duodecimo written on paper, without folios. There is an inscription in it in these words, Sicut Thomas Clementis, olim fratris Freyhe. On this inscription Dr. Barrett remarks: "It appears Freyhe was a Franciscan; and I find in some blank leaves in the book these words written, (by the same hand, in my opinion, that wrote the MS.) λέγει παπας φραγκισταν; by the latter, I understand the founder of that order." If St. Francis of Assisi be here meant, who was the founder of the order of Franciscans, and the inscription be written by the same who wrote the MS., then the MS. could not have been written before the thirteenth century, as St. Francis founded his order in 1206, and died in 1226, and consequently proves that the MS. could not have been written in the eleventh century, as Mr. Martin of Utrecht, and several others, have imagined.

Much stress has been laid on the dots over the ι and ς which frequently appear in this MS. Montfaucon has observed, Palaeographia Graeca, pag. 33, that such dots were in use a thousand years ago; hence the advocates of the antiquity of the Codex Montfortii have inferred, that this MS. must have been written at least in the tenth or eleventh century. But as these are found in modern MSS. (see Palaeog. pag. 324. 323.) they are therefore no proof of antiquity. In Michaelis's Introduction, Vol. II. pag. 286, where he is describing the MSS. of the Greek Testament, he gives the text in question as it is supposed to exist in the Codex Montfortii, in which two dots appear over every iota and upsilon in the whole five lines there introduced; but, on comparing this of Michaelis with the fac simile here produced, the reader will at once perceive that the arrangement is false, and the dotting egregiously inaccurate. Deceived by this false representation Dr. Marsh, (now bishop of Llandaff,) in his notes on the passage, pag. 754. observes, "That no MS. written in small characters, before the twelfth century, has these dots. That a MS. written in the twelfth century has these dots sometimes on the iota, but never on the upsilon; but MSS. written in the fourteenth century have these dots on both letters, but not in all cases. Now as these letters are dotted always in the Codex Montfortianus, but not always in the MSS. of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, and still less often in those of the twelfth century, we may infer that the Codex Montfortianus is at least as modern as the fifteenth century."

On this quotation I beg leave to make a few remarks. Dr. Marsh says, "That no MS. written in small letters, previous to the twelfth century, has these dots." This excellent critic has only to consult the Palaeographia Graeca, pag. 293. in which he will find No. 1. a fac simile of one of the Colbert MSS. (No. 4964.) written A. D. 1022, where the iota appears thrice dotted;—and in No. 2. on the same page, another fac simile of a MS. written A. D. 1045, the iota is dotted in the word ιων.—Ibid. page 293. (No. 7.) a MS. written in 988, has the iota twice dotted in the word Ιουμυ.—Ibid. pag. 275. (No. 2.) a MS. of the ninth or beginning of the tenth century, has the iota dotted in εμας;—and in No. 3. a specimen of the Codex Regius, (No. 2271,) written A. D. 914, the iota is dotted in Genes.—Ibid. pag. 271, (No. 4,) written about 890, the iota is dotted in Levitic. and in Spec. V. in the word rota. See also Ibid. pag. 320, No. 3. another of the Colbert MSS. (4111,) written A. D. 1236, where the iota is dotted seven times. All these specimens are taken from MSS. written in small characters; and, as the dates show, (the last excepted,) long before the twelfth century. As to these dots being more frequent in manuscripts of the fifteenth than those of the twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth centuries, I cannot say much: it is certain they became more frequent towards the fourteenth century than they were in the twelfth; and yet this was not a general case. In two well written manuscripts now before me, one of which I suppose to be of the fourteenth century, and the other of the fifteenth, these dots often occur, but they are by no means regular. I have noticed several pages in the oldest manuscript where they occur but once; and in other pages they may be met with ten or twelve times. On the contrary, in the more recent manuscript, whole pages occur without one of them; and where they do occur, they are much less frequent than in the former. So that it rather appears from this evidence, that they began to disappear in the fifteenth century. Dr. Marsh, misled by the specimen in Michaelis, Vol. II. pag. 285, says, "The letters in question are always dotted in the Codex Montfortiius." By referring to the fac simile, the reader will be able at once to correct this mistake. The iota in the fac simile occurs thirty times, and is dotted only in five instances: and the upsilon occurs nineteen times, and is dotted only in seven.

But arguments, for or against the age of any MS. on account of such dots, are futile in the extreme; as the most ancient MSS. have them not only on the iota and upsilon, but upon several other letters, as may be seen in the Codex Alexandrinus, the Codex Rescriptus, published by Dr. Barrett, and the Codex Beza: in the latter of which, they seem to occur more frequently than they do even in the Codex Montfortii. On the evidence of these dots, Mr. Martin, of Utrecht, supposed the Dublin manuscript to be as old as the eleventh century; and, on the same evidence, Dr. Marsh argues, "That it is at least as modern as the fifteenth." Both these judgments are too hastily formed: medio tutissimus ibis, is the best counsel in such a case; the manuscript is more likely to have been a production of the thirteenth, than of either the eleventh, or fifteenth. The former date is as much too high, as the latter is too low: the zeal of the critics for and against this controverted text, having carried them, in my opinion, much too far on either side.

In comparing the writing of the Codex Montfortii, with the different specimens given by Montfaucon in the Palaographia Græca, it appears to approach nearest to that on p. 320, No. 4, which was taken from one of the Colbert manuscripts, (No. 845,) written in the year of our Lord 1272, which, I am led to think, may be nearly about the date of the Codex Montfortii; but, on a subject of so much difficulty, where critics of the first rank have been puzzled, I should be sorry to hazard any more than an opinion, which the reader is at liberty to consider either true or false, as may seem best to his own judgment.

Though a conscientious advocate for the sacred doctrine contained in the disputed text, and which, I think, expressly enough revealed in several other parts of the Sacred Writings, I must own the passage in question stands on a most dubious foundation. All the Greek manuscripts, (the Codex Montfortii alone excepted,) omit the passage; so do all the ancient Versions, the Vulgate excepted: but in many of the ancient MSS. even of this version, it is wanting. There is one in the British Museum, of the tenth or eleventh century, where it is added by a more recent hand in the margin; for it is wanting also in the text. It is also variously written in those manuscripts which retain it. This will appear more plainly by comparing the following extracts, taken from four manuscripts of the Vulgate in my own possession:

1. — Quoniam tres sunt qui testimonium dant in celo, Pater, Verbum, et Spiritus Sanctus, et hii tres unum sunt. Et tres sunt qui testimonium dant in terra, Spiritus, Sanguis, et Aqua. This is the same with the text in the Complutensian Polyglot: only aqua is placed before sanguis.
2. — Quoniam tres sunt qui testimonium dant in terra, Spiritus, Aqua, et Sanguis, et tres unum sunt. Et tres sunt qui testimonium dant in celo, Pater Verbum, et Spiritus Sanctus, et hii tres unum sunt.
3. — Quoniam tres sunt qui testimonium dant in celo, Pater et Filius, et Spiritus Sanctus, et hii tres unum sunt. Et tres sunt qui testimonium dant in terra, Spiritus, Aqua, et Sanguis.
4. — Quoniam tres sunt qui testimonium dant in terra, Spiritus, Aqua, et Sanguis; et hii tres unum sunt. Et tres sunt qui testimonium dant in celo, Pater et Filius, et Spiritus Sanctus, et hii tres unum sunt.
5. — Quoniam tres sunt qui testimonium dant in terra, Spiritus, Aqua, et Sanguis, et tres sunt qui testimonium perhibent in celo, Pater Verbum, et Spiritus Sanctus, et hii tres unum sunt.

This last I took from an ancient manuscript in Marsh's library, St. Patrick's, Dublin.

In what has been denominated the Editto Princeps of the Latin Bible, and supposed to have been printed between 1455 and 1468, the text stands thus: Quoniam tres testimonium dant in celo, Pater Verbum, et Spiritus et hii tres unum sunt. Et tres sunt qui testantur in terra, Spiritus, Aqua, et Sanguis, et tres unum sunt. In the Bible printed by Fradin and Pinara fol. the text is the same with No. 2, only instead of unum dant, it reads dant testimonium.

The reader will observe, that in Nos. 2, 4, and 5, the verse is put before the eventh, and that 3 and 4 instead of verbum. But both these readings are ancient English manuscript of my own, which Bible from the beginning of Proverbs to the end of the Testament, written on thick, strong vellum, prior to most of those copies attributed to Wickliffe.

For three ben that given witnessing Fadir, the Word, or Son, and the and these three ben on. And three ben witnessing in erthe, the Spirit, Water, and these three ben on.

As many suppose the Complutensian editors of a manuscript, or manuscripts, which contained the passage, I judge it necessary to add the note which, (though not clearly expressed,) it appears they either had in script, or wished to have it thought they had seen; the note is curious, and shows us how this dispute was read in the most approved manuscripts extant in the thirteenth century, when St. Thomas wrote, from whom this note is taken. The following is the whole note literatim:

"Sanctus Thomas, in expositione secundæ sumæ Trinitatis et fidei Catholice, tractatus contra Abbatem Joachim; et tres sunt qui dant in celo, Pater, Verbum, et Spiritus Sanctus litteram perbæ sequentia. Et ad instantiam trium personarum subditur. Et hii tres Quodquidem dicitur propter esse unitatis Joachim perbæ trahere volens ad unitatis consensus, inducibat consequentem auctoritatem subditur ibidem: et tres sunt qui testimonium dant Spiritus: Aqua: et Sanguis. Et in quibus additur; et hii tres unum sunt. Sed hoc in veribus non habetur: sed dicitur esse appositum arrianis ad perturbandum intellectum sanæ præmissæ de unitate essentie trium personarum Thomas ubi supra."

If the Complutensian editors translated the Greek from the Vulgate; it is strange they made of it in this place, where they had so fair an opportunity of speaking so very pointedly on the doctrine in forming a note for the occasion, which is indeed logical note in the whole volume. It is again to be noted that when these editors found an important variation in any of their Greek manuscripts, they noted it; an example occurs 1 Cor. xiii. 3. and another why was it, then, that they took no notice of a variation as the text of the Three Witnesses, had no manuscript in which it was contained; to deceive the reader, and could they possibly in knavery could never be detected? If they designed they took the most effectual way to conceal the supposed they destroyed the manuscripts for printed their text; for the story of their being to a rocket-maker, (see Michaelis, vol. ii. p. 440) so exceptionable, and unlike the truth, that I there should be found any person who would credit. The substance of this story, as given in 1784, went to Alcalá on purpose to discover it was informed, that a very illiterate librarian, at years before, who wanted room for some new ancient vellum MSS. as useless parchments, who dealt in fire-works, as materials for making it is farther added, that "Martinez, a man of letters, soon after they were sold, and hastened to tread them down from destruction; but it was too late already destroyed, except a few scattered leaves now in the library." On the whole of this account to ask the following questions:—Is it likely that a man of so important a trust, should be in person so ignorant, that he could not know a Hebrew MS. from a piece of useless parchment? Could he be entrusted to make a purchase of new books for which he wanted room? or, if they were the trustees of the library, is it likely they would classification and arrangement of these to such a librarian is said to be? Would such a librarian any other, be permitted to dispose of any part which he might deem useless? If Mr. Martinez, soon after they were sold, and hastened to resell, likely that almost the whole should have been sold before he got to the place; when, were they were so many as to cost originally 4000 l. even the price which the librarian sold them for, considerable, that it had to be paid at two different times? Was it possible that in so short a time, these could have already considered the whole? The whole account is so improbable, that I cannot help saying, Credat Judæus Apella—non ego.

It is more likely the manuscripts were destroyed at first, or that they are still kept secret, to prevent the forgery (if it be one) of the text of the Three Witnesses from being detected; or the librarian already mentioned, may have converted them to his own use. If they were not destroyed by the Complutensian editors, I should not be surprised if the same manuscripts should come to light in some other part of the world, if not in the Alcala library itself.

It is worthy of remark, that Lesher never admitted the text of the Three Witnesses into any of the editions of his translation: it is true, it was afterward added, but never during his lifetime. On this, Professor Michaelis makes the following observation: "It is unbecoming in the extreme for one Protestant to condemn another for rejecting 1 John v. 7. since it was rejected by the author of our reformation." Any conscientious Trinitarian may sincerely hesitate to receive the feeble supporting evidence of this disputed text, in confirmation of a doctrine, which he finds it his duty and interest to receive, on the unambiguous testimony of various other passages in the book of God.

Professor Griesbach, who does not appear to be an enemy to the doctrine, and who has carefully and critically examined all the evidences and arguments, pro and con, has given up the text, as utterly defenceless; and thinks that to plead for its authenticity, is dangerous. "For if," says he, "a few dubious, suspicious, and modern evidences, with such weak arguments as are usually adduced, are sufficient to demonstrate the authenticity of a reading, then there remains no longer any criterion by which the spurious may be distinguished from the genuine: and, consequently, the whole text of the New Testament is unascertained and dubious."

Much stress has been laid on Bengel's defence of this text: Michaelis has considered the strength of his arguments in a candid and satisfactory manner.

"The ancient writers which Bengel has produced in favour of 1 John v. 7. are all Latin writers: for he acknowledges that no Greek father has ever quoted it. Now, if no objection could be made to Bengel's witnesses, and the most ancient Latin fathers had quoted in express terms the whole of the controverted passage, their quotations would prove nothing more than that the passage stood in their Manuscripts of the Latin version; and, therefore, that the Latin version contained it in a very early age. But it will appear, upon examination, that their evidence is very unsatisfactory. The evidence of Tertullian, the oldest Latin writer who has been quoted in favour of 1 John v. 7. is contained in the following passage of his treatise against Praxeas, Book I. chap. 25. Ita consensus Patris in Filio et Filii in Patre, tres. Ita consensus, alterum ex altero, qui tres unum sunt, non unum, quomodo dictum est, Ego et Pater unum sumus. Hence it is inferred, that because tres unum sunt stand at present in the Latin version, 1 John v. 7. these words stood there likewise in the time of Tertullian, and that Tertullian borrowed them from the Latin version. But this inference is wholly without foundation: for Tertullian does not produce these words as a quotation, and the bare circumstance of his using the expression tres unum sunt, will not prove that he found that expression in the Bible. On the contrary, it is evident from what immediately follows, that 1 John v. 7. was not contained in the Latin version when Tertullian wrote. For in proof of this assertion, qui tres unum sunt, he immediately adds, quomodo dictum est, Ego et Pater unum sumus, which is a quotation from St. John's Gospel, chap. v. 20. Now, as this quotation relates only to the Father and the Son, and not to the Holy Ghost, surely Tertullian would not have proved the unity of the Trinity from this passage, if 1 John v. 7. which is much more to the purpose, had then been contained in any Latin manuscript, with which he was acquainted. At any rate, the mere use of the words tres unum sunt, affords no argument in favour of the controverted passage; and if any inference is to be deduced from their agreement with our present copies of the Latin version in 1 John v. 7. it is this, that the person, who afterwards fabricated this passage, retained an expression which had been sanctioned by the authority of Tertullian. So much for the evidence of this Latin father, the only writer of the second century, to whom appeal has been made.

"Of the Latin fathers who lived in the third century, Cyprian alone has been produced as evidence in favour of 1 John v. 7. From the writings of Cyprian two passages have been quoted as proofs that 1 John v. 7. was contained in his manuscript of the Latin version. The one is from his epistle to Jubaianus where Cyprian writes thus: *Si baptizari quis apud hæreticum potuit, utique et remissionem consecutus est, et sanctificatus est, et templum Dei factus est; quæro cuius Dei? Si Creatoris, non potuit, qui in eum non credidit; si Christi, non hujus potest fieri templum qui negat Deum Christum: si Spiritus Sancti, cum tres unum sint, quomodo Spiritus Sanctus placatus esse et potest, qui aut Patris aut Filii inimicus est? Here it must be observed, that the words cum tres unum sint, though inserted in the later editions of Cyprian's works, are not contained in that edition which was published by Erasmus: and even if they were genuine, they will prove nothing more than the same words just quoted from *Tertul- lian. The other passage, which is much more to the purpose, is in Cyprian's treatise, De Unitate Ecclesie, where Cyprian writes thus: Dicit Dominus, Ego et Pater unum sumus: iterum de Patre et Filio, et Spiritu Sancto, scriptum est, et tres unum sunt. Now, admitting that the words et tres unum sunt, were quoted by Cyprian from 1 John v. 7. I seriously ask every impartial Judge, whether a passage found in no ancient Greek manuscript, quoted by no Greek father, and contained in no other ancient version than the Latin, is therefore to be pronounced genuine, merely because one Latin father of the three first centuries, who was bishop of Carthage, where the Latin version only was used, and where Greek was unknown, has quoted it? Under these circumstances should we conclude, that the passage stood originally in the Greek autograph of St. John? Certainly not: for the only inference which could be deduced from Cyprian's quotation would be this, that the passage had been introduced into the Latin version so early as the third century.

"The preceding answer is sufficient to invalidate Cyprian's authority in establishing the authenticity of 1 John v. 7. on the supposition that Cyprian really quoted it: but that he did so, is more than any man can prove. The words tres unum sunt, are contained not only in the seventh, but also in the eighth verse, which is a part of the ancient and genuine text of St. John; and therefore it is at least possible, that Cyprian took them not from the seventh, but from the eighth verse. It is true that he says, these words are written of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost; whereas tres unum sunt, in the eighth verse, relates only to the Spirit, the water, and the blood. But it must be observed, that the Latin Fathers interpreted spiritus, aqua, et sanguis, not literally, but mystically; and some of them really understood by these words, Pater, Filius, et Spiritus Sanctus, taking aqua in the sense of Pater, sanguis in the sense of Filius, and spiritus in the sense of Spiritus Sanctus.

"This is expressly asserted by Eucherius in his Questiones N. T. Difficiliores; for, after having quoted 1 John v. 8. thus, Tria sunt, quæ testimonium perhibent, aqua, sanguis, et spiritus: he adds, non after, plures tamen hic ipse interpretatione mysticè intelligere Trinitatem; aqua Patrem, sanguine, Christum, spiritus, Spiritum Sanctum manifestare. But if Cyprian really thought, that aqua, sanguis, et spiritus, 1 John v. 8. denoted Pater, Filius, et Spiritus Sanctus, he might say of tres unum sunt, ver. 8. that it was written, de Patre, et Filio, et Spiritu Sancto. And that he actually did so, that he quoted not ver. 7. but understood ver. 8. mystically, appears from the following passage of Facundus, who lived in the neighbourhood of Carthage, and consequently used the same Latin version as Cyprian. Johannes Apollinus in epistola sua de Patre, et Filio, et Spiritu Sancto, sic dicit: Tres sunt qui testimonium dant in terra, spiritus, aqua, et sanguis, et hi tres unum sunt: in spiritu significans Patrem, &c. Quod Johannes Apollinus testimonium beatus Cyprianus, in epistola, supra libris, quem de Trinitate scripsit, de Patre, et Filio, et Spiritu Sancto, dictum intelligit. Facundus then quotes the words of Cyprian, which are the subject of our present inquiry. From the preceding passage it is manifest that 1 John v. 7. was unknown to Facundus; for he proves the doctrine of the Trinity by a mystical interpretation of ver. 8. and appeals to the authority of Cyprian, who, he says, gave the same interpretation. But if 1 John v. 7. was unknown to Facundus, who lived in the same country as Cyprian, used the same Latin version, and wrote almost three centuries later, it is incredible that 1 John v. 7. was already introduced in the Latin manuscripts which Cyprian used. Consequently we must conclude that the assertion of Facundus is true, and that the words of Cyprian contain not a quotation from 1 John v. 7. but a mystical application of 1 John v. 8. This is further confirmed by Augustinus, who was likewise an African bishop, lived a hundred years later than Cyprian and still knew nothing of 1 John v. 7. for he has never quoted this passage, not even where he speaks of the Trinity, but he has mystically applied the eighth verse."—Michaelis, Vol. VI. p. 420.

The Greek writers who have not quoted this verse, though several of them wrote professedly on the Deity of Christ, and on the Trinity, are the following:

The writers that have quoted it are comparatively recent, or spurious; for those of any note, which have been supposed, from certain expressions in their works, to have had reference to this verse, have been proved by learned men to have had no such text in view. A great and good man has said, that "the seventh verse, in conjunction with the sixth and eighth, has been quoted by Tertullian, Cyprian, and an uninterrupted train of Fathers." But a more incautious assertion was never made, as the preceding list will prove: and the evidence on the subject I have most carefully examined. Bengel, who was an excellent critic and a good man, endeavoured to defend it, but without success; and Michaelis demonstrated its spuriousness from Bengel's five concessions. Knittel has defended its authenticity with much critical acumen: Hexæus with great sagacity; David Martin, of Utrecht, with much honest simplicity; and Dean Travis with abundance of zeal, without much knowledge of the critical bearings of the subject. Socinians need not glory that it is indefensible, and that honest Trinitarians give it up: for the sacred doctrine which it appears to express is diffused through every part of the Scriptures; and is as inexpugnable as a rock of adamant; and will live and prevail in the church of Christ while sun and moon endure, and till time shall be swallowed up in eternity.

SUMMARY of the whole evidence relative to the THREE HEAVENLY WITNESSES, 1 John v. 7.

1. ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTEEN Greek MSS. are extant, containing the First Epistle of John; and the text in question is wanting in 112. It only exists in the Codex Montfortii, (a comparatively recent MS.) already described. The Codex Bezaevianus, in the Royal Library at Berlin, is a transcript taken from the Complutensian Polyglot.
2. All the GREEK fathers omit the verse, though many of them quote both ver. 6. and ver. 8. applying them to the Trinity, and Divinity of Christ, and the Holy Spirit; yea, and endeavour to prove the doctrine of the Trinity from ver. 7. and ver. 8. without referring to any such verse as the 7th, which, had it existed, would have been a more positive proof, and one that could not have been overlooked.

3. The first place the verse appears in Greek, is in the Greek translation of the Acts of the Council of Lateran, held A. D. 1215.

4. Though it is found in many Latin copies; yet it does not appear that any written previously to the reformation contains it.

5. The Latin Fathers do not quote it, even when it would have greatly strengthened their arguments; and when, had it existed, it might have been most naturally expected.

6. Vigilius, bishop of Tippessa, at the conclusion of the fifth century, is the first who seems to have referred expressly to the three heavenly Witnesses: but his quotation does not agree with the present text, either in words or in sense; and besides, he is a writer of very little credit, nor does the place alleged appear, to learned men, to be genuine.

7. The Latin writers who do refer to the Three heavenly Witnesses vary greatly in their quotations: the more ancient placing the eighth verse before the seventh; and very many omitting, after the earthly witnesses, the clause these three are one. Others who insert these three are one, add in Christianus—others use different terms.

8. It is wanting in all the ancient Versions, the Falset excepted: but the more ancient copies of this have it not; and those which have it vary greatly among themselves, as may be seen in the specimens already produced.

9. It is wanting in the first edition of Erasmus A. B. 1516 which is properly the editio princeps of the Greek text.

It is wanting also in his second edition 1519; but he added it in the third from the Codex Montfortii.

It is wanting in the editions of Aldus, Orbellian, Optellus, &c.

It is wanting in the German translation of LUTHER, and in all the additions of it published during his lifetime.

It is inserted in our early English translations, but with marks of doubtfulness, as has already been shown.

10. In short, it stands on no authority sufficient to substantiate any part of a revelation, professing to have come from God.

See Griesbach's Dissertation on this verse at the end of the second volume of his Greek text. Harle et Londini, 1818.

In defence of this verse, see "Archdeacon Travis's Letters to Gibbon," and on the other side, "Professor Parsons's answer to Travis." The latter has left nothing farther to be said on the subject, either in vindication or reply.

PREFACE TO THE SECOND EPISTLE OF JOHN.

THE authority of the First Epistle of John being established, little need be said concerning either the second or third, if we regard the language and the sentiment only; for these are so fully in accord with the first, that there can be no doubt that he who wrote one wrote all the three. But it must not be concealed that there were doubts entertained in the primitive church that the two latter were not canonical. And so late as the days of Eusebius, who lived in the fourth century, they were ranked among those writings which were then termed apocryphes, not received by all, or contradicted, because not believed to be the genuine productions of the apostle John.

It is very likely that, being letters to private persons, they had for a considerable time been kept in the possession of the families to which they were originally sent; and only came to light perhaps long after the death of the apostle, and the death of the Elect Lady or Kyria, and Gaius or Caius, to whom they were addressed. When first discovered, all the immediate vouchers were gone; and the church of Christ, that was always on its guard against imposture, and especially in relation to writings professing to be the work of apostles, hesitated to receive them into the number of canonical Scriptures, till it was fully satisfied that they were divinely inspired. This extreme caution was of the utmost consequence to the Christian faith; for, had it been otherwise, had any measure of what is called credulity prevailed, the church would have been inundated with spurious writings: and the genuine faith greatly corrupted, if not totally destroyed.

The number of apocryphal Gospels, Acts of Apostles, and epistles, which were offered to the church in the earliest ages of Christianity is truly astonishing: we have the names of at least seventy-five Gospels, which were offered to, and rejected by the church; besides Acts of Peter, Acts of Paul and Thecla, Third Epistle to the Corinthians, Epistle to the Laodiceans, Book of Enoch, &c. some of which are come down to the present time, but are convicted of forgery by the sentiment, the style, and the doctrine.

The suspicion, however, of forgery, in reference to the Second Epistle of Peter, second and third of John, Jude, and the Apocalypse, was so strong, that in the third century, when the Peshito Syriac Version was made, these books were omitted; and have not since been received into that Version to the present day; which is the Version still used in the Syrian churches.

But the later Syriac Version, which was made A. D. 634 and is called the Philoxenian, from Philoxenus, bishop of Beroopolis, under whose direction it was formed, from the Greek, by his rural bishop, Polycarp, and was afterward carried out and published by Thomas of Cherket, in 616, contains them, as well as all the other canonical books of the New Testament.

From the time that the language, sentiments, and doctrine of these two epistles were critically examined, no doubt was entertained of their authenticity; and at present they are received by the whole Christian church throughout the world: for, although they are not in the ancient Syriac Version, they are in the Philoxenian; and concerning their authenticity I believe the Syrian churches have at present no doubts.

Dr. Lardner observes, that the first epistle was received as quoted by Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna, contemporary with the apostle; by Papias, who himself had been a disciple of St. John; by Irenæus, Clement of Alexandria, Origen, and many others. The second epistle is quoted by Irenæus, was received by Clement of Alexandria, mentioned by Origen and Dionysius of Alexandria; is quoted by Alexander, bishop of Alexandria. All the three epistles were received by Athanasius; by Cyril of Jerusalem; by the Council of Laodicea; by Epiphanius; by Jerome; by Ruffinus; by the third council of Carthage; by Augustin; and by all those authors who received the same canon of the New Testament that we do. All the epistles are in the Codex Alexandrinus, in the catalogues of Gregory of Nazianzen, &c. &c.

Thus we find, they were known and quoted at a very early period; and have been received as genuine by the most respectable fathers, Greek and Latin, of the Christian church. Their being apparently of a private nature might have prevented their more general circulation at the beginning, kept them for a considerable time unknown, and prevented them from being reckoned canonical. But such a circumstance as this, cannot operate in the present times.

As to the time in which this epistle was written, it is very uncertain. It is generally supposed to have been written at Ephesus between A. D. 80 and 90; but of this there is no proof: nor are there any data in the epistle itself, to lead to any probable conjecture relative to this point. I have placed it A. D. 86; but would not wish to pledge myself to the correctness of that date.

The apostle's address to a Christian matron and her children, 1-3. He rejoices to find that certain of her family had received, and continued to adorn the truth; and he exhorts them to continue to love one another according to the commandment of Christ, 4-6. And particularly cautions them against deceivers, and to be watchful that they might not lose the benefit of what they had received, 7, 8. The necessity of abiding in the doctrine of Christ, 9. He cautions them against receiving, or in any way forwarding, those who did not bring the true doctrine of Christ, 10, 11. Excuses himself from writing more largely, and purposes to pay her and family a visit shortly, 12, 13. [A. M. cir. 4069. A. D. cir. 86. An. Imp. Flavii Domitiani Cæs. Augusti 5.]

2 For the truth's sake, which dwelleth in us, and shall be with us for ever.

3 Grace be with you, mercy, and peace, from God the Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of the Father, in truth and love.

4 I rejoiced greatly that I found of thy children walking in truth, as we have received a commandment from the Father.

5 And now I beseech thee, lady, not as though I wrote a new commandment unto thee, but that which we had from the beginning, that we love one another.

NOTES.—Verse 1. The elder John the apostle who was now a very old man, generally supposed to be about ninety; and therefore he uses the term προσβυτερος, presbyter, or elder, not as the name of an office, but as designating his advanced age. He is allowed to have been the oldest of all the apostles, and to have been the only one who died a natural death.

This title led some of the ancients to attribute this epistle, to a person called John the Presbyter, a member of the church at Ephesus; and not to John the apostle. But this is a groundless supposition.

The elect lady Ελεγκρη Κυρια. An Κυρια, Kyria, may be the feminine of Κυριος, Kyrios, lord, therefore it may signify lady; and so several, both ancients and moderns, have understood it. But others have considered it the proper name of a woman, Kyria, and that this is a very ancient opinion, is evident from the Peshito Syriac, the oldest version we have, which uses it as a proper name Ιουδα κυρια, as does also the Arabic MS. horæ.

Some have thought that Eclecta, was the name of this matron; from the word, εκλεκτα, which we translate elect, and which here signifies the same as excellent, eminent, honourable, or the like. Others think that a particular church is intended, which some suppose to be the church at Jerusalem, and that the elect sister, ver. 13, means the church at Ephesus; but these are conjectures which appear to me to have no good ground. I am satisfied that no metaphor is here intended; that the epistle was sent to some eminent Christian matron, not far from Ephesus; who was probably deaconess of the church; who, it is likely, had a church at her house; or at whose house the apostles, and travelling evangelists, frequently preached and were entertained. This will appear more probable in the course of the notes.

Whom I love in the truth] Whom I love as the Christian religion requires us to love one another.

And not I only] She was well known in the churches; many had witnessed or heard of her fidelity, and pertook of her hospitality; so that she had a good report of all Christians in that quarter.

2 For the truth's sake] On account of the Gospel. Which dwelleth in us] By the grace which it has proclaimed.

And shall be with us] For God will preserve not only the Christian religion, but its truth, all its essential doctrines, for ever. And they that abide in the truth, shall go whither that truth leads; i. e. to glory. The Armenian has a strange reading here. "For the truth's sake which dwelleth in us," because it is also with you; and ye shall be with us for ever. But this is supported by no other version; nor by any MS.

3 Grace be with you] This is addressed to her, her household, and probably that part of the church which was more immediately under her care.

The Son of the Father] The apostle still keeps in the miraculous conception of Christ; a thing which the Gnostics absolutely denied—a doctrine which is at the ground-work of our salvation.

4 That I found of thy children walking in truth] I have already supposed this Christian matron to be mother of a family, probably a widow, for no mention is made of her husband; and that she was also a deaconess in the church, and one in whose house the travelling evangelists preached; and where they were entertained. The children mentioned here may either be her own children, or those members of the church which were under her care; or some of both. The apostle

6 And this is love, that we walk after his commandments. This is the commandment, That, as ye have heard from the beginning, ye should walk in it.

7 For many deceivers are entered into the world, who confess not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh. This is a deceiver and an antichrist.

8 Look to yourselves, that we lose not those things which we have wrought, but that we receive a full reward.

9 Whosoever transgresseth, and abideth not in the doctrine of Christ, hath not God. He that abideth in the doctrine of Christ, he hath both the Father and the Son.

10 If there come any unto you, and bring not this doctrine, receive him not into your house, neither bid him God speed:

k 1 John 2:24. -l 1 John 4:1. -m 1 John 4:2, 3. -n 1 John 2:22. & 4:3. -o Mark 13. & Gal 3:4. Heb. 10:32, 33. -p Or, gained: Same as last read, which ye have gained, but not the reward, &c. -q 1 John 2:22. -r Rom. 16:17. 1 Cor. 5:11. & 16:22. Gal. 1:8. & 2 Tim. 3:6. Tit. 2:10.

was glad to find, probably by an epistle sent from herself to him, or from the information of some of the itinerant evangelists, that the work of God was prospering in the place where she lived, and also in her own household. He does not say, that all were walking in the truth, but εκ των τεκνων, some of her children; there was a growing and spreading work; and there were many adversaries who strove to pervert them who had already believed; and perhaps were successful in drawing several away from their simplicity.

5. That which we had from the beginning] The commandment to love one another was what they had heard from the first publication of Christianity, and what he wishes this excellent woman to inculcate on all those under her care. The mode of address here shows that it was a person, not a church, to which the apostle wrote.

6. And this is love] That is, our love is shown and proved by our walking according to the commandments of God: for love is the principle of obedience.

7. For many deceivers, &c.] Of these he had spoken before, see first epistle, chap. iv. 1, &c. And these appear to have been Gnostics, for they denied that Jesus was come in the flesh. And this doctrine, so essential to salvation, none could deny, but a deceiver and an antichrist. Instead of εισελθου, are entered in, many excellent MSS. and Versions have εισηλυθου, are gone out. The sense is nearly the same.

8. Look to yourselves] Be on your guard against these seducers: watch, pray, love God and each other, and walk in newness of life.

That we lose not those things which we have wrought] That we apostles, who have been the means of your conversion, may not be deprived of you as our crown of rejoicing in the day of the Lord Jesus.

Instead of the first person plural, απολογουμε, &c. we lose &c. many MSS., Versions, and Fathers, read the whole clause in the second person plural, απολογουτε, ye lose, &c. Take heed to yourselves that ye lose not the things which ye have wrought, but that ye receive a full reward. This reading is more consistent and likely, and is supported by at least as good evidence as the other. We find, that if these persons did not keep on their guard, they might lose their salvation, and the apostles their rejoicing, in the day of the Lord Jesus. Even this intimation might put them on their guard. Had the apostle said ye cannot finally fall, what a different effect would it have produced?

9. Whosoever transgresseth] Παραβαινων, he who passes over the sacred enclosure, or goes beyond the prescribed limits—and abideth not in the doctrine, does not remain within these holy limits, but indulges himself either in excesses of action or passion; hath not God for his Father, nor the love of God in his heart.

Hath both the Father and the Son] He who abideth in the doctrine of Christ, his body is a temple of the Holy Trinity; and he has communion with the Father, as his Father, and with the Son, as his Saviour and Redeemer.

10. If there come any unto you] Under the character of an apostle or evangelist, to preach in your house.—And bring not this doctrine, that Jesus is come in the flesh, and has died for the redemption of the world;

Receive him not into your house] Give him no entertainment as an evangelical teacher. Let him not preach under your roof.

Neither bid him God speed] Και χαίρουσιν αμαρην αυτην, And do not say health to him. Do not salute him with Peace be to thee! The usual salutation among friends, and those of the same religion in the East, is for the Salom alechem, "Peace be to you;" which those of the same religion will use among themselves, but never to strangers, except in very rare cases. This is the case to the present day; and, from what John says here, it was a very ancient custom. We have often seen, that peacemongers and the Hebrews comprehended every spiritual and temporal blessing. The words mean, according to the Eastern use of them, "Have no religious connexion with him; nor act towards him, so as to induce others to believe you acknowledge him as a brother."

11 For he that biddeth him God speed is partaker of his evil deeds.

11. In partaker of his evil deeds) He that acts towards him as if he considered him a Christian brother, and sound in the faith, puts it in his power to deceive others, by thus apparently accrediting his ministry. No sound Christian should countenance any man as a Gospel minister, who holds and preaches erroneous doctrines; especially concerning the Lord Jesus. Nor can any Christian attend the ministry of such teachers, without being criminal in the sight of God. He who attends their ministry is, in effect, bidding them God speed—no matter whether such belong to an established church, or to any congregation of dissenters from it. But what St. John says here does not mean, that we should deny such the common office of humanity, charity, and mercy. No. In these offices we are equally bound to all men: far less does it intimate that we should persecute such on account of their heretical or heterodox sentiments. No. This right has God given to no man—to no church—to no state. They who persecute others, even for the worst heretical opinions, may expect the heaviest judgments of Almighty God.

There is a remarkable addition here in several MSS. of the Vulgate, and in some printed editions. Ecce praxisti vobis, ut in diem Domini nostri Jesu Christi non confundamini. "Behold I have foretold this to you, that ye may not be confounded in the day of our Lord Jesus Christ."

This addition is found in the edition of Pope Sixtus the Fifth, and in the Complutensian Polyglot: but it is not acknowledged by any of the Versions, nor by any Greek MSS.

12. Having many things to write] That is, I have many things that I might write to thee; but I think it best not to commit them to paper, because I hope to visit thee shortly, and speak fully of those matters, which will be a means of in-

THE THIRD EPISTLE OF JOHN.

For Chronological Eras, see at the end of the Acts.

THE elder unto the well beloved Caius, whom I love in the truth,

2 Beloved, I wish above all things that thou mayest prosper and be in health, even as thy soul prospereth.

a 2 John 1.—b Cr, truly.—c Ur, pray.

This epistle being of nearly the same complexion with the former, and evidently written about the same time, and indisputably by the same person; it is not necessary to give it any particular preface, as the subject of the authenticity of all the three epistles has been treated already so much at large, not only in the Introduction to them, but in the notes in general.

This and the preceding epistle, are, by Dr. Lardner, supposed to have been written between A. D. 80 and 90. There are no notes of time in the epistles themselves, to help us to fix any date; therefore all is conjecture concerning the time in which they were written; but, to me, it appears as likely that they were written before the destruction of Jerusalem, as after; for it is scarcely to be supposed that so signal a display of the justice of God, and such a powerful argument in favour of Christianity, and of the truth of Christ's predictions, could be passed, unnoticed, and unappealed to, by any of the inspired persons who wrote after that event. However, where there is no positive evidence, conjecture is useless.

NOTE.—Verse 1. The elder] See on the first verse of the preceding epistle, and also the Preface.

The well-beloved Caius] Faisc, Gaius, is the Greek mode of writing the Roman name Caius; and thus it should be rendered in the European languages.

Several persons of the name of Caius occur in the New Testament.

(1.) In the Epistle to the Romans, ch. xvi. 23. St. Paul mentions a Caius who lived at Corinth, whom he calls his host, and the host of the whole church.

d 2 John 4.—e 1 Cor. 4.18. Philom. 10.

(2.) In 1 Cor. i. 14. St. Paul mentions a Caius of Corinth, whom he had baptized: but this is probably not the same person.

(3.) In Acts xix. 29. mention is made of a native of Macedonia, who accompanied St. Paul some time with him at Ephesus. This is probably the same person as the Caius who lived at Corinth, and was the host of the church there, does not accord with the description of the host of the church, who, in the very same year, St. Paul, and was with him at Ephesus.

(4.) In Acts xx. 4. we meet a Caius of Derbe, who was a fellow-traveller of St. Paul. This is probably the same person as the host of the church at Corinth; for the host of the church would hardly leave that city to travel into Macedonia, and so far from home, as Macedonia, without clearly distinguishing himself from the host of the church at Ephesus, of Derbe.

(5.) And lastly, there is the Caius who is mentioned in the preceding epistle, and who is thought by some critics to be different from the Caius who is mentioned in this epistle, for, in writing to him, St. John ranks him as a child, which seems, according to them, to be converted by this apostle.

Now, whether this Caius was one of the persons mentioned, or whether he was different from them, we cannot determine; because Caius was a very common name, and if we may judge from the similarity of character, it is probable that he was the Caius who lived at Corinth, and who is mentioned in the preceding epistle. It is styled by St. Paul the host of the whole church, in allusion to his Christian brethren was the leading character of this Caius to whom St. John wrote

5 Beloved, thou doest faithfully whatsoever thou doest to the brethren, and to strangers;

6 Which have borne witness of thy charity before the church: whom if thou bring forward on their journey after a godly sort, thou shalt do well:

7 Because that for his name's sake they went forth, taking nothing of the Gentiles.

8 We therefore ought to receive such, that we might be fellow-helpers to the truth.

9 I wrote unto the church: but Diotrephes, who loveth to have the pre-eminence among them, receiveth us not.

10 Wherefore, if I come, I will remember his deeds which he doeth, prating against us with malicious words: and not content therewith, neither doth he himself receive the brethren,

11 For worthy of thy God.—g 1 Cor. 9. 12, 15.—h Prov. 10. 8, 10.—1 Psa. 37. 27. Jas. 1. 17. 1 Pet. 3. 11

this very account that he is commended by the apostle. Besides, St. John's friend lived in a place where this apostle had, in Diotrephes, a very ambitious and tyrannical adversary; and that there were men of this description at Corinth is evident enough from the two epistles to the Corinthians; though St. Paul has not mentioned their names.—See Michaelis.

The probability of this Caius being the same with the Corinthian Caius has suggested the thought that this epistle was sent to Corinth; and, consequently, that the second epistle was sent to some place in the neighbourhood of that city. But I think the distance between Ephesus, where St. John resided, and Corinth, was too considerable for such an aged man, as St. John is represented to be, to travel, whether by land or water. If he went by land, he must traverse a great part of Asia, go through Thrace, Macedonia, Thessaly, and down through Greece, to the Morea; a most tedious and difficult journey. If he went by water, he must cross the Ægean Sea, and navigate among the Cyclades Islands, which was always a dangerous voyage. Now, as the apostle promises, both in the second and in this epistle, to see the persons shortly to whom he wrote, I take it for granted that they could not have lived at Corinth, or any where in the vicinity of that city. That St. John took such a voyage Michaelis thinks probable: "for since Corinth lay almost opposite to Ephesus, and St. John, from his former occupation, before he became an apostle, was accustomed to the sea, it is not improbable that the journey or voyage which he proposed to make was from Ephesus to Corinth."

In answer to this I would just observe, 1. That the voyage was too long and dangerous for a man at John's advanced age to think of taking. 2. That John had never been accustomed to any such sea as the Ægean; for the Sea of Galilee or the Sea of Tiberias, on which, as a fisherman, he got his bread, was only an inconsiderable fresh-water lake; and his acquaintance with it could give him very few advantages for the navigation of the Ægean Sea, and the danger of coasting the numerous islands dispersed through it.

2. I wish above all things] Περὶ παντὸς εὐχεσθαι, above all things, I pray that thou mayest prosper, and be in health, and enjoy peace; to which one MSS. adds, ἐν ἀληθείᾳ, which gives it a different meaning, viz. that thou mayest be sound in the truth. The prayer of St. John for Caius, includes three particulars.—1. Health of body. 2. Health of soul: and, 3. Prosperity in secular affairs. That thou mayest prosper—and be in health—as thy soul prospereth. These three things, so necessary to the comfort of life, every Christian may in a certain measure expect; and for them every Christian is authorized to pray. And we should have more of all three, if we devoutly prayed for them.

It appears from the last clause, that the soul of Caius was in a very prosperous state.

3. When the brethren came] Probably the same of whom he speaks in the fifth and following verses; and who appear to have been itinerant evangelists.

The truth that is in thee] The soundness of thy faith, and the depth of thy religion.

4. To hear that my children] From this it has been inferred, that Caius was one of St. John's converts; and consequently not the Corinthian Caius, who was converted, most probably, by St. Paul. But the apostle might use the term children here, as implying those who were immediately under his pastoral care; and being an old man, he had a right to use such terms in addressing his juniors, both in age and grace; and there is much both of propriety and dignity in the appellation, coming from such a person.

5. Thou doest faithfully] Πιστὸν ποιεῖς. The phrase thinks that πῶς is put here for πῶτε, and that the phrase signifies to keep or preserve the faith, or to be bound by the faith: or to keep one's engagements. Thou hast acted as the faith, the Christian religion, required thee to act in all that thou hast done, both to the brethren at home, and to the strangers, the itinerant evangelists, who, in the course of their travels, have called at thy house. There is not a word here about the pilgrimages and penitential journeys, which the papists contrive to bring out of this text.

6. Which have borne witness of thy charity] Of thy love and benevolence.

Before the church] The believers at Ephesus; for to this church the apostle seems to refer.

Whom, if thou bring forward] If thou continue to assist such, as thou hast done, thou shalt do well.

and forbideth them that would, and casteth them out of the church.

11 Beloved, I follow not that which is evil, but that which is good. He that doeth good is of God: but he that doeth evil hath not seen God.

12 Demetrius hath good report of all men, and of the truth itself: yea, and we also bear record; and ye know that our record is true.

13 I had many things to write, but I will not with ink and pen write unto thee:

14 But I trust I shall shortly see thee, and we shall speak face to face. Peace be to thee. Our friends salute thee. Greet the friends by name.

h 1 John 2. 29 & 3. 9.—1 1 Tim. 3.—on John 21. 2.—2 John 12.—Gr. nouns to nouns.

The brethren of whom St. John speaks, might have been apostles; the strangers, assistants to these apostles, as John Mark was to Barnabas. Both were itinerant evangelists.

After a godly sort] Ἀξιῶν τὸν Θεόν, worthy of God; and in such a way as He can approve. Let all churches, all congregations of Christians, from whom their ministers and preachers can claim nothing by law, and for whom the state makes no provision, lay this to heart: let them ask themselves, Do we deal with those in a manner worthy of God, and worthy of the profession we make? Do we suffer them to lack the bread that perisheth: while they minister to us, with no sparing hand, the bread of life? Let a certain class of religious people, who will find themselves out, when they read this note, consider whether, when their preachers have ministered to them in their certain or stated time, and are called to go and serve other churches, they send them forth in a manner worthy of God? making a reasonable provision for the journey which they are obliged to take. In the itinerant ministry of the apostles it appears that each church bore the expenses of the apostle to the next church, or district, to which he was going to preach the word of life. So it should be still in the mission and itinerant ministry.

7. For his name's sake they went forth] For the sake of preaching the Gospel of the grace of God, and making known Jesus to the nation.

Taking nothing of the Gentiles.] Receiving no emolument for their labour; but in every respect showing themselves to be truly disinterested. Sometimes, and on some especial occasions, this may be necessary: but the labourer is worthy of his hire, is the maxim of the author of Christianity. And those congregations of Christians are ever found to prize the Gospel most, and profit most by it, who bear all expenses incident to it; and vice versa.

But some construe ἐξῆλθον, they went out, with ἀνευ τῶν εὐνῶν, from the Gentiles, or rather by the Gentiles; and give the passage this sense: they went out; i. e. were driven out by the Gentiles, taking nothing with them; i. e. leaving all their property behind, so that they were in a state of great destitution. A curious reading here, εὐνοῦν, heathenish men, for εὐνοῦν, Gentiles, which latter might imply those who were converted from among the Gentiles, while the sense of the other term seems to be restrained to those who were still unconverted, may seem to strengthen the above interpretation; and, although the construction seems rather harsh, yet it is not, on the whole, unlikely. The reading above referred to, is that of the most ancient and reputable MSS. That to be driven out, or expelled, is one Scriptural meaning of the verb ἐξερχομαι, see Matt. viii. 32, and when they were come out, οἱ δὲ ἐξῆλθοντες, and when they were driven out. Ib. xii. 43. When the unclean spirit is gone out, ἐξῆλθον, is driven out. See Mark v. 13, and vii. 29. The devil is gone out of thy daughter, ἐξῆλθον, is expelled. Ib. ix. 29. This kind can come forth by nothing, ἐν οὐδενὶ ὄνταται ἐξῆλθον, can be driven out by nothing but by prayer and fasting. Luke vii. 2. Mary Magdalene, out of whom went, ἀφ' ἧς δαίμονια ἐκῆλθον, out of whom were cast seven demons. See also 1 John ii. 19. Rev. iii. 12, and Schlessner, in voc. ἐξερχομαι.

8. We therefore ought to receive such] Those who are persecuted for righteousness' sake; and have professed the truth at the hazard of their lives, and the loss of all their worldly substance. Instead of ἀπολαβάντων, to receive, the most ancient and reputable MSS. have ὑπολαβάντων, to take up, undertake for, or kindly receive.

Fellow-helpers to the truth] And thus encourage the persecuted, and contribute to the spread and maintenance of the Gospel.

9. I wrote unto the church] The church where Caius was. But Diotrephes, who loveth to have the pre-eminence, φιλοπρωτων, who loves the presidency, or chief place in the church. He was doubtless an officer in the church; at least a deacon, probably a bishop; and being one, he magnified himself in his office: he loved such eminence, and behaved himself haughtily in it.

Receiveth us not.] Does not acknowledge the apostolical authority. As some MSS. supply ap, after εὐχαρις, and several judicious critics believe it is implied, the translation will run thus:—I would have written to the church to receive, these men kindly; but Diotrephes, who affects the presidency, and into whose hands, if I wrote to the church, my letter must come, receiveth us not, would not acknowledge my authority to interfere with any of the matters of his church; and, therefore, I have written unto thee whose love to the brethren, and general hospitality are well known, that thou wouldest receive those strangers and persecuted followers of our common Lord.

10. If come, I will remember] I will show him the authority, which, as an apostle of Jesus Christ, I possess.

Praying against us] Diotrophes might have been a converted Jew, who was unwilling that the Gentiles should be received into the church; or a Judaizing Christian, who wished to incorporate the law with the Gospel, and calumniated the apostles who taught otherwise. This haughty and unfeeling man would give no countenance to the converted Gentiles; so far from it, that he would not receive any of them himself, forbade others to do it, and excommunicated those who had been received into the church by the apostles. This appears to be the meaning of neither doth he himself receive the brethren, and forbiddeth them that would, and casteth them out of the church. He had the complete dog in the manger principle; he would neither do, nor let do. And when good was done that he did not approve, he endeavoured to undo it.

11. Follow not that which is evil] Μη μιμνησθε τὸ κακόν, ὃ ἐκτελεῖται τὸν κακόν, do not imitate that wicked man; i. e. the conduct of Diotrophes: be merciful, loving, and kind. For, whatever profession any man may make, it will ever appear that he who doeth good is of God; he alone is the person who uses rightly the grace received from God, and he alone shall enjoy the Divine approbation.

While he that doeth evil] He who is unfeeling, unmerciful, unkind, hath not seen God; he has no proper knowledge of that God whose name is mercy, and whose nature is love.

12. Demetrius hath good report] Perhaps another member of the church where Caius was; or he might have been one of those whom the apostle recommends to Caius; or, possibly, the bearer of this letter, from John to Caius. He seems to have been an excellent person; all testified of his righteousness; the truth, Christianity itself, bore testimony to him; and the apostles themselves added theirs also.

13. I had many things to write] That is, I have many things that I might write; but having the hope of seeing thee shortly, I will not commit them to paper. Ink and pen are here mentioned; paper and ink in the preceding epistle.

14. Peace be to thee] May thou possess every requisite good, both of a spiritual and temporal kind.

Our friends salute thee] Desire to be affectionately remembered to thee. Greet the friends bid me to all those with whom I am acquainted them by name. This is a proof that he was not sent to Corinth; where, if it was; and where, it is not likely, he had acquaintances, unless we could suppose he them when he was an exile in Patmos, as an Isa.

For other particulars concerning John, the apostle refers to the preface to his Gospel.

Instead of φίλοι, and φίλων, friends, the name, and several others, read ἀδελφοί, and the former (friends) is a very singular name, where else found in Scripture; the latter is a common current.

The text contains many excellent sentiments, well handled, might be very useful to the church. ## PREFACE TO THE GENERAL EPISTLE OF JUDE

In the Preface to the Epistle of James several things have been said relative to Jude, the brother of James, the supposed author of this epistle; and to that Preface the reader is requested to refer. What is farther necessary to be said on the author, and the authenticity of this epistle, I shall take the liberty to borrow principally from Michaelis.

"If James and Jude, whom the evangelists call brothers of Jesus, were in fact only cousins, or relations, as some suppose; and were sons, not of Joseph, but of Alpheus, these two persons were the same as the two brothers, James and Jude, who were apostles. And, in this case, Jude, the author of our epistle, was the same as the apostle Jude, the brother of James, who was son of Alpheus. On the other hand, if the James and the Jude, whom the evangelists call brothers of Jesus, were not the two brothers of this name, who were apostles, but were the sons of Joseph, the reputed father of Jesus, we have then two different persons of the name of Jude, either of which might have written this epistle. And, in this case, we have to examine whether the epistle was written by an apostle of the name of Jude, or by Jude, the brother-in-law of Christ.

"The author of the epistle himself has assumed neither the title of apostle of Jesus Christ, nor of brother of Jesus Christ; but calls himself only 'Jude, the servant of Jesus Christ, and brother of James.' Now, as the author distinguishes himself by the title 'brother of James,' and this was a common name among the Jews, he undoubtedly meant some eminent person of this name, who was well known at the time when he wrote, or the title 'brother of James' would have been no mark of distinction. We may infer, therefore, that the author of this epistle was the brother, either of the apostle James, the son of Alpheus, or of James, called the brother of Jesus, or of both, if they were one and the same person.

"The first question, therefore, to be asked is, Was the author of this epistle the apostle Jude? or, was he brother of James, the son of Alpheus? Now, I have already observed, that this question must be answered in the affirmative, if James and Jude, who were called brothers of Jesus, were the same as the two brothers James and Jude, who were apostles. And it may be answered in the affirmative, even if they were different persons: for Jude, the author of our epistle, had, in either case, a brother of the name of James, and therefore might, in either case, call himself Jude, the brother of James. I say the question may be answered in the affirmative, even if the apostle Jude was a different person from Jude, called the brother of James. But whether it ought to be answered in the affirmative, is another matter. I believe that it ought not: for if the Jude of this epistle, had been himself an apostle, and called himself, in the title, to Christians, simply 'Jude the brother of James,' adding the title apostle. It is true, that the name of Jude was brother of James, is called by St. Luke, but St. Luke gives him this title merely from another apostle of this name, who was brother of James. Now, the author of this epistle could have distinguished himself from Judas Iscariot, who lived many years before this epistle was written, if the name of Jude was very common among the Jews, or if the author of this epistle wished to distinguish himself from other persons who were so called. But James was a very common name; and, therefore, if the author of this epistle, he surely, would have preferred a title which would have removed all doubts, to a title which left it at least uncertain whether he was an apostle, or the omission of this title does not prove that the author of our epistle was not an apostle, or omitted it in four of his epistles; in the Epistles to the Thessalonians, and the Epistle to the Philoem. But St. Paul was sufficiently distinguished by his title; whereas the author of the epistle in question, had the necessity of a distinguishing appellation, as he had a very title which he has given himself, of 'brother of James.' Besides, at the time when this epistle was written, the name of James was then a very common name; and the son of James, the son of Zebedee, had been before. If then the author of this epistle had been the brother of James, he would have clearly ascertained who he himself was, and has no more given to his brother, than to his apostle, I think it highly probable that he was an apostle.

"The next question to be asked, therefore, is, Was the author of our epistle, the same person as the evangelists call brother of Jesus? and who is the opinion which I think the most defensible, that the author of this epistle was the brother of Jesus; that he was son of Joseph, and therefore not his own brother, but the brother of Jesus. Now that our epistle was written by the author of this description, appears to me highly his supposition we may assign the reason why the author called himself 'brother of James;' for if he was the brother-in-law of Jesus, his brother James was the person, who during so many years had presided over the church at Jerusalem, and well known both to Jews and Christians, and appears to have been more celebrated than either of the apostles called James. It will be objected, perhaps, that the very same reasons which I have alleged, to show that an apostle of the name of Jude would have assumed his proper title, will likewise show, that a person who was called brother of Jesus, would have one the same, and styled himself brother of Jesus. To this answer, that if he was the son of Joseph, not by Mary, but by a former wife, and Jude believed in the immaculate conception, he must have been sensible that, though to all outward appearance, he was brother-in-law to Jesus, since his own father was the husband of Jesus's mother, yet, in reality, he was no relation of Jesus. On the other hand, if Jude, called the brother of Jesus, was the son of Joseph, not by a former wife, but by Mary, as Herder asserts, I do not see how the receding objection can be answered; for, if Jesus and Jude had the same mother, Jude might, without the least impropriety, have styled himself 'brother of Jesus,' or 'brother of the Lord;' and this would have been a much more remarkable and distinguishing title than that of brother of James. A third question still remains to be asked on this subject. The apostle whom St. Luke calls Jude, is called Thaddæus by St. Matthew and St. Mark, as I have already observed. But the apostle of the Syrians, who first preached the Gospel at Edessa, and founded a church there, was named Thaddæus, or Adæus. It may be asked, therefore, whether the author of our epistle was Thaddæus, the apostle of the Syrians? But the answer is decisive; the old Syriac Version does not contain this epistle; consequently, it is highly probable, that Adai, or Adæus, was not the author; for an epistle written by the great apostle of the Syrians would surely have been received into the canon of the Syrian church.

The most accurate critics have been unable to determine the time when, and the persons to whom this epistle was written; so that much concerning these points, as well as the author of the epistle, must remain undecided.

"I am really unable to determine," says Michaelis, "who he persons were to whom this epistle was sent; for no traces are to be discovered in it which enable us to form the least judgment on this subject; and the address, with which this epistle commences, is so indeterminate, that there is hardly any Christian community, where Greek was spoken, which might not be denoted by it. Though this epistle has a very great similarity to the Second Epistle of Peter, it cannot have been sent to the same persons, namely, the Christians who resided in Pontus, &c. because no mention is made of them in his epistle. Nor can it have been sent to the Christians of Syria, and Assyria, where Jude preached the Gospel, if he be the same person as the apostle of the Syrians; for in this case the epistle would not have been written in Greek, but in Syriac or Chaldee, and would certainly have been received into the old Syriac Version.

"With respect to the date of this epistle, all that I am able to assert is, that it was written after the Second Epistle of Peter: at how many years after, whether between 64 and 66 as arduer supposes, or between 70 and 75 as Beausobre and L'Enfant believe; or, according to Dodwell and Cave, in 71 or 72, or, so late as the year 90, as is the opinion of Mill, I confess I am unable to determine, at least from any certain data. The expression, 'in the last time,' which occurs ver. 18, as well as in 2 Pet. iii. 3. is too indeterminate to warrant any conclusion, respecting the date of this epistle; for though, on the one hand, it may refer to the approaching destruction of Jerusalem, it may, on the other hand, refer to a later period, and denote the close of the apostolic age; for in the First Epistle of St. John a similar expression occurs, which must be taken in this latter sense. The inference, therefore, that the Epistle of St. Jude was written before the destruction of Jerusalem, which some commentators have deduced from the before-mentioned expression, on the supposition that it alluded to that event, then approaching, is very precarious; because it is drawn from premises which are themselves uncertain. However, there is some reason to believe, on other grounds, that this epistle was not written after the destruction of Jerusalem: for, as the author has mentioned, ver. 6-8, several well known instances of God's justice in punishing sinners, which Peter had already quoted in his second epistle, to the same purpose; he would probably, if Jerusalem had been already destroyed at the time he wrote, have not neglected to add to his other examples this most remarkable instance of Divine vengeance, especially as Christ himself had foretold it.

Lardner indeed, though he admits the similarity of the two epistles, still thinks it a matter of doubt, whether St. Jude had ever seen the Second Epistle of St. Peter; his reason is, that 'if St. Jude had formed a design of writing, and met with an epistle of one of the apostles very suitable to his own thoughts and intentions, he would have forborne to write.

To this argument I answer:

"1. If the Epistle of St. Jude was inspired by the Holy Ghost, as Lardner admits; the Holy Ghost certainly knew, while he was dictating the Epistle to St. Jude, that an Epistle of St. Peter, of a like import, already existed. And if the Holy Ghost, notwithstanding this knowledge, still thought that an Epistle of St. Jude was not unnecessary; why shall we suppose that St. Jude himself would have been prevented writing by the same knowledge?

"2. The second Epistle of St. Peter was addressed to the inhabitants of some particular countries; but the address of St. Jude's is general. St. Jude therefore might think it necessary to repeat, for general use, what St. Peter had written only to certain communities.

"3. The Epistle of St. Jude is not a bare copy of the Second Epistle of St. Peter; for in the former not only several thoughts are more completely unravelled than in the latter, but several additions are made to what St. Peter had said, for instance, ver. 4, 5, 9, 16.

"Eusebius, in his catalogue of the books of the New Testament, places the Epistle of St. Jude, among the apocrypha, contradicted, or apocryphal books, in company with the Epistle of St. James, the Second Epistle of St. Peter, and the Second and Third of John.

"But Origen, who lived in the third century, though he speaks in dubious terms of the Second Epistle of St. Peter, has several times quoted the Epistle of St. Jude, and has spoken of it as an epistle on which he entertained no doubt. In his commentary on St. Matthew, when he comes to chap. xiii. 55. where James, James, Simon, and Jude, are mentioned; he says Jude wrote an epistle of few lines indeed, but full of the powerful words of the heavenly grace, who at the beginning says, 'Jude the servant of Jesus Christ, and brother of James.' This is a very clear and unequivocal declaration of Origen's opinion; and it is the more remarkable, because he says nothing of the Epistle of St. James, though the passage, Matt. xiii. 55. afforded him as good an opportunity of speaking of this epistle, as it did of the Epistle of St. Jude. Nay, Origen carries his veneration for the Epistle of St. Jude so far, that in his treatise De Principiis, lib. III. cap. 2. he quotes an apocryphal book, called the Assumption of Moses, as a work of authority; because a passage from this book had been quoted by St. Jude. In one instance, however, in his commentary on St. Matthew, Origen speaks in less positive terms; for there he says, 'if any one receive the Epistle of St. Jude,' &c. Tertullian, in whose works Lardner could discover no quotation from the Second epistle of St. Peter, describes the Epistle of St. Jude as the work of an apostle; for in his treatise, De cultu Fœminarum, chap. 3. he says, 'Hence it is, that Enoch is quoted by the apostle Jude.'

"Clement of Alexandria, in whose works likewise Lardner could find no quotation from the Second Epistle of St. Peter, has three times quoted the Epistle of St. Jude, without expressing any doubt whatever. It appears then, that the three ancient fathers, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, and Origen, as far as we may judge from their writings, which are now extant, preferred the Epistle of St. Jude to the Second Epistle of Peter. However, I think it not impossible, that if all the writings of these authors were now extant, passages might be found in them which would turn the scale in favour of the latter; and it may be owing to mere accident, that in those parts of their works which have descended to us, more passages, in which they speak decidedly of St. Jude, are to be found, than such as are favourable to the Second Epistle of St. Peter. For I really cannot comprehend, how any impartial man, who has to choose between these two epistles, which are very similar to each other, can prefer the former to the latter, or receive the Epistle of St. Jude, the contents of which labour under great difficulties; and at the same time consider as dubious, or even reject, the Second Epistle of St. Peter, the contents of which labour under no such difficulties.

"But, it is much more difficult to explain the ninth verse, in which the archangel Michael is said to have disputed with the devil about the body of Moses. The history of this dispute, which has the appearance of a Jewish fable, it is not at present very easy to discover; because the book from which it is supposed to have been taken by the author of this epistle, is no longer extant; but I will here put together such scattered accounts of it as I have been able to collect.

"Origen found, in a Jewish Greek book, called the Assumption of Moses, which was extant in his time, this very story related concerning the dispute of the archangel Michael with the devil about the body of Moses. And from a comparison of the relation in his book with St. Jude's quotation, he was thoroughly persuaded that it was the book from which St. Jude quoted. This he asserts without the least hesitation; and in consequence of this persuasion he himself has quoted the Assumption of Moses, as a work of authority, in proof of the temptation of Adam and Eve by the devil. But, as he quoted it merely for this purpose, he has given us only an imperfect account of what this book contained, relative to the dispute about the body of Moses. One circumstance, however, he has mentioned, which is not found in the Epistle of St. Jude, (viz.) that Michael reproached the devil with having possessed the serpent that seduced Eve. In what manner this circumstance is connected with the dispute about the body of Moses, will appear from the following consideration:

"The Jews imagined the person of Moses was so holy, that God could find no reason for permitting him to die: and that nothing but the sin committed by Adam and Eve in paradise, which brought death into the world, was the cause why Moses did not live for ever. The same notions they entertained of JUDE, the servant of Jesus Christ, and brother of James, to them that are sanctified by God the Father, and preserved in Jesus Christ, and called: Mercy unto you, and peace, and love, be multiplied. Beloved, when I gave all diligence to write unto you of the common salvation, it was needful for me to write unto you, and exhort you that ye should earnestly contend for the faith which was once delivered unto the saints.

John 1:14, Acts 1:13, John 12:11, 18, 19, 1 Pet. 1:1, Rom. 1:7, 1 Pet. 1:2, Heb. 1:1, Th. 1:1, Phil. 1:27, 1 Tim. 1:13, 2 Tim. 1:13, 2 Cor. 1:1, Gal. 1:1, 1 Pet. 1:1.

NOTE.—Verse 1. Jude, the servant of Jesus Christ) Probably Jude the apostle, who was surnamed Thaddæus and Lebæus, was son to Alphæus and brother to James the less, and Symeon. See Matt. x. 3. and collate with Luke 1:16. Matt. xiii. 55. See the Preface.

Brother of James) Supposed to be James the less, bishop of Jerusalem, mentioned here, because he was an eminent person in the church. See the Preface to St. James.

To them that are sanctified by God) Instead of συνεπιστάται, in the Septuagint, A. B. several others, both the Syriac, Erpen's Arabic, Coptic, Sinhalese, Armenian, Ethiopic, and Valgate, with several of the Fathers, have κατηρισμένοι, to them that are beloved: and before εσσι, in God, some MSS. with the Syriac and Armenian, have αδελφοί, to the Gentiles, in God the Father; but although the first is a very profitable reading, this is much less so. St. Jude writes to all believers every where, and not to any particular church; hence his epistle has been called a general epistle.

Sanctified, signifies here consecrated to God through faith in Christ.

Preserved in (or by) Jesus Christ) Signifies those who continued unshaken in the Christian faith; and implies also, that some can be preserved in the faith, that do not continue in union with Christ, by whose grace alone they can be preserved and called. This should be read consecutively with the other epithets; and should be rather, in a translation, read first than last, to the saints in God the Father, called and preserved by Christ Jesus. Saints is the same as Christians: to become such they were called to believe in Christ by the preaching of the Gospel; and having believed, were preserved by the grace of Christ in the life and practice of piety.

Mercy unto you) For even the best have no merit, and must receive every blessing and grace in the way of mercy.

Peace) With God and your consciences.—Love both to God and men.—be multiplied, be unboundedly increased.

When I gave all diligence) This phrase κατα σπουδην κατα νουν; is a Græcism for being exceedingly intent upon a subject; taking it up seriously with determination to bring it to good effect. The meaning of the apostle seems to be this, I beloved brethren, when I saw it necessary to write to you concerning the common salvation, my mind being deeply affected with the dangers to which the church is exposed from the false teachers that are gone out into the world; I found it extremely necessary to write and exhort you to hold fast the truth which you had received, and strenuously to contend for that only faith, which, by our Lord, and His apostles, has been delivered to Christians.

The common salvation) The Christian religion, and the salvation which it brings. This is called common, because it equally belongs to Jews and Gentiles: it is in the saving grace of God which has appeared to every man, and equally offers to every human being that redemption which is provided for the whole world.

Some think that St. Jude intimates that he had at first purposed to write to the church at large, on the nature and design of the Gospel; but seeing the dangers to which the churches were exposed, because of the false teachers, he changed his method, and wrote pointedly against those false doctrines; exhorting them strenuously to contend for the faith.

For there are certain men crept in unawares) Μηχανιστες, they have got into the church under specious pretences; and when in, began to sow their bad seed.

Before of old ordained) Οι παλαια προσηγορευμενοι, such as were long ago proscribed, and condemned in the most public manner; this is the import of the word προσηγορευ in this sense; and there are many examples of this use of κ in the Greek writers. See Kypke.

For there are certain men crept in unawares, who were before of old ordained to this condemnation, ungodly men, turning the grace of our God into lasciviousness, and denying the only Lord God, and our Lord Jesus Christ.

I will therefore put you in remembrance, though ye once knew this, how that the Lord, having saved the people out of the land of Egypt, and shall reward destroyed them that believed not.

1 Rom. 9, 21, 22. 1 Pet. 2:8, 18 Pet. 2:10 - 11 Thim. 2:11. Heb. 12:15-1 Th. 1:10. 2 Pet. 2:1. 1 John 2:22 - 1 Cor. 10:13 - a Numo. 14:23, 27. & 32. 94. Psalm 105:23 Heb. 3:17, 19.

To this condemnation) To a similar punishment to that immediately about to be mentioned.

In the Sacred Writings all such persons, false doctrines, and impure practices, have been most openly proscribed and condemned; and the apostle immediately produces several examples, viz. the disobedient Israelites, the unfaithful angels, and the impure inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah. This is most obviously the apostle's meaning; and it is as ridiculous as it is absurd, to look into such words for a decree of eternal reprobation, &c. such a doctrine being as far from the apostle's mind, as that of Him in whose name he wrote.

Turning the grace of our God into lasciviousness) Making the grace and mercy of God a covering for crimes; intimating that men might sin safely, who believe the Gospel, because, in that Gospel grace abounds. But perhaps the goodness of God is here meant; for I cannot see how they could believe the Gospel in any way who denied the Lord Jesus Christ; unless, which is likely, they denied refers to this, that while they acknowledged Jesus as the promised Messiah, they denied Him to be the only Lord, Sovereign, and Ruler, of the church and of the world. There are many in the present day who hold the same opinion.

The only Lord God, and our Lord Jesus Christ.) Μονον δεσποτην θεου και κυριον ημων ιησουν χριστον αποστολον. These words may be translated, Denying the only Sovereign God, even our Lord Jesus Christ. But θεου, God, is omitted by A. B. C. sixteen others, with Erpen's Arabic, the Coptic, Ethiopic, Armenian, and Valgate, and by many of the Fathers. It is very likely that it was originally inserted as a gloss, to ascertain to whom the title of τον μονον δεσποτην, the only Sovereign, belonged; and thus make two Persons, where only One seems to be intended. The passage, I believe, belongs solely to Jesus Christ, and may be read thus; denying the only Sovereign Ruler, even our Lord Jesus Christ. The text is differently arranged in the Compendianian Polyglott, which contains the first edition of the Greek Testament: Και τον μονον θεον και δεσποτην, τον κυριον ημων ιησουν χριστον αποστολον. Denying the only true God and Sovereign, our Lord Jesus Christ. This is a very remarkable position of the words, and doubtless existed in some of the MSS. from which these editors copied. The Simonians, Nicollaitans, and Gnostics, denied God to be the Creator of the world; and Simon is said to have proclaimed himself as ΠΑΥΣΑ to the Samaritans, as θεος to the Jews, and as the HOLY GHOST to all other nations. All such, most obviously denied both Father, Son, and Spirit.

I will therefore put you in remembrance) That is, how such persons were proscribed and condemned to bear the punishment due to such crimes.

Though ye once knew this) The word αρα, here translated once, has greatly puzzled many interpreters. It has two meanings in the Sacred Writings; and, indeed, in the Greek writers also. 1. It signifies once, one time, as opposed to twice, or several times. 2. Altogether, entirely, perfectly, interpreted by σικτας αντι του διολου ελοχρητες; and of this meaning he produces a proof from Josephus. This appears to be the sense of the word in Heb. vi. 4. τους αρα φωτισθησασ, those who were fully enlightened. Heb. x. 2. αρα ελοχρητους, προνωστως ολασεν. See also ver. 3. of this epistle. Ψα. lxi. 11. αρα ελαλησεν to θεου. God spoke fully, completely, on the subject. St. Jude is to be understood as saying, I will therefore put you in remembrance, though ye are προνωστως instructed in this.

Saved the people) Delivered them from the Egyptian bondage. Afterward destroyed them) Because they neither believed His word, nor were obedient to His commands. This is the first example of what was mentioned ver. 4.

6 And * the angels which kept not their * first estate, but left their own habitation, * he hath reserved in everlasting chains under darkness * unto the judgment of the great day.

6 Even as * Sodom and Gomorrah, and the cities about them in like manner, giving themselves over to fornication, and going after * strange flesh, are set forth for an example, suffering the vengeance of eternal fire.

6 * Likewise also these filthy dreamers despise the flesh, despise dominion, and * speak evil of dignities.

6. The angels which kept not their first estate] They have now apown, their own principality. The words may be understood of their having invaded the office or dignity of some others; or of their having by some means forfeited their own. This is spoken of those generally termed the fallen angels; but from what they fell, or from what cause, or for what crime, we know not. It is generally thought to have been pride; but this is mere conjecture. One thing is certain: the angels who fell must have been in a state of probation, capable of either standing or falling, as Adam was in Paradise. They did not continue faithful, though they knew the law on which they stood; they are therefore produced as the second example.

But left their own habitation] This seems to intimate that they had invaded the office and prerogative of others, and attempted to seize on their place of residence and felicity.

He hath reserved in everlasting chains] That is, in a state of confinement from which they cannot escape.

Under darkness] Alluding, probably, to those dungeons or dark cells in prisons, where the most flagitious culprits were confined.

The judgment of the great day.] The final judgment, when both angels and men shall receive their eternal doom. See on 2 Peter ii. 4. In Sohar Exod. fol. 8. c. 32. "Rabbi Isaac asked, Suppose God should punish any of His heavenly family, how would He act?—R. Abba answered, He would send them into the flaming river, take away their dominion, and put others in their place." Some suppose that the saints are to occupy the places from which these angels, by transgression, fell.

7. Even as Sodom and Gomorrah] What their sin and punishment were, may be seen in Gen. xix. and the notes there. This is the third example to illustrate what is laid down ver. 4.

Are set forth for an example] Both of what God will do to such transgressors, and of the position laid down in ver. 4. viz. that God has in the most open and positive manner declared, that such and such sinners shall meet with the punishment due to their crimes.

Suffering the vengeance of eternal fire.] Subjected to such a punishment as an endless fire can inflict. Some apply this to the utter subversion of these cities; so that by the action of that fire, which descended from heaven, they were totally and eternally destroyed; for, as to their being rebuilt, that is impossible, seeing the very ground on which they stood is burnt up, and the whole plain is now the immense lake Asphaltites. See my notes on Gen. xix.

The first sense applies to the inhabitants of those wicked cities; the second to the cities themselves: in either case, the word top azovon signifies an eternally destructive fire; it has no end in the punishment of the wicked Sodomites, &c. it has no end in the destruction of the cities; they were totally burnt up, and never were, and never can be, rebuilt. In either of these senses the word azov, eternal, has its grammatical and proper meaning.

8. Likewise also these filthy dreamers] He means to say, that these false teachers and their followers were as unbelieving and disobedient as the Israelites in the wilderness; as rebellious against the authority of God, as the fallen angels; and as impure and unholv as the Sodomites; and that, consequently, they must expect similar punishment.

Our translators, by rendering avvriaazovtes, filthy dreamers, seem to have understood St. Jude to mean, les pollutions nocturnes et volutions de ces hommes impurs; qui se livrent sans scrupule à toutes sortes de penées; et caressent leur imagination par la vûe de toutes sortes d'objets, tombent ensuite dans les corruptions honteuses et criminelles. See Calmet. In plain English, self-pollution, with all its train of curses, and cursed effects, on body, soul, and spirit. The idea of our translators seems to be confirmed by the words azovra pav mavrovri, they indeed pollute the flesh.—See what is said at the conclusion of the xxxviii. chapter of Genesis.

Despise dominion] Κοπιοντες δε αδικοι, they set all government at naught; they will come under no restraints; they despise all law; and wish to live as they list.

Speak evil of dignities] Δοξας δε θρασευοντες, they blaspheme, or speak injuriously of supreme authority.—See 2 Pet. ii. 10. 11. They treat governors and government with contempt; and calumniate, and misrepresent all Divine and civil institutions.

9. Yet Michael the Archangel] Of this personage many things are spoken in the Jewish writings. "Rabbi Judah Hakkodesh says, Wherever Michael is said to appear, the glory of the Divine Majesty is always to be understood." Shemesh Rabba, sec. ii. fol. 104. 3. So that it seems as if they condered Michael in some sort as those do C eternal Sonship of His Divine nature.

Let it be observed, that the word archangel is in the plural number in the Sacred Writings properly; only one archangel; one chief angelic host. Nor is the word devil, as an enemy of mankind, ever found in the plural; one monarch of all fallen spirits.

Michael, and head of all the angelic order, dragon, or Satan, is head of all the devils; these two hosts are opposed to each other act under these two chiefs, as leaders: he it is said, Michael and his angels fought with Satan and his angels. The word Michael, compounded of mi, who, el, like, mi, like God; hence by this personage, in the Disputed about the body of Moses] I cannot tell; or from what source St. Jude some tradition among his countrymen. It very like it, in Debarim Rabba, sec. ii. fo that wicked one, the prince of the Satans, soul of Moses, saying, When the time comes, shall lament, I shall have my mouth filled with chael said to him, Wretch, I weep, and I

joyce not against me, O mine enemy, because for I shall rise again: when I sit in darkness my light, Mic. vii. 8. By the words, because we must understand the death of Moses shall rise again, the government of Joseph.

The contention mentioned by Jude is not of Isaac, nor the soul, of Moses; but about

Durst not bring against him a railing] A Jewish maxim, as may be seen in Synoponote 6. "It is not lawful for man to prefer speeches, even against wicked spirits."

Dr. Macknight says, "In Dan. x. 13, 21 spoken of as one of the chief angels who Israelites as a nation: he may, therefore, be of the Lord, before whom Joshua the high-priest. I. to have stood, Satan being at his ri him; namely, in his design of restoring and state, called by Jude, the body of Moestan church is called by Paul, the body of adda, And the Lord, that is, the angel of the from ver. 1. said unto Satan, The Lord raman! even the Lord that hath chosen J thes?" This is the most likely interpretation: and it will appear the more probable, considered, that among the Hebrews ru guph, for a thing itself; as in Rom. vii. 24. rupe body of sin, signifies sin itself; so the body rupe guph shal, Moahet, may signify Moses, in which he was particularly concerned, religion, &c.

It may be added, that the Jews consider Michael as the friend, the other as the enemy, the accuser, Michael their advocate, mael stand before the Lord; Satan accuses, the merits of Israel. Satan endeavours to stences him: Hold thy tongue, says he, and the Judge determines; for it is written, He to his people, and to his saints, Psa. lxxxv. 9. sa, sec. 18. fol. 117. 3.

10. Speak evil of these things which they do not understand] The origin and utility of they revile that which ever protects their property. This is true in most instances.

But what they know naturally] They a fiction; their minds are uncultivated: the instinct, and are slaves to their animal instincts; and are slaves to their animal instincts; and are slaves to their animal

14 And Enoch also, m the seventh from Adam, prophesied of they corrupt themselves, beyond the example of the brute beasts. A fearful description ; and true of many in the present day.

11. They have gone in the way of Cain] They are haters of their brethren, and they that are such are murderers ; and by their false doctrine they corrupt and destroy the souls of the people.

The error of Balaam] For the sake of gain they corrupt the word of God, and refine away its meaning, and let it down so as to suit the passions of the profligate. This was literally true of the Nicolaitans, who taught most impure doctrines, and followed the most lascivious practices.

Gainsaying of Core.] See the account of the rebellion of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, and their company, in Numb. xiii. It appears that these persons opposed the authority of the apostles of our Lord, as Korah and his associates did that of Moses and Aaron : and St. Jude predicts them a similar punishment. In this verse he accuses them of murder, covetousness, and rebellion against the authority of God.

12. Spots in your feasts of charity] It appears that these persons, unholily and impure as they were, still continued to have outward fellowship with the church ! This is strange ; but it is very likely that their power and influence in that place had allowed up, or set aside the power and authority of the real ministers of Christ : a very common case, when worldly, time-serving men, get into the church.

The feasts of charity ; the ayarai, or love-feasts, of which the apostle speaks, were in use in the primitive church till the middle of the fourth century, when, by the council of Laodicea, they were prohibited to be held in the churches ; and, having been abused, fell into disuse. In later days they have been revived, in all the purity and simplicity of the primitive institution, among the Moravians or Unitas Fratrum, and the people called Methodists.

Among the ancients, the richer members of the church made an occasional general feast, at which all the members attended ; and the poor and the rich ate together. The fatherless, the widows, and the strangers, were invited to these feasts ; and their eating together was a proof of their love to each other ; whence such entertainments were called love-feasts. The love-feasts were, at first, celebrated before the Lord's supper : in process of time they appear to have been celebrated after it. But they were never considered as the Lord's supper, nor any substitute for it.—See, for farther information, Suicer in his Thesaurus, under the word Ayarai.

Feeding themselves without fear] Eating, not to suffice nature, but to pamper appetite. It seems the provision was abundant ; and they ate to gluttony and riot. It was this which brought the love-feasts into disrepute in the church ; and was the means of their being at last wholly laid aside. This abuse is never likely to take place among the Methodists, as they only use bread and water ; and of this the provision is not sufficient to afford the tenth part of a meal.

Instead of ayarais, love-feasts, ayarais, deceits, is the reading of the Codex Alexandrinus, and the Codex Ephrem, two MSS. of the highest antiquity ; as also of those MSS. collated by Laurentius Valla, and of some of those in the Medicæan library. This reading appears to have been introduced in order to avoid the conclusion that some might be led to draw concerning the state of the church ; it must be very corrupt, to have in its communion such corrupt men.

Clouds—without water] The doctrine of God is compared to the rain, Deut. xxxii. 2. and clouds are the instruments by which the rain is distilled upon the earth. In arid or parched countries, the very appearance of a cloud is delightful, because it is a token of refreshing showers ; but when sudden winds arise and disperse these clouds, the hope of the husbandman and shepherd is cut off. These false teachers are represented as clouds, they have the form and office of the teachers of righteousness, and from such appearances pure doctrine may be naturally expected. But these are clouds without water ; they distil no refreshing showers, because they have none ; they are carried away, and about, by their passions, as those light fleecy clouds are carried by the winds.—See the notes on 2 Pet. ii. 17.

Trees whose fruit withereth] Δένδρα θύροντορα, galled or diseased trees ; for θύροντορα is, according to Phavorinus, νεως θύροντα αωρα, a disease, (in trees) which causes their fruit to wither : for, although there are blossoms, and the fruit shaves, or is set, the galls in the trees prevent the proper circulation of the sap ; and, therefore, the fruit never comes to perfection. Hence the apostle immediately adds, without fruit ; i. e. the fruit never comes to maturity. This metaphor expresses the same thing as the preceding. They have the appearance of ministers of the Gospel, but they have no fruit.

Twice dead] First, naturally and practically dead in sin, from which they had been revived by the preaching and grace of these, saying, Behold, * the Lord cometh with ten thousand of his saints, 15 To execute judgment upon all, and to convince all that are ungodly among them of all their ungodly deeds which they have ungodly committed, and of all their * hard speeches which ungodly sinners have spoken against him.

16 These are murmurers, complainers, walking after their

of the Gospel. Secondly, dead by backsliding or apostasy from the true faith, by which they lost the grace they had before received ; and now, likely to continue in that death, because plucked up from the roots, their roots of faith and love being no longer fixed in Christ Jesus. Perhaps the aorist is taken here for the future : they SHALL BE plucked up from the roots ; God will exterminate them from the earth.

13. Ragging waves of the sea, foaming out their own shame] The same metaphor as in Isa. lvii. 20. The wicked are like the troubled sea, when it cannot rest, whose waters cast up mire and dirt. These are like the sea in a storm, where the swells are like mountains, the breakers lash the shore, and sound like thunder ; and the great deep, stirred up from its very bottom, rolls its muddy putrid sediment, and deposits it upon the beach. Such were those proud and arrogant boasters, those headstrong, unruly, and ferocious men, who swept into their own vortex the souls of the simple, and left nothing behind them that was not indicative of their folly, their turbulence, and their impurity.

Wandering stars] Αστροι κλαννται, not what we call planets ; for, although these differ from what are called the fixed stars, which never change their place, while the planets have their revolution round the sun ; yet, properly speaking, there is no irregularity in their motions ; for their appearance of advancing, stationary, and retrograde, are only in reference to an observer on the earth, viewing them in different parts of their orbits ; for, as to themselves, they ever continue a steady course through all their revolutions. But these are uncertain anomalous meteors, ignis fatui, will-o'-the-wisp, dancing about in the darkness which themselves have formed, and leading simple souls astray ; who have ceased to walk in the light, and have no other guides but those oscillating and devious meteors, which, if you run after them, will flee before you ; and if you run from them, will follow you.

The blackness of darkness] They are such as are going headlong into that outer darkness where there is weeping, and gnashing of teeth. The whole of this description appears to have been borrowed from 2 Pet. ii. where the reader is requested to see the notes.

14. Enoch also the seventh from Adam] He was the seventh patriarch ; and is distinguished thus from Enoch, son of Cain, who was but the third from Adam : this appears plainly from the genealogy, 1 Chron. i. 1 Adam, Seth, Enos, Kenan, Mahalaleel, Jared, Henoch, or Enoch, &c. Of the book of Enoch, from which this prophecy is thought to have been taken, much has been said ; but as the work is apocryphal, and of no authority, I shall not burthen my page with extracts.—See the Preface.

Perhaps the word προφητεως, prophesied, means no more than preached, spoke, made declarations, &c. concerning these things and persons ; for, doubtless, he reproved the ungodliness of his own times. It is certain that a book of Enoch was known in the earliest ages of the primitive church, and is quoted by Origen and Tertullian ; and is mentioned by St. Jerome in the Apostolical Constitutions, by Nicephorus, Athanasius, and probably by St. Augustin.—See Suicer's Thesaurus, Vol. I. col. 1131. Such a work is still extant among the Abyssinians.

Ten thousand of his saints] This seems to be taken from Dan. vii. 10.

15. To execute judgment] This was originally spoken to the antediluvians ; and the coming of the Lord to destroy that world was the thing spoken of in this prophecy, or declaration. But as God had threatened this, it required no direct inspiration to foretell it. To execute judgment, &c. This is a very strange word as to its composition, and is loaded with various readings ; the MSS. and Versions being at little agreement among themselves, on its phraseology. Ανωγει, which we translate among them, is omitted by the best MSS. and Versions ; and is, in all probability, spurious. Many also omit αυβιτας, after ηρωων, ungodly deeds. Many insert λογων, words or speeches, after αληθων, hard ; and this word our translators have supplied. And instead of sinners, αναρτοι, the Sahidic has ανθρωποι, men. There are others of less note ; but the frequent recurrence of ALL and USUALLY makes the construction of the sentence very harsh.

Dr. Macknight supposes that Enoch's prophecy was common among the Jews ; for the first words in Hebrew are Maranatha, and these were used by them in that form of excommunication, or cursing, which they pronounced against irrefragable offenders. The doctor forgets himself here : the words, Maranatha, are not Hebrew, but Syriac. In Hebrew, the form of execration begins with אלה אלהי ארור אתה, "cursed art thou ;" or, אלהיך מעהרם אתה ; but the Syriac, [2] maranatha, is literally our Lord is coming ; see on 1 Cor. xvi. 22. but here, in the Syriac, the words are [2] alpha moria, "the Lord cometh." So it is doubtful whether this fancied analogy exists.

16 These are murmurers] Grudging and grumbling at all men, and at all things. Complainers, μωψιμοίτοι, complain-ers of their fate or destiny; finding fault with God and all His providential dispensations; making and governing worlds in their own way; persons whom neither God nor man can please.

Walking after their own lusts] Taking their wild, disorderly, and impure passions for the rule of their conduct, and the writings of the prophets and apostles.

Great swelling words] Υπερβολα: see the explanation of this term in 2 Pet. ii. 18.

Having men's persons in admiration] Time-servers and flatterers; persons who pretend to be astonished at the greatness, goodness, vagacity, learning, wisdom, &c. of rich and great men; hoping thereby to acquire money, influence, power, friends, and the like.

Because of advantage] Οφελειας χαρις, for the sake of lucre. All the flatterers of the rich are of this kind; and especially those who profess to be ministers of the Gospel, and who, for the sake of a more advantageous settlement or living, will soothe the rich even in their sins. With such persons, a rich man is every thing; and if he have but a grain of grace, his pety is extolled to the skies! I have known several ministers of this character, and wish them all to read the sixteenth verse of Jude.

17. Remember—the words] Instead of following those teachers, and their corrupt doctrine, remember what Christ and His apostles have said; for they foretold the coming of such false teachers and impostors.

18. Mockers in the last time] See the notes on 1 Tim. iv. 1. 2 Tim. iii. 1, &c. and particularly 2 Peter iii. 2, 3, &c. to which Jude seems to refer.

The last time] The conclusion of the Jewish polity.

19. Who separate themselves] From the true church; which they leave from an affectation of superior wisdom.

Sensual] Φυσικοι, animal; living as brute beasts, gulled simply by their own lusts and passions; their Bible being the manifold devices and covetousness of their own hearts: for they have not the Spirit, they are not spiritually-inclined, and have no Holy Ghost; no inspiration from God.

20. Building up yourselves] Have the most holy faith, the Gospel of our Lord Jesus, and the writings of His apostles, for your foundation. Found all your expectations on these; and seek from the Christ, who is their sum and substance, all the grace and glory ye need.

Praying in the Holy Ghost] Holding fast the Divine influence which ye have received; and under that influence making prayer and supplication to God. The prayer that is not sent up through the influence of the Holy Ghost, is never likely to reach heaven.

21. Keep yourselves in the love of God] By building up yourselves on your most holy faith, and praying in the Holy Ghost; for without this, we shall soon lose the love of God.

Looking for the mercy of our Lord] For, although they were to build themselves up, and to pray in the Holy Ghost, and keep themselves in the love of God; yet this building, praying, and keeping, cannot merit heaven; for, after all their diligence, earnestness, self-denial, watching, obedience, &c. they must look for the mercy of the Lord Jesus Christ, to bring them to eternal life.

22. And of some have compassion, making a difference] The general meaning of this exhortation is supposed to be—"Ye are not to deal alike with all those who have been seduced by false teachers; ye are to make a difference between those who had been led away by weakness and imprudence; and those who in the pride and arrogance of their hearts, and their unwillingness to submit to wholesome discipline, have separated themselves from the church, and become its inveterate enemies."

Instead of και ους μη ελεητε διακρινομενοι, and of some have compassion, making a difference, many MSS., Versions, and Fathers, have και ους μη ελεητε διακρινομενος, and some rebuke after having judged them; or, rebuke those that differ; or, some that are wavering, convince; or whatever else the reader pleases: for this and the following verse are all confusion, both in the MSS. and Versions; and it is extremely difficult to know what was the original text. Our own is as likely as any.

23. And others save with fear] "Some of them snatch from the fire; but when they repent, have mercy upon them in fear."—Syriac. "And some of them rebuke for their sins; and on others have mercy when they are convicted; and others save from the fire, and deliver them."—Erpen's Arabic. Mr. Wesley's note has probably hit the sense. "Mean-

INTRODUCTION TO THE REVELATION OF ST. JOHN THE DIVINE

As there has been much controversy concerning the authenticity of this book; and as it was rejected by many for a considerable time; and, when generally acknowledged, was received cautiously by the church; it will be well to examine the testimony by which its authenticity is supported, and the arguments by which its claim to a place in the Sacred Canon is vindicated. Before, therefore, I produce my own sentiments, I shall beg leave to lay before the reader those of Dr. Lardner, who has treated the subject with much judgment.

"We are now come to the last book of the New Testament, the Revelation; about which there have been different sentiments among Christians; many receiving it as the writing of John the apostle and evangelist, others ascribing it to John a presbyter, others to Cerinthus, and some rejecting it, without knowing to whom it should be ascribed. I shall therefore here rehearse the testimony of ancient Christians, as it arises in several ages.

"It is probable that Hormas read the Book of the Revelation, and imitated it; he has many things resembling it. It is referred to by the Martyrs at Lyons. There is reason to think it was received by Papias. Justin Martyr, about the year 140, was acquainted with this book, and received it as written by the apostle John; for, in his dialogue with Trypho, he expressly says, 'A man from among us, by name John, one of the apostles of Christ, in the revelation made to him, has prophesied that the believers in our Christ shall live a thousand years in Jerusalem; and after that shall be the general, and, in a word, the eternal resurrection and judgment of all together.' To this passage we suppose Eusebius to refer, in his ecclesiastical history, when, giving an account of Justin's works, he observes to this purpose. He also mentions the Revelation of John, expressly calling it the apostle's. Among the works of Melito, bishop of Sardis, one of the seven churches of Asia, about the year 177, Eusebius mentions one, intitled, 'Of the Revelation of John.' It is very probable that Melito ascribed this book to the apostle of that name, and esteemed it of canonical authority. Irenæus, bishop of Lyons in Gaul, about A. D. 178, who in his younger days was acquainted with Polycarp, often quotes this book as the Revelation of John, the apostle of the Lord. And in one place he says, 'It was seen not long ago, but almost in our age, at the end of the reign of Domitian.'

"Theophilus was bishop of Antioch about 181. Eusebius, speaking of a work of his against the heresy of Heronogenes, says, 'He therein made use of testimonies, or quoted passages, from John's Apocalypse.' The book of the Revelation is several times quoted by Clement of Alexandria, who flourished about 194; and once in this manner, 'Such an one, though here on earth he is not honoured with the first seat, shall sit upon the four-and-twenty thrones judging the people, as John says in the Revelation.' Tertullian, about the year 200, often quotes the Revelation, and supposes it to have been written by St. John, the same who wrote the First Epistle of John, universally received. Again, the apostle John describes, in the Apocalypse, A sharp two-edged sword coming out of the mouth of God. He also says, 'We have churches that are the disciples of John. For though Marcion rejects the Revelation, the succession of bishops, traced to the original, will assure us that John is the author;' by John, undoubtedly meaning the apostle.

"From Eusebius we learn, that Apollonius, who wrote against the Montanists about 211, quoted the Revelation. By Caius, about 212, it was ascribed to Cerinthus; it was received by Hippolytus about 220, and by Origen about 230. It is often quoted by him. He seems not to have had any doubt about its genuineness. In his commentary upon St. John's Gospel, he speaks of it in this manner: 'Therefore John, the son of Zebedee, says in the Revelation.' Dionysius, bishop of Alexandria, about 247, or somewhat later, wrote a book against the Millenarians, in which he allows the Revelation to be written by John, a holy and divinely inspired man. But he says, 'He cannot easily grant him to be the apostle, the son of Zebedee, whose is the Gospel according to John, and the catholic epistle.' He rather thinks it may be the work of John an elder, who also lived at Ephesus in Asia, as well as the apostle. It also appears, from a conference which Dionysius had with some Millenarians, that the Revelation was about 240, and before, received by Nepos, an Egyptian bishop, and by many others in that country; and that it was in great reputation. It was received by Cyrilian, bishop of Carthage, about 248, and by the church of Rome in his time, and by many Latin authors. The Revelation was received by Novatus and his followers, and by various other authors. It is also probable that it was received by the Manichees. It was received by Lactantius, and by the Donatists; by the latter Arnobius about 460, and by the Arians.

"In the time of Eusebius, in the former part of the fourth century, it was by some not received at all; and therefore it is reckoned by him among the contradicted books. Nevertheless, it was generally received. Eusebius himself seems to have hesitated about it; for he says, 'It is likely the Revelation was seen by John the elder, if not by John the apostle.' It may be reckoned probable, that the critical argument of Dionysius of Alexandria was of great weight with him, and others of that time. The Revelation was received by Athanasius, and by Epiphanius; but we also learn from him, that it was not received by all in his time. It is not in the catalogue of Cyril of Jerusalem, and seems not to have been received by him. It is also wanting in the catalogue of the council of Laodicea, about 363.

"The Revelation is not in Gregory Nazianzen's catalogue; however it seems to have been received by him. It is in the catalogue of Amphilochius; but he says, it was not received by all. It is also omitted in Ebed-jesus's catalogue of the books of Scripture received by the Syrians; nor is it in the ancient Syriac Version.

"It was received by Jerom; but he says, it was rejected by the Greek Christians. It was received by Rufin, by the third Council of Carthage, and by Augustine; but it was not received by all in his time. It is never quoted by Chrysostom, and probably was not received by him. It is in the catalogue of Dionysius called the Areopagite, about 490. It is in the Alexandrian MS. It was received by Sulpicius Severus about 401; and by J. Damascenus, and by Oecumenius, and by many other authors. Andrew, bishop of Caesarea, in Cappadocia, at the end of the fifth century, and Arethas, bishop of the same place, in the sixth century, wrote commentaries upon it. But it was not received by Severian, bishop of Gabala; nor, as it seems, by Theodoret. Upon the whole, it appears that this book has been generally received in all ages, though some have doubted of it, and rejected it; particularly the Syrians, and some other Christians in the east.

"Having thus represented the external evidence of the genuineness of the book of the Revelation, or of its being written by St. John, I should proceed to consider the internal evidence. But I need not enlarge here, but merely take notice of a few things of principal note, which learned men insist upon as arguments, that the Revelation has the same author with the Gospel and epistles that go under the name of the evangelist and apostle John. Chap. i. ver. 1. 'The revelation of Jesus Christ, which God gave unto him, to show unto his servant things which must shortly come to pass. And he sent and signified it by his angel unto his servant John.'

"Hence it is argued, that John styles himself the 'servant of Christ,' in a sense not common to all believers, but peculiarly to those who are especially employed by Him. So Paul and other apostles, call themselves 'servants of God and of Christ.' Particularly Rom. i. 1. 'Paul, a servant of Jesus Christ.' James i. 1. 'James, a servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ.' & Peter i. 1. 'Simon Peter, a servant and an apostle of Jesus Christ.' Jude v. 1. 'Jude, a servant of Jesus Christ.' So Moses is called 'the servant of God,' Numb. xii. 7. and Heb. iii. 2. and in like manner many of the prophets. And in this very book, chap. x. 7. is the expression, 'as he has declared unto his servants, the prophets.'

"This observation may be of some weight for showing that the writer is an apostle; but it is not decisive; and in the same verse, whence this argument is taken, the phrase is used in its general sense; 'Which God gave unto him, to show unto his servants.' Ver. 2. 'Who bare record of the word of God, and of the testimony of Jesus Christ, and of all things that he saw.'

"Some suppose the writer here refers to the written Gospel of St. John; and should be understood to say that he had already 'borne testimony concerning the word of God, and of Jesus Christ.' But these words may be understood of this very book, the Revelation, and the things contained in it. The writer says here, very properly at the beginning, and by way of preface, that he had performed his office in this book, having faithfully recorded in it the word of God, which he had received from Jesus Christ. Certainly, if these words did clearly refer to a written Gospel, they would be decisive; but they are allowed to be ambiguous, and other senses have been given of them. By some they have been understood to contain a declaration that the writer had already borne witness to Jesus Christ before magistrates. Moreover, I think, that if St. John had intended to manifest himself in this introduction, he would more plainly have characterized himself in several parts of this book than he has done. This observation, therefore, appears to me to be of small moment for determining who the writer is.

"Further, it is argued in favour of the genuineness of this book, that 'there are in it many instances of conformity, both of sentiment and expression, between the Revelation and the uncontented writings of St. John. Our Saviour says to his disciples, John xvi. 33. 'Be of good cheer, I have overcome the world.' Christian firmness under trials is several times represented by 'overcoming, overcoming the world,' or 'overcoming the wicked one,' in St. John's first epistle, chap. ii. 13, 14. iv. 4. v. 4, 5. And it is language peculiar to St. John, being in no other books of the New Testament. And our Lord says, Rev. iii. 21. 'To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me in my throne; even as I also overcame, and am set down with my Father in his throne,' comp. chap. ii. 7, 11, 17, 26. iii. 5, 12, 21. and xxi. 7.

"Concerning the time of writing this book, I need not now say much. It is the general testimony of ancient authors, that St. John was banished into Patmos in the time of Domitian, in the latter part of his reign, and restored by his successor Nerva. But the book could not be published till after John's release and return to Ephesus in Asia. As Domitian died in 96, and his persecution did not commence till near the end of his reign, the Revelation seems to be fitly dated in the year 95 or 96. Mill places the Revelation in the year of Christ 96, and the last year of the Emperor Domitian. At first he supposed that the Revelation was written at Patmos; but afterward he altered his mind, and thought it was not written till after his return to Ephesus. He builds his opinion upon the words of Revelation i. 9. If so, I apprehend it might not be published before the year 97; or, at the soonest, near the end of 96. Sausage places the Revelation in 96. Le Clerc, likewise, who readily admits the genuineness of this book, speaks of it in the same year. Mr. Lowman supposes St. John to have had his visions in the Isle of Patmos, in 95; but Mr. Wetstein favours the opinion of those who have argued that the Revelation was written before the Jewish war. He also says, that if the Revelation was written before that war, it is likely that the events of that time should be foretold in it: to which I answer, that though some interpreters have applied some things in this book to those times, I cannot say whether they have done it rightly or not, because I do not understand the Revelation. But to me, it seems, that though this book was written before the destruction of Jerusalem, there was no necessity that it should be foretold here; because our blessed Lord had, in His own preaching, frequently spoken very plainly and intelligibly concerning the calamities coming upon the Jewish people in general, and the city and temple of Jerusalem in particular; and his plain predictions, and symbolical prefigurations of those events, were recorded by no less than three historians and evangelists, before the war in Judea broke out.

"Grotius, who places this book in the reign of Claudius, was of opinion that the visions of this book were seen at different times, and afterward joined together in one book, in the same way as the visions and prophecies of some of the prophets of the Old Testament.

"Concerning this opinion it is not proper for me to dispute; though there appears not any foundation for it in the book itself, as Vitringa has observed. But that the book of the Revelation in its present form, sent as an epistle to the seven churches of Asia, ch. i. ver. 4. was not composed and published before the reign of Domitian, appears to me very probable, from the general and almost universally concurring testimony of the ancients, and from some things in the book itself.

"I shall now transcribe a part of L'Enfant's and Beausobre's Preface to the Revelation, at the same time referring to Vitringa, who has many like thoughts:

"Having quoted Irenæus, Origen, Eusebius, and various other writers, placing St. John's banishment at Patmos in the latter part of the reign of Domitian, and saying that he there saw the Revelation, they say, 'To these incontestable witnesses it is needless to add a long list of others of all ages, and of the same sentiment, to whom the authority of Epiphanius is by no means comparable.' And they go on: 'We must add to so constant a tradition other reasons which farther show, that the Revelation was not written till after Claudius and Nero. It appears from the book itself, that there had been already churches for a considerable space of time in Asia; forasmuch as St. John, in the name of Christ, reproves faults, that happen not but after a while. The church of Ephesus 'had left her first love.' That of Sardis 'had a name to live, but was dead.' The church of Laodicea was fallen into lukewarmness and indifference. But the church of Ephesus, for instance, was not founded by St. Paul before the last years of Claudius. When, in 61 or 62, St. Paul wrote to them from Rome, instead of reproving their want of love, he commends their love and faith, ch. i. 15. It appears from the Revelation, that the Nicolaitans made a sect, when this book was written, since they are expressly named; whereas they were only foretold, and described in general terms by St. Peter, in his second epistle, written after the year 60, and in St.

Jude, about the time of the destruction of Jerusalem by Vespasian. It is evident from many places of the Revelation, that there had been an open persecution in the provinces; St. John himself had been banished to the Isle of Patmos for the testimony of Jesus. The church of Ephesus, or its bishops, is commended for their labour and patience, which seems to imply persecution. This is still more clear in the words directed to the church of Smyrna, ch. ii. 9. 'I know thy works and tribulation.' For the original word always denotes persecution, in the Scriptures of the New Testament; and it is also explained in the following verse. In the thirteenth verse of the same chapter, mention is made of a martyr named Antipas, put to death at Pergamus. Though ancient ecclesiastical history gives us no information concerning this Antipas, it is nevertheless certain, that, according to all the rules of language, what is here said must be understood liberally. All that has been now observed concerning the persecution of which mention is made in the first chapters of the Revelation, cannot relate to the time of Claudius, who did not persecute the Christians, nor to the time of Nero, whose persecutions did not reach the provinces; and therefore, it must relate to Domitian, according to ecclesiastical tradition.

"The visions, therefore, here recorded, and the publication of them in this book, must be assigned, as far as I can see, to the years of Christ 95, and 96, or 97."

The reasoning of Dr. Lardner, relative to the date of the book, is by no means satisfactory to many other critics; who consider it to have been written before the destruction of Jerusalem; and in this opinion they are supported by the most respectable testimonies among the ancients, though of a century or two more the general opinion. Epiphanius says, that John was banished to Patmos by Claudius Cæsar; the date being back the date to about A. D. 50. Andreas, bishop of Cæsarea, in Cappadocia, about A. D. 500, in his Comment on this book, ch. vi. ver. 16, says, John received this Revelation under the reign of Vespasian. This date also might stand before the final overthrow of the Jewish state; though Vespasian reigned to A. D. 79. The Inscription, in 1662, at afterward in the London Polyglott, is the following:—'The Revelation which God made to John the evangelist, in the island of Patmos, to which he was banished by Nero Cæsar.' This places it before the year of our Lord 69, and consequently before the destruction of Jerusalem. Of this opinion are many eminent writers, and among them Hentzenius, Barthelemy, Grotius, Lightfoot, Hammond, Sir Isaac Newton, Henry Newton, Wetstein, and others.

"If the date could be settled, it would be of the utmost consequence to the right interpretation of the book; but, until so many conflicting opinions, this is almost hopeless.

Dr. Lardner has given several proofs, from internal evidence, that the Revelation is the work of St. John: as these are found in it the same forms of expression which are used in his Gospel and epistles; and which are peculiar to the apostle. Wetstein gives a collection, which the reader may examine at his leisure. E. g. compare

Rev. i. 1.	with John xii. 33. xviii. 37. xxi. 19
6.	1 John i. 7.
7.	John xix. 37.
9.	1 John v. 10.
ii. 10.	John xx. 27.
17.	John vi. 32.
iii. 4.	John vi. 65.
7, 9.	John xv. 20. xvii. 6. 1 John ii. 8.
8.	John xxi. 27.
21.	John xii. 37.
21.	1 John ii. 13, 14. iv. 4. v. 5.
vi. 12.	John i. 29.
ix. 6.	John xviii. 26. iii. 17.
xii. 9.	John xii. 31.
xix. 13.	John i. 1.
xxi. 6.	John vii. 37.
xxii. 8, 10.	John viii. 51, 52, 55. xiv. 23, 24.

Dr. Lardner has considered several of these with the addition of other resemblances, in his account of Dionysius, bishop of Alexandria, in A. D. 247. In the third volume of the Works, page 121—126. This mode of proof, as it applies to most of the above references, is not entirely satisfactory.

Dionysius argues, that the style of the Revelation is totally different from that of John in his acknowledged writings; and it seems strange to me that this should be contended by any man of learning. Nothing more simple and unadorned than the narrative of St. John in his Gospel; nothing more plain and natural than his Epistles; but the Revelation, on the contrary, is figurative, rhetorical, laboured, and elevated, to the highest degree. All that can be said here on this subject, is, that if the Spirit of God choose to impart the words and style, as well as the matter, of His communications to men, He may choose what variety He pleases; and speak at different times, and in divers manners, to the same persons. This, however, is not His usual way.

For other matters relative to this subject, I must refer to the following Preface, and to the writers quoted above.

PREFACE TO THE REVELATION OF ST. JOHN THE DIVINE.

Among the interpreters of the Apocalypse, both in ancient and modern times, we find a vast diversity of opinions; but they may be all reduced to four principal hypotheses, or modes of interpretation:

1. The Apocalypse contains a prophetic description of the destruction of Jerusalem, of the Jewish war, and the civil wars of the Romans.

2. It contains predictions of the persecutions of the Christians under the heathen emperors of Rome, and of the happy days of the church under the Christian emperors, from Constantine downwards.

3. It contains prophecies concerning the tyrannical and oppressive conduct of the Roman pontiffs, the true Antichrist; and foretells the final destruction of popery.

4. It is a prophetic declaration of the schism and heresies of Martin Luther, those called reformers, and their successors; and the final destruction of the Protestant religion.

The first opinion has been defended by Professor Wetstein, and other learned men on the continent.

The second is the opinion of the primitive fathers in general, both Greek and Latin.

The third was first broached by the Abbe Joachim, who flourished in the thirteenth century, was espoused by most of the Frenchmen, and has been, and still is, the general opinion of the Protestants.

The fourth seems to have been invented by popish writers, merely by way of retaliation; and has been illustrated and defended at large by a Mr. Walmley (I believe,) titular Dean of Wells, in a work called the History of the Church, under the signed name of Signior Pasterink.

In this work he endeavours to turn every thing against either the Protestants, which they interpreted of the open and popery; and attempts to show, from a computation of the Apocalyptic numbers, that the total destruction of protestantism in the world will take place in 1825! But this is not the first prophecy that has been invented for the sake of an event, the accomplishment of which was earnestly desired; and as a stimulus to excite general attention, and promote needless exertion, when the time of the pretended prophecy was elapsed.

The full title of the book which I quote, is the following: The General History of the Christian Church, from her birth to her final triumphant state in Heaven, chiefly deduced from the Apocalypse of St. John the Apostle. By Sir PASTORIN. Blessed is he that readeth and heareth the words of this prophecy.—APOCALYPSE, Ch. I. ver. 3. printed in the Year MDCCLXXI. 8vo. No place nor printer's name mentioned.

The place where he foretells the final destruction of Protestantism is in p. 249 and 262.

The Catholic College of Maynooth, in Ireland, have lately published a new edition of this work in which the author indly predicts the approaching overthrow of the whole Protestant system both in church and state; and in the mean time gives them, most condescendingly, Abaddon or the devil for their king!

Who the writer of the Apocalypse was, learned men are not agreed. This was a question, as well in ancient as in modern times. We have already seen that many have attributed it to the apostle John; others to a person called John the presbyter, who they say was an Ephesian, and totally different from John the apostle. And, lastly, some have attributed it to Jeremias, a contemporary of John the apostle. This hypothesis, however, seems utterly unsupportable; as there is no probability that the Christian church would have so generally received a work which came from the hands of a man at all men reputed a very dangerous heretic; nor can the doctrines contained, ever comport with a Cerinthian creed.

Whether it was written by John the apostle, John the presbyter, or some other person, is of little importance, if the question of its inspiration be fully established. If written by an apostle, it is canonical; and should be received, without hesitation, as a work divinely inspired. Every apostle acted under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit. John was an apostle, and consequently inspired; therefore, whatever he wrote was written by divine inspiration. If, therefore, the authenticity of the work be established, i. e. that it was written by John the apostle, all the rest necessarily follow.

As I have scarcely any opinion to give concerning this book which I could wish any of my readers to rely, I shall not enter into any discussion relative to the author, or the meaning of his several visions and prophecies; and for general information refer to Dr. Lardner, Michaelis, and others.

Various attempts have been made by learned men to fix the time of this work; but even in this few agree. I shall propose some of the chief of these; and first that of Wetstein, which is the most singular of the whole.

He supposes the book of the Apocalypse to have been written considerable time before the destruction of Jerusalem. The rents described from the fourth chapter to the end he supposes to refer to the Jewish war, and to the civil commotions which took place in Italy while Otho, Vitellius, and Vespasian were contending for the empire. These contentions and destructive wars occupied the space of about three years and a half, during which Professor Wetstein thinks the principal events took place which are recorded in this book. On these subjects he speaks particularly in his notes, at the end of which he subjoins what he calls his Ανακαταλωσις, or Synopsis of the whole work, which I proceed now to lay before the reader.

"This prophecy, which predicts the calamities which God should send on the enemies of the Gospel, is divided into two parts. The first is contained in the closed book; the second in the open book.

I. The first concerns the 'earth and the third part,' i. e. Judea and the Jewish nation.

II. The second concerns 'many peoples, and nations, and tongues, and kings,' ch. x. 11. i. e. The Roman empire.

1. The 'book written within and without, and sealed with seven seals,' ch. v. 1. is the bill of divorce sent from God to the Jewish nation.

2. The 'crowned conqueror on the white horse armed with a bow,' ch. vi. 2. is Artabanus, king of the Parthians, who slaughtered multitudes of the Jews in Babylon.

3. The 'red horse,' ver. 4. The Scarii and robbers in Judea, in the time of the proconsul Felix and Festus.

4. The 'black horse,' ver. 5. The famine under Claudius.

5. The 'pale horse,' ver. 8. The plague which followed the robberies and the famine.

6. The 'souls of those who were slain,' ver. 9. The Christians in Judea, who were persecuted, and were now about to be avenged.

7. The 'great earthquake,' ver. 12. The commotions which preceded the Jewish rebellion.

8. The 'servants of God from every tribe, sealed in their foreheads,' ch. vii. 3. The Christians taken under the protection of God, and warned by the prophets to flee immediately from the land.

9. The 'silence for half an hour,' ch. viii. 1. The short truce granted at the solicitation of king Agrippa. Then follows the rebellion itself.

1. The 'trees are burnt,' ver. 7. The fields and villages, and unfortified places of Judea, which first felt the bad effects of the sedition.

2. The 'burning mountain cast into the sea, which' in consequence 'became blood,' ver. 8. and,

3. The 'burning star falling into the rivers, and making the waters bitter,' ch. viii. 10, 11. The slaughter of the Jews at Caesarea and Scythopolis.

4. The 'eclipsing of the sun, moon, and stars,' ver. 12. The anarchy of the Jewish commonwealth.

5. The 'locusts like scorpions hurting men,' ch. ix. 3. The expedition of Cassius Gallus, prefect of Syria.

6. The 'army with arms of divers colours,' ver. 16, 17. The armies under Vespasian in Judea. About this time Nero and Galba died; after which followed the civil war, signified by 'the sounding of the seventh trumpet,' ch. x. 7, 11. xi. 15.

1. The 'two prophetic witnesses, two olive-trees, two candlesticks,' ch. xi. 3, 4. Teachers in the church, predicting the destruction of the Jewish temple and commonwealth.

2. The 'death of the witnesses,' ver. 7. Their flight, and the fight of the church of Jerusalem, to Pella, in Arabia.

3. The 'resurrection of the witnesses, after three days and a half,' ver. 11. The predictions began to be fulfilled at a time in which their accomplishment was deemed impossible; and the doctrine of Christ begins to prevail over Judea, and over the whole earth.

4. The 'tenth part of the city fell in the same hour, and seven thousand names of men slain,' ver. 13. Jerusalem seized by the Idumeans; and many of the priests and nobles, with Anna, the high-priest, signified by names of men, i. e. men of name, slain by the zealots.

5. The 'woman clothed with the sun; the moon under her feet, and a crown of twelve stars on her head,' ch. xii. 1. The Christian church.

6. The 'great red dragon seen in heaven, with seven heads, seven diadems, and ten horns,' ver. 6. The six first Caesars, who were all made princes at Rome, governing the armies and the Roman people with great authority; especially Nero, the last of them, who, having killed his mother, cruelly persecuted the Christians, and afterward turned his wrath against the rebellious Jews.

7. The 'seven-headed beast from the sea, having ten horns surrounded with diadems,' ch. xiii. 1. Galba, Otho, and Vitellius, who were shortly to reign, and who were proclaimed emperors by the army.

9. 'One head' i. e. the seventh, cut off, ver. 3. Galba.

10. 'He who leatheth into captivity, shall be led into captivity; he who killeth with the sword, shall be killed with the sword,' ver. 10. Otho, who subdued the murderers of Galba, and slew himself with a dagger: Vitellius, who bound Sabinius with chains, and was himself afterward bound.

11. 'Another beast rising out of the earth, with two horns,' ver. 11. Vespasian and his two sons, Titus and Domitian, elected emperors at the same time in Judea.

12. The 'number of the wild beast 666, the number of a man,' TETTAN, Titan or Titus: T, 300. E, 5. I, 10. T, 300. A, I. N, 50. making in the whole 666. [But some very respectable MSS. have 616 for the number; if the N be taken away from Teitan, then the letters in Teita make exactly the sum 616.]

13. A 'man sitting upon a cloud with a crown of gold upon his head, and a sickle in his hand,' ch. xiv. ver. 14. Otho and his army, about to prevent supplies for the army of Vitellius.

14. An 'angel of fire commanding another angel to gather the vintage; the wine-press trodden, whence the blood flows out 1600 furlongs.' The followers of Vitellius laying all waste with fire; and the Bebriciæ conquering the followers of Otho with great slaughter.

Then follow the seven plagues:

1. The 'grievous sore,' ch. xvi. 2. The diseases of the soldiers of Vitellius through intemperance.

2. The 'sea turned into blood,' ver. 3. The fleet of Vitellius beaten, and the maritime towns taken from them by the Flavii.

3. The 'rivers turned into blood,' ver. 4. The slaughter of the adherents of Vitellius, at Cremona, and elsewhere, near rivers.

4. The 'scorching of the sun,' ver. 8. The diseases of the Vitelli increasing, and their exhausted bodies impatient of the heat.

5. The 'seat of the beast darkened,' ver. 10. All Rome in commotion through the torpor of Vitellius.

6. 'Euphrates dried up, and a way made for the kings of the East; and the three unclean spirits like frogs.' The Flavii besieging Rome with a trouble army; one part of which was by the bank of the Tiber.

3. The 'eighth, which is of the seven,' ver. 11. Otho, destined by adoption to be the son and successor of Galba.

4. The 'ten horns,' ver. 12-16. The leaders of the Flavian factions.

5. The 'merchants of the earth,' ch. xviii. 11. I. e. of Rome, which was then the emporium of the whole world.

6. The 'beast and the false prophet,' ch. xix. 20. Vespasian and his family, contrary to all expectation, becoming extinct in Domitian, as the first family of the Cæsars, and of the three princes, Galba, Otho, and Vitellius.

7. 'The millennium, or a thousand years,' ch. xx. 2. Taken from Psa. xc. 4. a time appointed by God, including the space of forty years, from the death of Domitian to the Jewish war, under Adrian.

8. 'Gog and Magog going out over the earth,' ver. 8. Barchochebas, the false Messiah, with an immense army of the Jews, coming forth suddenly from their caves and dens, tormenting the Christians, and carrying on a destructive war with the Romans.

9. 'The New Jerusalem,' ch. xxi. 1, 2. The Jews being brought so low as to be capable of injuring no longer; the whole world resting after being expiated by wars; and the doctrine of Christ propagated and prevailing every where with incredible celerity.

Wetstein contends, (and he is supported by very great men among the ancients and moderns,) that "the book of the Revelation was written before the Jewish war, and the civil wars in Italy: that the important events which took place at that time, the greatest that ever happened since the foundation of the world, were worthy enough of the Divine notice, as the affairs of His church were so intimately connected with them; that his method of exposition proves the whole book to be a well-connected series of events; but the common method of interpretation, founded on the hypothesis that the book was written after the destruction of Jerusalem is utterly destitute of certainty; and leaves every commentator to the urinations of his own fancy; as is sufficiently evident from what has been done already on this book; some interpreters leading the reader now to Thebes, now to Athens, and finding in the words of the sacred penman Constantine the Great; Arius, Luther, Calvin; the Jesuits; the Albigenses; the Bohemians; Chemnitzius; Elizabeth, queen of England; Cecil, her treasurer; and who not!"—See Wetstein's Gr. Test. Vol. II. pag. 869.

Those who consider the Apocalypse as a prophecy and scenical exhibition of what shall happen to the Christian church to the end of the world, lay this down as a proposition, which comprises the subject of the whole book:—"The contest of Christ with his enemies; and His final victory and triumph over them."—See I Cor. xv. 25. Matt. xxiv. Mark xlii. Luke xxi. but what is but briefly hinted in the above Scriptures, is detailed at large in the Apocalypse, and represented by various images nearly in the following order:—

1. The decrees of the Divine Providence concerning what is to come, are declared to John.

2. The manner in which these decrees are printed in the most vivid colours.

3. Then follow thanksgivings to God, Governor of all things, for these manifestations of wisdom, and goodness.

After the Ecce and the seven epistles to the churches of Asia Minor, to whose angels it seems to be dedicated, (ch. i. ii. iii.) the scene is opened in heaven, full of majesty; and promise of a revelation relative to the church, ch. iv. v.

The enemies of the church of Christ, who had then most to fear, were the Jews, the false teachers. All these are overcome by them He triumphs gloriously. First of all threatened to the enemies of the kingdom preservation of His own followers, in their terms; and these determinations are the praises and thankgivings of all the heads and of all good men, ch. vi.—x.

Each takes a different view of the plot, though, in substance, not differing much. According to this writer, the whole is represented of a drama, the parts of which are the title, chap. i. 1-5. II. The prologue, chap. i. 6-17. which it is stated, that the argument of the Christians; epistles being sent to the churches in the symbolic style, are represented by the Next follows the drama itself, the parts of which are the prologue, or prelude, chap. i. viii. 6. in which is prepared and adorned.

Taken in this sense, each work to be most exquisitely finished, and had a truly poetic mind, polished by the high to have been accurately acquainted with times and nations, and to have enriched his choicest spoils.

My readers will naturally expect that I should have decided preference to some one of the opinions or produce one of my own; I can do neither; I intend to explain the book; I do not understand things which concern so sublime and awful a subject, as my predecessors, indulge in conjectures.

elaborate works on the subject, and each seemed right till another was examined. I am satisfied that no certain mode of interpreting the prophecies of this book has yet been found out; and I will not add another monument to the littleness or folly of the human mind, by endeavouring to strike out a new course. I repeat it, I do not understand the book; and I am satisfied that not one who has written on the subject knows any thing more of it than myself: I should, perhaps, except J. E. Clarke, who has written on the Number of the Beast. His interpretation amounts nearly to demonstration; but that is but a small part of the difficulties of the Apocalypse; that interpretation, as the most probable ever yet offered to the public, shall be inserted in its proper place; as also his illustration of the xliith, xliiith, and xliiith chapters. As to other matters, I must leave them to God, or to those events which shall point out the prophecy; and then, and probably not till then, will the sense of these visions be explained.

A conjecture concerning the design of the book, may be safely indulged; thus, then, it has struck me, that The book of the Apocalypses may be considered as a PROPHET continued in the church of God, uttering predictions relative to all times, which have their successive fulfillments as ages roll on; and thus it stands in the Christian church in the place of the succession of prophets in the Jewish church; and by this special economy PROPHECY IS STILL CONTINUED, IS ALWAYS SPEAKING; and yet a succession of prophets rendered unnecessary. If this be so, we cannot too much admire the wisdom of the contrivance which still continues the voice and testimony of prophecy, by means of a very short book, without the assistance of any extraordinary messenger, or any succession of such messengers, whose testimony would at all times be liable to suspicion, and be the subject of infidel and malevolent criticism, howsoever unexceptionable to ingenious minds the credentials of such might appear.

On this ground it is reasonable to suppose, that several prophecies contained in this book have been already fulfilled; and that, therefore, it is the business of the commentator to point such out. It may be so; but as it is impossible for me to prove that my conjecture is right, I dare not enter into proceedings upon it, and must refer to Bishop Newton, and such writers as have made this their particular study.

After having lived in one of the most eventful eras of the world; after having seen a number of able pens employed in the illustration of this and other prophecies; after having carefully attended to those facts which were supposed to be the most probable proofs of the fulfillment of such and such visions, wars, tempests, murders, and vicissitudes of the Apocalypse; after seeing the issue of that most terrible struggle which the French nation, the French republic, the French consulates, and the French empire, have made to regain and preserve their liberties, which, like arguing in a circle, have terminated where they began, without one political or religious advantage to them or to mankind; and after viewing how the prophecies of this book were supposed to apply almost exclusively to these events, the writers and explainers of these prophecies keeping pace in their publications with the rapid succession of military operations, and confidently promising the most glorious issue, in the final destruction of superstition, despotism, arbitrary power, and tyranny of all kinds, nothing of which has been realized! I say, viewing all these things, I feel myself at perfect liberty to state that, to my apprehension, all these prophecies have been misapprehended and misapprehended; and that the key to them is not yet entrusted to the sons of men. My readers will, therefore, excuse me from any exposure of my ignorance or folly, by attempting to do what many, with much more wisdom and learning, have attempted, and what every man to the present day has failed in, who has preceded me in expositions of this Book. I have no other mountain to heap on those already piled up; and if I had, I have not strength to lift it: those who have courage may again make the trial; already we have had a sufficiency of vain efforts.

VIRG. G. l. 281.

With mountains piled on mountains, thrice they strove
To scale the steep battlements of Jove:
And thrice his lightning and red thunder play'd,
And their demolished works in ruin laid. DRYDEN.

I had resolved, for a considerable time, not to meddle with this book, because I foresaw that I could produce nothing satisfactory on it: but when I reflected that the literal sense and phraseology might be made much plainer by the addition of philological and critical notes; and that, as the diction appeared in many places to be purely rabbinical, (a circumstance to which few of its expositors have attended,) it might be rendered plainer by examples from the ancient Jewish writers; and that several parts of it spoke directly of the work of God in the soul of man, and of the conflicts and consolations of the followers of Christ, particularly in the beginning of the book, I changed my resolution, and have added short notes where I thought I understood the meaning.

I had once thought of giving a catalogue of the writers and commentators on this book, and had begun a collection of this kind; but the question of Oui bene? What good end is this likely to serve? not meeting with a satisfactory answer in my own mind, caused me to throw this collection aside. I shall notice two only.

1. The curious and learned work, intitled "A Plain Discovery of the whole Revelation of St. John," written by Sir John Napier, inventor of the Logarithms, I have particularly described in the general Preface to the Holy Scriptures, prefixed to Genesis, to which the reader is requested to refer.

2. Another work, not less singular, and very rare, intitled "The Image of both churches, after the most wonderful and heavenly Revelation of Saint John the Evangelist, containing a very fruitful exposition or paraphrase upon the same: wherein it is conferred with the other Scriptures, and most authorized histories. Compiled by John Bale, an exile also in thys life for the faithful testimony of Jesus." Printed at London by Thomas East, 18mo. without date.

The author was at first a Carmelite; but was afterward converted to the protestant religion. He has turned the whole of the Apocalypse against the Romish church; and it is truly astonishing to see with what address he directs every image, metaphor, and description, contained in this book, against the corruptions of this church. He was made bishop of Ossory, in Ireland; but was so persecuted by the papists that he narrowly escaped with his life, five of his domestics being murdered by them. On the accession of Mary he was obliged to take refuge in the Low Countries, where it appears he compiled this work. As he was bred up a papist, and was also a priest, he possessed many advantages in attacking the strongest holds of his adversaries. He knew all their secrets, and he uncovered the whole: he was acquainted with all their rites, ceremonies, and superstitions; and finds all distinctly marked in the Apocalypse, which he believes was written to point out the abominations, and to forest the final destruction, of this corrupt and intolerant church. I shall make a few references to his work in the course of the following notes. In chap. xvii. ver. 1. the author shows his opinion, and speaks something of himself: "Come hither, I will show thee the judgment of the great whore," &c. "Come hither, friends John, I will show thee in secretness the terrible judgment of the great whore, or counterfeit church of hypocrites.—Needs must this whore be Rome, for that she is the great city which reigneth over the kings of the earth. Evilent it is both by Scriptures and Chronicles that in John's days, Rome had hir dominion over all the whole world; and being infected with the abominations of all lands, rightly is shee called Babylou, or cite of confusion. And like as in the Scriptures ofte tymes under the name of Jerusalem is ment the whole kingdom of Juda, so under the name of Rome here may be understood the universal world, with all their abominations and divilishnesses, their idolatryes, witchcraftes, sectes, superstitions, papacyes, priest-hoodes, religion, shavings, anointings, blessings, sensings, processions, and the divil of all such beggeries. For all the people since Christes ascension, hath this Rome infected with hir pestilent poisons gathered from all idolatrous nations, such time as she held over them the monarchial suppremit. At the wryting of this prophecy, felt John of their crueltie, being exiled into Pathmos for the faithful testimony of Jesus. And so did I poore creature, with my poore wife and children, at the gathering of this present Commentary, flying into Germany for the same," &c.

Shall I have the reader's pardon if I say, that it is my firm opinion that the expositions of this book have done great disservice to religion; almost every commentator has become a prophet; for, as soon as he began to explain, he began also to prophesy. And what has been the issue? Disappointment laughed at hope's career; and superficial thinkers have been led to despise and reject prophecy itself. I shall sum up all that I wish to say farther in the words of GRÆGORIUS:—*Mixta Apocalypsis valde obscura videtur; et talis, cuius explicatio citra periculum, viz. quæ tentari. the first begotten of the dead, and the prince of the kings of the earth. Unto him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood.

6 And hath made us kings and priests unto God and his Father; to him be glory and dominion for ever and ever. Amen. 7 Behold, he cometh with clouds; and every eye shall see him, and they also which pierced him: and all kindreds of the earth shall wail because of him. Even so, Amen.

8 I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the ending, with the Lord, which is, and which was, and which is to come, the Almighty.

1 1 Cor. 15:27. Col. 1:13.—a Eph. 1:20. Ch. 17:14. & 18:15.— John 13:31 & 15:9. Gal. 2:20.— Heb. 1:14. 1 John 1:7.— 1 Pet. 2:8, 9. Ch. 5:10 & 9:15.— 1 Tim. 6:16. Heb. 12:9. 1 Pe. 4:11 & 5:11.— Dan. 7:13. Matt. 11:30 & 95:94. Acts 1:11.— Zech. 14:9. John 19:37.

attributed to the love of God, who gave His Son; and to the love of Christ, who died for us.—See John iii. 16.

Washed us from our sins] The redemption of the soul, with the remission of sins, and purification from unrighteousness, is here, as in all the New Testament, attributed to the blood of Christ shed on the cross for man.

6 Kings and priests] See on 1 Pet. ii. 5, 9. But, instead of βασιλεις και ιερωτες, kings and priests, the most reputable MSS. Versions, and Fathers, have βασιλεις ιερωτες, a kingdom, and priest; i. e. a kingdom of priests, or a royal priesthood. The regal and sacerdotal dignities are the two highest that can possibly exist among men; and these two are here mentioned to show the glorious prerogatives and state of the children of God.

To him be glory] That is, to Christ; for it is of him that the prophet speaks, and of none other.

For ever and ever] Εως των αιωνων των αιωνων, to ages of ages; or rather through all indefinite periods, through all time, and through eternity.

Amen] A word of affirmation and approbation; so it shall be; and so it ought to be.

7 Behold, he cometh with clouds] This relates to His coming to execute judgment on the enemies of His religion: perhaps to His coming to destroy Jerusalem, as he was to be particularly manifested to them that pierced Him: which must meet the incredulous and rebellious Jews.

And all kindreds of the earth] Παντα α φολαι της γης, all the tribes of the land. By this the Jewish people are most evidently intended; and therefore the whole verse may be understood as predicting the destruction of the Jews; and is a presumptive proof that the Apocalypse was written before the final overthrow of the Jewish state.

Even so, Amen] Ναι, αμην, ναι, αμην. It is true, so be it. Our Lord will come and execute judgment on the Jews and Gentiles. This the Jews and Romans particularly felt.

8 I am Alpha and Omega] I am from eternity to eternity. This mode of speech is borrowed from the Jews, who express the whole compass of things by α αλεφ and τ ταυ; the first and last letters of the Hebrew alphabet: but as St. John was writing in Greek, he accommodates the whole to the Greek alphabet, of which α alpha, and Ω omega, are the first and last letters. With the rabbins τ ταυ "to maleph vead tau," from αλεφ to ταυ," expressed the whole of a matter, from the beginning to the end. So in Yalcut Rubens, fol. 17. A Adam transgressed the whole law, from αλεφ to ταυ; i. e. from the beginning to the end.

Ibid. fol. 48. A. Abraham observed the law from αλεφ to ταυ; i. e. he kept it entirely, from beginning to end.

Ibid. fol. 123. B. When the holy blessed God pronounced a blessing on the Israelites, He did it from αλεφ to ταυ; i. e. He did it perfectly.

The beginning and the ending] That is, as αλεφ, or alpha, is the beginning of the alphabet, so am I the Author and Cause of all things: as ταυ, or omega, is the end or last letter of the alphabet, so am I the End of all things; the Destroyer as well as the Establisher of all things. This clause is wanting in almost every MS. and Version of importance. It appears to have been added first as an explanatory note, and in process of time crept into the text. It is worthy of remark, that as the union of α αλεφ and τ ταυ in Hebrew, make ταυ αθ, or et, which the rabbins interpret of the first matter out of which all things were formed; see on Gen. i. 1. so the union of Α alpha and Ω omega in Greek, make the verb αω, I breathe; and may very properly in such a symbolical book point out Him in whom we live, and move, and have our being: for, having formed man out of the dust of the earth, He breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and he became a living soul: and it is by the inspiration or in-breathing of His Spirit, that the souls of men are quickened; made alive from the dead, and fitted for life eternal. He adds also, that he is the Almighty, the all-powerful Framers of the universe, and the Inspirer of men.

9 Your brother] A Christian begotten of God and incorporated in the heavenly family.

Compassion in tribulation] Suffering under the persecution in which you also suffer.

In the kingdom] For we are a kingdom of priests unto God. And patience of Jesus] Meekly bearing all indignities, privations, and sufferings, for the sake, and after the example, of our Lord and Master.

The isle that is called Patmos] This island is one of the Sporades, and lies in the Ægean Sea, between the island of Kos, and the promontory of Miletus. It is now called 9 I John, who also am your brother, and a companion in tribulation, and in the kingdom and patience of Jesus Christ, was in the isle that is called Patmos, for the word of God, and for the testimony of Jesus Christ.

10 I was in the Spirit on the Lord's day, and heard behind me a great voice, as of a trumpet, 11 Saying, I am Alpha and Omega, the first and the last: and, What thou seest write in a book, and send it unto the seven churches which are in Asia; unto Ephesus, and unto Smyrna, and unto Pergamos, and unto Thyatira, and unto Sardis, and unto Philadelphia, and unto Laodicea.

Pactino, Patmol, or Palmosa. It has derived all its celebrity from being the place to which St. John was banished by one of the Roman emperors; whether Domitian, Claudius, or Nero, is not agreed on: but it was most probably the latter. The island has a convent on a well fortified hill, dedicated to John the apostle; the inhabitants are said to amount to about three hundred men, and about twenty women to one man. It is very barren, producing very little grain, but abounding in partridges, quails, turtles, pigeons, snipes, and rabbits. It has many good harbours, and is much infested by pirates. Patmos, its capital, and chief harbour, lies in east long. 26° 24', north lat. 37° 24'. The whole island is about thirty miles in circumference.

For the testimony of Jesus Christ] For preaching Christianity, and converting heathens to the Lord Jesus.

10 I was in the Spirit] That is, I received the Spirit of prophecy, and was under its influence when the first vision was exhibited.

The Lord's day] The first day of the week, observed as the Christian Sabbath, because on it Jesus Christ rose from the dead: therefore it was called the Lord's day; and has taken place of the Jewish Sabbath throughout the Christian world.

I heard behind me a great voice] This voice came unexpectedly and suddenly. He felt himself under the Divine afflatus; but did not know what scenes were to be represented.

As of a trumpet] This was calculated to call in every wandering thought, to fix his attention, and solemnize his whole frame. Thus God prepared Moses to receive the law. See Exod. xix. 16, 19, &c.

11 I am Alpha and Omega, the first and the last: and] This whole clause is wanting in A. B. C. thirty-one others; some editions; the Syriac, Coptic, Ethiopic, Armenian, Slavonic, Vulgate, Arcthus, Andrade, and Primianus. Griesbach has left it out of the text.

Saying—What thou seest, write in a book] Carefully note down every thing that is represented to thee. John had the visions from heaven; but he described them in his own language and manner.

Send it unto the seven churches] The names of which immediately follow. In Asia—This is wanting in the principal MSS. and Versions. Griesbach has left it out of the text.

Ephesus] This was a city of Ionia, in Asia Minor, situated at the mouth of the river Cayster, on the shore of the Ægean Sea, about fifty miles south of Smyrna.—See Preface to the Epistle to the Ephesians.

Smyrna] Now called also Smirna, is the largest and richest city of Asia Minor. It is situated about one hundred and eighty-three miles west by south of Constantinople, on the shore of the Ægean Sea. It is supposed to contain about one hundred and forty thousand inhabitants, of whom there are from fifteen to twenty thousand Greeks, six thousand Armenians, five thousand Roman Catholics, one hundred and forty Protestants, eleven thousand Jews, and fifteen thousand Turks. It is a beautiful city, but often ravaged by the plague, and seldom two years together free from earthquakes. In 1768, the city was nearly desolated by the plague; scarcely a sufficient number of the inhabitants survived to gather in the fruits of the earth. In 1698 there was a terrible earthquake here, which overthrew a great number of houses: in one of the shocks, the rock on which the castle stood, opened, swallowed up the castle, and five thousand persons! On these accounts, nothing but the love of gain, so natural to man, could induce any person to make it his residence; though in other respects, it can boast of many advantages. In this city the Turks have nineteen mosques; the Greeks two churches; the Armenians one, and the Jews eight synagogues; and the English and Dutch factories have each a chaplain. Smyrna is one hundred miles north of the island of Rhodes, long. 27° 25' E. lat. 38° 28' N.

Pergamos] A town of Mysia, situated on the river Caicus. It was the royal residence of Eumenes, and the kings of the race of the Attali. It was anciently famous for its library, which contained, according to Plutarch, two hundred thousand volumes. It was here that the membræ Pergamæna, Pergamæna skins, were invented; from which we derive our word parchment. Pergamos was the birth-place of Galen, and in it, P. Scipio died. It is now called Pergama, and Bergama, and is situated in long. 27° 0' E. lat. 38° 13' N.

Thyatira] Now called Atessa, and Ak-kissar, a city of Natolia, in Asia Minor, seated on the river Hermus, in a plain, eighteen miles broad, and is about fifty miles from Pergamos: long. 27° 49' E. lat. 36° 15' N. The houses are chiefly built 12 And I turned to see the voice that spake with me. And being turned, I saw seven golden candlesticks; 13 And in the midst of the seven candlesticks one like unto the Son of man, clothed with a garment down to the foot, and girt about the paps with a golden girdle. 14 His head and his hairs were white like wool, as white as snow; and his eyes were as a flame of fire; 15 And his feet like unto fine brass, as if they burned in a furnace; and his voice as the sound of many waters. 16 And he had in his right hand seven stars: and out of his mouth went a sharp two-edged sword: and his countenance was as the sun shined in his strength.

of earth, but the mosques are all of marble. Many remarkable ancient inscriptions have been discovered in this place.

Sardis] Now called Sardo, and Sart, a town of Asia, in Natolia, about forty miles east from Smyrna. It is seated on the side of mount Tmolus, and was once the capital of the Lydian kings, and here Croesus reigned. It is now a poor inconsiderable village. Long 28° 5' E. lat. 37° 51' N.

Philadelphia] A city of Natolia, seated at the foot of mount Tmolus, by the river Cogamus. It was founded by Attalus Philadelphia, brother of Eumenes, from whom it derived its name. It is now called Alak-shaker, and is about forty miles E. S. E. of Smyrna. Long 28° 15' E. lat. 38° 28' N.

Laodices] A town of Phrygia, on the river Lycus; first called Diopollis, or the city of Jupiter. It was built by Antiochus Theos, and named after his consort Laodice. See the note on Col. ii. 1. And, for a very recent account of these seven churches, see a letter from the Reverend Henry Lindsay, inserted at the end of chap. iii.

12. And I turned] For he had heard the voice behind him. To see the voice, i. e. the Person from whom the voice came. Seven golden candlesticks] Επτα χρυσιας κηραις, seven golden lamps. It is absurd to say, a golden, silver, or brass candlestick. These seven lamps, represented the seven churches, in which the light of God was continually shining, and the love of God continually burning. And they are here represented as golden, to show how precious they were in the sight of God. This is a reference to the temple at Jerusalem, where there was a candlestick, or chandelier, of seven branches, or rather six branches; three springing out on either side, and one in the centre. See Esak. xxvii. 17—23. This reference to the temple seems to intimate that the temple of Jerusalem was a type of the whole Christian church.

13. Like unto the Son of man] This seems a reference to Dan. vii. 13. This was our blessed Lord Himself, ver. 13.

Clothed with a garment down to the foot] This is a description of the high-priest in his sacerdotal robes.—See these described at large in the notes on Esak. xxviii. 4, &c. Jesus is our high-priest even in heaven. He is still discharging the sacerdotal functions before the throne of God.

Golden girdle] The emblem both of regal and sacerdotal dignity.

14. His head and his hairs were white like wool] This was not only an emblem of His antiquity; but it was the evidence of His glory: for the whiteness or splendour of His head and hair, doubtless proceeded from the rays of light and glory which encircled His head, and darted from it in all directions. The splendour around the head was termed by the Romans nimbus, and by us, a glory; and was represented round the heads of gods, deified persons, and saints.

His eyes were as a flame of fire] To denote His omniscience, and the all-penetrating nature of the Divine knowledge.

15. His feet like unto fine brass] An emblem of His stability and permanence, brass being considered the most durable of all metallic substances.

The original word χαλκολιβανον, means the famous aurichalcum, or fictitious metal, which, according to Suidas, εδος κλειστερον, τιμιωτερον χρυσου, was "of the colour of amber, and more precious than gold." It seems to have been a composition of gold, silver, and brass; and the same with the Corinthian brass, so highly famed and valued; for, when Lucius Mummius took and burnt the city at Corinth, many statues of these three metals, being melted, had run together, and formed the composition already mentioned, and which was held in as high estimation as gold.—See Pliny, Hist. Nat. lib. 34. c. 2. Florus, lib. 2. c. 16. It may, however, mean no more than copper melted with the lapid calaminarius, which converts it into brass; and the flame that proceeds from the metal, during this operation, is one of the most intensely and insufferably vivid that can be imagined. I have often seen several furnaces employed in this operation; and the flames burning up through the earth, for these furnaces are underground, always called to remembrance this description given by St. John—His feet of fine brass, as if they burned in a furnace; the propriety and accuracy of which none could doubt, and every one must feel, who has viewed this most dazzling operation.

His voice as the sound of many waters] The same description we find in Esak. xliii. 2. The glory of the God of Israel came from the way of the east: and His voice was like the noise of many waters: and the earth shined with His glory.

17 And when I saw him, I fell at his feet, laid his right hand upon me, saying unto me, the first and the last:

18 I am he that liveth, and was dead; alive for evermore, Amen; and have the death.

19 Write the things which thou hast seen, which are, and the things which shall be.

20 The mystery of the seven stars which my right hand holdeth, and the seven golden candlesticks are the angels of the seven churches which thou sawest above.

Out of his mouth went a sharp two-edged sword intended to point out the judgments sent by Christ against the rebellious Jews, &c.: God's judgments were just now given. The sharp two-edged sword may represent general, according to that saying of the Lord, The word of God is quick and powerful, two-edged sword: piercing even to the soul and spirit, &c. And the word of sword of the Spirit, Eph. vi. 17.

And his countenance was as the splendour of the sun] His face was like the disk of the east summer's day, when there were no splendour of his rays. A similar form of it in Judges v. 31. Let him that love him see earth's power in his might. And a similar form found, Midraah in Yalcut Simeoni, "When Moses and Aaron came and stood before the Lord, they appeared like the ministering angels, like the cedars of Lebanon; מן השרות נעקבו עיניהם domin legolotey elipile of their eyes were like the wheels of beams were as the grove of the palm-trees, ready princelyness, keviv shamah: and the faces was as the splendours of the sun."

17. I fell at his feet as dead] The appearance of the Lord had the same effect upon the appearance of Gabriel had the same effect, viii. 17. The terrible splendour of such a man the apostle could bear; and he fell dead; but was soon enabled to behold communication of strength from our Lord's right hand.

In the Jerusalem Targum are these words,— "There are four keys which He never trusts either to angel or of the rain. 2. The key of provision. grave. And 4. The key of the barren woman. In Sanhedrim, fol. 113. 1. It is said, "A woman of Sarepta died, Elijah requested to give the key of the resurrection of the dead, him, there are three keys, which are not of the apostle: the key of life, the key of the resurrection of the dead." From evident that we should understand αδης, hell, nor the place of separated spirits, but the key we find to be merely the emblem of authority. Christ can both save and make alive. Death is still under his dominion and the dead whomsoever He pleases, tion and the life.

19. Write the things which thou hast seen and prophesies are for general instruction every circumstance must be faithfully recorded, was to be written; and what he wrote to the seven churches, must be also written to see afterwards, concerning other churches, was to be recorded likewise.

20. The mystery] That is, the allegorical seven stars is the seven angels or ministers, and the allegorical meaning of the seven churches themselves.

1. In the seven stars there may be an allusion to the seven planets, each of a particular metal, which verified all instructions; and as these metals were frequently worn upon the fingers, there may be a brilliant set in rings, and worn on the hand. In Jer. xxii. 24. Jeremiah is represented the right hand of the Lord; and that ringa, see Gen. xxxviii. 18, 25. Exod. xxviii. 11. Dan. vi. 17. Hag. ii. 23. On close examination, we shall find that all the symbols in this book have their foundation either in nature, fact, custom, or general opinion.

2 The churches are represented by these lamps; they hold the oil and the fire, and dispense the light. A lamp is not light in itself; it is only the instrument of dispensing light, and it must receive both oil and fire, before it can dispense any: so, no church has in itself either grace or glory; it must receive all from Christ, its Head; else it can dispense neither light nor life.

3 The ministers of the Gospel are signets, or seals, of Jesus Christ; He uses them to stamp His truth, to accredit it, and give it currency. But, as a seal can mark nothing of itself, unless applied by a proper hand; so the ministers of Christ can do no good, seal no truth, impress no soul, unless the great Owner condescend to use them.

4 How careful should the church be that it have the oil and the light, that it continue to burn and send forth Divine knowledge. In vain does any church pretend to be a church of Christ, if it dispense no light: if souls are not enlightened, quickened, and converted in it. If Jesus walk in it, its light will shine both clearly and strong, and sinners will be converted unto Him; and the members of that church will be children of the light, and walk as children of the light, and of the day; and there will be no occasion of stumbling in them.

5 How careful should the ministers of Christ be, that they proclaim nothing as truth, and accredit nothing as truth but what comes from their Master.

They should also take heed, lest, after having preached to others, themselves should be castaways; les. God should say unto them as He said of Coniah—As I live, saith the Lord, though Coniah, the son of Jehoiakim, were the signet upon my right hand, yet would I pluck thee thence.

On the other hand, if they be faithful, their labour shall not be in vain: and their safety shall be great. He that toucheth them toucheth the apple of God's eye; and none shall be able to pluck them out of His hand. They are the angels and ambassadors of the Lord; their persons are sacred; they are the messengers of the churches, and the glory of Christ. Should they lose their lives in the work, it will be only a speedier entrance into an eternal glory.

The rougher the way, the shorter their stay;

The troubles that rise

Shall gloriously hurry their souls to the skies.

NOTES.—I must here advertise my readers.—1. That I do not perceive any metaphorical or allegorical meaning in the epistles to these churches. 2. I consider the churches as real; and that their spiritual state is here really and literally pointed out; and that they have no reference to the state of the church of Christ in all ages of the world, as has been imagined; and that the notion of what has been termed the Ephesian state, the Smyrnan state, the Pergamenean state, the Thyatirian state, &c. &c. is unfounded, absurd, and dangerous; and such explications should not be entertained by any who wish to arrive at a sober and rational knowledge of the Holy Scriptures. 3. I consider the angel of the church as signifying the messenger, the pastor sent by Christ and His apostles to teach and edify that church. 4. I consider what is spoken to this angel as spoken to the whole church; and that it is not his particular state that is described, but the states of the people in general, under his care.

The Epistle to the Church at Ephesus.

Verse 1. Unto the angel of the church of Ephesus] By angels, angel, we are to understand the messenger or person sent by God to preside over this church: and to him the epistle is directed, not as pointing out his state, but the state of the church under his care. Angel of the church, here, answers exactly to that officer of the synagogue among the Jews, called מַשְׁלֵיחַ שְׁלִיחַ תַּיְבוֹר, the messenger of the church, whose business it was to read, pray, and teach in the synagogue. The church at Ephesus is first addressed, as being the place where John chiefly resided; and the city itself was the metropolis of that part of Asia. The angel or bishop at this time was, most probably, Timothy, who presided over that church before St. John took up his residence there; and who is supposed to have continued in that office till A. D. 97, and to have been martyred a short time before St. John's return from Patmos.

Holdeth the seven stars] Who particularly preserves, and guides, and upholds, not only the ministers of those seven churches, but all the genuine ministers of his Gospel, in all ages and places.

Walketh in the midst of the seven golden candlesticks] Is the Supreme Bishop and Head not only of those churches, but of all the churches or congregations of His people throughout the world.

2. I know thy works] For the eyes of the Lord are throughout the earth, beholding the evil and the good: and being omnipresent, all things are continually open and naked before Him. It is worthy of remark, that whatsoever is preterit in any of these churches, is first mentioned: thereby intimating that God is more intent on finding out the good, than the evil, in any person or church; and that those who wish to reform such as have fallen, or are not making sufficient advances in the Divine life, should take occasion which yet remains, to encourage them to set out afresh for the kingdom of heaven. The fallen, or backsliding, who have any tenderness of conscience left, are easily discouraged; and are apt to think, that there is no seed left from which any harvest can be reasonably expected. Let such be told, that there is still a seed of godliness remaining; and that it requires only watching and strengthening the things which remain, by prompt application to God through Christ, in order to bring them back to the full enjoyment of all they have lost; and to renew them in the spirit of their mind. Ministers continually harping on ye are dead, ye are dead, there is little or no Christianity among you, &c. &c. are a contagion in a church; and spread desolation and death wherever they go. Is it not easy to say in such cases—“Ye have lost ground; but ye have not lost all your ground: ye might have been much farther advanced; but through mercy ye are still in the way. The Spirit of God is grieved by you; but, it is evident, he has not forsaken you. Ye have not walked in the light as ye should; but your candlestick is not yet removed, and still the light shines. Ye have not much zeal, but ye have a little. In short, God still strives with you; still loves you; still waits to be gracious to you; take courage, set out afresh; come to God through Christ; believe—love—obey—and you will soon find days more blessed than you have ever yet experienced.” Exhortations and encouragements of this kind are sure to produce the most blessed effects; and under such the work of God infallibly revives.

And thy labour] He knew their works in general. Though they had left their first love, yet still they had so much love as excited them to labour, and enabled them to bear persecution patiently, and to keep the faith; for they could not tolerate evil men; and they had put fictitious apostles to the test, and had found them to be liars, pretending a Divine commission while they had none; and teaching false doctrines as if they were the truths of God.

3. And hast borne] The same things mentioned in the preceding verse, but in an inserted order; the particular reason of which does not appear; perhaps it was intended to show more forcibly to this church, that there was no good which they had done, nor evil which they had suffered, that was forgotten before God.

And hast not fainted] They must therefore have had a considerable portion of this love remaining, else they could not have thus acted.

4. Nevertheless I have somewhat against thee] The clause should be read according to the Greek text:—But I have against thee, that thou hast left thy first love. They did not retain that strong and ardent affection for God and sacred things which they had, when first brought to the knowledge of the truth, and justified by faith in Christ.

5. Remember] Consider the state of grace in which you once

14 But I have a few things against thee, because thou hast there them that hold the doctrine of <sup>a</sup> Balaam, who taught Balac to cast a stumbling-block before the children of Israel, <sup>b</sup> to eat things sacrificed unto idols, <sup>c</sup> and to commit fornication.

15 So hast thou also them that hold the doctrine <sup>d</sup> of the Nicolaitans, which thing I hate.

<sup>a</sup> Num. 24. & 25. 1. & 2. 16. 2 Pa. 2. 15. Jude 11.—Ver. 20. Act. 13. 9. I Cor. 5. 11. & 10. 19, 20.

Satan has his throne; where he reigns as king, and is universally obeyed. It was a maxim among the Jews, that where the law of God was not studied, there Satan dwelt; but he was obliged to leave the place, where a synagogue or academy was established.

Those holdest [ast my name] Notwithstanding that the profession of Christianity exposed this church to the bitterest persecution, they held fast the name of Christian, which they had received from Jesus Christ;—and did not deny his faith; for, when brought to the trial, they openly professed themselves disciples and followers of their Lord and Master.

Antipas was my faithful martyr] Who this Antipas was we cannot tell. We only know that he was a Christian, and probably bore some office in the church; and became illustrious by his martyrdom in the cause of Christ. There is a work extant, called, The Acts of Antipas which makes him bishop of Pergamos, and states that he was put to death, by being enclosed in a burning brazen bull. But this story confutes itself, as the Romans, under whose government Pergamos then was, never put any person to death in this way. It is supposed that he was murdered by some mob, who chose this way to vindicate the honour of their God Æsculapius, in opposition to the claims of our Lord Jesus.

14. I have a few things against thee] Their good deeds are first carefully sought out and commended; what was wrong in them is touched with a gentle but effectual hand.

The followers of Balaam, the Nicolaitans, and the Gnostics, were probably all the same kind of persons; but see on ver. 6. What the doctrine of Balaam was, see the notes on Num. xlii. xvi. and xxi. It appears that there were some then in the church at Pergamos who held eating things offered to idols, in honour of those idols, and fornication, indifferent things. They associated with idolaters in the heathen temples, and partook with them in their religious festivals.

15. The doctrine of the Nicolaitans] See on ver. 6.

16. Will fight against them with the sword of my mouth]—See on ver. 12. He now speaks for their edification and salvation; but if they do not repent, He will shortly declare those judgments which shall unavoidably fall upon them.

17. The hidden manna] It was a constant tradition of the Jews that the ark of the covenant, the tables of stone, Aaron's rod, the holy anointing oil, and the pot of manna, were hidden by king Josiah, when Jerusalem was taken by the Chaldeans; and that these shall all be restored in the days of the Messiah. Jesus is the ark, the oil, the rod, the testimony, and the manna. He who is partaker of His grace has all those things in their spiritual meaning and perfection.

I will give him a white stone] I. It is supposed, that by the white stone is meant pardon, or acquittance, and the evidence of it; and that there is an allusion here to the custom observed by judges in ancient times, who were accustomed to give their suffrages by white and black pebbles: those who gave the former, were for absolving the culprit; those who gave the latter, were for his condemnation. This is mentioned by Ovid, Metam. lib. xv. ver. 41.

*Mos erat antiquus, niveis atriisque lapillis,
His damnare reos, illis absolvere culpa.
Nunc quoque sic lata est sententia triasti:*

"A custom was of old, and still remains,
Which life or death by suffrages ordains:
White stones and black within an urn are cast,
The first absolve, but fate is in the last." DRYDEN.

II Others suppose there is an allusion here to conquerors in the public games, who were not only conducted with great pomp into the city to which they belonged, but had a white stone given to them, with their name inscribed on it; which badge entitled them, during their whole life, to be maintained at the public expense—See Pind. Olymp. vii. v. and the Schoia there; and see the collections in Vetstein, and Rosenmüller's note. These were called Tessera among the Romans; and of these there were several kinds.

1. Tessera convivales, which answered exactly to our cards of invitation, or tickets of admission to a public feast or banquet; when the person invited produced his tessera, he was admitted. The mention of the hidden manna here may seem to intimate that there is a reference to these convivial tessera; whether given to the victor in the public games, entitling him to be fed at the public expense, or to a particular friend inviting him to a family meal, or to a public banquet.

2. There were tessera inscribed with different kinds of things, such as provisions, garments, gold or silver vessels, horses, mares, slaves, &c. These were sometimes thrown by the Roman emperors among the crowd in the theatres; and he that could, snatched one, and on producing it, he received the name of which was inscribed on it.—But from Dio Casarius it appears that those tessera were small wooden 16 Repent; or else I will come unto thee quickly, and will fight against them with the sword of my mouth.

17. He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches; To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the hidden manna, and will give him a white stone, and in the stone <sup>a</sup> a new name written, which no man knoweth saving he that receiveth it.

<sup>a</sup> I Cor. 6. 12. Eccl.—Ver 6.—Ira 11. 4. 2 Thess. 2. 8. Ch. 1. 16. & 19. 15. 21.—Ver 7, 11.—I Ch. 3. 12. & 16. 12.

balls, whereas the tessera, in general, were square, whence they had their name, as having four sides, angles, or corners. illi reserapay, vel reserapay vocabant, figuram quemvis quadratam, quæ quatuor angulos haberet:—and these were made of stone, marble, bone or ivory, lead, brass, or other metal.—See Pitiscus.

3. Tessera frumentaria, or tickets to receive grain in the public distributions of corn; the name of the person who was to receive, and the quantum of grain, being both inscribed on this badge or ticket. Those who did not need this public provision for themselves, were permitted to sell their ticket; and the bearer was entitled to the quantum of grain mentioned on it.

4. But the most remarkable of these instruments were the tessera hospiales, which were given as badges of friendship and alliance; and on which some device was engraved, as a testimony that a contract of friendship had been made between the parties. A small oblong square piece of wood, bone, stone, or ivory, was taken and divided into two equal parts, on which each of the parties wrote his own name, and then interchanged it with the other. This was carefully preserved, and handed down even to posterity in the same family; and by producing this when they travelled, it gave a mutual claim to the bearers, of kind reception and hospitable entertainment at each other's houses.

It is to this custom, that Plautus refers in his Pænorulus, Act v. sc. 2. ver. 80. In the interview between Agerastocles, and his unknown uncle Hanno!

HANNO.—O mi popularis, salve!
AGERASTOCLES.—*Et tu edepol, quætuque es.
Et si quid opus est, quæmo, dic; atque impera,
Popularitate cassus.*

HANNO.—Habeo gratiam.
*Veram ego Me hospitium habeo: Antidamas filium
Quætu comonstra, si novisti, Agerastoclem?
Ephem adolecentem tu Me sociasti Agerastoclem?*

AGER.—Siquidem tu Antidama Me quaris adprobritium, Ego cum ipse, quem tu quaris.

HAN.—Hem! quid ego audio?
AGER.—Antidama gratum me esse.
HAN.—*Si ita est, tesseram
Conferre, si vis hospitalem, eccam, adtuli.*

AGER.—Agedum huc ostende; est par probe: nam habeo domi.
HAN.—*O mi hospes, salve multum! nam mihi tuus pater,
Pater tuus ergo, hospes Antidamas fuit.
Hæc mihi hospitibus tessera cum illo fuit.*

AGER.—*Ergo Me apud me hospitium tibi probabitur.
Nam hauri vixitio hospitium neque Carthaginem,
Inde sim oriundus.*

HAN.—Dii dent tibi omnes quæ velis.
Hanno.—*Mail, my countryman!
Agerastocles.*—I hail thee also, in the name of Pollux, whoever thou art. And if thou have need of any thing, speak, I beseech thee, and thou shalt obtain what thou askest, for civility's sake.

Han.—I thank thee, but I have a lodging here; I seek the son of Antidamas. Tell me if thou knowest Agerastocles: dost thou know in this place the young Agerastocles?

Ager.—If thou seek the adopted son of Antidamas, I am the person whom thou seekest.

Han.—Ha! what do I hear?
Ager.—Thou hearest that I am the son of Antidamas.
Han.—If it be so, compare, if thou pleasest, the hospitable tessera: here it is, I have brought it with me.

Ager.—Come then, reach it hither: it is the exact counterpart, I have the other at home.

Han.—O my friend, I am very glad to see thee, for thy father was my friend; therefore Antidamas thy father was my guest. I divided this hospitable tessera with him.

Ager.—Therefore a lodging shall be provided for thee with me; I reverence hospitality, and I love Carthage where I was born.

Han.—May all the gods grant thee whatsoever thou wishest. The tessera taken in this sense, seems to have been a kind of tally; and the two parts were compared together to ascertain the truth. Now, it is very probable that St. John may allude to this; for, on this mode of interpretation, every part of the verse is consistent. 1. The word ἄσπες, does not necessarily signify a stone of any kind, but a suffrage, sentence, decisive vote; and in this place seems answerable to the tessera.—The tessera which Hanno had, he tells us, in his Punic language, was inscribed with the image or name of his god. "Stigillium hospitii mei est tabula scripta, cujus sculptura est Deus meus." This is the interpretation of the Punic words at the beginning of the above 5th Act of the Panulus, as given by Bochart. 2. The person who held it had a right to entertainment in the house of him who originally gave it;

18 And unto the angel of the church in Thyatira write ; These things saith the Son of God, who hath his eyes like unto a flame of fire, and his feet are like fine brass ;

19 I know thy works, and charity, and service, and faith, and thy patience, and thy works ; and the last to be more than the first.

20 Notwithstanding I have a few things against thee, because thou suffereſt that woman Jezebel, which calleth herself a prophetess, to teach and to seduce my servants to commit fornication, and to eat things sacrificed unto idols.

21 And I gave her space to repent of her fornication ; and she repented not.

22 Behold, I will cast her into a bed, and them that commit aultery with her into great tribulation, except they repent of their deeds.

23 And I will kill her children with death ; and all the

for it was in reference to this that the friendly contract was made. 3. The names of the contracting persons, or some device, were written on the tessera, which commemorated the friendly contract : and as the parts were interchanged, none could know that name or device, or the reason of the contract, but he who received it. 4. This gave the bearer a right to the offices of hospitality, when produced ; he was accommodated with food, lodging, &c. as far as these were necessary ; and to this the eating of the hidden manna may refer.

But what does this mean in the language of Christ ?—1. That the person is taken into an intimate state of friendship with Him. 2. That this contract is witnessed to the party by some especial token, sign, or seal, in which he may have recourse to support his claim, and identify his person. This is probably what is elsewhere called the earnest of the Spirit : see the note on Eph. i. 14, and the places there referred to. He then who has received, and retains the witness of the Spirit, that he is adopted into the heavenly family, may humbly claim, in virtue of it, his support of the bread and water of life ;—the hidden manna, every grace of the Spirit of God ;—and the tree of life ; immortality, or the final glorification of His body and soul throughout eternity. 3. By this state of grace into which he is brought, he acquires a new name, the name of a child of God ; the earnest of the Spirit, the tessera which he has received, shows him this new name. 4. And this name of child of God, no man can know or understand but he who has received the tessera, or Divine witness. 5. As his Friend and Redeemer may be found every where, because He fills the heavens and the earth, every where he may, on retaining this tessera, claim direction, succour, support, grace, and glory : and therefore the privileges of him who overcometh are the greatest and most glorious that can be imagined.

18. These things saith the Son of God See the notes on chap. i. 14, 15.

19. I know thy works And of these he first sets forth their charity, τῆν ἀγάπην, their love to God and each other ; and particularly to the poor and distressed : and hence followed their faith, τῆν πίστιν, their fidelity, to the grace they had received ; and service, τῆν διακονίαν, and ministrations : properly pious and benevolent service to widows, orphans, and the poor in general.

And thy patience Τῆν ὑπομονὴν σου, thy perseverance under afflictions and persecutions ; and thy continuance in well-doing. I put faith before service, according to the general consent of the best MSS. and Versions.

Thy works The continued labour of love, and thorough obedience.

The last to be more than the first They not only retained what they had received at first, but grew in grace, and in the knowledge and love of Jesus Christ. This is a rare thing in most Christian churches ; they generally lose the power of religion, and rest in the forms of worship ; and it requires a powerful revival to bring them to such a state that their last works shall be more than their first.

20. That woman Jezebel There is an allusion here to the history of Ahab and Jezebel, as given in 2 Kings ix. x. And although we do not know who this Jezebel was ; yet, from the allusion, we may take it for granted she was a woman of power and influence in Thyatira, who corrupted the true religion, and harassed the followers of God in that city, as Jezebel did in Israel. Instead of that woman Jezebel, τῆν γυναῖκα Ἰεζαβὴλ, many excellent MSS. and almost all the ancient Versions, read τῆν γυναῖκα ἐκ Λαβάρ, ἣν ὠνόμαζεν Jezebel : which intimates, indeed asserts, that this bad woman was the wife of the bishop of the church ; and his criminality in suffering her was therefore the greater. This reading Griesbach has received into the text. She called herself a prophetess, i. e. set up for a teacher ; taught the Christians that fornication, and eating things offered to idols, were matters of indifference, and thus they were seduced from the truth. The messenger, or bishop of this church, probably her husband, suffered this ; he had power to have cast her and her party out of the church ; churches shall know that I am he who reins and hearts : and I will give unto every one according to your works.

24 But unto you I say, and unto the rest in many as have not this doctrine, and which have the depths of Satan, as they speak ; I will put upon you other burden.

25 But that which ye have already ; hold fast, lest ye lose it. And he that overcometh, and keepeth unto the end, to him will I give power over the nations.

27 And he shall rule them with a rod of iron, as vessels of a potter shall they be broken to shivers before me.

28 And I will give him the morning star.

29 He that hath an ear, let him hear what is said unto the churches.

or, as his wife, to have restrained her ; but he and thus she had every opportunity of seducing them. This is what Christ had against the messenger.

21. I gave her space to repent This allusion of Jezebel. God first sent Elijah to Ahab to rebuke judgment upon him ; upon which Ahab repented, and so God put off his punishment until he should repent. This allusion means the like punishment pronounced against Jezebel also put off. Thus God gave her time to repent ; but she did not ; but, instead of that, seduced her servants : see 1 Kings xxi. 2, 3, 29. According to law, the punishment of idolatrous seducers was layed at all ; but God sometimes showed more much more under the Christian dispensation, to try if they were truly penitent, and thus produces the correction in the case of this Jezebel.—See Eccles. viii.

22. Behold, I will cast her into a bed To the same history. Ahaziah, son of Ahab, by his mother's ill instruction and example, followed God punished him by making him fall down from the top of the terrace over his house, a ridden for a long time, under great anguish ; by to give him time to repent ; but when, instead of consulting Banezeb, Elijah was sent to p down against him in impenitence. Thus the son had committed idolatry, with and by her advice into the bed of affliction, and not repenting, did in manner his brother Jehoram succeeded like while Jezebel had time and warning enough though she did not prenil with Jehoram to idolatrous worship of Baal ; yet she persisted notwithstanding God's warnings. The sacrifice, here threatens the Gnostic Jezebel to make she delighteth, as adulterers in the bed of lust place, occasion, and instrument, of her gratification in Israhel, the bed is made a symbol of tribulation of body and mind.—See Isa. xxviii. 20.

23. And I will kill her children with death certainly destroy her offspring and memory, as her designs. Jezebel's two sons being both slain ; and after that all the seventy sons of Ahab, in all which the hand of God was very visible manner, God predicts the destruction of the heretics referred to.—See ver. 16. It should seem, I am he which searcheth the reins and these heretics lurked about, and sowed their truth secretly. But our Saviour tells them that for He had power to bring their deeds to light vine power of searching into the wills and affections, and hereby He would both show them and according to His title. The Son of God ; and happy into their actions, that like a fire they every thing, and burn up the chaff, which is carnal ; so that the depths of Satan, mentioned in to which this alludes, (Christ assuming here the trial,) shall avail nothing to those who think, by their to undermine the Christian religion ; He will to light, but baffle all their evil intentions.

24. But unto you I say, and unto the rest rest, &c. This is the reading of the Complutensian preferable to the common one, as it evidently rest of the epistle wholly concerns the faithful received the former doctrine of error. I will give none other burden is a commendation of the church ; that they have no need of any new charge to be given them ; no new advice, but as usual.—See Rom. xv. 14, 15. The expression taken from the history of Ahab, 2 Kings ix. laid this burden on him : a word often used to signify a prophecy threatening heavy things. See on Israhel xli. i. and Numb. iv. 19.—See l.

It is worthy of remark, that the Gnostics esteem the depths of God, and the depths of Babylon that they contained the most profound secrets. Christ here calls them the depths of Satan, pieces of his subtlety. Perhaps they thought of God, while all the time they were deceived

25. That which ye have] That is, the pure doctrine of the Gospel;—hold fast till I come; till I come to execute the judgments which I have threatened.

26. Power over the nations] Every witness of Christ has power to confute and confound all the false doctrines and maxims of the nations of the world; for Christianity shall at last rule over all; the kingdom of Christ will come, and the kingdoms of this world become the kingdoms of our God, and of His Christ.

27. He shall rule them with a rod of iron] He shall restrain vice by the strictest administration of justice; and those who finally despise the word, and rebel, shall be broken and destroyed, so as never more to be able to make head against the truth. This seems to refer to the heathen world; and perhaps Constantine the Great may be intended, who, when he overcame Licinius, became the instrument in God's hand of destroying idolatry over the whole Roman empire; and it was so effectually broken as to be ever after like the fragments of an earthen vessel; of no use in themselves, and incapable of being ever united to any good purpose.

28. And I will give him the morning star.] He shall have the brightest and most glorious empire, next to that of Christ Himself. And it is certain, that the Roman empire under Constantine the Great, was the brightest emblem of the latter day glory which has ever yet been exhibited to the world. It is well known that sun, moon, and stars, are emblems, in prophetic language, of empires, kingdoms, and states. And as the morning star is that which immediately precedes the rising of the sun, it probably here intends an empire which should usher in the universal sway of the kingdom of Christ.

Ever since the time of Constantine, the light of true religion has been increasingly diffused; and is shining more and more unto the perfect day.

29. He that hath an ear] Let every Christian pay the strictest regard to these predictions of Christ: and let them have a suitable influence on his heart and life.

The epistle to the church of Sardis, 1.—6. The epistle to the church of Laodicea, 14.—22. [A. M. cir. 4100. A. D. cir. 96.]

AND unto the angel of the church in Sardis write; These things saith he that hath the seven Spirits of God, and the seven stars; b I know thy works, that thou hast a name that thou livest, c and art dead.

2 Be watchful, and strengthen the things which remain, that are ready to die: for I have not found thy works perfect before God.

3 Remember therefore how thou hast received and heard, and hold fast, and repent. If therefore thou shalt not watch, I will come on thee as a thief, and thou shalt not know what hour I will come upon thee.

4 Thou hast a few names even in Sardis which have not defiled their garments; and they shall walk with me in white: for they are worthy.

5 He that overcometh, he shall be clothed in white raiment; and I will not blot out his name out of the book of life, but I will confess his name before my Father, and before his angels.

6 He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches.

7 And to the angel of the church in Philadelphia write; These things saith he that is holy, he that is true, he that hath the key of David, he that openeth, and no man shutteth; and he that shutteth, and no man openeth;

8 I know thy works; behold, I have set before thee an open door, and no man can shut it: for thou hast a little strength, and hast kept my word, and hast not denied my name.

9 He that cometh, he shall enter in, and shall be with me, and he shall eat and drink of my table, and I will be his God, and he shall be my people.

10 He that shutteth, he shall be without God, and without cities, and without synagogues, and without any: and he shall be hated of all them which shall read this book of the prophecy of this book.

NOTES.—Epistle to the Church of Sardis.—Verse 1. The seven Spirits of God] See the note on ch. 1. 4. 16, &c.

Thou hast a name that thou livest] Ye have the reputation of Christians, and consequently of being alive to God, through the quickening influence of the Divine Spirit. But ye are dead; ye have not the life of God in your souls: ye have not walked consistently and steadily before God, and His Spirit has been grieved with you; and He has withdrawn much of His light and power.

Be watchful] Ye have lost ground by carelessness and inattention. Awake, and keep awake!

Strengthen the things which remain] The convictions and good desires, with any measure of the fear of God; and of a tender conscience, which, although still subsisting, are about to perish; because the Holy Spirit, who is the Author of them, being repeatedly grieved, is about finally to depart.

Thy works perfect] Περαινομενα, filled up. They performed duties of all kinds; but no duty completely. They were constantly beginning, but never brought any thing to a proper end. Their resolutions were languid, their strength feeble, and their light dim. They probably maintained their reputation before men; but their works were not perfect before God.

Remember] Enter into a serious consideration of your state.

How thou hast received] With what joy, zeal, and gladness, ye heard the Gospel of Christ when first preached to you.

Hold fast] Those good desires and heavenly influences which still remain.

And repent] Be humbled before God, because ye have not been workers together with Him; but have received much of His grace in vain.

If therefore thou shalt not watch] If you do not consider your ways, watching against sin; and for opportunities to receive and do good;

I will come on thee as a thief] As the thief comes, when he is not expected; so will I come upon you, if ye be not watchful; and cut you off from life and hope.

Thou hast a few names even in Sardis] A few persons; names being put for those who bore them. And as the members of the church were all enrolled, or their names entered in a book, when admitted into the church, or when baptized, names are here put for the people themselves.—See ver. 6.

Have not defiled their garments] Their souls. The Hebrews considered holiness as the garb of the soul, and evil actions as stains or spots on this garb. So in Shabbath, fol. 162. 2. "A certain king gave royal garments to his servants: those who were prudent folded them up, and laid them by in a chest; those who were foolish put them on, and performed their daily labour in them. After some time, the king asked for those royal robes: the wise brought theirs white and clean; the foolish brought theirs spotted with dirt. With the former the king was well pleased; with the latter he was angry. Concerning the former he said, Let those garments be laid up to my wardrobe; and let the persons go home in peace. Of the latter he said, Let the garments be put into the hands of the fuller: and cast those who wore them into prison." This parable is spoken on these words of Ecclesiastes, ch. xii. 7 The spirit shall return to God who gave it.

They shall walk with me in white] They shall be raised to a state of eternal glory; and shall be for ever with their Lord.

I will not blot out his name] This may be an allusion to the custom of registering the names of those who were admitted into the church, in a book kept for that purpose; from which custom our baptismal registers in churches are derived. These are properly books of life, as there those who were born unto God were registered; as in the latter, those who were born in that parish were enrolled. Or, there may be allusions to the white raiment worn by the priests; and the erasing of the name of any priest out of the sacerdotal list, who had either sinned, or was found not to be of the seed of Aaron. In Middoth, fol. 37. 2. "The great council of Israel sat and judged the priests. If in a priest any vice was found, they stripped off his white garments, and clothed him in black; in which he wrapped himself, went out, and departed. Him in whom no vice was found, they clothed in white; and he went and took his part in the ministry, among his brother priests."

I will confess his name] I will acknowledge that this person is My true disciple, and a member of My mystical body. In all this there may also be an allusion to the custom of registering citizens. Their names were entered into books, according to their condition, tribes, family, &c. and when dead, or had by unconstitutional acts forfeited their rights of citizenship, the name was blotted out, or erased from the registers.—See the note on Exod. xxxii. 32.

He that hath an ear] The usual caution and counsel carefully to attend to the things spoken to the members of that church; in which every reader is more or less interested.

Epistle to the church of Philadelphia.

He that is holy] In whom holiness essentially dwells; and from whom all holiness is derived.

He that is true] He who is the Fountain of truth; who cannot lie, nor be imposed on. From whom all truth proceeds; and whose veracity in His Revelation is unimpeachable.

He that hath the key of David] See this metaphor explained, Mat. xvi. 19. Key is the emblem of authority and knowledge; the key of David, is the regal right or authority of David. David could shut or open the kingdom of Israel to whom he pleased. He was not bound to leave the kingdom, even to his eldest son. He could choose whom he pleased to succeed him. The kingdom of the Gospel, and the kingdom of heaven, are at the disposal of Christ. He can shut against whom He will: He can open to whom He pleases. If He shuts, no man can open: if He opens, no man can shut. His determination all stand fast: and none can reverse them.—This expression is an allusion to Isa. xlii. 22. where the prophet promises to Eliakim, under the symbol of the key of the house of David, the government of the whole nation; i. e. all the power of the king, to be executed by him as his deputy; but the words, as here applied to Christ, show that He is absolute.

He that is filthy] He who is filthy, and he that is filthy, and he that is filthy, shall be without God, and without cities, and without synagogues, and without any: and he shall be hated of all them which shall read this book of the prophecy of this book.

He that is filthy] He who is filthy, and he that is filthy, and he that is filthy, shall be without God, and without cities, and without synagogues, and without any: and he shall be hated of all them which shall read this book of the prophecy of this book.

He that is filthy] He who is filthy, and he that is filthy, and he that is filthy, shall be without God, and without cities, and without synagogues, and without any: and he shall be hated of all them which shall read this book of the prophecy of this book.

He that is filthy] He who is filthy, and he that is filthy, and he that is filthy, shall be without God, and without cities, and without synagogues, and without any: and he shall be hated of all them which shall read this book of the prophecy of this book.

He that is filthy] He who is filthy, and he that is filthy, and he that is filthy, shall be without God, and without cities, and without synagogues, and without any: and he shall be hated of all them which shall read this book of the prophecy of this book.

He that is filthy] He who is filthy, and he that is filthy, and he that is filthy, shall be without God, and without cities, and without synagogues, and without any: and he shall be hated of all them which shall read this book of the prophecy of this book.

He that is filthy] He who is filthy, and he that is filthy, and he that is filthy, shall be without God, and without cities, and without synagogues, and without any: and he shall be hated of all them which shall read this book of the prophecy of this book.

He that is filthy] He who is filthy, and he that is filthy, and he that is filthy, shall be without God, and without cities, and without synagogues, and without any: and he shall be hated of all them which shall read this book of the prophecy of this book.

He that is filthy] He who is filthy, and he that is filthy, and he that is filthy, shall be without God, and without cities, and without synagogues, and without any: and he shall be hated of all them which shall read this book of the prophecy of this book.

9 Behold, I will make them of the synagogue of Satan, which say they are Jews, and are not, but do lie; behold, I will make them to come and worship before thy feet, and to know that I have loved thee.

10 Because thou hast kept the word of my patience, I also will keep thee from the hour of temptation, which shall come upon all the world, to try them that dwell upon the earth.

11 Behold, I come quickly: hold that fast which thou hast, that no man take thy crown.

12 Him that overcometh will I make a pillar in the temple of my God, and he shall go no more out: and I will write upon him the name of my God, and the name of the city of my God, which is the new Jerusalem, which cometh down out of heaven from my God: and I will write upon him my new name.

13 He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches.

8. I have set before thee an open door: I have opened to thee a door to proclaim and diffuse My word; and, notwithstanding there are many adversaries to the spread of my Gospel, yet none of them shall be able to prevent it.

Thou hast a little strength: Very little political authority or influence; yet thou hast kept my word; hast kept the true doctrine—and hast not denied my name by taking shelter in heathenism, when Christianity was persecuted. The little strength may refer either to the smallness of the numbers, or to the littleness of their grace.

9. I will make them: Show them to be of the synagogue of Satan, who say they are Jews, pretending thereby to be of the synagogue of God, and consequently His true and peculiar children.

I will make them to come and worship: I will so dispose of matters in the course of my Providence, that the Jews shall be obliged to seek unto the Christians for toleration, support, and protection; which they shall be obliged to sue for in the most humble and abject manner.

To know that I have loved thee: That the love which was formerly fixed on the Jews, is now removed, and transferred to the Gentiles.

10. The word of my patience: The doctrine which has exposed you to so much trouble and persecution; and required so much patience and magnanimity to bear up under its attendant trials.

The hour of temptation: A time of sore and peculiar trial, which might have proved too much for their strength. He who is faithful to the grace of God, is often hidden from trials and difficulties, which fall without mitigation on those who have been unfaithful in his covenant. Many understand by the hour of temptation, the persecution under Trajan, which was greater and more extensive than the preceding ones under Nero and Domitian.

To try them: That is, such persecutions will be the means of trying and proving those who profess Christianity; and showing who were sound and thorough Christians, and who were not.

11. Behold, I come quickly: These things will shortly take place; and I am coming with my consolations and rewards to my faithful followers; and with judgments to my adversaries.

Take thy crown: God has provided mansions for you: let none through your fall, occupy those seats of blessedness.

12. A pillar in the temple: There is probably an allusion here to the two pillars in the temple of Jerusalem, called Jachin and Boaz, stability and strength. The church is the temple: Christ is the foundation on which it is built: and His ministers are the pillars, by which, under Him, it is adorned and supported. St. Paul has the same allusions, Gal. ii. 9.

I will write upon him the name of my God: That is, I will make him a priest unto myself. The priest had written on his forehead כהן קודש kodesh layhovah; "Holiness to the Lord."

And the name of the city of my God: As the high-priest had on his breastplate the names of the twelve tribes engraved, and these constituted the city or church of God; Christ here promises, that in place of them, the twelve apostles, representing the Christian church, shall be written, which is called the New Jerusalem: and which God has adopted in place of the twelve Jewish tribes.

My new name: The Saviour of ALL; the light that lightens the GENTILES. THE CHRIST, the anointed One; the only GOVERNOR of His Church, and the Redeemer of ALL mankind.

There is here an intimation, that the Christian church is to endure for ever; and the Christian ministry to last as long as time endures. He shall go no more out for ever.

Epistle to the Church of the Laodiceans.

14. These things saith the Amen: That is, He who is true, or faithful: from אמן aman, he was true; immediately interpreted, the faithful and true witness.—See ch. i. 5.

The beginning of the creation of God: That is, the Head and Governor of all creatures: the King of the creation.—See on Coloss. i. 15. By His titles here, He prepares them for the humiliating and awful truths which He was about to declare; and the authority on which the declaration was founded.

14 And unto the angel of the church write; I These things saith the Amen, the witness, the beginning of the creation of God: I know thy works, that thou art neither would thou wert cold or hot.

15 So then because thou art lukewarm, and hot, I will spue thee out of my mouth.

17 Because thou sayest, I am rich, and increased and have need of nothing; and knowest not that thou mayest be rich; and white raiment, to be clothed, and that the shame of thy nakedness be not upon thee, and anoint thine eyes with eyesalve, I see.

19 As many as I love, I rebuke and chastise: therefore, and repent.

Ch. 2. 7. — Or, in Laodicea.—Im. 26. 16.—m. Ch. 1. 5. & 19. Col. 1. 15.—n. Ver. 1.—p. Hos. 12. 8. [C. 4. 9.—q. Isa. 52. 1. Mat. 5. 3. Ch. 7. 13. & 16. 15. & 19. 8.—Job 5. 17. Prov. 3. 11, 12. Heb. 12. 12.]

15. Thou art neither cold nor hot: Ye are not Christians: neither good nor evil; neither false doctrine, nor thoroughly addicted to truth. In a word, they were listless and indifferent: care little whether heathenism or Christianity should prevail. Though they felt little zeal either for the salvation of souls, or that of others, yet they had such a glow of the truth and importance of Christianity, that they would not readily give it up.

I would thou wert cold or hot: That is, ye had: adopt some part or other, and be in earnest attachment to it. If ever the words of Mr. Erskine's Sonnets, were true, they were true of this class.

To good and evil equal bent:

I'm both a devil and a saint."

They were too good to go to hell: too bad to go to heaven. Like Ephraim and Judah, Hos. vi. 4. O Ephraim, I do unto thee? O Judah, what shall I do unto thee? your goodness is as a morning cloud; and, it passeth away. They had good dispositions, but were captivated by evil ones. And they had evil dispositions, but were captivated by good ones. In their turn, yielded to those that were good, and justice and mercy seem puzzled to know whether to punish them. This was the state of the Laodicean church. Lord expresses here in this apparent wish, expressed by Epictetus, Ench. ch. 36. ένα αυτων η κακον ειπαι. "Thou oughtest to be either a good man, or a bad man."

16. Because thou art lukewarm: Irrelevant.

I will spue thee out of my mouth: He alludes to the known effect of tepid water upon the stomach, which produces a nausea. I will cast thee off. Thy interest in me. Though thou hast been near me, now I must pluck thee thence, because thou art indolent. Thou art not in earnest for thy salvation.

17. I am rich: Thou supposest thyself to be perfectly sure of final salvation, because thou art rich in good works, and laid the right foundation. It was this conviction that cut the nerves of their spiritual progress in what they had already received; and that once in grace, must be still in grace.

Thou art stretched: Taken up, most words signifies, "according to Mineat," being fatigued with grievous labours, as they who quarry, or are condemned to the mines." So children of God, as they supposed, and infernal kingdom, they were, in the sight of God, in the most abject slaves.

And miserable: O slaves, most deplorable by all men.

And poor: Having no spiritual riches; no money, and no power, are sometimes used by the righteous and the wicked.

And blind: The eyes of the understanding are so that thou dost not see thy state.

And naked: Without the image of God; holiness and purity. A more deplorable state, can scarcely be imagined than that of a man who is naked. And it is the true picture of many churches, and individuals.

18. I counsel thee: O fallen and deceived man, thy case is not hopeless.—buy me gold tried in the fire: Come, and receive money and without price, faith that shall stand so, gold tried in the fire, is here understood as more pure and undefiled religion; or that influence which produces it; which is more precious than the purest gold to the body. They are ginary riches; this alone can make them true.

White raiment: Holiness of heart and life. Anoint thine eyes: Pray for, that ye may be enlightened influences of my Spirit; that ye may be of your true state, and see where your help lies.

19. As many as I love: So it was the love of God, that induced Him thus to reprove, and chastise them.

Be zealous: Be in earnest to get your souls saved.

20 Behold, I stand at the door, and knock: if any man hear my voice, and open the door, I will come in to him, and will sup with him, and he with me.

21 To him that overcometh I will grant to sit with me in had no zeal; this was their bane. He now stirs them up to diligence in the use of the means of grace; and repentance for their past sins and remissions.

20. Behold, I stand at the door, and knock! There are many sayings of this kind among the ancient rabbins: thus in Sir Hashirim Rabba, fol. 25. 1. "God said to the Israelites, My children, open to me one door of repentance, even so wide as the eye of a needle; and I will open to you doors through which calves and horned cattle may pass."

In Sabar Levit, fol. 8. col. 32. it is said, "If a man conceal his sin, and do not open it before the Holy King, although he ask mercy, yet the door of repentance shall not be opened to him. But if he open it before the holy, blessed God, God spares him, and mercy prevails over wrath; and when he laments, although all the doors were shut, yet they shall be opened to him, and his prayer shall be heard."

Christ stands, waits long, at the door of the sinner's heart; He knocks, uses judgments, merces, reproofs, exhortations, &c. to induce sinners to repent and turn to Him. He lifts up His voice, calls loudly by His word, ministers, and Spirit.

If any man hear! The sinner will seriously consider his state, and attend to the voice of his Lord:—

And open the door! This must be his own act, receiving power for this purpose from his offended Lord, who will not break open the door: He will make no forcible entry.

I will come in to him! I will manifest myself to him; heal all his backslidings, pardon all his iniquities, and love him freely.

Will sup with him! Hold communion with him; feed him with the bread of life.

And he with me! I will bring Him at last to dwell with Me in everlasting glory.

21. To sit with me in my throne! In every case it is to him that overcometh, to the conqueror, that the final promise is made. He that conquers not, is not crowned; therefore every promise is here made to him that is faithful unto death. Here is a most remarkable expression; Jesus has conquered, and is sat down with the FATHER upon the Father's throne. He who conquers through Christ, sits down with Christ upon His throne: But Christ's throne, and the throne of the Father, is the same; and it is on this same throne, that those who are faithful unto death, are finally to sit! How astonishing is this state of exaltation! The dignity and grandeur of it who can conceive!

This is the worst of the seven churches, and yet the most eminent of all the promises is made to it; showing that the worst may repent, finally conquer, and attain even to the highest state of glory.

22. He that hath an ear, let him hear! Mr. Wesley has a very judicious note on the conclusion of this chapter, and particularly on this last verse:—He that hath an ear, &c. "This (counsel) stands in three former letters before the promise; in the four latter, after it; clearly dividing the seven into two parts, the first containing three, the last four letters. The three given over to the three former letters, peculiarly respect His powers after His resurrection and ascension, particularly over his Church; those in the four latter, His Divine glory and unity with the Father and the Holy Spirit. Again, this word being placed before the promise, in the three former letters, excludes the false apostles at Ephesus, the false Jews at Smyrna, and the partakers with the heathens at Pergamos, from having any share therein. In the four latter, being placed after them, it leaves the promises immediately joined with Christ's address to the angel of the church, to show that the fulfilling of these was near; whereas the others reach beyond the end of the world. It should be observed, that the overcoming, or victory, (to which alone these peculiar promises are annexed,) is not the ordinary victory obtained by every believer, but a special victory obtained over great and peculiar temptations, by those that are strong in faith."

The latest account we have of the state of the seven Asiatic churches, is in a letter from the Rev. David Lindsay, chaplain to the British embassy at Constantinople, to a member of the British and Foreign Bible Society, by which society Mr. Lindsay had been solicited to distribute some copies of the New Testament in modern Greek, among the Christians in Asia Minor. The following in his communication, dated—

"Constantinople, Jan. 10, 1816.

"When I last wrote to you, I was on the point of setting out on a short excursion into Asia Minor. Travelling hastily, as I was constrained to do, from the circumstances of my situation, the information I could procure was necessarily superficial and unsatisfactory. As, however, I distributed the few books of the society which I was able to carry with me, I think it necessary to give some account of the course I took:—

"1. The regular intercourse of England with SMYRNA, will enable you to procure as accurate intelligence of its present state as any I can pretend to offer. From the conversations I had with the Greek bishop and his clergy, as well as various well-informed individuals, I am led to suppose, that if the population of Smyrna be estimated at one hundred and forty my throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with my Father in his throne.

22. He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches.

1 Mat. 13. 23. Luke 22. 31. 1 Cor. 3. 2. 2 Tim. 2. 12. Ch. 3. 23. 27.—Ch. 3. 7.

thousand inhabitants, there are from fifteen to twenty thousand Greeks, six thousand Armenians, five thousand Catholics, one hundred and forty Protestants, and eleven thousand Jews.

"2. After Smyrna, the first place I visited was EURUSUS, or rather, (as the site is not quite the same) AISANLICK, which consists of about fifteen poor cottages. I found there but three Christians, two brothers who keep a small shop, and a gardener. They are all three Greeks, and their ignorance is lamentable indeed. In that place, which was blessed so long with an apostle's labours, and those of his zealous assistants, are Christians who have not so much as heard of that apostle; or seem only to recognize the name of Paul as one in the calendar of their saints. One of them I found able to read a little; and left with him the New Testament in ancient and modern Greek, which he expressed a strong desire to read, and promised me he would not only study it himself, but lend it to his friends in the neighbouring villages.

"3. My next object was to see LAODICEA: in the road to this is Guzeli-hisar, a large town, with one church, and about seven hundred Christians. In conversing with the priests here, I found them so little acquainted with the Bible, or even the New Testament in an entire form, that they had no distinct knowledge of the books it contained, beyond the four Gospels; but mentioned them indiscriminately, with various idle legends and lives of saints. I have sent thither three copies of the modern Greek Testament since my return. About three miles from Laodicea, is Denizli, which has been styled, (but I am inclined to think, erroneously,) the ancient Colosse; it is a considerable town, with about four hundred Christians, Greeks, and Armenians, each of whom has a church. I regret, however, to say, that here also the most extravagant tales of miracles, and fabulous accounts of angels, saints, and relics, had so usurped the place of the Scriptures, as to render it very difficult to separate, in their minds, Divine truths from human inventions. I felt that here that unhappy time was come when men should 'turn away their ears from the truth, and be turned unto fables.' I had with me some copies of the Gospels in ancient Greek, which I distributed here, as in some other places through which I had passed. Eski-hisar, close to which are the remains of ancient Laodicea, contains about fifty poor inhabitants, in which number are but two Christians, who live together in a small mill: unhappily, neither could read at all; the copy, therefore, of the New Testament, which I intended for this church, I left with that of Denizli, the orphan and poor remains of Laodicea and Colosse. The prayers of the mosque are the only prayers which I heard near the ruins of Laodicea, on which the threat seems to have been fully executed, in its utter rejection as a church.

"4. I left it for PHILADELPHIA, now Aish-shehr. It was gratifying to find at last some surviving fruits of early zeal; and here, at least, whatever may be the loss of the spirit of Christianity, there is still the form of a Christian church; this has been kept from the hour of temptation, which came upon all the Christian world. There are here about one thousand Christians, chiefly Greeks, who, for the most part, speak only Turkish; there are twenty-five places of public worship, five of which are large regular churches; to these there is a resident bishop, with twenty inferior clergy.—A copy of the modern Greek Testament was received by the bishop with great thankfulness.

"5. I quitted Aish-shehr, deeply disappointed at the statement I received there of the church of SARDIS. I trusted that, in its utmost trials, it would not have been suffered to perish utterly; and I heard with surprise, that not a vestige of it remained. With what satisfaction then did I find, on the plains of Sardis, a small church establishment: the few Christians who dwell around modern Sart were anxious to settle there, and erect a church, as they were in the habit of meeting at each other's houses for the exercise of religion. From this design they were prohibited by Kar 'Osman Oglu, the Turkish governor of the district; and, in consequence, about five years ago, they built a church upon the plain, within view of ancient Sardis; and there they maintain a priest. The place has gradually risen into a little village, now called Tatar-keny; thither the few Christians of Sart, who amount to seven, and those in its immediate vicinity, resort for public worship, and form together a congregation of about forty. There appears then still a remnant, a few names even in Sardis, which have been preserved. I cannot repeat the expressions of gratitude with which they received a copy of the New Testament, in a language with which they were familiar. Several crowded about the priest to hear it on the spot, and I left them thus engaged.

"6. AK-HISAR, the ancient TAVATIA, is said to contain about thirty thousand inhabitants, of whom three thousand are Christians, all Greeks, except about two hundred Armenians. There is, however, but one Greek church, and one Armenian. The superior of the Greek church, to whom I presented the Roman Testament, esteemed it so great a treasure, that he earnestly pressed me, if possible, to spare another, that one might be secured to the church, and free from accidents, while the other went round among the people for their private reading. I have, therefore, since my return hither, sent him four copies.

7. The church of BERGAMO, in respect to numbers, may be said to flourish still in Bergamo. The town is less than Akhisar, but the number of Christians is about as great, the proportion of Armenians to Greeks nearly the same, and each nation also has one church. The bishop of the district, who occasionally resides there, was at that time absent; and I experienced, with deep regret, that the resident clergy were totally incapable of estimating the gift I intended them; I therefore delivered the Testament to the lay vicar of the bishop, at his urgent request, he having assured me that the bishop would highly prize so valuable an acquisition to the church.

He seemed much pleased that the benighted world had excited the attention of strangers.

"Thus, Sir, I have left, at least one copy rated word of God, at each of the seven Asiatic Apocalypses; and I trust they are not utter but, whoever may plant, it is God only who cresce; and from His goodness we may hope time, bring forth fruit, 'some thirty, some six hundred fold' " H

In my note on Acta xiv. 24. I have given celebrated temple of Diana, at Ephesus, to called one of the seven wonders of the world posed to allude, in his epistle to this church, ill. '8. where I have again given the measure

CHAPTER IV.

John sees the throne of God in heaven surrounded by twenty-four elders; and four living creatures, &c. all join in giving glory to the Almighty, 1-11. [A. M. cir. 4100. A. D. cir. 96. Empp. Flavio Domitiano Cæs

AFTER this I looked, and, behold, a door was opened in heaven; and the first voice which I heard was as it were of a trumpet talking with me; which said, Come up hither, and I will show thee things which must be hereafter.

2 And immediately I was in the spirit: and, behold, a throne was set in heaven, and one sat on the throne.

3 And he that sat was to look upon like a jasper and a sardine stone: and there was a rainbow round about the throne, in sight like unto an emerald.

4 And round about the throne were four and twenty seats: and upon the seats I saw four and twenty elders sitting, clothed in white raiment; and they had on their heads crowns of gold.

5 And out of the throne proceeded lightnings and thunderings and voices: and there were seven lamps of fire burning before the throne, which are the seven spirits of God.

6 And before the throne there was a sea of glass like unto crystal: and in the midst of the throne, and round about the throne, were four beasts full of eyes before and behind.

7 And the first beast was like a lion, and the second was like a calf, and the third beast had a face like a man, and the fourth beast was like a flying eagle.

8 And the four beasts had each of them six wings: and they were full of eyes within and without: and they say continually, Holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almighty, who was, and is, and is to come.

9 And when those beasts give glory and honour and thanks to him that sat on the throne, who liveth for ever and ever, they say, Amen.

10 And the four and twenty elders fall down before him that sat on the throne, and worship him that liveth for ever and ever, and cast their crowns before the throne, saying, O Lord, thou art worthy.

11 And thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive glory and honour and power: for thou hast created all things, and thou hast created them, and they were created.

NOTES.—Verse 1. A door was opened in heaven] This appears to have been a visible aperture in the sky over his head. 2. I was in the spirit] Wrapt up in an ecstasy.

3. And he that sat] There is here no description of the Divine Being, so as to point out any similitude, shape, or dimensions. The description rather aims to point out the surrounding glory and effulgence, than the Person of the Almighty King.—See a similar description Numb. xxiv. 10, &c. and the notes there.

4. Four and twenty elders] Perhaps this is in reference to the smaller sanhedrim at Jerusalem, which was composed of twenty-three elders; or to the princes of the twenty-four courses of the Jewish priests, which ministered at the tabernacle and the temple; at first appointed by David.

Clothed in white raiment] The garments of the priests.

On their heads crowns of gold.] An emblem of their dignity. The Jewish writers represent human souls as being created first; and before they enter the body, each is taken by an angel into Paradise, where it sees the righteous sitting in glory with crowns upon their heads.—Rab. Tanchum, fol. 39. 4.

5. Seven lamps of fire] Seven angels, the attendants and ministers of the Supreme King.—See chap. i. 4. and the note there.

6. Four beasts] Tetraopa zwa, four living creatures, or four animals. The word beast is very improperly used here, and elsewhere, in this description: Wicif first used it; and translators in general have followed him in this uncouth rendering. A beast before the throne of God in heaven, sounds oddly.

7. The first beast was like a lion] It is supposed that there is a reference here to the four standards, or ensigns, of the four divisions of the tribes in the Israelitish camp, as they are described by Jewish writers.

The first living creature was a lion; this was, say the rabbins, the standard of JUDAH on the east, with the two tribes of Issachar and Zabulon. The second, like a calf, or ox, which was the emblem of EPHRAIM, who pitched on the west, with the two tribes of Manasseh and Benjamin. The third, with the face of a man, which, according to the rabbins, was the standard of REUBEN, who pitched on the south, with the two tribes of Simeon and Gad. The fourth, which was like a flying (spread) eagle, was, according to the same writers, the emblem on the ensign of DAN, who pitched on the north, with the two tribes of Asher, and Naphtali. This traditional description agrees with the four faces of the cherub in Ezekiel's vision.—See my notes and diagrams on Numb. ii.

Christian tradition has given these creatures as emblems of the four evangelists. To John is attributed the eagle; to Luke, the ox; to Mark, the lion; and to Matthew, the angel in human form. As the former represented the whole Jewish church, congregation, so the latter is intended to represent the whole Christian church.

8. The four beasts had each of them six wings] I have already observed, in the Preface to this book, that the phraseology is rabbinical; I might have added, and the imagery also. We have almost a counterpart of this description in Pirkey Eliezer, chap. 4. I shall give the substance of this from Schoettgen. "Four troops of minister the holy blessed God; the first is Michael, the next is Gabriel, at the left; the third is the fourth in Raphael, behind Him. The Holy Blessed God is in the midst, and He is throned high and elevated, hanging in the effulgence as amber, חַשְׁמֶל (chashmel), in fire.—Ezek. i. 4. On His head is placed a diadem, with the incommunicable name (יהוה) on the front of it. His eyes go throughout part of them is fire, and a part of them A hand stands Life, and at His left hand He holds a sceptre in His hand. Before Him is a veil which is between the temple and the seven angel minister before Him, within and His footstool are like fire and lightning throne of glory there is a shining like fire about his throne are justice and judgment.

The place of the throne are the seven and the chariot-wheels, and the cherub, creatures, which give glory before His face in similitude like sapphire; and at the four living creatures, each of which has four wings.—When God speaks from between the two cherubim, with the face of a lion; when He speaks from the south, then it is from cherubim, with the face of a lion; when it is from between the two cherubim, with and when from the north, then it is from cherubim, with the face of an eagle.

"And the living creatures stand before and they stand in fear, in trembling, in agitation; and from this agitation a stream of fire flows from them. Of the two seraphim, one is the hand of the Holy Blessed God, and one is each has six wings; with two they cover their face, lest they should find out the footsteps, and two they fly, and sanctify His great answer each other, saying, Holy, holy, holy, hoste; the whole earth is full of His glory, creatures stand near His glory, yet the place of His glory; but wheresoever His out, and say, Blessed be the glory of the Lord. In Shemeth Rabba, sec. 23. fol. 121. 4.

"There are four which have principal among intellectual creatures, MAN; among among cattle, the ox; and among wild beasts of these has a kingdom, and a certain they are placed under the throne of glory show that no creature is to exalt itself in the kingdom of God is over all." These considered the representatives of the whole 10. Cast their crowns before the throne] infinite supremacy of God; and that they being and their blessings from Him assent to the custom of prostrations in the E sage of petty kings, acknowledging the supremacy of the emperor.

11. Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive] Thus all creation acknowledges the supremacy of God: and we learn from this that He made all things for his pleasure; and through the same motive, He preserves. Hence, it is most evident, that He hateth nothing that He has made; and could have made no intelligent creature with the design to make it eternally miserable. It is strange that a contrary supposition has ever entered into the heart of man: and it is high time that the benevolent nature of the Supreme God should be fully vindicated from aspersions of this kind.

CHAPTER V.

The book sealed with seven seals, which no being in heaven or earth could open, 1-3. Is at last opened by the Lion of the tribe of Judah, 4-8. He receives the praises of the four living creatures, and the twenty-four elders, 9, 10. And afterward of an innumerable multitude, who acknowledge that they were redeemed to God by His blood, 11, 12. And then of the whole creation, who ascribe blessing, honour, glory, and power, to God and the Lamb for ever, 13, 14. [A. M. cir. 4100. A. D. cir. 96. Inpp. Flavio Domitiano Cæs. Aug. et Nervæ.]

AND I saw on the right hand of him that sat on the throne a book written within and on the backside, sealed with seven seals.

And I saw a strong angel proclaiming with a loud voice, Who is worthy to open the book, and to loose the seals thereof? And no man in heaven, nor in earth, neither under the earth, was able to open the book, neither to look thereon.

And I wept much, because no man was found worthy to open and to read the book, neither to look thereon.

And one of the elders saith unto me, Weep not: behold, the Lion of the tribe of Juda, the Root of David, hath prevailed to open the book, and to loose the seven seals thereof.

And I beheld, and, lo, in the midst of the throne and of the four beasts, and in the midst of the elders, stood a Lamb as had been slain, having seven horns and seven eyes, which are the seven Spirits of God sent forth into all the earth.

NOTES.—Verse 1. A book written within and on the backside] That is, the book was full of solemn contents within, and it was sealed: and on the backside was a superscription, inciting its contents. It was a labelled book, or one written each side of the skin, which was not usual.

Sealed with seven seals] As seven is a number of perfection, it may mean that the book was so sealed, that the book could neither be counterfeited nor broken; i. e. the matter of the book was an obscure and enigmatical, and the work profound, and the facts it predicted, so difficult and stupendous, that they could neither be known nor performed by human wisdom or power.

A strong angel] One of the chief of the angelic host. Proclaiming] As the herald of God.

To open the book, and to loose the seals] To loose the seals, is to may open the book. Who can tell what this book contains? Who can open its mysteries? The book may be in the purposes and designs of God relative to His government of the world and the church; but we, whose habitation is the dust, know nothing of such things.

And no man] Obedt, no person or being in heaven.] Among all the angels of God.

For in the earth] No human being. Neither under the earth] No disembodied spirit, nor any one in hell. Neither angels, men, nor devils, can fathom the designs of God.

Neither to look thereon.] None can look into it, unless they need; and none can open it, unless the seals be unloosed. I wept much] Because the world and the church were to be deprived of the knowledge of the contents of the book.

The Lion of the tribe of Juda] Jesus Christ, who sprang in this tribe, as His genealogy proves; see on Matt. 1. and e. iii. There is an allusion here to Gen. xlix. 9. Judah lion's whelp: the lion was the emblem of this tribe; and supposed to have been embrokked on its ensigns.

The Root of David] See Isa. xi. 1. Christ was the root of it, as to His Divine nature; He was a branch out of the stem of Jesse, as to His human nature.

Which prevailed] By the merit of His incarnation, passion, death, to open the book] To explain and execute all the purposes (decrees of God, in relation to the government of the world and the church.

Stood a lamb] Christ, so called because He was a sacrificial offering; aprior, signifies a little or delicate lamb. Which had been slain] As if now in the act of being offered. It is very remarkable; so important is the sacrificial offering of Christ, in the sight of God, that He is still represented as being in the very act of pouring out His blood for the offences of man. This gives great advantage to faith: when soul comes to the Throne of Grace, He finds a sacrifice provided for him to offer to God. Thus all succeeding generations find they have the continual sacrifice ready; and they shed blood to offer.

Seven horns] An horn is the emblem of power, and seven number of perfection, the seven horns may denote the revalling and infinite might of Jesus Christ. He can vanquish all His enemies; He can destroy all His enemies; and can save to the uttermost all that come unto God through Him.

Seven eyes] To denote His infinite knowledge and wisdom: of. VI. 3 S

7 And He came and took the book out of the right hand of him that sat upon the throne.

8 And when He had taken the book the four beasts and four and twenty elders fell down before the Lamb, having every one of them a harp, and golden vials full of odours, which are the prayers of saints.

9 And they sung a new song, saying, Thou art worthy to take the book, and to open the seals thereof: for thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us to God by thy blood out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation;

10 And hast made us unto our God kings and priests: and we shall reign on the earth.

11 And I beheld, and I heard the voice of many angels round about the throne and the beasts and the elders; and the number of them was ten thousand times ten thousand, and thousands of thousands;

but as these seven eyes are said to be the seven spirits of God, they seem to denote rather His Providence, in which He often employs the ministry of angels; therefore, these are said to be sent forth into all the earth.—See on chap. 1, 4.

7. He came and took the book] This verse may be properly explained by John, ch. 1, 18. No man hath seen God at any time: the only begotten Son, which is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him. With Jesus alone, are all the counsels and mysteries of God.

8. The four beasts—fell down before the Lamb] The whole church of God, and all His children in heaven and earth, acknowledge that Jesus Christ is alone worthy and able to unfold and execute all His mysteries and counsels of God. See on ver. 9.

Having every one of them harps] There were harps and vials; and each of the elders and living creatures had one.

Odours, which are the prayers of saints.] The frankincense and odours offered at the tabernacle were emblems of the prayers and praises of the Lord. That prayers are compared to incense, see Psa. cxli. 2. Let my prayers be set forth before thee as incense. Hence that saying in Synopsis Sobar, p. 44. n. 37. "The odour of the prayers of the fidelities is equal to myrrh and frankincense: but on the sabbath it is preferred to the scent of all kinds of perfumes." The words, which are the prayers of saints, are to be understood as this is my body; its signification or represents my body: these odours represent the prayers of the saints.

9. A new song] Composed on the matters and blessings of the Gospel, which was just now opened on earth. But new song may signify a most excellent song; and by this, the Gospel and its blessings are probably signified. The Gospel is called a new song, Psa. xcvi. 1. And perhaps there is an allusion in the harps here, to Psa. cxliv. 9. I will sing a new song unto thee, O God, upon a psaltery, and an instrument of ten strings, &c. The same form of speech is found, Isa. xlii. 10. Sing unto the Lord a new song, &c. and there the prophet seems to have the Gospel dispensation particularly in view.

Thou—hast redeemed us to God—out of every—nation] It appears therefore, that the living creatures and the elders represent the aggregate of the followers of God; or the Christian church in all nations, and among all kinds of people; and perhaps through the whole compass of time: and all these are said to be redeemed by Christ's blood: plainly showing that His life was a sacrificial offering for the sins of mankind.

10. Kings and priests] See Exod. xix. 6. 1 Pet. ii. 5, 9. and the notes there.

11. The voice of many angels] These also are represented as joining in the chorus with redeemed mortals.

Ten thousand times ten thousand] "Myriads of myriads, and chills of chills;" that is, an infinite or innumerable multitude. This is in reference to Dan. vii. 10.

12. To receive power] That is, Jesus Christ is worthy to take, λαβειν, to have ascribed to Him, power, omnipotence; riches, beneficence; wisdom, omniscience; strength, power in prevalent exercise; honour, the highest reputation for what He has done; glory, the praise due to such actions; and blessing, the thankful acknowledgments of the whole creation. Here are seven different species of praise: and this is exactly agreeable to the rabbinical forms, which the author of this book keeps constantly in view.—See Sepher Raaiel fol.

slain to receive power, and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and honour, and glory, and blessing.

13 And every creature which is in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them, heard I saying, "Blessing, and honour, and glory, and power, be unto him that sitteth and unto the Lamb for ever and ever.

14 And the four beasts said, Amen. twenty elders fell down and worshipped him ever and ever.

15 And the four beasts said, Amen. twenty elders fell down and worshipped him ever and ever.

29. 2. "To thee belongs, כבוד, kehob, glory; גודלהו, gadolahu, magnitude; גבורה, geburah, might; חממה, hammalekah, the kingdom; כבוד, hatephaareth, the honour; חן, hanetsach, the victory; והוד, vehod, and the praise.

13. Every creature] All parts of the creation, animate and inanimate, are represented here by that figure of speech called prosopopœia, or personification, as giving praise to the Lord Jesus; because by Him all things were created. We find that the whole creation gives precisely the same praise, and in the same terms, to Jesus Christ, who is undoubtedly meant here by the Lamb just slain, as they give to God who sits upon the throne. Now if Jesus Christ were not properly God, this would be idolatry; as it would be giving to the creature what belongs to the Creator.

14. The four beasts said, Amen] Acknowledged that what was attributed to Christ was His due.

The four and twenty elders] The word εικοσάχροιστος, twenty-four, is wanting in the most eminent MSS. and Versions.

Fell down and worshipped] Εκπεσόντες και προσεκύνησαν, fell down on their knees, and then prostrated themselves before the throne. This is the Eastern method of the person worshipping, fell down on his bowing down, touched the earth with his forehead as was prostration.

Him that liveth for ever] This clause thirty-seven others, Syriac, Arabic, Coptic, copies of the Slavonic; Italia and Vulgate; and Arithas, ancient commentators on the wanting in some editions; and is undoubtedly

Now follow the least intelligible parts of the book, on which so much has been written in vain. It is natural for a man to desire to know more difficult the subject, the more it is hoped of finding out something by which the church might be profited, has caused to be learned men to employ their talents, and to be learned and well meant labour been to make these abstruse prophecies, and conjecture their faith can rest? NOTES.—Verse 1. When the Lamb opened one of the seals] It is worthy of remark, that the opening of the seals is not merely a declaration of what God will do, but is the exhibition of a purpose then accomplished; for whenever the seal is opened, the sentence appears to be executed. It is supposed, that, from chap. vi.—xi. inclusive, the calamities which should fall on the enemies of Christianity, and particularly the Jews, are pointed out under the various images; as well as the preservation of the Christians under those calamities.

One of the four beasts] Probably that with the face of a lion.—See ch. iv. 7.

Come and see] Attend to what is about to be exhibited. It is very likely that all was exhibited before his eyes as in a scene; and he saw every act represented which was to take place; and all the persons and things which were to be the chief actors.

2. A white horse] Supposed to represent the Gospel system; and pointing out its excellence, swiftness, and purity.

He that sat on him] Supposed to represent Jesus Christ.

A bow] The preaching of the Gospel, darting conviction into the hearts of sinners.

A crown] The emblem of the kingdom which Christ was to establish on earth.

Conquering and to conquer] Overcoming and confounding the Jews first, and then the Gentiles; spreading, more and more, the doctrine and influence of the cross over the face of the earth.

3. The second beast] That which had the face of an ox. 4. Another horse—red] The emblem of war; perhaps also of severe persecution, and the martyrdom of the saints.

Him that sat thereon] Some say Christ; others Vespasian; others the Roman armies; others Artabanus, king of the Parthians, &c. &c.

Take peace from the earth] To deprive Judea of all tranquillity.

They should kill one another] This was literally the case with the Jews, while besieged by the Romans.

A great sword] Great influence and success, producing terrible carnage.

5. The third beast] That which had the face of a man.

A black horse] The emblem of famine. Some think that which took place under Claudius. See also what was predicted by Agabus, Acts 21. 10. [A pair of balances] To show that such, that every person must be put under

6. A measure of wheat for a penny] This denoted, was a measure of dry things; and city is not exactly known, yet it is generally contained as much as one man could consume a penny, the Roman denarius, was the ordinary labour. So it appears that in this scarcity to obtain a bare subsistence by his daily could not, in such cases, provide for a family.

Three measures of barley] This seems proportion of value between the wheat and barley was allowed to afford a poor aliment; and Roman soldiers instead of wheat, by way Hurt not the oil and the wine.] Be upon them not as delicacies, but for necessity; vines nor the olives will be productive.

7. The fourth beast] That which had the face of a man.

8. A pale horse] The symbol of death. death, was a very usual poetic epithet; or can be no doubt, because it is immediately eat on him was DEATH. And he followed with him.] The grave, received the slain. This is a very elegant personification.

Over the fourth part of the earth] One was to feel the desolating effects of this war.

To kill with the sword] WAR.—With death, pestilence.—And with the lions, tigers, hyenas, &c. which would quence of the devastations occasioned by pestilence.

9. The fifth seal] There is no animal, to introduce this seal; nor does there appear event predicted: but the whole is intended to show the lower of God under their persecutions, them to bear up under their distresses.

I saw under the altar] A symbolical view in which he saw an altar; and under it

1 And white robes were given unto every one of them; and it was said unto them, that they should rest yet for a little season, until their fellow-servants also and their brethren, who should be killed as they were, should be fulfilled.

2 And I beheld when he had opened the sixth seal, and, lo, there was a great earthquake; and the sun became black as sackcloth of hair, and the moon became as blood;

3 And the stars of heaven fell unto the earth, even as a fig tree casteth her untimely figs, when she is shaken of a mighty wind.

4 And the heaven departed as a scroll when it is rolled to;

5 And the earth, and the sea, and the mountains, and the islands, and the trees, were moved out of their places.

6 And the kings of the earth, and the great men, and the rich men, and the chief captains, and the mighty men, and every bondman, and every freeman, hid themselves in the dens and in the rocks of the mountains;

7 And said to the mountains and rocks, Fall on us, and hide us from the face of him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb:

8 For the great day of his wrath is come; and who shall be able to stand?

9 And I saw four angels standing on the four corners of the earth, holding the four winds of the earth, that the wind should not blow on the earth, nor on the sea, nor on any tree.

10 And they cried with a loud voice, That is, their blood, like that of Abel, cried for vengeance: for we are not to suppose that there was any thing like a vindictive spirit in those happy and holy souls, who had shed their blood for the testimony of Jesus. We sometimes say blood cries for blood: that is, in the order of Divine justice, every murderer, and every murdering persecutor, shall be punished.

O Lord! O Accusers, Sovereign Lord, Supreme Ruler; One saving and exercising unlimited and uncontrolled authority; Holy! In Thy own nature, hating iniquity;

And true! In all Thy promises and threatenings; Do not thou not judge! The persecutors;

And avenge our blood! Inflict signal punishment; On them that dwell on the earth! Probably meaning the persecuting Jews: they dwelt enim in his terris, upon that land, a term of speech by which Judea is often signified, in the New Testament.

11. White robes] The emblems of purity, innocence, and triumph.

They should rest yet for a little season] This is a declaration that when the cup of the iniquity of the Jews should be full, they should then be punished in a mass. They were determined to proceed farther, and God permits them so to do; reserving the fullness of their punishment till they had filled up the measure of their iniquity. If this book was written before the destruction of Jerusalem, as is most likely; then his destruction is that which was to fall upon the Jews; and his little time or season was that which elapsed between their martyrdom, or the date of this book, and the final destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, under Vespasian and his son Titus, about A. D. 70. What follows may refer to the destruction of the heathen Roman empire.

12. The sixth seal] This seal also is opened and introduced by Jesus Christ alone.

A great earthquake] A most stupendous change in the civil and religious constitution of the world. If I refer to Constantine the Great, the change that was made by his conversion to Christianity might be very properly represented under the emblem of an earthquake, and the other symbols mentioned in this and the following verses.

The sun, the ancient Pagan government of the Roman empire, was totally darkened; and like a black hair sackcloth, was degraded and humbled to the dust.

The moon, the ecclesiastical state of the same empire, became as blood, was totally ruined; their sacred rites abrogated, their priests and religious institutions desecrated, their altars cast down, their temples destroyed, or turned into places for Christian worship.

13. The stars of heaven] The gods and goddesses, demi-gods and deified heroes, of their poetical and mythological heaven, prostrated indiscriminately, and lay as useless as the figs or fruit of a tree shaken down before ripe, by a tempestuous wind.

14. And the heaven departed as a scroll] The whole system of pagan and idolatrous worship, with all its spiritual, secular, and superstitious influence; blessed, shrivelled up, and rendered null and void, as a parchment scroll when exposed to the action of a strong fire.

And every mountain] All the props, supports, and dependencies of the empire; whether regal allies, tributary kings, dependent colonies, or mercenary troops; were all moved out of their places, so as to stand no longer in the same relation to that empire, and its worship, support, and maintenance, as they formerly did.

And islands] The heathen temples, with their precincts and enclosures, cut off from the common people, and into which together; and every mountain and island were moved out of their places.

15. And the kings of the earth, and the great men, and the rich men, and the chief captains, and the mighty men, and every bondman, and every freeman, hid themselves in the dens and in the rocks of the mountains;

16. And said to the mountains and rocks, Fall on us, and hide us from the face of him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb:

17. For the great day of his wrath is come; and who shall be able to stand?

none could come but the privileged, may be here represented by islands, for the same reasons.

15. The kings of the earth, &c.] All the secular powers who had endeavoured to support the pagan worship by authority, influence, riches, political wisdom, and military skill; with every bondman, all slaves, who were in life and limb addicted to their masters or owners.

And every freeman] Those who had been manumitted; commonly called freedmen; and who were attached, through gratitude, to the families of their liberators. All hid themselves, were astonished at the total overthrow of the heathen empire, and the revolution which had then taken place.

16. Said to the mountains and rocks] Expressions which denote the strongest perturbation and alarm. They preferred any kind of death to that which they apprehended from this most awful revolution.

From the face of him that sitteth on the throne] They now saw that all these terrible judgments came from the Almighty; and that Christ, the author of Christianity, was now judging, condemning, and destroying them for their cruel persecutions of His followers.

17. For the great day of his wrath] The decisive and manifest time in which He will execute judgment on the oppressors of His people.

Who shall be able to stand?] No might can prevail against the might of God. All these things may literally apply to the final destruction of Jerusalem, and to the revolution which took place in the Roman empire, under Constantine the Great. Some apply them to the day of judgment; but they do not seem to have that awful event in view. These two events were the greatest that have ever taken place in the world, from the flood to the eighteenth century of the Christian era; and may well justify the strong figurative language used above.

Though I do not pretend to say that my remarks on this chapter point out its true signification, yet I find others have applied it in the same way. Dr. Dodd observes, that the fall of Babylon, Idumea, Judah, Egypt, and Jerusalem, has been described by the prophets in language equally pompous, figurative, and strong.—See Isa. xlii. 10. xxiv. 4. concerning Babylon and Idumea; Jerem. iv. 23, 24. concerning Judah; Ezek. xxxii. 7. concerning Egypt; Joel ii. 10, 31. concerning Jerusalem: and our Lord Himself, Matt. xxiv. 29. concerning the same city. "Now," says he, "it is certain that the fall of any of these cities or kingdoms was not of greater concern or consequence to the world, nor more deserving to be described in pompous figures, than the fall of the Pagan Roman empire, when the great lights of the heathen world, the sun, moon, and stars, the powers civil and ecclesiastical, were all eclipsed and obscured; the heathen emperors and Cæsars were slain; the heathen priests and augurs were extirpated; the heathen officers and magistrates were removed; the temples were demolished, and their revenues were devoted to better uses. It is customary with the prophets, after they have described a thing in the most symbolical and figurative manner, to represent the same again in plainer language; and the same method is observed here, ver. 15, 16, 17. And the kings of the earth, &c. That is, Maximin, Galerius, Maxentius, Licinius, &c. with all their adherents and followers, were so routed and dispersed, that they hid themselves in dens, &c.: expressions used to denote the utmost terror and confusion. This is, therefore, a triumph of Christ over his heathen enemies; and a triumph after a severe persecution: so that the time, and all the circumstances, as well as the series and order of the prophecy, agree perfectly with this interpretation. Galerius, Maximin, and Licinius, made even a public confession of their guilt; recalled their decrees and edicts against the Christians; and acknowledged the just judgments of God and of Christ in their own destruction."—See Newton, Lawson, &c. and Dr. Dodd, on this chapter; with the works of several more recent authors.

CHAPTER VII.

The four angels holding the four winds of heaven. 1. The angel with the seal of the Living God, and sealing the servants of God out of the twelve tribes, whose number amounted to One Hundred and Forty-four thousand, 2-8. Besides these there was an innumerable multitude from all nations, who gave glory to God and the Lamb, 9-12. One of the elders shows who these are; and describes their most happy state, 13-17. [A. M. cir. 4100. A. D. cir. 96. Imp. Flavio Domitiano Cæs. Aug. et Nervæ.]

b. Ch. 8. 1.

NOTES.—Verse 1. And after these things] immediately after the preceding vision.

I saw four angels] Instruments which God employs in the dispensation of His Providence; we know not what.

2 And I saw another angel ascending from the east, having the seal of the living God: and he cried with a loud voice to the four angels, to whom it was given to hurt the earth and the sea,

3 Saying, Hurt not the earth, neither the sea, nor the trees, till we have sealed the servants of our God in their foreheads.

4 And I heard the number of them which were sealed: and there were sealed an hundred and forty and four thousand of all the tribes of the children of Israel.

5 Of the tribe of Judah were sealed twelve thousand. Of the tribe of Reuben were sealed twelve thousand. Of the tribe of Gad were sealed twelve thousand.

6 Of the tribe of Aser were sealed twelve thousand. Of the tribe of Nephthalim were sealed twelve thousand. Of the tribe of Manasses were sealed twelve thousand.

7 Of the tribe of Simeon were sealed twelve thousand. Of the tribe of Levi were sealed twelve thousand. Of the tribe of Issachar were sealed twelve thousand.

8 Of the tribe of Zabulon were sealed twelve thousand. Of the tribe of Joseph were sealed twelve thousand. Of the tribe of Benjamin were sealed twelve thousand.

9 After this I beheld, and, lo, a great multitude, which no man could number, of all nations, and kindreds, and people, and tongues, stood before the throne, and before the

On the four corners of the earth) On the extreme parts of the land of Judea, called h y n, the land, or earth, by way of eminence.

Holding the four winds) Preventing evil from every quarter. Earth—sea, nor any tree: keeping the whole of the land free from evil, till the church of Christ should wax strong; and each of His followers have time to prepare for his flight from Jerusalem, previously to its total destruction by the Romans.

The seal of the living God) This angel is represented as the chancellor of the Supreme King; and as ascending from the east, απο ανατολης ηλιου, from the rising of the sun. Some understand this of Christ, who is called ανατολη, the east, Luke 1. 78.

It was given to hurt) Particular agents, employed by Divine Providence in the management of the affairs of the earth: but whether spiritual or material we know not.

Till we have sealed the servants of our God) There is manifestly an allusion to Ezek. ix. 4. here. By sealing, we are to understand consecrating the persons in a more especial manner to God: and showing, by this mark of God upon them, that they were under His more immediate protection; and that nothing should hurt them. It was a custom in the East, and indeed in the West too, to stamp, with a hot iron, the name of the owner upon the forehead or shoulder of his slave.

It is worthy of remark, that not one Christian perished in the siege of Jerusalem; all had left the city, and escaped to Pella. This I have often had occasion to notice.

I heard the number of them which were sealed) In the number of 144,000 is included all the Jews converted to Christianity; 12,000 out of each of the twelve tribes: but this must be only a certain for an uncertain number; for it is not to be supposed that just 12,000 were converted out of each of the twelve tribes.

Of the tribe of Judah &c.) First, we are to observe that the tribe of Levi is here mentioned, though that tribe had no inheritance in Israel; but they now belonged to the spiritual priesthood. Secondly, That the tribe of Dan, which had an inheritance, is here omitted; as also the tribe of Ephraim. Thirdly, That the tribe of Joseph is here added, in the place of Ephraim. Ephraim and Dan being the principal promoters of idolatry, are left out in this enumeration.

A great multitude) This appears to mean the church of Christ among the Gentiles, for it was different from that collected from the twelve tribes; and it is here said to be of all nations, kindreds, people, and tongues.

Clothed with white robes) As emblems of innocence and purity. With palms in their hands, in token of victory gained over the world, the devil, and the flesh.

Salvation to our God) That is, God alone is the Author of the salvation of man; and this salvation is procured for, and given to, them through the Lamb, as their propitiatory sacrifice.

All the Angels, &c.) As there is joy in the presence of God, among these holy spirits, when one sinner repents, no wonder that they take such an interest in the gathering together of such innumerable multitudes, who are fully saved from their sins.

Saying, Amen) Giving their most cordial and grateful assent to the praises attributed to God and the Lamb.

Blessing, and glory, &c.) There are here seven different species of praise attributed to God, as in chap. v. 12. where see the note.

CHAPTER VIII.

The opening of the seventh seal, 1. The seven angels, with the seven trumpets, 2-6. The first sounds; and there is a shower of hail, fire, and blood, 7. The second sounds; and the burning mountain is cast into the sea, 8-9. The third sounds; and the great star Wormwood falls from heaven, 10, 11. The fourth sounds; and the sun, moon, and stars, are smitten; and a threefold woe is denounced against the inhabitants of the earth, because of the three angels who are yet to sound, 12, 13. [A. M. cir. 4100. A. D. cir. 98. Imp. Flavio Domitiano Cæs. Aug. et Nerv.]

1 And when he had opened the seventh seal, there was silence in heaven about the space of half an hour.

2 And I saw the seven angels which stood before God; and to them were given seven trumpets.

3 And another angel came and stood at the altar, having a golden censer; and there was given unto him much incense, that he should offer it with the prayers of all saints upon the golden altar which was before the throne.

4 And the smoke of the incense, which came with the prayers of the saints, ascended up before God out of the angel's hand.

5 And the angel took the censer, and filled it with fire of the altar, and cast it into the earth: and there were voices, and thunders, and lightnings, and an earthquake.

6 And the seven angels which had the seven trumpets prepared themselves to sound.

7 The first angel sounded, and there followed hail and fire mingled with blood, and they were cast upon the earth: and the third part of trees was burnt up; and all green grass was burnt up.

8 And the second angel sounded, and as it were a great mountain burning with fire was cast into the sea: and the third part of the sea became blood;

9 and the third part of the creatures which were in the sea, and had life, died: and the third part of the ships were destroyed.

10 And the third angel sounded, and there fell a great star from heaven, burning as it were a lamp, and it fell upon the third part of the rivers, and upon the fountains of waters;

11 and the name of the star is called Wormwood: and the third part of the waters became wormwood; and many men died of the waters, because they were made bitter.

12 And the fourth angel sounded, and the third part of the sun was smitten, and the third part of the moon, and the third part of the stars; so as the third part of them was darkened, and the day shone not for a third part of it, and the night likewise.

13 And I beheld, and heard an angel flying through the midst of heaven, saying with a loud voice, Woe, wo, wo, to the inhabitants of the earth, by reason of the other voices of the trumpet of the three angels, which are yet to sound!

They were cast upon the earth [Esc τῶν ἄνθρ, into that land: viz. Judea, thus often designated.

And the third part of the trees] Before this clause, the Codex Alexandrinus, thirty-five others, the Syriac, Arabic, Ethiopic, Armenian, Slavonic, Vulgate, Andreas, Arctas, and some others, have καὶ τὰ ἕνδεκα τῶν ἁγίων ἄρτων, and the third part of the land was burnt up. This reading, which is undoubtedly genuine, is found also in the Complutensian Polyglot.

The land was wasted; the trees, the chiefs of the nation were destroyed; and the grass, the common people, were slain or carried into captivity. High and low, rich and poor, were overwhelmed with one general destruction. This seems to be the meaning of these figures.

Many eminent men suppose that the irruption of the barbarous nations on the Roman empire is here intended. It is easy to find coincidences, when fancy runs riot. Later writers might find here the irruption of the Austrians, and British, and Prussians, Russians, and Cossacs, on the French empire!

8. A great mountain burning with fire] Supposed to signify the powerful nations which invaded the Roman empire. Mountain, in prophetic language, signifies a kingdom, Jer. xii. 25, 27, 30, 53. Great disorders, especially when kingdoms are moved by hostile invasions, are represented by mountains being cast into the midst of the sea, Psa. xlvii. 2. Seas, and collections of waters, mean peoples, as is shown in this book, ch. xvii. 15. Therefore, great commotions in kingdoms, and among their inhabitants, may be here intended; but to whom, where, and when, these happened, or are to happen, we know not.

The third part of the sea became blood] Another allusion to the Egyptian plagues, Exod. vii. 20, 21. Third part is a rabbinism, expressing a considerable number. "When Rabbi Akiba prayed, wept, rent his garments, put off his shoes, and sat in the dust, the world was struck with a curse; and then the third part of the olives, the third part of the wheat, and the third part of the barley was smitten."—Rab. Mardocheus, in Notitia Karorum, p. 102.

9. The third part of the ships were destroyed] These judgments seem to be poured out on some maritime nation, destroying much of its population, and much of its traffic.

10. There fell a great star from heaven] This has given rise to various conjectures. Some say the star means Attila and his Huns; others, Genericus with his Vandals falling on the city of Rome; others, Elazar, the son of Anna, spurning the emperor's victims, and exciting the fury of the zealots; others, Arius, infecting the pure Christian doctrine with his heresy, &c. &c. It certainly cannot mean all three; and probably none of them. Let the reader judge.

11. The star is called Wormwood] So called from the bitter and distressing effects produced by its influence.

12. The third part of the sun—moon—stars—were smitten] Supposed to mean Rome, with her senates, consuls, &c. eclipsed by Odoacer, king of the Heruli, and Theodoric, king of the Ostrogoths, in the fifth century. But all this is uncertain.

13. I—heard an angel flying] Instead of ἀγγελος περὶφρῶν, an angel flying, almost every MS. and Version of note has ἀερόν περὶφρῶν, an eagle flying. The eagle was the symbol of the Romans; and was always on their ensigns. The three woes which are here expressed, were probably to be executed by this people; and upon the Jews and their component parts. Taken in this sense, the symbols appear consistent and appropriate: and the reading eagle, instead of angel, is undoubtedly genuine.

NOTES.—Verse 1. The seventh seal] This is ushered in and opened only by the Lamb.

Silence in heaven] This must be a mere metaphor, silence being put here for the deep and solemn expectation of the stupendous things about to take place, which the opening of this seal had produced. When any thing prodigious or surprising is expected, all is silence; and even the breath is scarcely heard to be drawn.

Half an hour.] As heaven may signify the place in which all these representations were made to St. John, the half hour may be considered as the time during which no representation was made to him; the time in which God was preparing the august exhibition which follows.

There is here, and in the following verses, a strong allusion to different parts of the temple worship; a presumption that the temple was still standing, and the regular service of God carried on. The silence here, refers to this fact—while the priest went in to burn incense in the holy place, all the people continued in silent mental prayer without, till the priest returned.—See Luke i. 10. The angel mentioned here appears to execute the office of priest, as we shall by and by see.

2. The seven angels who stood before God] Probably the same as those called the seven spirits which are before his throne, chap. i. 4.; where see the note. There is still an allusion here to the seven ministers of the Persian monarchs. See Tobit, chap. xii. 15.

3. Another angel] About to perform the office of priest. Having a golden censer] This was a preparation peculiar to the day of expiation. "On other days, it was the custom of the priest to take fire from the great altar in a silver censer; but on the day of expiation the high-priest took the fire from the great altar, on a golden censer; and when he was come down from the great altar, he took incense from one of the priests, who brought it to him, and went with it to the golden altar; and while he offered the incense, the people prayed without in silence, which is the silence in heaven for half an hour."—See Sir Isaac Newton.

Much incense, that he should offer it] Judgments of God are now about to be executed: the saints, the genuine Christians pray much to God for protection. The angelic Priest comes with much incense, standing between the living and those consigned to death, and offers His incense to God with the prayers of the saints.

4. The smoke of the incense—with the prayers] Though incense itself be an emblem of the prayers of the saints, Psa. cxlii. 2. yet here they are said to ascend before God, as well as the incense. It is not said that the Angel presents these prayers; He presents the incense, and the prayers ascend with it. The ascending of the incense shows that the prayers and offering were accepted.

5. Cast it into the earth] That is, upon the land of Judea; intimating the judgments and desolations which were now coming upon it; and which appear to be further opened in the sounding of the seven trumpets.

There were voices] All these seem to point out the confusion, commotions, distresses, and miseries, which were coming upon these people, in the wars which were at hand.

6. Prepared themselves to sound.] Each took up his trumpet, and stood prepared to blow his blast. Wars are here indicated: the trumpet was the emblem of war.

7. Hail and fire mingled with blood] This was something like the ninth plague of Egypt.—See Exod. ix. 18—24. The Lord sent thunder and hail—and fire mingled with the hail—and the fire ran along upon the ground. In the hail, and fire mingled with blood, some fruitful imaginations might find gunpowder, and cannon balls; consisters shot, and bombs.

CHAPTER IX.

The fifth angel sounds, and a star falls from heaven to earth, 1. The bottomless pit is opened, and locusts the earth, 2, 3. Their commission, 4-6. Their form, 7-10. Their government, 11, 12. The sixth and the four angels bound in the Euphrates are loosed, 13-15. The army of horsemen, and their deeds. Though much evil is inflicted upon men for their idolatry, &c. they do not repent, 20, 21. [A. M. cir. 410. Imp. Flavio Domitiano Cæs. Aug. et Nervæ.]

4 And it was commanded them that they should not hurt the grass of the earth, neither any green thing, neither any tree; but only those men which have not the seal of God in their foreheads.

5 And to them it was given that they should not kill them, but that they should be tormented five months; and their torment was as the torment of a scorpion, when he striketh a man.

6 And in those days shall men seek death, and shall not find it; and shall desire to die, and death shall flee from them.

7 And the shapes of the locusts were like unto horses prepared unto battle; * and on their heads were as it were crowns like gold, * and their faces were as the faces of men.

NOTES. Verse 1. [A star fall from heaven] An angel, encompassed with light, suddenly descended; and seemed like a star falling from heaven.

[The key of the bottomless pit] Power to inundate the earth with a flood of temporal calamities and moral evils.

2. [He opened the bottomless pit] Το άπύρτα τής άβύσσου, the pit of the bottomless deep. Some think the angel means Satan; and the bottomless pit, hell. Some suppose Mohammed is meant; and Signor Pastoralini professes to believe that Luther is intended!

[There arose a smoke] False doctrine, obscuring the true light of heaven.

3. [Locusts] Vast hordes of military troops; the description which follows certainly agrees better with the Saracens than with any other people or nation; but may also apply to the Romans.

[As the scorpions of the earth have power.] Namely, to hurt men by stinging them. Scorpions may signify archers; and hence the description has been applied to Cestius Gallus, the Roman general, who had many archers in his army.

4. [They should not hurt the grass of the earth, &c.] Neither the common people, the men of middling condition, nor the nobles. However, this appears rather to refer to the prudent counsels of a military chief, not to destroy the crops and herbage, of which they might have need in their campaigns.

[Who have not the seal of God] All false, hypocritical, and heterodox Christians.

5. [To them it was given] That is, they were permitted.

[That they should be tormented five months] Some take these months literally, and apply them to the conduct of the zealots, who, from May to September, in the year of the siege, produced dreadful contests among the people; or to the afflictions brought upon the Jews by Cestius Gallus, when he came against Jerusalem; before which he lay one whole summer, or nearly five months.—See Joseph. Bell. Jud. l. ii. c. 19.

Others consider the months as being prophetic months, each day being reckoned for a year; therefore, this period must amount to one hundred and fifty years, counting thirty days to each month, as was the general custom of the Asiatics.

[Their torment was as the torment of a scorpion] The phraseology here is peculiar, and probably refers to the warlike weapon called a scorpion, several of which, or men armed with them, Cestius Gallus brought with him in his army.

Isidore describes this scorpion thus:—Scorpio est sagitta venenata arca relictormentis excussa: qua dum ad hominem ceciderit, virus qua figit infundit; unde et scorpio nomen accepit. "The scorpion is a poisoned arrow shot from a bow, or other instrument; which, when it wounds a man, deposits the poison, with which it is covered, in the wound: whence it hath the name of scorpion." Seneca, in his Hercules Œtus, Act. iv. v. 1218, describes the torment which is occasioned by this species of poisoned arrow:

Hæc qualis intus scorpius, quis fervida
Punga reulzus cancer infusus mens Urit medullas?

6. [In those days shall men seek death] So distressing shall be their sufferings and torment, that they shall long for death in any form, to be rescued from the evils of life. There is a sentiment much like this in Maximianus, Eleg. l. v. 111, commonly attributed to Cornelius Gallus:

Nunc quia longa mihi gravis est et inutilis ætas,
Vivere cum nequeam, sit mihi posse mori!

O quam dura premit miseris conditio
Nec more humano subject arbitrio
Dulce mori miseris sed mors optata reo
At cum tristis erit, precipitata venit.

"Seeing that long life is both useless and burdensome, when we can no longer live comfortably, and are led to die!

O how hard is the condition on which we have to live! For death is not subjected to the will of man, but to die is sweet to the wretched; but wishes away.

Yet when it is not desired, it comes with the same manner!

Job expresses the same sentiment in the same manner:

Why is light given to the miserable,
And life to the bitter of soul?
Who wait for death, but it is not;
And dig for it more than hid treasure:
They rejoice for it; and are glad;
And exult when they find the grave.

7. [The locusts were like unto horses] The locusts appears to be taken from Joel ii. This symbolical description of an overwhelming army agrees very well with the troops of Mohammed, who are the most expert horsemen in the world; on horseback, that the horse and his rider are one animal. The Romans also were eminent cavalry.

[Crests like gold] Not only alluding to their armor, or barbans; but to the extent of their conquests, and the multitude of power which they subdued.

[Their faces were as the faces of men] These words symbolical, they are really men.

8. [Hair, as the hair of women]. No razor used. Their hair long, and their beards long.

[Their teeth were as the teeth of lions] Their armor and cruel.

9. [They had breastplates—of iron] They were terrible; for no force availed against them.

[The sound of their wings] Their long military trappings, and the clang of their shields when they make their fierce onsets. This is from Joel ii. 5-7.

10. [They had tails like unto scorpions.] To denote the consequences of their victories. They conquered with their pernicious doctrines.

[Their power was to hurt men five months] make their principal ravages during the five months. But probably these may be prophetic months, 5, 100 years.

11. [A king over them] A supreme head and commander; some think Vespasian.

[The angel of the bottomless pit.] The chief agent of destruction.

[Apollyon] From απο, intensives, and ἀλλω, meaning is the same, both in the Hebrew and Greek.

12. [One was his past] That is the word or symbolical scorpions.

[There come two voices more] In the trumpet and seventh angels.

13. [The four horns of the golden altar]

17 And thus I saw the horses in the vision, and them that sat on them, having breastplates of fire, and of jacinth, and brimstone: <sup>a</sup> and the heads of the horses were as the heads of lions; and out of their mouths issued fire, and smoke, and brimstone.

18 By these three was the third part of men killed, by the fire, and by the smoke, and by the brimstone, which issued out of their mouths.

19 For their power is in their mouth, and in their tails: <sup>b</sup> for not very obscure indication, that the Jewish temple was yet standing.

14. Loose the four angels These four angels bound, hitherto restrained, in the Euphrates, are by some supposed to be the Arabs, the Saracens, the Tartars or the Turks; by others, Vespasian's four generals, one in Arabia, one in Africa, one in Alexandria, and one in Palestine.

15. For an hour, and a day, and a month, and a year We have in this place a year resolved into its component parts. Twenty-four hours constitute a day, seven days make a week, four weeks make a month, and twelve months make a year. Probably no more is meant than that these four angels were at all times prepared and permitted to inflict evil on the people against whom they had received their commission. There are some who understand these divisions of time as prophetic periods; and to these I must refer, not professing to discuss such uncertainties.

16. Two hundred thousand thousand Two septuagies septuagies; two myriads of myriads; that is, two hundred millions: an army that never was yet got together from the foundation of the world; and could not find forage in any part of the earth. Perhaps it only means vast numbers, multitudes, without number. Such a number might be literally true of the locusts. Those who will have their particular system supported by the images in this most obscure book, tell us that the number here means all the soldiers that were employed in this war from its commencement to its end! Those who can receive this saying, let them receive it.

17. Breastplates of fire—jacinth, and brimstone That is, red, blue, and yellow; the first is the colour of fire, the second of jacinth, and the third of sulphur.

And the heads of the horses Is this an allegorical description of great ordinance? Cannons, on the mouths of which horses' heads were formed; or the mouth of the cannon cast in that form? Fire, smoke, and brimstone, is a good allegorical representation of gunpowder. The Ottomans made great use of heavy artillery in their wars with the Greeks of the lower empire.

18. By these three was the third part of men killed That is, by these was great carnage made.

19. Their power is in their mouth From these the destructive balls were like unto serpents, and had heads, and with them they do hurt.

20 And the rest of the man which were not killed by these plagues yet repented not of the works of their hands, that they should not worship devils, and idols of gold, and silver, and brass, and stone, and of wood; which neither can see, nor hear, nor walk:

21 Neither repented they of their murders, nor of their sorceries, nor of their fornication, nor of their thefts.

Ps. 105.7. 1 Cor. 10.22.—<sup>a</sup> Ps. 115.4 & 115.13. Dan. 5.23.—<sup>b</sup> Ch. 15.

tive balls are projected—and in their tails; the breech where the charge of gunpowder is lodged?

Their tails were like unto serpents, and had heads If cannons are intended, the description, though allegorical, is plain enough; for brass ordnance especially, are frequently thus ornamented, both at their muzzles and at their breech.

20. Yet repented not The commission which these horse-men had was against idolaters; and, though multitudes of them were destroyed, yet the residue continued their senseless attachment to dumb idols; and therefore heavier judgments might be expected. These things are supposed to refer to the desolation brought upon the Greek church by the Ottomans, who entirely ruined that church, and the Greek empire. The church which was then remaining, was the Latin or western church, which was not at all corrected by the judgments which fell upon the eastern church, but continued its senseless adoration of angels, saints, relics, &c. and does so to the present day. If, therefore, God's wrath be kindled against such, this church has much to fear.

21. Neither repented they of their murders Their cruelties towards the genuine followers of God; the Albigenses, and Waldenses, and others; against whom they published crusades, and hunted them down, and butchered them in the most shocking manner. The innumerable murders by the horrible inquisition need not be mentioned.

Their sorceries Those who study this also to the Romish church, understand by it the various tricks, sleights of hand, or legerdemain, by which they impose on the common people, in causing images of Christ to bleed; and the various pretended miracles wrought at the tombs, &c. of pretended saints, holy wells, and such like.

Fornications Giving that honour to various creatures; which is due only to the Creator.

Their thefts Their exactions and impositions on men for induigences, pardons, &c. These things may be intended, but it is going too far to say that this is the true interpretation. And yet, to express any doubt on this subject, is with some little else than heresy. If such men can see these things so clearly in such obscure prophecies, let them be thankful for their sight; and indulgent to those who still sit in darkness.

CHAPTER X.

The description of a mighty angel, with the little book in his hand, 1, 2. The seven thunders, 3, 4. The angel swears that there shall be time no longer, 5—7. NOTES.—Verse 1. Another mighty angel Either Christ, or His representative. Clothed with a cloud; a symbol of the Divine Majesty.

A rainbow was upon his head The token of God's merciful covenant with mankind.

His face was as it were the sun So intensely glorious that it could not be looked on.

His feet as pillars of fire To denote the rapidity and energy of His motions, and the stability of His counsels.

2. A little book open Meaning, probably, some design of God long concealed, but now about to be made manifest. But who knows what it means?

His right foot upon the sea, and his left—upon the earth To show that He had the command of each; and that His power was universal, all things being under His feet.

3. Seven thunders Seven being a number of perfection, it may here mean many, great, loud, and strong peals of thunder, accompanied with distinct voices; but what was said St. John was not permitted to reveal, ver. 4.

8 And the voice which I heard from heaven spake unto me again, and said, Go and take the little book which is open in the hand of the angel which standeth upon the sea and upon the earth.

9 And I went unto the angel, and said unto him, Give me the little book. And he said unto me, <sup>l</sup> Take it and eat it up; and it shall make thy belly bitter, but it shall be in thy mouth sweet as honey.

10 And I took the little book out of the angel's hand, and ate it up: <sup>m</sup> and it was in my mouth sweet as honey: and as soon as I had eaten it, <sup>n</sup> my belly was bitter.

5. Lifted up his hand to heaven As one making an appeal to the Supreme Being.

6. By him that liveth for ever and ever The eternal, se'c.-existent Jehovah, the Maker of all things.

That there should be time no longer That the great counsels relative to the events already predicted should be immediately fulfilled; and that there should be no longer delay.—This has no reference to the day of judgment.

7. The mystery of God should be finished What this mystery refers to, who knows? Nor have we more knowledge concerning the wounding of the seventh angel. On these points there is little agreement among learned men. Whether it means the destruction of Jerusalem, or the destruction of the papal power, or something else, we know not. And yet, with what confidence do men speak of the meaning of these hidden things?

Declared to his servants the prophets It is most likely, therefore, that this trumpet belongs to the Jewish state.

8. Take the little book which is open Learn from this angel what should be published to the world.

9. Take it and eat it up] Fully comprehend its meaning; study it thoroughly.

10. It was in my mouth sweet as honey.] There was in its own pleasing, some unpleasing intelligence. I read of the consolations and protection of the true worshippers of God, and did rejoice; I read of the persecutions of the church, and was distressed.

11. Thou must prophesy again.] Thou must write not only for the instruction of the Jews in Palestine, but of those in the different provinces; as well as the heathens, and heathen emperors and potentates, in general.

The reader will find, on comparing this chapter with Dan. viii. and xii. and Ezek. ii. and iii. that there are several things similar in both; and the writer of the Apocalypse appears to keep these two prophets continually in view. I must once more say, that I do not understand these prophecies; therefore, I do not take upon me to explain them. I see, with regret, how many learned men have mistaken Commentators, and even some of the most strangely trifled in these solemn things: all woes, &c. are perfectly easy to them; yet for nations, none get wise either to common sense, that make for their peace.

On the same ground, I cannot admit the interpretation given of the word χρονος, translated time, if some have construed into an artificial period, which they term chronos; hence we have the chronos and non-chronos. Bengel has said points; but to very little purpose; the word seems to signify delay simply; and probably long-suffering of God being ended, in reference for, I all along take for probable, that this book was written previously to the destruction of that city.

CHAPTER XI.

The command to measure the temple, 1, 2. The two witnesses which should prophesy twelve hundred] and the description, power, and influence, of these witnesses, 4—5. They shall be slain by the beast which shall rise from the bottomless pit; and shall arise again after three days and a half, and ascend to heaven, 7—12. After a great earthquake, 13. The introduction to the third sea, 14. The sounding of the seventh angel, and twenty elders give glory to God, 15—19. [A. M. cir. 4100. A. D. cir. 96. Iupp. Flavius Domitiano Cæs. Au-

AND there was given me a reed like unto a rod; and the angel stood, saying, Rise, and measure the temple of God, and the altar, and them that worship therein.

2 But the court which is without the temple leave out, and measure it not; for it is given unto the Gentiles; and the holy city shall they tread under foot forty and two months.

3 And I will give power unto my two witnesses, and they shall prophesy a thousand two hundred and threescore days, clothed in sackcloth.

4 These are the two olive trees, and the two candlesticks standing before the God of the earth.

5 And if any man will hurt them, he must in this manner be killed: their month, and devoureth their enemies: and if any man will hurt them, he must in this manner be killed.

6 These have power to shut heaven, that it rain not in the days of their prophecy; and have power over waters to turn them to blood, and to smite the earth with all plagues, as often as they will.

7 And when they shall have finished their testimony, the beast that ascendeth out of the bottomless pit shall make war against them, and shall overcome them, and kill them.

8 And their dead bodies shall lie in the street of the great city, which spiritually is called Sodom and Egypt, where also our Lord was crucified.

9 And they of the people, and kindreds, and tongues, and

10 And they of the people, and kindreds, and tongues, and nations, shall see their dead bodies three days and shall not suffer their dead bodies to be put in a shroud. 10 And they that dwell upon the earth shall see them, and make merry, and shall send gifts unto them; because these two prophets tormented them on the earth. 11 And after three days and a half the Spirit of God entered into them, and they stood upon great fear fell upon them which saw them. 12 And they heard a great voice from heaven, Come up hither. And they ascended up a cloud; and their enemies beheld them. 13 And the same hour there was a great earthquake: the tenth part of the city fell, and in the earthquake slain of men seven thousand; and the remnant that gave glory to the God of heaven. 14 The second wa is past; and, behold, the third wa is come. 15 And the seventh angel sounded; and there were voices in heaven, saying, The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord, and of his Christ, and he shall reign for ever and ever. 16 And the four and twenty elders, which sat before his seat, fell upon their faces, and worshipped him, saying, We give thee thanks, O Lord God of heaven and earth, who art, and wast, and shalt be, because thou hast taken up the vials of the wrath of God against the world. 17 Saying, We give thee thanks, O Lord God of heaven and earth, who art, and wast, and shalt be, because thou hast taken up the vials of the wrath of God against the world. 18 And the voice which I heard from heaven said unto me, Write; for these things shall come to pass soon. 19 And when he had said these things, he fell down, and worshipped the angel which shewed these things unto me. And when he had said these things, he fell down, and worshipped the angel which shewed these things unto me. And when he had said these things, he fell down, and worshipped the angel which shewed these things unto me.

NOTES.—Verse 1. And there was given me a reed.] See Ezek. chap. xi. 3, &c.

Measure the temple of God.] This must refer to the temple of Jerusalem; and this is another presumptive evidence that it was yet standing.

2. But the court—is given unto the Gentiles.] The measuring of the temple probably refers to its approaching destruction, and the termination of the whole Levitical service; and this we find was to be done by the Gentiles, (Romans,) who were to tread it down forty-two months; i. e. just three years and a half, or twelve hundred and sixty days. This must be a symbolical period.

3. My two witnesses.] This is extremely obscure: the conjectures of interpreters are as unsatisfactory as they are endless on this point.—Conjecturas conjecturas superlativum, parum verosimiles, says Rosenmüller: quorum sententias enarrare, neminem non est. I say the same. Those who wish to be amused, or bewildered, may have recourse both to ancient and moderns on this subject.

4. These are the two olive-trees.] Mentioned Zecl. iv. 14. which there represent Zerubbabel, and Joshua the high-priest. The whole account seems taken from Zecl. iv. 1—14. Whether the prophet and the apostle mean the same things by these emblems, we know not.

5. Fire proceedeth out of their mouth.] That is, they are commissioned to denounce the judgments of God against all who would attempt to prevent them from proceeding in their ministry.

6. These have power to shut heaven.] As Elijah did, 1 Kings xvii. and xviii.

To turn them to blood.] As Moses did, Exod. vii. They shall have power to afflict the land with plagues, similar to those which were inflicted on the Egyptians.

7. The beast that ascendeth out of the bottomless pit.] This may be what is called Antichrist; some power that is opposed to genuine Christianity. But what, or whence, except from the bottomless pit, i. e. under the influence and appointment of the devil, we cannot tell; nor do we know by what name this power or being should be called. The conjectures concerning the two witnesses, and the beast, have been sufficiently multiplied. If the whole passage, as some think, refer to the persecution raised by the Jews against the Christians, nations, shall see their dead bodies three days and shall not suffer their dead bodies to be put in a shroud. 10 And they that dwell upon the earth shall see them, and make merry, and shall send gifts unto them; because these two prophets tormented them on the earth.

11 And after three days and a half the Spirit of God entered into them, and they stood upon great fear fell upon them which saw them.

12 And they heard a great voice from heaven, Come up hither. And they ascended up a cloud; and their enemies beheld them.

13 And the same hour there was a great earthquake: the tenth part of the city fell, and in the earthquake slain of men seven thousand; and the remnant that gave glory to the God of heaven.

14 The second wa is past; and, behold, the third wa is come.

15 And the seventh angel sounded; and there were voices in heaven, saying, The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord, and of his Christ, and he shall reign for ever and ever.

16 And the four and twenty elders, which sat before his seat, fell upon their faces, and worshipped him, saying, We give thee thanks, O Lord

God of heaven and earth, who art, and wast, and shalt be, because thou hast taken up the vials of the wrath of God against the world. 17 Saying, We give thee thanks, O Lord God of heaven and earth, who art, and wast, and shalt be, because thou hast taken up the vials of the wrath of God against the world. 18 And the voice which I heard from heaven said unto me, Write; for these things shall come to pass soon. 19 And when he had said these things, he fell down, and worshipped the angel which shewed these things unto me. And when he had said these things, he fell down, and worshipped the angel which shewed these things unto me.

then some Jewish persecutor or person is the beast that ascendeth out of the bottomless pit. If it refer to the early ages of Christianity, the beast may be one of the persecuting emperors. If it refer to a later age of Christianity, then it is the papal power, and the Abigoneses and Waldensians, which were nearly extinguished by persecution raised up against them by the emperor Constantine. Whatever may be here intended, the earth has its blood.

3. The great city.] Some say Rome; which is usually called Sodom for its abominations, Egyptian cruelty, and the place where our Lord was crucified; and the punishment of the members of Jerusalem itself may be intended. All these that refer to others.

9. Shall not suffer their dead bodies to be put in a shroud.] They shall be treated with the greatest barbarity; and to the dead was allowed to be the same cruelty.

10. Shall send gifts.] This was a custom in rejecting. They sent gifts to each other, and to the poor.—See Esther ix. 19, 22.

11. They stood upon their feet.] Were restored to a primitive state.

12. They ascended up to heaven.] Enjoyed peace and happiness.

13. A great earthquake.] Violent commotions, persecutions; and revolutions of states.

Slain of men seven thousand.] Many popular commotions.

The remnant were afflicted.] Seeing the judgments so remarkably stretched out.

Gave glory.] Received the pure doctrines of glorified God for His judgments and their own.

14. The second wa is past.] That which took place at the sixth trumpet, has been already described.

The third wa cometh.] Is about to be described. The angel which the angel is now preparing. Of the three woes which were denounced, the first is described, chap. ix. 1—12; the second, in these verses; and the third, in the next chapter.

which art, and wast, and art to come; because thou hast taken to thee thy great power, and hast reigned.

18 And the nations were angry, and thy wrath is come, and the time of the dead, that they should be judged, and hast thou shouldst give reward unto thy servants the prophets, and to the saints, and them that fear thy name, and small

he Jews themselves. The second wo—the besieging of the city by the Romans. The third wo—the taking and sacking of the city, and burning the temple. This was the greatest of all the woes; as, in all the city and temple were destroyed, and nearly a million of men lost their lives.

15. There were great voices in heaven All the heavenly host, angels and redeemed human spirits, joined together to signify God, that He had utterly discomfited His enemies, and rendered His friends glorious. This will be truly the case when the kingdoms of this world become the kingdoms of God and of His Christ. But when shall this be? Some say, What is meant by these words, has already taken place in the destruction of the Jewish state; and sending the Gospel throughout the Gentile world. Others say that it refers to the millennium, and to the consummation of all things.

16. The four and twenty elders—The representatives of the universal church of Christ.—See chap. v. 8.—10.

17. O Lord God Almighty, which art! This gives a proper law of God in his eternity; all times are here comprehended, to present, the past, and the future. This is the infinitude of God.

Hast taken to thee! Thou hast exercised that power which thou ever hast; and Thou hast broken the power of Thy enemies, and exalted Thy church.

18. The nations were angry! Were enraged against Thy apostle, and determined to destroy it.

Thy wrath is come! The time to avenge Thy servants, and destroy all Thy enemies.

The time of the dead that they should be judged! The word weigh, to judge, is often used in the sense of to avenge. He dead, here, may mean those who were slain for the testimony of Jesus; and the judging is, the avenging of their blood.

19. And the temple of God was opened in heaven, and there was seen in his temple the ark of his testament; and there were lightnings, and voices, and thunderings, and an earth quake, and great hail.

x Ch. 13. 10 & 13. 6.—Or, corrupt.—Ch. 15. 5, 6.—Ch. 6. 5 & 14. 13.—Ch. 16. 18

Give reward unto thy servants! Who have been faithful unto death.

The prophets! The faithful teachers in the church—The saints; the Christians.

And them that fear thy name! All thy sincere followers. Destroy them that destroy the earth! All the authors, fomenters, and encouragers, of bloody wars.

19. The temple of God was opened in heaven! The true worship of God was established and performed in the Christian church: this is the true temple, that at Jerusalem being destroyed.

And there were lightnings, and voices, and thunderings, and an earthquake, and great hail! These great commotions were intended to introduce the following vision; for the 12th chapter is properly a continuation of the 11th, and should be read in strict connexion with it.

I now come to a part of this book that is deemed of the greatest importance, by the Protestant church; but is peculiarly difficult and obscure. I have often acknowledged my own inability to illustrate these prophecies. I might have availed myself of the labours of others; but I know not who is right; or whether any of the writers on this book have hit the sense, is more than I can assert; and more than I think.

The illustration of the xiiith, xliiith, and xlviiith chapters which I have referred to in the Preface, drawn up and displayed with great industry and learning, I shall insert in its place, as by far the most probable I have yet seen; but I leave the learned author responsible for his own particular views of the subject.

CHAPTER XII.

the woman clothed with the sun, and in travail, 1, 2. The great red dragon, waiting to devour the child as soon as born, 3, 4. The woman is delivered of a son, who is caught up unto God; and she flees to the wilderness, 5, 6. The war in heaven between Michael and the dragon, 7, 8. The dragon and his angels are overcome and cast down to the earth, whereupon the whole heavenly host give glory to God, 10, 11. The dragon, full of wrath at his defeat, persecutes the woman, 12, 13. She flees to the wilderness, whither he attempts to pursue her; and he makes war with her seed, 14—17. [A. M. cir. 4100. A. D. cir. 96. Impm. Flavio Domitiano Cæs. Aug. et Nervæ.]

AND there appeared a great wonder in heaven; a woman clothed with the sun, and the moon under her feet, and on her head a crown of twelve stars:

And she being with child cried, travailling in birth, and ined to be delivered.

And there appeared another wonder in heaven; and behold a great red dragon, having seven heads and ten horns, and seven crowns upon his heads.

And his tail drew the third part of the stars of heaven, and did cast them to the earth: and the dragon stood before the woman which was ready to be delivered, for to devour her child as soon as it was born.

And she brought forth a man-child, who was to rule all nations with a rod of iron: and her child was caught up unto God, and to his throne.

And the woman fled into the wilderness, where she hath place prepared of God, that they should feed her there a year and two hundred and threescore days.

And there was war in heaven: Michael and his angels fought against the dragon; and the dragon fought and his angels.

And prevailed not; neither was their place found any more heaven.

And the great dragon was cast out, that old serpent, called the Devil, and Satan, which deceiveth the whole world: he was cast out into the earth, and his angels were cast out with him.

And I heard a loud voice saying in heaven, Now is the reign of our Lord Jesus Christ begun. [See the notes on the preceding chapter, I think it necessary to state the phraseology of the whole chapter is peculiarly radical, and shall insert a few selections which may serve to strate some of the principal figures.

1. Sahar Exod. fol. 47. col. 157. we find a mystical interpretation of Exod. xxi. 2. If a man strike, and hurt a woman's child, so that her fruit depart, he shall be surely punished as the woman's husband will lay upon him. If men strike, Michael and Sammael, and hurt a woman with child, the Israelitish church, so that her fruit depart, Accit in lia, he shall surely be punished; i. e. Sammael. As the man's husband, that is, the holy and blessed God.

verse 5. And her child was caught up unto God, and to his throne! In Yalcut Rubeni are these words: "Rachel, the wife of Methusala, was pregnant, and ready to be delivered come salvation, and strength, and the kingdom of our God, and the power of his Christ: for the accuser of our brethren is cast down, which accused them before our God day and night.

11 And they overcame him by the blood of the Lamb, and by the word of their testimony; and they loved not their lives unto the death

12 Therefore rejoice, ye heavens, and ye that dwell in them. Wo to the inhabitants of the earth, and of the sea! for the devil is come down unto you, having great wrath, because he knoweth that he hath but a short time.

13 And when the dragon saw that he was cast unto the earth, he persecuted the woman which brought forth the man-child.

14 And to the woman were given two wings of a great eagle, that she might fly into the wilderness, into her place; where she is nourished for a time, and times, and half a time, from the face of the serpent.

15 And the serpent cast out of his mouth water as a flood, after the woman, that he might cause her to be carried away of the flood.

16 And the earth helped the woman, and the earth opened her mouth, and swallowed up the flood which the dragon cast out of his mouth.

17 And the dragon was wroth with the woman, and went to make war with the remnant of her seed, which keep the commandments of God, and have the testimony of Jesus Christ.

7. There was war in heaven! In the same treatise, fol. 87. 2. on Exod. xiv. 7. Pharaoh took six hundred chariots, we have these words: "There was war among those above, and among those below, מלחמה גדולה נערכה בין המלאכים והאנשים, hayetah chazakah be-shamayim, and there was great war in heaven."

Of Michael, the rabbins are full.—See much in Schoetigen, and see the note on Jude, ver. 9.

9. That old serpent! The rabbins speak much of this being;

sometimes under the notion of שַׂטָּן yetsar ha-ra'â, "the evil principle;" and sometimes Sammael.

He was cast out into the earth, and his angels were cast out with him—This is very like a saying in the book Bahir, in Sohar Gen. fol. 27. col. 107. "And God cast out Sammael and his troops from the place of their holiness."

10. The accuser of our brethren—There is scarcely any thing more common in the rabbinical writings than Satan as the accuser of the Israelites. And the very same word שַׂטָּן, accuser; or, as it is in the Codex Alexandrinus, שַׂטָּן, accuser, is used by them in Hebrew letters, שַׂטָּן katigor, e. gr. Pickney Eliezer, c. 46. speaking of the day of expiation: "And the holy blessed God hears their testimony from their accuser, שַׂטָּן מִן הַקָּטִיגוֹר min ha-katigor; and expiates the altar, the priests, and the whole multitude, from the greatest to the least."

In Shemath Rabba, sect. 31. fol. 129. 2. are these words: "If a man observe the precepts, and is a son of the law, and lives a holy life, then Satan stands and accuses him."

"Every day, except the day of expiation, Satan is the accuser of men."—Vayikra Rabba, sect. 21. fol. 164.

"The holy blessed God said to the seventy princes of the world: Have ye seen him who always accuses my children?" Yalcut Chadash, fol. 101. 3.

"The devil stands always as an accuser before the King of Israel."—Sohar Levit. fol. 43. col. 171. See much more in Schoettgen.

NOTES BY J. E. C.—Verse 1. There appeared a great wonder in heaven, a woman clothed with the sun—That the woman here represents the true church of Christ, most commentators are agreed. In other parts of the Apocalypse, the pure church of Christ is evidently portrayed by a woman. In chap. xix. ver. 7. a great multitude are represented as saying, "Let us be glad and rejoice, and give honour to Him; for the marriage of the Lamb is come, and His wife hath made herself ready." In chap. xxi. 9. an angel talks with St. John, saying, "Come hither, I will show thee the woman, the Lamb's wife." That the Christian church is meant will appear also from her being clothed with the sun, a striking emblem of Jesus Christ, the Sun of righteousness, the light and glory of the church; for the countenance of the Son of God is as the sun shineth in his strength. The woman has

The moon under her feet—Bishop Newton understands this of the Jewish typical worship; and, indeed, the Mosaic system of rites and ceremonies could not have been better represented: for it was the shadow of good things to come. The moon is the less light, ruling over the night, and deriving all its illumination from the sun: in like manner the Jewish dispensation was the bright moonlight night of the world, and possessed a portion of the glorious light of the Gospel. At the rising of the sun the night is ended, and the lunar light no longer necessary, as the sun, which enlightens her, shines full upon the earth: exactly in the same way has the whole Jewish system of types and shadows been superseded by the birth, life, crucifixion, death, resurrection, ascension, and intercession of Jesus Christ. Upon the head of the woman is

A crown of twelve stars—A very significant representation of the twelve apostles, who were the first founders of the Christian church; and by whom the Gospel was preached in great part of the Roman empire with astonishing success. "They that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars for ever and ever." Don. xii. 3.

2. And she being with child, cried, travailing in birth, &c.—This, when taken in connexion with the following verses, is a striking figure of the great persecution which the church of Christ should suffer under the heathen Roman emperors, but more especially of that long and most dreadful one under Dioclesian. The woman is represented as being with child, to show that the time would speedily arrive when God's patient forbearance with the heathen would be terminated, and that a deliverer should arise in the Christian world who would execute the Divine vengeance upon paganism.

3. There appeared another wonder—a great red dragon—The dragon here is a symbol not of the Roman empire in general, but of the heathen Roman empire. This great pagan power must have, therefore, been thus represented from the religion which it supported. But what is a dragon? An entirely fabulous beast of antiquity. Consequently, in this respect, a most proper emblem of the heathen worship, which consisted in paying adoration to numerous imaginary beings, termed gods, goddesses, &c. The very foundation of the heathen religious system is mostly built upon fable; and it is very difficult to trace many of their superstitions to any authentic original; and even those which appear to derive their origin from the Sacred Writings are so disguised in fable as literally to bear no more resemblance to the truth than the dragon of the ancients does to any animal with which we are acquainted. But it may be asked why the Spirit of God should represent the heathen Roman empire by a dragon rather than by any other of the fabulous animals with which the mythology of the ancient Romans abounded. The answer is as follows: In the eighth chapter of the prophet Daniel, God has represented the kingdom of the Greeks by a he-goat, for no other apparent reason than this, that it was the national military standard of the Grecian monarchy: we may, therefore, expect that the pagan Roman empire is called a dragon on a similar account. In confirmation of this point it is very remarkable that the dragon was Romans next to the eagle in the fifth, centuries of the Christian era, as evident in the writings of Arrian is the earliest writer who was used as military standards Tactics, c. 51. Hence Schwabard was introduced after Trajan Vegetius de Re Militari à Schv 1800; and Grævi Thesaur. Ant. Vegetius, who flourished about Primum signum totius legionis portat. DRACONES etiam per signa feruntur ad prælium. The eagle is the eagle, which the aquilifer also borne to battle by the draco of ten cohorts, there were, the aquilifer; hence, from the great army, the word signarius or signifer at last to mean the carriers of the others retaining the name of a c. 7, and his commentators. To call a red dragon, and accompany of ancient writers, that the Romans were painted red. We read lib. xvi. c. 12. of FERREUS standard of the dragon."—See bib. ii. l. 177, 178. Petrus in his Glossarium Media Draco, have considered this as the latter writer, who has made dianus, Sidorius Prudentius, a standard; but also the image of a red purple colour. Of respecting the dragon, this is the beast is shown to St. John, by which is symbolically represented; and from among the numerous images of mankind have created, power is the heathen ROMAN em-

Having seven heads.—As the heathen Roman power, its head of government.—See the heads of the beast are explained exactly seven, and are enumerated in principia in words to the Roman was originally governed by liberty and the consulate. Sionally appointed; neither did above two years; and the consul bunee was not of long continu Sylla's long domination; the power was also soon absorbed in that of pidus and Antony finally yielded this passage it is evident to ever the Roman history, that the seven heathen Roman world were, 1. consulate; 3. The Dictatorship; 4. sular power of the military Tri and 7. The Imperial Government.

It is singular that commentators of this passage, have taken no form of government evidently others, as kings are from consul. For the triumvirate consisted of republic into three parts, each ed with consular authority in limited together in the regulation. Consequently, it differed entirely which was the entire conversion republic to a monarchy.

And ten horns.—That these ten doms is evident from the seven the angel, speaking of the four horns out of this kingdom are ten in this view of the passage may who also admit that the ten horns "and the broken pieces of the ten man empire, and its division into can be intended by the angel's therefore, the ten horns of Dan many kingdoms; for the very so the dragon have a similar meaning was not divided into several considerable time after it became can it be said that the different man empire was divided by the dragon? They were so, he narchy, in its seventh DRACONIS was dismembered by the barbar empire was not completely dissolved it is well known that the depre and the advancement of Christian the least change in the form of a stinued still to be under subjection consequently, when the heathen

Roman empire among themselves, they might very properly be denominated horns of the dragon; as it was by means of their incursions that the imperial power, founded by the Heathen Cæsars was abolished. Machiavel and Bishop Lloyd enumerate the horns of the dragon thus: 1. The kingdom of the Huns. 2. The kingdom of the Ostrogoths. 3. The kingdom of the Visigoths. 4. The kingdom of the Franks. 5. The kingdom of the Vandals. 6. The kingdom of the Sueves and Alans. 7. The kingdom of the Burgundians. 8. The kingdom of the Heruli, Rugii, Scyri, and other tribes which composed the Italian kingdom of Odoacer. 9. The kingdom of the Saxons. And, 10. The kingdom of the Lombards.

And seven crowns upon his heads.—In the seven Roman forms of government already enumerated, Heathenism has been the erecting, or dominant, religion.

1. And his tail drew the third part of the stars of heaven.—It is not unusual in Scripture, as Dr. Mitchell observes, to call the hindmost of an enemy the tail; as in Josh. x. 19. Ye shall cut off the hindmost of them, which is literally, in Hebrew, כְּחֵטְמָם "Ye shall cut off their tail".—See also Deut. xxx. 15. It is also observable that the word up in this verse has been used by the Greeks in the same sense with the Hebrew word already referred to. Thus upa spara, which we would translate the rear of an army, is literally the tail of an army. See the Thesaurus of Stephens in loc. The tail of the dragon is, therefore, the Heathen Roman power in its erect or last form of government, viz. the imperial power; and is not, as Dr. Mitchell supposes, to be restricted to the last Heathen Roman emperors. The Heathen imperial power is said to draw the third part of the stars of heaven; by which has generally been understood that the Roman empire subjected the third part of the princes and potentates of the earth. But that this is not a correct statement of the fact is evident from the testimony of ancient history. The Roman empire was always considered and called the empire of the world by ancient writers. See Dionys. Halicarn. Antiq. Rom. lib. i. prope principium; Pittisci Lexicon Antiq. Rom. sub voc. imperium; Ovidii Fast. lib. ii. l. 683; Vegetius de Re Militari, lib. i. c. 1; &c. &c. It is even so named in Scripture; for St. Luke, in the second chapter of his Gospel, informs us that there went out a decree from Cæsar Augustus that the whole world should be taxed; by which is evidently meant the Roman empire. The whole mystery of this passage consists in the misapprehension of its symbolical language. In order, therefore, to understand it, the symbols here used must be examined. By heaven is meant the most eminent or ruling part of any nation. This is evident from the very nature of the symbol; for "heaven is God's throne;" they, therefore, who are advanced to the supreme authority in any state are very properly said to be taken up into heaven, because they are raised in this eminence by the favour of the Lord, and are ministers of his to do his pleasure. And the calamity which fell upon Nebuchadnezzar was to instruct him in this important truth that the heavens do rule; that is, that all monarchs possess their kingdoms by Divine appointment; and that no man is raised to power by what is usually termed the chances of war; but that "the Most High ruleth in the kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever he will, and setteth up over it the basest of men." The meaning of heaven being thus ascertained, it cannot be difficult to comprehend the meaning of earth, this being evidently its opposite, that is, everything in subjection to the heaven or ruling part. Stars have already been shown to denote ministers of religion; and this is more fully evident from chap. i. of this Book, where the seven stars which the Son of God holds in His right hand are explained to signify the seven angels (or messengers) of the seven churches, by whom must be meant the seven pastors or ministers of these churches. The resemblance of ministers to stars is very striking; for as the stars give light upon the earth, so are ministers the lights of the cause they advocate; and their position in heaven, the symbol of domination, very fitly betokens the spiritual authority of priests or ministers over their flocks. Hence as the woman, or Christian church, has upon her head a crown of twelve stars, which signifies that she is under the guidance of the twelve apostles, who are the twelve principal lights of the Christian world; so has the dragon also his stars or ministers. The stars, therefore, which the dragon draws with his tail, must represent the whole body of Pagan priests, who were the stars or lights of the Heathen world. But in what sense can it be said that the Heathen Roman empire, which ruled over the whole known world, only draws a third part of the stars of heaven? The answer is, the religious world in the time of St. John was divided into three grand branches, viz. The Christian world, the Jewish world, and the Heathen and Pagan world; consequently, as a dragon, a fabulous animal, is an emblem of a civil power supporting a religion founded in fable; it necessarily follows that the stars or ministers of the Jews and Christians cannot be numbered among those which he draws with his tail; as they were not the advocates of his idolatry, but were ministers of a religion founded by the God of heaven, and consequently formed no part of the Pagan world; though they were in subjection in secular matters to the Pagan Roman empire. The tail of the dragon, therefore, draweth after him the whole Heathen world!

And cast them upon the earth.—That is, reduced all the Pagan priests under the Roman yoke. The words of the prophecy are very remarkable. It is said the tail of the dragon draweth (for so erupt should be translated); but it is added and HATH CAST them upon the earth, to show that at the time the Apocalypse was written, the world was divided into the three grand religious divisions already referred to; but that the tail of the dragon, or the Pagan Roman power under its last form of government, had brought the whole Heathen world, (which was a third part of the religious world in the apostolic age,) into subjection, previously to the communication of the Revelation of St. John. It is the dragon's tail that draws the third part of the stars of heaven; therefore, it was during the dominion of his last form of government that Christianity was introduced into the world; for in the time of the six preceding draconic forms of government, the world was divided religiously into only two grand branches, Jews and Gentiles. That the sense in which the third part is here taken is the one intended in the prophecy is put beyond all controversy; when it is considered that this very division is made in the first and third verses, in which mention is made of the woman clothed with the sun, the Christian church, the moon under her feet, or Jewish church, and the dragon, or Heathen power. Thus the Heathen imperial government is doubly represented; first, by one of the seven draconic heads, to shew that it was one of those seven Heathen forms of government which have been successively at the head of the Roman state; and, secondly, by the dragon's tail, because it was the last of those seven. For a justification of this method of interpretation, see on the angel's double explanation of the heads of the beast, chap. xvii. 9, 10, 16.

And the dragon stood before the woman, &c.—Constantius Chlorus, the father of Constantine, abandoned the absurdities of Paganism, and treated the Christians with great respect. This alarmed the Pagan priests, whose interests were so closely connected with the continuance of the ancient superstitions, and who apprehended that to their great detriment the Christian religion would become daily more universal and triumphant throughout the empire. Under these anxious fears they moved Dioclesian to persecute the Christians. Hence began what is termed the tenth and last general persecution, which was the most severe of all, and continued nearly ten years (See Mosheim's Ecclesiastical History of the Third Century); and as it was the Divine pleasure that at this time a great deliverer should be raised up in behalf of His suffering people; the woman, or Christian church, is very appropriately represented as overtaken with the pangs of labour, and ready to be delivered. Before the death of Constantius, the Heathen party, aware that Constantine would follow the example of his father, who so much favoured the Christians, beheld him with a watchful and malignant eye. Many were the snares that, according to Eusebius, were laid for him by Maximin and Galerius; he relates the frequent and dangerous enterprises to which they urged him, with the design that he might lose his life. When Galerius heard of the death of Constantius, and that he had appointed Constantine his successor, he was filled with the most ungovernable rage and indignation; notwithstanding he did not dare to take any steps contrary to the interest of Constantine: the dread of the armies of the west, which were mostly composed of Christians, was a sufficient check to all attempts of that kind. Thus the dragon, or Heathen power, stood before the woman, or Christian church, to devour her son, or deliverer; as soon as he was born.—See Dr. Mitchell's Exposition of the Revelation in loc.

6. And she brought forth a man-child.—The Christian church, when her full time came, obtained a deliverer, who, in the course of the Divine providence, was destined to rule all nations.—The Heathen Roman empire, with a rod of iron—A strong figure to denote the very great restraint that should be put upon Paganism, so that it should not be able longer to persecute the Christian church. The man-child mentioned in this verse is the dynasty of Christian emperors, beginning with Constantine's public acknowledgment of his belief in the divinity of the Christian religion, which happened in the latter part of A. D. 312 after the defeat of the emperor Maximian.

And her child was caught up unto God and to his throne.—A succession of Christian emperors was raised up to the church; for the Roman throne, as Bishop Newton observes, is here called the throne of God, because there is no power but of God; the powers that he are ordained of God.

6. And the woman fled into the wilderness.—The account of the woman's flying into the wilderness immediately follows that of her child being caught up to the throne of God, to denote the great and rapid increase of heresies in the Christian church after the time that Christianity was made the religion of the empire.

Where she hath a place prepared of God—See on verse 14. 7. And there was war in heaven.—As heaven means here the throne of the Roman empire, the war in heaven consequently alludes to the breaking out of civil commotions among the governors of this empire.

Michael and his angels fought against the dragon.—Michael was the man-child which the woman brought forth, as is evident from the context; and therefore signifies, as has been shown already, the dynasty of Christian Roman emperors. This dynasty is represented by Michael, because he is "the great prince which standeth for the children of God's people." Dan. xii. 1 And the dragon, fought and his angels.—Or ministers.

8. And prevailed not—Against the cause of Christianity.

Nether was their place found any more in heaven—The advocates of the heathen idolatry were prevented from having any further share in the government of the empire. The wonderful success of Constantine over all his enemies, and his final triumph over Licinius, correspond exactly to the symbolical language of this verse.

9. And the great dragon was cast out, &c.—By the terms devil and Satan mentioned in this verse, Pareus, Faber, and many other commentators, understand literally the great spiritual enemy of mankind. But this view of the passage cannot be correct; from the circumstance that it is the dragon which is thus called. Now, if by the dragon be meant the devil; then we are necessarily led to this conclusion, that the great apostate spirit is a monster, having seven heads and ten horns, and also that he has a tail, with which he drags after him the third part of the stars of heaven. The appellations old serpent, devil, and Satan, must, therefore, be understood figuratively. The heathen power is called that old serpent which deceiveth the whole world, from its subtlety against the Christians, and its causing the whole Roman world, as far as it was in its power, to embrace the absurdities of paganism. It is called the devil, from its continual false accusations and slanders against the true worshippers of God; for the devil is a liar from the beginning: and it is also called Satan, which is a Hebrew word signifying an adversary, from its frequent persecutions of the Christian church. The dragon and his angels are said to be cast out; which is more than was said in the preceding verse. There mention is made of his being found no longer in heaven, or on the throne of the Roman empire; here, he is entirely cast out from all offices of trust in the empire: his religion is first only tolerated, and then totally abolished, by the imperial power. This great event was not the work of a reign; it took up many years; for it had to contend with the deep-rooted prejudices of the heathen, who to the very last endeavored to uphold their declining superstition. Paganism received several mortal strokes in the time of Constantine and his sons Constans and Constantius. It was further reduced by the great zeal of Jovian, Valentinian, and Valens; and was finally suppressed by the edicts of Gratian, Theodosius I. and his successors. It was not till A. D. 388, that Rome itself, the residence of the emperor, was generally reformed from the absurdities of paganism; but the total suppression of paganism soon followed the conversion of the metropolitan city; and about A. D. 395, the dragon may be considered, in an eminent sense, to have been cast into the earth, that is, into a state of utter subjection to the ruling dynasty of Christian emperors.

10. And I heard a loud voice, saying,--Now is come salvation, &c.—This is a song of triumph of the Christian church over the heathen idolatry; and is very expressive of the great joy of the Christians upon this most stupendous event. The loud voice of triumph is said to be heard in heaven; to show that the Christian religion was now exalted to the heaven or throne of the Roman empire. "It is very remarkable," as Bishop Newton observes, "that Constantine himself, and the Christians of his time, describe his conquests under the image of a dragon: as if they had understood that this prophecy had received its accomplishment in him. Constantine himself, in his epistle to Eusebius and other bishops concerning the re-edifying and repairing of the churches, saith that 'liberty being now restored, and that the dragon being removed from the administration of public affairs, by the providence of the great God, and by my ministry: I esteem the great power of God to have been made manifest to all.' Moreover, a picture of Constantine was set up over the palace-gate, with the cross over his head, and under his feet the great enemy of mankind, who persecuted the church by means of impious tyrants, in the form of a dragon, transfixed with a dart through the midst of his body, and falling headlong into the depth of the sea." See Eusebius de Vita Constantini, lib. ii. c. 46. and lib. iii. c. 2. and Socratis Hist. Eccles. lib. i. c. 9. Constantine added to the other Roman ensigns the labarum, or standard of the cross, and constituted it the principal standard of the Christian Roman empire. To this labarum Prudentius refers, when speaking of the Christian soldiers, in his first hymn ἕπι σταυρῶν,

*Cæsaris vexilla linguunt, eligunt signum crucis,
Proque ventosis Draconum, quæ gerebant, pallis, Præferunt insigne lignum, quod Draconem subdidit.*

"They leave the ensigns to Cæsar; they choose the standard of the cross: and instead of the dragon-flags which they carried, moved about with the wind, they bring forward the illustrious wood that subdued the dragon."

When the apostle saw the woman in heaven, well might he call it, in the spirit of prophecy, a great wonder.

11. And they overcame him by the blood of the Lamb—Here is given the reason why the followers of Christ prevailed at this time against all their adversaries. It was because they fought against the dragon in the armour of God. They overcame him by the blood of the Lamb, by proclaiming salvation to sinners through Christ crucified, and by their continual intercession at the throne of grace for the conversion of the heathen world.

And by the word of their testimony.—By constantly testifying against the errors and follies of mankind.

And they loved not their lives unto the death—They did not value their present temporal estate, but even up their lives to the fury of their persecution for the truth of what they spoke with their blood.

12. Therefore rejoice, ye heavens, and ye that dwell in them.—Let the Christians, who are now partaking temporal prosperity, and advanced to the empire, praise and magnify the Lord who wisely interfered in their behalf. But it is not

Wo to the inhabitants of the earth and of the sea, who have come down upon you.—By the inhabitants of the earth and of the sea, those parts of the Roman dominions intended that were reduced to a state of anarchy of the barbarous nations. It is not unlikely that great hosts of nations combined together. See Ezek. xxvi. 3. Here, then, is a warning to the whole Roman world, which will be excited by the method they pursued in their endeavor to destroy the religion of Jesus.—See on ver. 15.

Having great wrath, because he knoweth the time.—The Christian religion, the pagans regret, is rapidly gaining ground everywhere, and not timely checked, must soon brave all opposition.

13. And when the dragon saw that his time was short, he persecuted the woman.—When the heathen party saw that they were supported by the civil power—

He persecuted the woman that brought forth the man.—The heathens persecuted the Christian church, of which Divine Providence had raised up a series of Roman emperors.

14. And to the woman were given two great eagles.—The two eagles, here mentioned is an emblem of the Roman empire, and, therefore, differs from the dragon, who is the heathen Roman empire in particular. The eagle is called an eagle from its legionary standard introduced among the Romans in the second year of C. Marius; for, before that time, the standards were leopards, horses, boars and eagles, were used according to the humour of the commanders. The eagles were figures in relief, of silver or gold, supported by the tops of pikes; the wings being displayed, and a thunderbolt in their talons. Under the eagle were piled bucklers, and sometimes crowns. The two great eagles refer to the two grand divisions of the Roman empire, which took place in A. D. 395; and were given to the woman, Christianity, established religion of both empires.

That she might fly into the wilderness into the desert.—The apparent repetition here of what is said in the preceding verse induced Bishop Newton to consider the form introduced by way of prolepsis, or anticipation, that the woman did not fly into the wilderness after the conversion of Constantine. But such prolepsis as the bishop imagines, is very unusual in the ecclesiastical history of the fourth century; for the true church, began to flee into the wilderness time before the division of the great Roman empire into independent monarchies. The word translatio is taken in that peculiar sense, as if the woman had been furnished with the original word is ἐκπέφυγε. The meaning of the word is, that the woman began to fly into the wilderness almost immediately after the conversion of the Roman empire. The wings of her flight was furnished with the wings of the dove, ὡς πτερόν, that she might fly into that part of the world, where she should be fed a thousand years, and three score days. It is said here that the woman should be nourished in the wilderness, time, times, and a half; consequently, this is to be understood of the twelve hundred and sixty days, of other sense can they be considered the same standing a time to signify a year; times, times, and a half a time, half a year: i. e. three years and a half. Each prophetic year contains three hundred and sixty days, and a half will contain three hundred and sixty days. The Apocalypse being symbolic, it is reasonable to expect that its periods should be represented symbolically, that the prophetic years in all its parts. The Holy Spirit was given to the prophet Ezekiel to side three hundred and ninety days, that it might be a symbol of the house of Israel bearing their iniquity; and forty days upon his right side, to signify the house of Judah in a symbolical manner, that they might bear their iniquity forty years. The one thousand and three score days, therefore, that the woman is to be nourished in the wilderness, must be understood symbolically, and denote as many natural years. The fact that the woman flies is the Greek and Latin word conveyed into her place by means of the great eagle. We must not understand the phrase her place, of her removing from one part of the habitable world into another; but of her speedy declension from a state of great prosperity to a forlorn and desolate condition. The woman is nourished for one thousand two hundred and three-score years from the face of the serpent. The empires of the east and west were destined, in the course of the Divine Providence, to support the Christian religion, at least nominally, while the rest of the world should remain in pagan idolatry, or under the influence of the dragon, here called the serpent, because he deceiveth the whole world. The words of the prophecy are very remarkable. The Christian church is said to be supported by the eastern and western empires, two mighty dominations, and at the same time situated in the wilderness, strongly denoting that though many professed Christianity, there were but very few who "kept the commandments of God, and had the testimony of Jesus Christ."

15. And the serpent cast out of his mouth water as a flood. The water here evidently means great multitudes of nations and people; for in chap. xvii. 15 the interpreting angel says, the waters which thou sawest—are peoples, and multitudes, and nations, and tongues. This water, then, which the dragon cast out of his mouth, must be an inundation of heathen barbarous nations upon the Roman empire; and the purpose which the dragon has in view by this inundation is, that he might cause the woman, or Christian church—

To be carried away of the flood.—Entirely swept away from the face of the earth. Dr. Mosheim, in the commencement of his second chapter upon the fifth century, observes, "that the Goths, the Heruli, the Franks, the Huns, and the Vandals, with other fierce and warlike nations, for the most part strangers to Christianity, had invaded the Roman empire, and rent it asunder in the most deplorable manner. Amidst these calamities the Christians were grievous, nay, we may venture to say, the principal sufferers. It is true these savage nations were much more intent upon the acquisition of wealth and domination than upon the propagation or support of the pagan superstitions; nor did their cruelty and opposition to the Christians arise from any religious principle, or from an enthusiastic desire to ruin the cause of Christianity: it was merely by the insatiation of the pagans, who remained yet in the empire, that they were excited to treat with such severity and violence the followers of Christ." Thus the war, which was denounced ver. 12. against the inhabitants of the earth and of the sea, came upon the whole Roman world; for, in consequence of the excitement and malicious misrepresentations of the pagans of the empire, "a transmigration of a great swarm of nations" came upon the Romans, and ceased not their ravages till they had desolated the eastern empire, even as far as the gates of Byzantium; and finally possessed themselves of the western empire. "If," says Dr. Robertson, in the introduction to his History of Charles V. Vol. I. pp. 11, 12. edit. Lond. 1809, "a man were called to fix upon the period in the history of the world, during which the condition of the human race was most calamitous and afflicted; he would, without hesitation, name that which elapsed from the death of Theodosius the Great, to the establishment of the Lombards in Italy, a period of one hundred and seventy-six years. The contemporary authors who beheld that scene of desolation, labour and are at a loss for expressions to describe the horror of it. The scourge of God, the destroyer of nations, are the dreadful epithets by which they distinguish the most noted of the barbarous leaders; and they compare the ruin which they had brought on the world to the havoc occasioned by earthquakes, conflagrations or deluges, the most formidable and fatal calamities which the imagination of man can conceive." But the subtle design which the serpent or dragon had in view, when he vomited out of his mouth a flood of waters, was most providentially frustrated; for—

16. The earth helped the woman.—"Nothing indeed," as Bishop Newton excellently observes, "was more likely to produce the ruin and utter subversion of the Christian church, than the irruptions of so many barbarous nations into the Roman empire. But the event proved contrary to human appearance and expectation: the earth swallowed up the flood; the barbarians were rather swallowed up by the Romans, than the Romans by the barbarians; the heathen conquerors, instead of imposing their own, submitted to the religion of the conquered Christians; and they not only embraced the religion, but affected even the laws, the manners, the customs, the language, and the very name of Romans, so that the victors were in a manner absorbed and lost among the vanquished." See his Dissertations on the Prophecies, in loc.

17. And the dragon was wrath with the woman.—The heathen party, foiled in their subtle attempt to destroy Christianity, were greatly enraged and endeavoured to excite the hatred of the multitude against the religion of Jesus. "They alleged that before the coming of Christ the world was blessed with peace and prosperity; but that, since the progress of their religion every where, the gods, filled with indignation to see their worship neglected, and their altars abandoned, had visited the earth with those plagues and desolations which increased every day." See Mosheim's Ecclesiastical History, Cent. V. Part. 1. and other works on this subject.

Went to make war with the remnant of her seed.—The dragon ἀντίθετος departed, i. e. into the wilderness, whither the woman had fled; and, in another form, commenced a new species of persecution, directed only against the remnant of her seed who keep the commandments of God, and have the testimony of Jesus Christ. See on verse 13 of the following chapter for an illustration of this remarkable passage.

CHAPTER XIII.

The beast rising out of the sea, with seven heads, ten horns, &c. 2-10. The beast coming out of the earth with two horns, every one to receive his mark in their right hand, 11-17. Flavio Domitiano Cæs. Aug. et Nervæ.]

AND I stood upon the sand of the sea, and saw a beast rise up out of the sea, b having seven heads and ten a Dan. 7:2,7.—b Ch. 12:3 & 17:3,12.

NOTES BY J. E. C.—Verse 1. And I stood upon the sand of the sea, and saw a beast rise up out of the sea. Before we can proceed in the interpretation of this chapter, it will be highly necessary to ascertain the meaning of the prophetic symbol beast, as the want of a proper understanding of this term has probably been one reason why so many discordant hypotheses have been published to the world. In this investigation, it is impossible to resort to a higher authority than Scripture; for the Holy Ghost is His own interpreter. What is, therefore, meant by the term beast in any one prophetic vision, the same species of thing must be represented by the term whenever it is used in a similar manner in any other part of the Sacred Oracles. Having, therefore, laid this foundation, the angel's interpretation of the last of Daniel's four beasts need only be produced, an account of which is given in the seventh chapter of this prophet. Daniel being very desirous to "know the truth of the fourth beast which was diverse from all the others, exceeding dreadful, and of the ten horns that were on his head," the angel thus interprets the vision:—"The fourth beast shall be the fourth kingdom upon the earth, which shall be diverse from all kingdoms, and shall devour the whole earth, and shall tread it down, and break it in pieces. And the ten horns out of this kingdom are ten kings that shall arise," &c. In this Scripture it is plainly declared that the fourth beast should be the fourth kingdom upon earth; consequently, the four beasts seen by Daniel are four kingdoms: hence the term beast is the prophetic symbol for a kingdom.

As to the nature of the kingdom which is represented by the term beast; we shall obtain no inconsiderable light in examining the most proper meaning of the original word חַיָּאָה. This Hebrew word is translated in the Septuagint by the Greek word θηρίον, and both words signify what we term a wild beast; and the latter is the one used by St. John in the Apocalypse. Taking up the Greek word θηρίον in this sense,

c Or, names. Ch. 17:3

It is fully evident, if a power be represented in the prophetic writings under the notion of a wild beast, that the power so represented must partake of the nature of a wild beast. Hence an earthly belligerent power is evidently designed. And the comparison is peculiarly appropriate; for as several species of wild beasts carry on perpetual warfare with the animal world; so most governments, influenced by ambition, promote discord and depopulation. And also, as the carnivorous wild beast acquires its strength and magnitude by preying upon the feebler animals; so most earthly monarchies are raised up by the sword, and derive their political consequence from the unsuccessful resistance of the contending nations. The kingdom of God, on the other hand, is represented as "a stone cut out of the mountain without hands;" and is never likened to a beast, because it is not raised up by the sword, as all other secular powers are; but sanctifies the persons under its subjection, in which last particular it essentially differs from all other dominations.

This beast is said to rise up out of the sea, in which particular it corresponds with the four beasts of Daniel; the sea is, therefore, the symbol of a great multitude of nations, as has already been proved; and the meaning is, that every mighty empire is raised upon the ruins of a great number of nations, against which it has successfully contended, and incorporated with its dominions. The sea, here, is doubtless the same, against the inhabitants of which a war was denounced, chap. xii. 12. for St. John was standing upon the sand of the sea, when the vision changed from the woman and the dragon to that recorded in this chapter. It therefore follows, that the kingdom or empire here represented by the beast, is that which sprung up out of the ruins of the western Roman empire.

his horns ten crowns ; i. e. is an empire composed of ten distinct monarchies in the interest of the Latin church.—See the heads and horns, fully explained in the notes on chapter xvii. 10, 12, 16.

As the phrases Latin church, Latin empire, &c. are not very generally understood at present, and will occur frequently in the course of the notes on this and the xviii. chapter, it will not be improper here to explain them.—During the period from the division of the Roman empire into those of the east and west, till the final dissolution of the western empire ; the subjects of both empires were equally known by the name of Romans. Soon after this event the people of the west lost almost entirely the name of Romans, and were denominated after their respective kingdoms which were established upon the ruins of the western empire. But as the eastern empire escaped the ruin which fell upon the western ; and the subjects of the former still retained the name of Romans, and called their dominion Ἡ Ῥωμαίων βασιλεία, the Roman empire ; by which name this monarchy was known among them till its final dissolution in 1453, by Mohammed II. the Turkish sultan. But the subjects of the eastern empire, ever since the time of Charlemagne, or before, (and more particularly in the time of the crusades, and subsequently,) called the western people, or those under the influence of the Romish church, Latins ; and their church, the Latin church. And the western people, in return, denominated the eastern church the Greek church, and the members of it Greeks. Hence the division of the Christian church into those of the Greek and Latin. For a confirmation of what has just been said, the reader may consult the Byzantine writers, where he will find the appellations Ῥωμαῖοι and Λατίνοι, Romans and Latins, used in the sense here mentioned in very numerous instances. The members of the Romish church have not been named Latins by the Greeks alone ; this term is also used in the public instruments drawn up by the general popish councils, as may be instanced in the following words, which form a part of a decree of the council of Basil, dated Sept. 26, 1437, " copiosissimam subjectionem pro unione ἙΛΛΗΝΟΝ CUM ΛΑΤΙΝΙΣ," a very great convention for the union of the Greeks with the Latins. Even in the very papal bulls this appellation has been acknowledged, as may be seen in the edict of Pope Eugenius IV. dated Sept. 17, 1437, where in one place mention is made of " Ecclesia LATINORUM—JUNCTA UNIO," the desired union of the church of the Latins ; and in another place we read, " Nec superesse modum alium prosequendi operis tam pii, et servandi LATINÆ ECCLESIÆ honoris," that no means might be left untried of prosecuting so pious a work, and of preserving the honour of the Latin church.—See Corps Diplomatique, Tom. III. pp. 32, 35. In a bull of the same pontiff, dated Sept. 1439, we have " Sanctissima LATINORUM ET ἙΛΛΗΝΟΝ UNIO," the most holy union of the Greeks with the Latins.—See Bail's Summa Conciliorum, in loc. By the Latin empire is meant the whole of the powers which support the Latin church.

And upon his heads the name of blasphemy] Ονομα βλασφημίας, a name of blasphemy. This has been variously understood : Jerome and Prosper give it as their opinion that the name of blasphemy consists in the appellation urbs aeterna, eternal city, applied to Rome ; and modern commentators refer it to the idolatrous worship of the Romans and papists. Before we attempt to ascertain the meaning of this passage, it must be first defined what the Holy Spirit means by a name of blasphemy. Blasphemy, in Scripture, signifies impious speaking, when applied to God ; and injurious speaking, when directed against our neighbour. A name of blasphemy is the prostitution of a sacred name to an unholy purpose. This is evident from the 9th verse of the second chapter of the Apocalypse, where God says, " I know the blasphemy of them which say they are Jews, and are not, but are the synagogue of Satan." These wicked men, by calling themselves Jews, blasphemed the name, i. e. used it in an injurious sense ; for he only is a Jew who is one inwardly. Hence the term Jews applied to the synagogue of Satan, is a name of blasphemy, i. e. a sacred name blasphemed. A name of blasphemy, or a blasphemous appellation, is said to be upon all the seven heads of the beast. To determine what this name is, the meaning of the seven heads in this place must be ascertained. If the reader refer to the notes on chap. xvii. 9, 10, 11, he will find that the heads are explained to have a double meaning, viz. that they signify the seven electorates of the German empire, and also seven forms of Latin government. As this is the first place in which the heads of the beast are mentioned with any description ; it is reasonable to expect that that signification of the heads which is first in order in the angel's interpretation, chap. xvii. 9, must be what is here intended. This is, " the seven heads are seven mountains, on which the woman sitteth," the name of blasphemy will, consequently, be found upon the seven electorates of Germany. This, therefore, can be no other than that which was common not only to the electorates, but also to the whole empire of Germany, or that well known one of SACRUM IMPERIUM ROMANUM, " The SACRED

But it must be horridly blasphemous to the German empire, the grand support of his very rise to temporal authority. Therefore its assumption of an appellation was originally given to the emperor being styled, on this account vicar upon earth ; see Casarini's FÜRSTEN SUPREMATU PRINCIPUM GERMANIÆ, cc. 31, sense the words can be taken, a name of blasphemy is very properly said heads of the beast, or seven electorates, because the electors are styled SACRI IMPERATORIS, Princes, Electors of the Holy Roman Empire, Electors of the Holy

2. And the beast which I saw was like a leopard, &c. The similitude of the beast to a leopard appears the third beast of Daniel, which is well the empire of the Greeks. The Latin empire the modern empire of the Greeks ; the Greeks was still said to be like a leopard, the subjugation by the Romans, is evident in the seventh chapter of Daniel, " As com beasts, they had their dominion taken were prolonged for a season and time." was, in the first place, like to its content adhered to an idolatrous system of worship, but really unchristian ; and it is Greek and Latin churches abound in the spread of pure Christianity ; though the Latins far outstripped the Greek Thirdly, both empires were similar in authority being powerfully depressed but though it must be granted the authority was more strongly marked, and of much The excommunication of the Greek Empire Armenia, and the consequences of that a remarkable example of the greatest clergy. But the beast of Saint John, though penance it resembles a leopard, yet different like those of a bear. The second is likened to a bear, and there can be no doubt the Medes and Persians was intended ; likened to this animal, because it was of man governments that ever existed ; and known Scripture emblem of cruelty.—See Hos. xiii. 8. Is not cruelty a striking example Latin empire? Have not the sub literally trampled to death all those in the not obey their idolatrous requisitions ? tyrs, and other works which treat upon found a melancholy catalogue of the horrid lingering deaths which they have obliged Christians to suffer. In this sense, the as the feet of a bear. Another particular differed from a leopard, was in having " It is," says Dr. More, " like the Babylon first beast of Daniel, which is likened to decrease against such as will not obey the nor worship the golden image that Nebuchadnezzar set up. Their stubbornness must be punished : fire and fagot must be prepared for submit to this New Roman idolatry."

And the dragon gave him his power, great authority.] It was said of the dragon that his place was found no more in heaven cannot, therefore, be the heathen Roman abolished previously to the rising up of them allude to the restoration of one of the heads, as will be seen in the explanation, and more fully in the notes on chap. 17. 8. 3. And I saw one of his heads as it were wounded to death] This is the second and last place the beast are mentioned, with any description, the meaning here must be forms of government were noticed last in the angel's double explanation that was wounded to death can be no other dragon's head, which was the sixth head, imperial power ; for " this head," = " Eodem " was, as it were, wounded to death, which was overturned by the northern nations, to the very name of emperor in Monarchy was so wounded that it was wholly impo-

And his deadly wound was healed] This was effected by Charlemagne, who, with his successors, assumed all the marks of the ancient emperors of the west, with the titles of Semper Augustus, Sacred Majesty, First Prince of the Christian world, Temporal Chief of the Christian people, and Rector or Temporal Chief of the Faithful in Germany: Mod. But it is said in ver. 9. that the dragon gave the beast his power, δυναμεις, his armies, or military strength; i. e. he employed all his imperial power in defence of the Latin empire, which supported the Latin church. He also gave his seat, θρονου, literally his throne, to him; that is, his whole empire formed an integral part of the Latin empire, by its conversion to the Roman Catholic faith. He also gave him great authority. This is literally true of the Roman empire of Germany, which, by its great power and influence in the politics of Europe, extended the religion of the empire over the various states and monarchies of Europe; thus incorporating them, as it were, in one vast empire, by uniting them in one common faith.

And all the world wondered after the beast] Ὁλη ἡ γη, all the earth. As the original word signifies earth, and not world, as in our translation, the Latin word, which is the earth of the beast, is here intended; and the meaning of the passage consequently is, that the whole body of the Roman Catholics were affected with great astonishment at the mighty sway of the Latin empire, considering it as a great and holy power.

4. And they worshipped the dragon] Worshipping the dragon here evidently means the voluntary religious subjection of the members of the Latin church to the revived western empire, because of the eminent part it has taken in the support of their faith.

And they worshipped the beast] Not only the dragon, or revived western empire, was worshipped; the beast, the whole Latin empire, is a partaker in the adoration. The manner in which it is worshipped consists in the subjects of it—

Saying, Who is like unto the beast? Is it not the only holy power in the universe? Is it possible for any person not a subject of it to be saved?

Who is able to make war with him? Can any nation successfully fight with it? Is not the Roman empire, which is its most principal bulwark, invictissimum, most invincible? Invictissimus, most invincible, was the peculiar attribute of the empire of Germany. See Modern Universal History, Vol. XXXII. p. 197.

6. And there was given unto him a mouth speaking great things] That is, there was given to the rulers of the Latin empire, who are the mouth of the beast, (and particularly the Roman emperors of Germany,) power to assume great and pompous titles, indicative of their mighty sway over many subjugated countries, (see the imperial instruments of the middle centuries in the Corps Diplomatique;) and also to utter against their opponents the most terrible edicts.

And blasphemies] The system of worship supported by the beast is a system of blasphemy; as there will be occasion to show presently.

And power was given unto him to continue forty and two months] As these forty-two months are prophetic, they must mean so many years as there are days contained in them; viz. 1260, each month containing 30 days. The beast, therefore, will continue in existence at least 1260 years; but when the termination of this period will take place, is difficult to say, as the beginning cannot be at present indubitably ascertained.

8. And he opened his mouth in blasphemy against God, to blaspheme his name] The Latin empire is here represented as blasphemous power in three respects: first, he blasphemes the name of God. This has been most notoriously the case with the different popish princes, who continually blaspheme the sacred names of God, by using them in their idolatrous worship. The mouth of blasphemy against God cannot be more evident than in the following impious words which form a part of the Golden Bull published by Charles IV. in January, 1366: "But thou, envy, how often hast thou attempted to ruin by division the Christian empire, which God had founded upon the three cardinal virtues, faith, hope, and charity, as upon a holy and indivisible Trinity; vomiting the old venom of discord among the seven electors, who are the pillars and seven principal members of the holy empire; by the brightness of whom the holy empire ought to be illuminated as by seven torches, the light of which is reinforced by the seven gifts of the Holy Spirit."

And his tabernacle] Tabernacle is any kind of dwelling-place; and, in an eminent sense among the Jews, was a kind of tent to take up and down, as occasion required; which was, as it were, the palace of the Most High, the dwelling of the God of Israel. It was divided into two partitions, one called The Holy Place, and the other The Most Holy Place; in the latter of which, before the building of the temple, the ark of the covenant was kept, which was a symbol of God's gracious presence with the Jewish church. All this the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews, in the eighth and ninth chapters, explains to prefigure the human nature of Christ. The beast's blasphemy of the tabernacle of God is, therefore, as Dr. More and others properly observe, his impious doctrine of transubstantiation, in which it is most blasphemously asserted that the substance of the bread and wine in the sacrament, is literally converted by the consecration of the priest, into the very body and blood of Jesus Christ! This doctrine was first advanced among the Latins, in the tenth century; and in 1215 fully received as an article of the Roman Catholic faith. It is for the pages of ecclesiastical history to record the incredible numbers which have been martyred by the papists for their non-reception of this most unscriptural and antichristian doctrine.

And them that dwell in heaven] By heaven is here meant the throne of God, and not the throne of the beast, because it is against God the beast blasphemes. This must, therefore, allude to his impious adoration of the saints and angels, whose residence is in heaven. He blasphemes against God by paying that adoration to the crucifixion is properly the commencement of Christianity, as the apostles then first began to promulgate the religion of Christ with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven. But as Jesus Christ was in the Divine purpose appointed from the foundation of the world to redeem man by His blood, He therefore is, in a very eminent sense, the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world, i. e. from the creation.

9. If any man have an ear, let him hear.] These words are evidently introduced to impress the reader with the awfulness of what has just been spoken, all shall worship him whose names are not written in the book of life; as well as to fix his attention upon the following words:—

10. He that leadeth into captivity shall go into captivity] The Latin empire here spoken of must go into captivity, because it has led into captivity, by not only propagating among the various nations its abominable antichristian system, but also in compelling them to embrace it under penalty of forfeiting the protection of the empire.

He that killeth with the sword must be killed with the sword] The Latin empire must be also broken to pieces by the sword, because it has killed the saints of God. This prophecy will not receive its full accomplishment till the kingdoms of this world become the kingdoms of our Lord and of His Christ.

Here is the patience and the faith of the saints.] By these words, as Dr. Mitchell observes, "God calls upon His saints to keep in view, under all their persecutions, His retributive justice: there is no violence that has been exercised upon them but what shall be retaliated upon the cruel and persecuting government and governors of the Latin empire."

11. And I beheld another beast coming up out of the earth] As a beast has already been shown to be the symbol of a kingdom or empire, the rising up of this second beast must, consequently, represent the rising up of another empire. This beast comes up out of the earth; therefore it is totally different from the preceding, which rose up out of the sea. Earth here means the Latin world, for this word has been shown to import this already in several instances; the rising up of the beast out of this earth must, consequently, represent the springing up of some power out of a state of subjection to the Latin empire: therefore the beast, here called another beast, is another Latin empire. This beast is the spiritual Latin empire, or, in other words, the Romish hierarchy; for with no other power can the prophetic description, yet to be examined, be shown to accord. In the time of Charlemagne, the ecclesiastical power was in subjection to the civil; and it continued to be so for a long time after his death: therefore the beast, whose deadly wound was healed, ruled over the whole Latin world, both clergy and laity; these, consequently, constituted but one beast or empire. But the Latin clergy kept continually gaining more and more influence in the civil affairs of the empire; and in the tenth century their authority was greatly increased. In the subsequent centuries the power of the Romish hierarchy ascended even above that of the emperors; and led into captivity the kings of the whole Latin world, as there will be occasion to show in commenting upon the following verses. Thus the Romish hierarchy was at length entirely exempted from the civil power, and constituted another beast, as it became entirely independent of the secular Latin empire. And this beast came up out of the earth; that is, the Latin clergy, which composed a part of the earth, or Latin world, raised their authority against that of the secular powers; and, in process of time, wrested the superintendence of ecclesiastical affairs from the secular princes.

And he had two horns] As the seven-headed beast is represented as having ten horns, which signifies so many kingdoms leagued together to support the Latin church; so the beast which rises out of the earth has also two horns, which must, consequently, represent two kingdoms, for if horns of a beast mean kingdoms in one part of the Apocalypse, kingdoms must be intended by this symbol whenever it is used in a similar way in any other part of this book. As the second beast is the spiritual Latin empire, the two horns of this beast denote that the empire thus represented is composed of two distinct spiritual powers. These, therefore, can be no other, as Bishop Newton and Faber properly observe, than the two grand independent branches of the Romish hierarchy, viz. the Latin clergy, REGULAR and SECULAR. "The first of these comprehends all the various monastic orders; the second comprehends the whole body of parochial clergy." These two grand branches of the hierarchy originally constituted but one dominion, as the monks as well as the other clergy were in subjection to the bishops; but the subjection of the monks to their dioceses became by degrees less apparent; and in process of time, through the influence and authority of the Roman pontiff, they were entirely exempted from all episcopal jurisdiction, and thus became a spiritual power, entirely independent of that of the secular clergy.

Like a lamb] As lamb, in other parts of the Apocalypse, evidently means Christ, who is the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world, it must have a similar import in this passage: therefore the meaning here is evidently that

13 And he doeth great wonders, so that all men come down from heaven on the earth in

14 And deceiveth them that dwell on the two horns of the beast, or the regular profess to be the ministers of Christ; to be meek and humility; and to teach nothing but godliness. The two-horned beast, or spirit, has in reality the name, and in the eyes of appearance, of a CHRISTIAN power. But its appearance, and that alone among his disciples when he spake,

He spake as a dragon] The doctrines of the hierarchy are very similar to those contained in worship; for he has introduced "a new name, nominally different, but essentially the same, angels and saints instead of the gods and angels."

12. And he exerciseth all the power of him] In the preceding verse the two-horned beast is rising out of the earth, that is, more and more influence in the civil affairs. Here he is represented as having obtained the management of all the power of the first Latin empire, before him, was over him. That the Romish hierarchy has had the effect spoken of, is evident from history; for in subjection to the ecclesiastical. The power of the horns of the second beast, have had their portion over the whole Latin world. Two of Germany were given by the three Orders, each other, to ecclesiastics; and in the other parts the parochial clergy possessed great temporal extraordinary as the power of the secular parts of the Latin world, it was but feeble with that of the monastic orders, which were born of the beast. The Mendicant Friars, the regular clergy, first made their appearance in the early part of the thirteenth century. They were introduced by Gregory X. in a general council at Lyons in 1272, into the four following nations, viz. the Dominicans, the Franciscans, and the Hermits of St. Augustine. "A new order," says Moheim, "allowed these four Mendicant orders the liberty of travelling wherever they thought proper, and of conversing with persons of all ranks, of all ages, and the multitude wherever they went; and exhibited, in their outward appearance, a more striking mark of gravity and holiness, than was observable in the other monastic societies, that were to the very summit of fame, and were reputed to the highest esteem and veneration throughout Europe. The enthusiastic attachment to the Mendicants went so far, that, as we learn from the records, several cities were divided, one part being assigned to the Mendicants, the second to the Carmelites, and the fourth to the other hands than those of the Mendicants they crowded to perform their duties; and were extremely desirous to depart, and remain after death; all which occasions complaints among the ordinary priests, to whom the Mendicants were committed, and who considered the Mendicants as the spiritual guides of the multitude. Nor did the Mendicants end here: for we find that in the thirteenth century and the succeeding centuries they employed not only in spiritual matters, but in the political affairs of the greatest consequence, the differences of princes, concluding alliances, presiding in cabinet councils, levying taxes, and other occupations, but absolutely inconsistent with their order and profession. We must not, however, think that the Mendicant Friars attained to the same power and authority; for the power of the Dominicans surpassed greatly that of the other orders, and they were singularly conspicuous in the world. During three centuries these two fraternities almost universal and absolute sway, both in the most eminent posts, ecclesiastical and in the universities and churches with which all opposition was silent; and maintaining the majesty and prerogatives of the Roman pontiff, princes, bishops, and heretics, with unequal success. The Dominicans and Franciscans, before the Reformation, were the most happy and glorious period, the very soul and spring of all the secret springs of all the engines of state, and the authors and directors of the most important event in the religious and political history of the world. Thus the Romish hierarchy has exercised all the power of the first beast in his sight, both temporal and spiritual; therefore, with such astonishing influence and power, it was no difficult matter for him means of those miracles which he had power to do in the sight of the beast; saying to them that dwell on the earth, that they should make an image to the beast, which had the wound by a sword, & and did live.

15 And he had power to give life unto the image of the beast, that the image of the beast should both speak, & and

The earth, and them which dwell therein, to worship the first beast, whose deadly wound was healed.] That is, he causes the whole Latin world to submit to the authority of the Latin empire, with the revived western empire at its head; persuading them that such submission is beneficial to their spiritual interests, and absolutely necessary for their salvation. Here it is observable that both beasts have dominion over the same earth; for it is expressly said, that the second beast causeth THE EARTH and them that dwell therein, to worship the first beast; therefore it is, as Bishop Newton, and others, have observed, imperium in imperio, "an empire within an empire." We have, consequently, the fullest evidence that the two beasts consist in the division of the great Latin empire, by the reservation of the Latin clergy, into two distinct empires, the one secular, the other spiritual; and both united in one anti-christian design, viz. to diffuse their most abominable system of idolatry, over the whole earth, and to extend the sphere of their domination. Here we have also an illustration of that remarkable passage in chap. xvi. 10. the kingdom of the beast, i. e. the kingdom of the Latin kingdom; which is apparently a solecism, but in reality expressed with wonderful precision. The fifth vial is poured out upon the throne of the beast, and his kingdom is darkened, i. e. the Latin kingdom in subjection to the Latin kingdom, or the secular Latin empire.

13. And he doeth great wonders) That we may have the greatest assurance possible that the two-horned beast is the spiritual Latin empire, it is called, in chap. xix. 20. a passage illustrative of the one now under consideration, the false prophet, "than which," as Bishop Newton observes, "there cannot be a stronger or plainer argument to prove that false doctors or teachers were particularly designed; for prophet, in the Scripture style, is not unfrequently used for a preacher or expounder of God's word. See 1 Cor. xiv. It hence follows, that the two-horned beast is an empire of false doctors or teachers."

In order to establish the Latin church upon a foundation that can never fail, the false prophet doeth great wonders; he attempts the most wonderful and prodigious exploits, and is crowned with incredible success. He has the art to persuade his followers that the clergy of the church of Rome are the only true ministers of Christ; that they have such great influence in the court of heaven as to be able not only to forgive sins, but also to grant indulgences in sin, by paying certain stipulated sums. He persuades them too that they can do works of supererogation. He pretends that an incredible number of miracles have been wrought, and are still working, by the Almightiness, as so many evidences of the great sanctity of the Latin church; and the false prophet has such an astonishing influence over his flock, as to cause them to believe all his fabulous legends and lying wonders. He pretends also (and is believed) that his power is not confined to this world; that he is able by his prayers to deliver the souls of the deceased from what he calls purgatory, a place which he has fabricated to exist for the purification of sinful souls after their departure from this world. His wonderful power in being able to induce men, possessed of reasonable faculties, to believe his monstrous absurdities, do not end here; he even

Maketh fire come down from heaven—in the sight of men) Fire, in Scripture, when it signifies a wrath, represents that species of indignation which is attended with the destruction of whatever is the cause of it. Thus the wrath of God is likened to fire, Psa. xviii. 7, 8. Jer. iv. 4.—Therefore the fire which the false prophet bringeth down from heaven upon the earth, is the fiery indignation which he causes to come down from the heavens or throne of the Latin empire upon all those of the earth or Latin world who rebel against his authority. All this has been fulfilled in the Romish hierarchy: the Latin clergy have denominated all those that oppose their authority, heretics; they have instituted tribunals to try the cause of heresy; and all those that would not submit to their idolatry, they have condemned to various kinds of tortures and deaths. It is said of the false prophet that he bringeth fire FROM HEAVEN upon the earth; that is to say, he will only try the cause of heresy, and pass the sentence of condemnation; he will not suffer an ecclesiastic to execute the sentence of the court; the destroying fire he causeth to come down from the heavens or throne of the Latin empire; secular princes and magistrates must execute the sentence of death upon all that are capitally condemned by the spiritual power. HE MAKETH FIRE COME DOWN FROM HEAVEN; he compels secular princes to assist him against heretics; and if any rebel against his authority, he immediately puts them under the bond of the anathemas, so that they are deprived of their offices, and exposed to the insults and persecution of their brethren. Thus the false prophet deceives the Latin world by the means of those miracles which he had power to do in the sight of the beast. Under the appearance of great sanctity, he persuades men to believe all cause that as many as would not worship the image of the beast should be killed.

16 And he caused all, both small and great, rich and poor free and bond, to receive a mark in their right hand, or in their foreheads:

17 And that no man might buy or sell, save he that had the his lying doctrines; and enforces his canons and decretals with the sword of the civil magistrate.

14. Saying to them that dwell on the earth, that they should make an image to the beast which had the wound by a sword and did live.] The image of the beast must designate a person who represents in himself the whole power of the Latin empire: therefore it cannot be the emperor; for though he was, according to his own account, supremum caput Christianitatis, the supreme head of Christendom, yet he was only the chief of the Germanic confederation; and, consequently, was only sovereign of the principal power of the Latin empire. The image of the beast must be the supreme ruler of the Latin empire; and as it is through the influence of the false prophet, that this image is made for the first beast, this great chief must be an ecclesiastic. Who this is has been ably shown by Bishop Newton, in his comment on the following verse:

15. And he had power to give life unto the image of the beast, that the image of the beast should both speak, and cause that as many as would not worship the image of the beast should be killed.] "The influence of the two-horned beast, or corrupted clergy, is farther seen in persuading and inducing mankind to make an image to the beast which had the wound by a sword and did live. This image and representative of the beast is the pope. He is properly the idol of the church. He represents in himself the whole power of the beast, and is the head of all authority, temporal as well as spiritual. He is nothing more than a private person, without power and without authority, till the two-horned beast, or corrupted clergy, by choosing him pope, give life unto him, and enable him to speak and utter his decrees, and to persecute even to death as many as refuse to submit to him, and to worship him. As soon as he is chosen pope, he is clothed with the pontifical robes, and crowned and placed upon the altar, and the cardinals come and kiss his feet, which ceremony is called adoration. They first elect, and then they worship him; as in the medals of Martin V. where two are represented crowning the pope, and two kneeling before him with this inscription, Quem queant adorant, Whom they create they adore. He is THE PRINCIPLE OF UNITY TO THE TEN KINGDOMS OF THE EAST; and causeth, as far as he is able, all who will not acknowledge his supremacy to be put to death." The great ascendancy which the popes have obtained over the kings of the Latin world by means of the Romish hierarchy, is sufficiently marked in the history of Europe. As long as the great body of the people were devoted to the Roman Catholic idolatry, it was in vain for the kings of the different Roman Catholic countries to oppose the increasing usurpations of the popes. They ascended in spite of all opposition, to the highest pinnacle of human greatness; for even the authority of the emperors themselves was established or annulled at their pleasure. The high-sounding tone of the popes commenced in Gregory VII. A. D. 1073, commonly known by the name of Hildebrand, who aimed at nothing less than universal empire. He published an anathema against all who received the investiture of a bishopric or abbacy from the hands of a layman; as also against those by whom the investiture should be performed. This measure being opposed by Henry IV. emperor of Germany, the pope deposed him from all power and dignity, regal or imperial. See Cors Diplomatique, Tom. I. page 53.

Great numbers of German princes siding with the pope, the emperor found himself under the necessity of going (in January, 1077) to the bishop of Rome to implore his forgiveness, which was not granted him till he had fasted three days, standing from morning to evening barefooted, and exposed to the inclemency of the weather! In the following century the power of the popes was still farther increased; for on the 22d of September, 1122, the emperor Henry V. gave up all right of conferring the regalia by the ceremony of the ring and crozier, and that the chapters and communities should be at liberty to fill up their own vacancies. In this century the election of the Roman pontiff was confined by Alexander III. to the college of cardinals. In the thirteenth century the popes (Dr. Musheim observes) "inculcated that pernicious maxim, that the bishop of Rome is the supreme lord of the universe; and that neither princes nor bishops, civil governors nor ecclesiastical rulers, have any lawful power in church or state but what they derive from him. To establish their authority, both in civil and ecclesiastical matters, upon the firmest foundation, they assumed to themselves the power of disposing of the various offices of the church, whether of a higher or more subordinate nature, and of creating bishops, abbots, and canons, according to their fancy. The first of the pontiffs who usurped such an extravagant extent of authority was Innocent III. (A. D. 1198—1216.) whose example was followed by Honorius III. (A. D. 1216.) Gregory IX. (A. D. 1227.) and several of their successors." Thus the plenitude of the papal power, (as it is termed,) was not confined to what was spiritual; the Romish bishops "dethroned monarchs, disposed of crowns, absolved subjects from the obedience due to their sovereigns, and laid kingdoms under interdicts. There was not a state in Europe which had not been disquieted by their ambition. There was not a throne which they had not shaken, nor a prince who did not tremble at their presence.<sup>11</sup> The point of time in which the Romish bishops attained their highest elevation of authority was about the commencement of the 14th century. Boniface VIII. who was pope at this time, out-stripped all his predecessors in the high sounding tone of his public decrees. According to his famous bull, Unam Sanctam, published Nov. 16, 1302, "the secular power is but a simple emanation from the ecclesiastical; and the double power of the pope, founded upon Holy Scripture, is even an article of faith. God," said he, "has confided to Saint Peter, and to his successors, two swords, the one spiritual, the other temporal. The first ought to be exercised by the church itself, and the other by secular powers for the service of the church, and according to the will of the pope. The latter, that is to say, the temporal sword, is in subjection to the former; and the temporal authority depends indispensably on the spiritual power which judges it, while God alone can judge the spiritual power. Finally, he adds, it is necessary to salvation for every human creature to be in subjection to the Roman pontiff.<sup>12</sup> The false prophet said "to them that dwell upon the earth, that they should make an image to the beast that had the wound by a sword and did live;" that is, the Romish priesthood preached up the pope's supremacy over temporal princes; and, through their astonishing influence on the minds of the people, the bishop of Rome, at last, became the supreme sovereign of the secular Latin empire; and thus was at the head of all authority, temporal and spiritual.

The papists have, in their various superstitions, professed to worship God. But they are said, in the unerring words of prophecy, to worship the dragon, beast, and image of the beast; and to blaspheme God; for they received as holy those commandments of men that stand in direct opposition to the Sacred Scriptures, and which have been imposed on them by the Romish bishops, aided by the secular powers. "God is a spirit, and they who worship Him must worship Him in spirit and in truth."<sup>13</sup>

16. And he caused all, both small and great, rich and poor, free and bond, to receive a mark] To ascertain the meaning of the mark which the two-horned beast causes all orders and degrees of men in the Latin world to receive, we need only refer to chap. xiv. 11, where the mark imposed by the two-horned beast is called the mark of his name. The name of the beast is the Latin empire; the mark of his name must, therefore, be his LATIN worship; for this very reason, that it is the two-horned beast, or false prophet, who causes all descriptions of persons to receive it. Now it is well known that the continual employment of the Latin clergy is to enforce the Latin idolatry upon their flocks. The mass and offices of the church, which are in Latin, and contain the sum and substance of their idolatrous worship, are of different kinds, and abound in impious prayers to the Virgin Mary, and the saints and angels. In a word, the LATIN worship is the universal badge of distinction of the LATIN church, from all other churches on the face of the earth; and is, therefore, the only infallible MARK by which a genuine papist can be distinguished from the rest of mankind. But the two-horned beast causes all to receive this mark—

In their right hand, or in their foreheads] Right hand, in Scripture language, when used figuratively, represents the physical power of the person of whom it is spoken; and, when applied to God, designates a signal manifestation of Divine power against His enemies, and in behalf of His people. See Isa. xvii. 7. xx. 6. xxi. 8. xlv. 3, 4, &c. The reception of the mark in the right hand must, therefore, mean that all, so receiving it, devote the whole powers of their mind and body for the propagation of the Latin worship, and in the eradication of all they denominate heresies out of their church. But some receive the mark in their foreheads. By any thing being impressed upon the forehead, is meant the public profession of whatever is inscribed or marked upon it: see Rev. ix. 4. xiv. 1. xxii. 4, &c. The mark of the beast being received on the forehead, therefore, means that all those so marked make a public profession of the Latin worship; whereby it is evident to all that they form a part of the Latin church. Many may be marked in the right hand, who are also marked on their foreheads; but it does not follow that those marked on their foreheads are also marked in their right hand; that is to say, it is not every individual that complies with the Latin worship, who, to the utmost of his power, endeavours to propagate his religious system. Hence the propriety of the words, "He causeth all—to receive a mark in their right hand, or in their foreheads."<sup>14</sup>

17. And that no man might buy or sell, save he that had the mark] "If any," observes Bishop Newton, "dissent from the stated and authorized forms, they are condemned and excommunicated as heretics; and in consequence of that, they are no longer suffered to buy or sell; they are interdicted from traffic and commerce, and all the benefits of civil society. So

Roger Hoveden relates of William I. so dutiful to the pope that he was power to buy or sell any thing the apostolic see. So the cardinals under pope Alexander III. the Albigenses, enjoins, upon pain of excommunication, to enjoin or cherish exercise traffic with them. Under the same pope, orders, that no man should presume to so much as to hold any commodity buying; that, being deprived they may be compelled to repent. In the tenth and eleventh centuries excommunicated was carried out might come near them, not even or servants; they forfeited all privileges, and were excluded in form of excommunication in lighted torches, throw them upon anathemas, and trample them under the bells. It is in this, and spirit has terrified the Latin world to the secular and spiritual power two-horned beast from all offices as have not—

The name of the beast, or to on the following verse.

18. Here is wisdom. Let him count the number of the beast; man; and his number is Six hundred and sixty six. In this verse we have the very symbol of the number 666, figures by the Arabs, in the alphabet were used for number, flower, or soon after, are thought to their letters a numerical value in the alphabet; thus, a was 1, 24, being the last. It is in this Iliad and Odyssey are numbered by Homer himself, or by some time. A system of representative was used by the Greeks, very ward adopted by the Romans. The initial letter of the name of the number. Thus X, the initial of the initial of deka, for ten; H, Herodotus, the grammarian, is it has noticed this system, and remarkable events on the Arund extant in which this method prohibited. The system now in very ancient source. What cause before the commencement of the letters denoting the year or exist on great numbers of the of Augustus Cesar through the Egyptian Imperatorii, & Geo. 2 are coins extant marked of the 39th, 40th, 41st, and 42d years numerical letters preceded by I, B, L, P, LIA, LA, LAE, LAL. The following is the Greek value of each letter affixed, received system:

α	..... 1	η	.... 8
β	..... 2	θ	.... 9
γ	..... 3	ι	.... 10
δ	..... 4	κ	.... 20
ε	..... 5	λ	.... 30
ζ	..... 6	μ	.... 40

The method just described letters of the alphabet, gave anciently of representing names of this kind abound in the writings of Christians. When the practice names or phrases first began to used; it is sufficient for the ill consideration, if it can be shown the apostolic age. Seneca, who Paul, informs us, in his eighth grammarian, maintained Homer the division of his poems of the eight books; for a proof of writing argument, that the poet word αἰών, that the two first I indicate such division. Leon rished in the reigns of Nero, notice of computing the number equi-numeral distichs; that is first hexameter and pentameter the other two. We will only

Θυει σοι τοδε γραμμα γενεθλιακαισιν εν ωραις

"The muse of Leonidas of the Nile offers up to thee, O Caesar, this writing, at the time of thy nativity; for the sacrifice of Calliope is always without smoke: but in the ensuing year he will offer up, if thou wilt, better things than this."

From the numerical table already given, the preceding epigram may be shown to contain equinumeral distichs, as follows: Θυει contains 424, i. e. 3 9, v 400, ρ 100, α 1, ν 50, ι 10, σ 1; contains 280, i. e. σ 200, ο 70, ε 10. In like manner τοδε will be found to contain 379, γραμμα 185, γενεθλιακαισιν 404, εν 55, ωραις 1111, Καισαρ, 332, Νειλαιη 114, Μσα 711, Λεωνιδω 1704. The sum of all these is 5699, the number in the first distich. In the second distich, Καλλιοσος contains 449, γαρ 104, ακανων 272, αι 16, θυοσ 679, εις 215, δε 9, νεωρα 1156, Ην 58, εδελφι 267, (the subscribed eta being taken into the account.) Θυει 624, ταδε 779, περισηροσ 1071. The sum of all 5699; which is precisely the same with that contained in the first distich.

Ουρανιον μειρημα γενεθλιακαισιν εν ωραις

Ποπταια Διοσ τυνη, Σαβαστιος: ενδεσ γαρ σοι
Δωρα τα και λεκτρων αζια και φοριση.

"O Poppæa, wife of Jupiter, (Nero,) Augusta, receive from Leonidas of the Nile a celestial globe on the day of thy nativity; for gifts please thee which are suited to thy imperial dignity and wisdom."

In this epigram each of the distichs contains the number 6422; viz. Ουρανιον 751, i. e. ο 70, ν 400, ρ 100, α 1, ν 50, ι 10, σ 70, ν 60, the sum of which is 751, μειρημα 144, γενεθλιακαισιν 404, εν 55, ωραις 1111, τερ' 1070, απο 151, Νειλογονου 893, δεξο 139, Λεωνιδω 1704: the sum of all 6422. The numbers corresponding to the words of the second distich are, respectively, 322, 284, 465, 919, 415, 104, 220, 905, 301, 31, 1305, 72, 31, 983; the sum of which is also 6422.

This poet did not restrict himself to the construction of equinumeral distichs. The following is one of his distichs in which the hexameter line is made equal in number to its corresponding pentameter:

Εξ προς ενα ψηφοισιν ισαεται, εν δυο δοισι,
Οσ γαρ ετι σερων την δεκαψηφοισιν.

"One line is made equal in number to one, not two to two; for I no longer approve of long epigrams."

In this distich the words of the hexameter line contain, respectively, the numbers 215, 450, 56, 1548, 534, 470, 474, and 364; the sum of which is 4111. The numbers corresponding to the words of the pentameter line are, respectively, 470, 104, 215, 1408, 363, and 1456; the sum of which is also 4111. The equinumeral distichs of Leonidas are contained in the second volume of Brunck and Jacob's edition of the Greek Anthology. It appears from ancient records, that some of the Greeks in the early part of the second century, if not in the apostolic age, employed themselves in counting the number contained in the verses of Homer, to find out what two consecutive lines were ισοψηφοι, or equinumeral. Aulus Gellius, the grammarian, who lived in the reigns of Hadrian and Antoninus Pius, gives us an account, (lib. xiv. cap. 6.) of a person who presented him with a book filled with a variety of information collected from numerous sources, of which he was at liberty to avail himself in writing his Attic Nights. Among the subjects treated of in this book, we are informed that Gellius, was that of Homeric equinumeral verses. None of the examples are given by the grammarian; but Labbeus says, in his Bibl. Nov. MSS. p. 284, that the equinumeral verses are marked in the Codex 2216 in the French king's library. Gronovius in his notes on Gellius, p. 655, has copied what he found in a MS. (No. 1488), upon this subject, viz. two examples out of the Iliad and one in the Odyssey. The examples in the Iliad are lines 264 and 265, of book vii. each line containing 3508; and lines 306 and 307 of book xix. each containing 2243. The verses in the Odyssey, (ω, 110, 111,) stated to be equinumeral in the MS. cited by Gronovius, have not now this property, owing possibly to some corruption that may have taken place in the lines from frequent transcription.

For other examples of the computation of the number in words or phrases, the reader is referred to the Oenocritica of Artemidorus, lib. ii. c. 75. lib. iii. c. 34. and lib. iv. c. 26. See also Martiani Minei Felicis Capellæ Africæ Africanensis, De Nuptiis Philologæ et Mercurii, lib. ii. and vii.; Irenæus adversus Hæreses, lib. i. ii. and v.; Tertullian de Præscriptionibus Hæret. Tom. II. page 487. Wirceburgi, 1751; Sibyll. Oracul. lib. i. &c.

Having thus shown that it was a practice in the apostolic age, and subsequently, to count the number in words and phrases, and even in whole verses, it will be evident that what is intended by 666, is that the Greek name of the beast, (for it was in the Greek language that Jesus Christ communicated His Revelation to St. John,) contains this number. Many names have been proposed from time to time, as applicable to the beast, and at the same time containing 666. We will only notice one example, viz. that famous one of Irenæus, which has been approved of by almost all commentators who have given any sort of tolerable exposition of the Revelation. The word alluded to is Λατινους, the letters of which have the following numerical values—λ 30, α 1, ρ 300, κ 5, ι 10, ν 50, ο 70, σ 200; and if these be added together, the sum will be found to be equivalent to the number of the beast. This word was applied by Irenæus, who lived in the second century, to the then existing Roman empire: "for," says he, "they are Latins who now reign." Though it is evident, from the notes on the preceding part of this chapter, that the conjecture of Irenæus respecting the number 666 having some way or other a reference to the empire of the Latins is well founded; yet his production of the word Λατινους, as containing 666, is not a proof that it has any such reference. Bellarmine the Jesuit objected against Λατινους, being the name intended in the prophecy from its orthography; for, says he, it should be written Λατινους. That the objection of the learned Jesuit has very great force, is evident from every Greek writer extant, who has used the Greek word for Latinus, in all of whom it is uniformly found without the diphthong.—See Hesiod, Polybius, Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Strabo, Plutarch, Dio Cassius, Photius, the Byzantine historians, &c. &c. It hence follows that if the Greek word for Latinus had been intended, the number contained in Λατινους, and not that in Λατινους, would have been called the number of the beast. We have already observed that the beast is the Latin kingdom or empire; therefore, if this observation be correct, the Greek words signifying The Latin kingdom must have this number. The most concise method of expressing this among the Greeks was as follows: 'Η Λατινη βασιλεια, which is thus numbered—

Table showing the numerical values of the letters in 'Η Λατινη βασιλεια. H=8, A=30, alpha=1, tau=200, rho=100, epsilon=10, sigma=10, eta=5, beta=2, alpha=1, sigma=200, epsilon=10, lambda=30, epsilon=5, tau=1, alpha=1, total=666.

No other kingdom on earth can be found to contain 666. This is then η σοφια, the wisdom, or demonstration. A beast is the symbol of a kingdom; THE BEAST has been proved, in the preceding part of this chapter, to be the LATIN kingdom; and 'Η Λατινη βασιλεια being shown to contain, exclusively, the number 666, is the demonstration.

Having demonstrated that 'Η Λατινη βασιλεια, The Latin kingdom, is the name of the beast, we must now examine what is intended by the phrase in the 17th verse, the name of the beast, or the number of his name. Bishop Newton supposes that the name of the beast, and the number of his name, mean the same thing; but this opinion is totally irreconcilable with chap. xv. 2. where St. John informs us that he "saw as it were a sea of glass mingled with fire, and them that had gotten the victory over the beast, and over his image, and over the number of his name, stand upon the sea of glass, having the harps of God." In this passage it is evident that the beast, his image, and the number of his name, are perfectly distinct; and therefore, no two of them can mean the same thing. Hence what is meant by the name of the beast is entirely different from that intended by the number of his name. But how can this be, when it is expressly declared that the number of the beast is 666, which number is declared to be that of his name? The solution of the whole mystery is as follows: both beasts of the Apocalypse we have already shown, have the same appellation; that is to say, the name of the first and second beast is equally 'Η Λατινη βασιλεια, the Latin kingdom; therefore, by the name of the beast is meant the Latin kingdom, and by the number of his name is also meant the Latin kingdom. Hence only one of the beasts is numbered; the name of that which is not numbered is termed the name of the beast, and the numbered Latin empire is denominated the number of his name, or 666, exactly agreeable to an ancient practice, already noticed, of representing names by the numbers contained in them. Therefore, the meaning of the whole passage is, that those whom the false prophet does not excommunicate, or put out of the pale of his church, have the mark of the beast, that is, are genuine papists, or such as are actively or passively obedient to his Latin idolatry. Those also escape his ecclesiastical interdicts who have the name of the beast, or the number of his name. By a person having the name of the beast is evidently meant his being a Latin, i. e. in subjection to the Latin empire; and, consequently, an individual of the Latin world; therefore, those that have the name of the beast, or the number of his name, are those that are subjects of the Latin empire; or of the numbered Latin empire, viz. who are in subjection to the Latin empire, secular or spiritual. All that were in subjec tion to the secular or spiritual power were not papists in heart; hence the propriety of distinguishing those which have the mark from those which have the name of the beast, or the number of his name. But which of the two beasts it is which God has numbered, has been not a little contested. That it is the first beast which is numbered has been the prevailing opinion. On this side are Lord Napier, Whiston, Bishop Newton, Faber, and others. Among those that have supposed the second beast to be the one which is numbered are Dr. Henry More, Pyle, Kerahaw, Galloway, Bichem, Dr. Hales, &c. Dr. Gill and Reader assert that both beasts have the same number, and that the name is Aarivon. Though it has been demonstrated that the name of the beast is the Latin kingdom, it is impossible from the mere name to say whether it is the Latin empire SECULAR or SPIRITUAL: hence the necessity of determining which of the two beasts God has computed. That it is the second beast which is numbered is evident from three different passages in the Apocalypse. The first is in chap. xiii. 17. where it is said, "that no man might buy or sell save he that had the mark, or the name of the beast, or the number of his name." Here the name of the beast mentioned before the number of his name which is a presumptive evidence that the name of the beast refers to the first beast, and the number of his name to the second. The second passage is in chap. xv. 2. where mention is made of "them that had gotten the victory over the beast, and over his image, and over the number of his name." That here styled the beast is evidently the secular Latin empire: for it was to this that the two-horned beast made an image; consequently there can be no doubt that the number of his name, or the numbered Latin empire, is the two-horned beast, or false prophet. To feel the full force of this argument, it must be considered that the saints of God are represented as getting the victory over the beast, as well as over the number of his name, which is a proof that two distinct antichristian empires are here spoken of, for otherwise it would be tautology. That the two-horned beast is the one which is numbered is farther evident from a comparison of this passage with chap. xix. 20. In the latter passage the words are—"And the beast was taken, and with him the false prophet, that wrought miracles before him, with which he deceived them that had received the mark of the beast, and them that worshipped his image." Here nothing is said of the number of his name, which is so particularly mentioned in chap. xv. 2. and in that chapter nothing is mentioned of the false prophet; the reason of which can only be that what is termed in one passage the number of his name, is in its parallel one called the false prophet. Hence the two-horned beast, or false prophet, is also designated by the phrase the number of his name; and consequently, it is this beast which is numbered. But what adds the last degree of certainty to this argument is the passage in chap. xiii. 18. Here is wisdom. Let him that hath a mind count the number of the beast; for it is the number of a man: and his number is Six hundred threescore and six. Here is the solution of this mystery; let him that hath a mind for investigations of this kind, find out a kingdom which contains precisely the number 666; for this must be infallibly the name of the beast. H Aarivon βασιλεια, THE LATIN KINGDOM, has exclusively this number. But both beasts are called by this name;—which is, therefore, the one that is numbered? It is said the number of the beast is the number of a man; consequently, the numbered beast must be a MAN, that is, it must be represented elsewhere in the Revelation under this emblem, for in no other sense can an empire be denominated a man. Therefore it is not the ten-horned beast, for this is uniformly styled The Beast in every part of the Apocalypse where there has been occasion to mention this power. It can, therefore, be no other than the two-horned beast, or Romish hierarchy; which, on account of its preaching to the world its most antichristian system of doctrines, and calling it Christianity, is likewise named in chap. xvi. 13. xix. 20. and xx. 10. THE FALSE PROPHET.

CHAPTER XIV.

The Lamb on Mount Zion, and His company, and their character, 1-5. The angel flying in the midst of heaven, with the everlasting Gospel, 6, 7. Another angel proclaims the fall of Babylon, 8. A third angel denounces God's judgments against those who worship the beast, or his image, 9-11. The patience of the saints, and the blessedness of them who die in the Lord, 12, 13. The man on the white cloud, with a sickle, reaping the earth, 14-16. The angel with the sickle commanded by another angel, who had power over fire, to gather the clusters of the vines of the earth, 17, 18. They are gathered, and thrown into the great wine-press of God's wrath; which is trodden without the city; and the blood comes out 1600 furlongs, 19, 21. [A. M. cir. 4100. A. D. cir. 96. Inapp. Flavio Domitiano Cæs. Aug. et Nervæ.]

AND I looked, and, lo, a Lamb stood on the mount Zion, and with him a hundred forty and four thousand, having his Father's name written in their foreheads.

And I heard a voice from heaven, as the voice of many waters, and as the voice of a great thunder: and I heard the voice of harpers harping with their harps:

And they sung as it were a new song before the throne, and before the four beasts, and the elders: and no man could learn that song: but the hundred and forty and four thousand, which were redeemed from the earth.

NOTES.—Verse 1. A Lamb stood on the Mount Zion This represents Jesus Christ in His sacerdotal office: Mount Zion was a type of the Christian church.

And with him an hundred forty and four thousand] Representing those who were converted to Christianity from among the Jews.—See chap. vii. 4.

His Father's name written in their foreheads.] They were professedly, openly, and practically, the children of God, by faith in Christ Jesus. Different sects of idolaters have the peculiar mark of their god on their foreheads. This is practised in the East to the present day; and the mark is called the sectarial mark. Between eighty and ninety different figures are found on the foreheads of different Hindu deities, and their followers.

Almost every MS. of importance, as well as most of the Versions, and many of the Fathers, read this clause thus: Having HIS NAME and his Father's name written upon their foreheads. This is undoubtedly the true reading; and is properly received by Griesbach into the text.

2. The voice of many waters] That is, of multitudes of various nations.

The voice of harpers] Though the sounds were many and apparently confused, yet both harmony and melody were preserved.

2. They sung—a new song] See on chap. v. 9.

No man could learn that song] As none but genuine Christians can worship God acceptably, because they approach Him through the only Mediator: so none can understand the deep things of God but such; nor can others know the cause why true believers exult so much in God through Christ; because they know not the communion which such hold with the Father and the Son, through the Holy Ghost.

4. These are they which were not defiled with women] They are pure from idolatry; and are presented as unspotted virgins to their Lord and Saviour Christ.—See 2 Cor. xi. 2. There may be an allusion here to the Israelites committing idolatry, through the means of their criminal connexion with the Midianitish women.—See Num. xxv. 1.—4. and xxvi. 16.

Follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth] They go through good and through evil report, bear his reproach, and love not their lives even to the death.

The first-fruits unto God] The reference appears to be to those Jews, who were the first converts to Christianity.

5. In their mouth was found no guile] When brought before kings and rulers, they did not dissemble, but boldly confessed the Lord Jesus.

6. Another angel fly in the midst of heaven, having the everlasting Gospel] Whether this angel mean any more than a particular dispensation of Providence and grace, by which the Gospel shall be rapidly sent throughout the whole world; or whether it mean any especial messenger, order of preachers, people, or society of Christians, whose professed object it is to send the Gospel of the kingdom throughout the earth; we know not. But the vision seems truly descriptive of a late institution, intitled THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY, whose object it is to print and circulate the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments, through all the habitable world; and in all the languages spoken on the face of the earth. Already they have been the means by actually printing, or by affording the means to different nations to print for themselves, the Bible, in a vast number of languages and dialects: so that it has been sent in hundreds of thousands of copies, in whole, or in part, to almost every part of the globe; viz. in their native language to the Welsh; in Gaelic, to the Irish; in Erse to the Highlands of Scotland; in Manks, to the Ile of Man; in French, Italian, Portuguese and Spanish, to those countries, and Switzerland. In low Dutch, to Holland, &c. in high Dutch, to Germany, Prussia, &c. Through them a similar society has been established at St. Petersburg, by which the Bible has been sent in Slavonic to the Russians; and in different dialects to the people of that vast empire: besides the Turkish, Tartaric, and Calmuck. They have also sent the Holy Scriptures in ancient and modern Greek to Asia Minor, and the different isles of the Mediterranean Sea: in Arabic, and Ethiopic, to Egypt and Abyssinia; in Syriac, to the Holy Land; and to the Christians, at Travancore. They have also greatly and effectually assisted a very worthy society in the East Indies, whose indefatigable and

7 Saying with a loud voice, Fear God, and give glory to him; for the hour of his judgment is come: and worship him that made heaven, and earth, and the sea, and the fountains of waters.

8 And there followed another angel, saying, Babylon is fallen, is fallen, that great city, because she made all nations drink of the wine of the wrath of her fornication.

9 And the third angel followed them, saying, with a loud voice, If any man worship the beast and his image, and receive his mark in his forehead, or in his hand,

10 The same shall drink of the wine of the wrath of God, which is poured out without mixture into the cup of his indignation; and he shall be tormented with fire and brimstone: and he shall have his smoke ascending up and upon the stone in the presence of the holy angels, and in the presence of the Lamb:

11 And the smoke of their torment ascendeth up for ever and ever: and they have no rest day nor night, who worship the beast and his image, and whosoever receiveth the mark of his name.

12 Here is the patience of the saints: here are they that keep the commandments of God, and the faith of Jesus.

13 And I heard a voice from heaven saying unto me, Write, Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth: Yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labours; and their works do follow them.

14 And I looked, and behold a white cloud, and upon the cloud sat a man, whose face was as the sun, and his feet as white as snow: and he sat upon the stone in the presence of the holy angels, and in the presence of the Lamb:

Τρις μακαρες Δαναοι και τετρακις ο τοτ' ελοντο Τροην εν τροει χαρις Ατρουιδιοι φερουτες: Ως οη εγω; οφελον θανειν, και ποτμον εκτισεν Πηλητιοι, εσθ μοι κλειστοι χαλκικρα δορα Τρωες επιρριψαν περι Πηληιοτι θαναοτι.

Happy, thrice happy, who in battle slain, Pressed in Atreides' cause the Trojan plain: O, had I died before that well-fought wall; Had some distinguish'd day renown'd my fall; Such was that when showers of javelins fled From conquering Troy, around Achilles' dead.—POPE.

Thus imitated by the prince of the Roman poets:—

Exempto Enea solvantur frigora membra, Ingemit; et duplices tendens ad sidera palmas, Talia voce refert: O terque quaterque beati, Quis ante ora patrum Troja sub mœnibus altis, Contigit oppotere! O Danaum fortissimum genus Tydide, mene Hiacis occumbere campis Non potuisset! tuncque animam hanc effunderet dextrâ? Scœvus ubi Bœacida telo facti Hector, ubi ingens Sarpedon: ubi tot Simois corpora sub undâ Scuta virum, galeasque et fortia corpora volvit.

“In horror fix’d the Trojan hero stands, He groans, and spreads to heaven his lifted hands. Thrice happy those whose fate it was to fall, Exclaims the chief, before the Trojan wall! Oh, ’twas a glorious fate to die in fight! To die so bravely in their parent’s sight! Oh, had I there, beneath thy dices’ hand, That bravest hero of the Grecian band; Four’d out this soul, with martial glory fix’d, And in the plain triumphantly expir’d, Where Hector fell, by heret’ Achilles’ spear, And great Sarpedon, the renown’d in war: Where Simois’ stream, encumber’d with the slain, Rolls shields, and helms, and horns to the main.”—PITT.

Which die in the Lord] These are the only glorious dead. They die, not in the field of battle, in either what are called lawful or unlawful wars against their fellow-men: but they die in the cause of God; they die under the smile and approbation of God; and they die to live and reign with God for ever and ever.

From henceforth] Aν’ απο, from this time; now; immediately. These words are joined to the following by many MSS., and some Versions. It was a maxim among the Jews, that as soon as the souls of the just departed from this life, they ascended immediately to heaven.

Yea, saith the Spirit] The Holy Spirit confirms the declaration from heaven; and assigns the reasons of it. That they may rest from their labours] Have no more tribulation and distress.

And their works do follow them.] Εργα αυτων ακολουθησιν μετ’ αυτων, and their works follow with them. They are in company. Here is an elegant prosopopœia, or personification; their good works, sufferings, &c. are represented as so many companions escorting them on their way to the kingdom of God.

There are some good and pertinent things in the Jewish writers on this subject. “Rabbi Jonathan taught, If a man perform one righteous action in his life, it goes before him into the world to come. But if a man commit one crime, it cleaves to him, and drags him to the day of judgment.” Sota, fol. 3. 2. Avoda Sara, fol. 5. 1.

“Come and see, if any man observe a precept, that work ascends to God, and says (such a one) performed me. But if a man transgress the law, that sin ascends to the Holy Blessed God, and says, I came from (such a one) who has performed me.”—Sohar Levit. fol. 34. col. 136. Here the same personification is observed, as that in the text.

“In that hour in which a man passes from this life into eternity, all his works precede him; and there they say unto him, ‘This and that hast thou done in such a place, on such a day.’ This he shall acknowledge.—They shall require that he shall subscribe this with his own hand, as it is written, Job xxxvii. 7. each man shall subscribe with his own hand: and, not only this, but he shall acknowledge that the sentence brought against him is most just.”—Taanith, fol. 11. 1.

incomparable missionaries, the Rev. Messrs. Carey, Marshman, and Ward, have translated the Scriptures into the principal languages of India: and they have furnished the means of printing a complete translation of the New Testament in the Chinese language at Canton, by the Rev. Mr. Morrison. In short, almost every nation in the universe has, through this society, directly, or indirectly received, or are receiving the words of eternal life; so that it appears to answer the description of the Apocalyptic “angel dying in the midst of heaven, having the everlasting Gospel to preach unto them that dwell on the earth; and to every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people.”

7. Fear God, and give glory to him] This is the general language of the Sacred Writings. Worship the true God, the Creator and Governor of all things, and give Him glory, for to Him alone, not to idols or men, all glory and honour belong.

8. Babylon is fallen, is fallen] This is generally understood to be a prediction concerning Rome: and it is certain that Rome, in the rabbinical writings, is termed Babylon.

That great city] Among the same writers this city is styled רבתי קרתי karēthi rabbetha, the great city; and רומא רומי Romi rabbetha, the great Rome. But which Rome is meant? Pagan or papal Rome? Some parts of the description apply best to the former.

The wine of the wrath of her fornication.] There is an allusion here to a custom of impure women; who give philtres, or love potions, to those whom they wish to seduce and bind to their will; and those potions were generally of an intoxicating nature, greatly inflaming the blood, and disturbing the intellect.

Fornication and adultery are frequently used in Scripture as emblems of idolatry and false worship.

The wine of the wrath is another expression for the poisoned or poisoned cup given by such women.

No nation of the idol spread their idolatries so far as the ancient Romans; they were as extensive as their conquests. And papal Rome has been not less active in disseminating her superstitions. She has given her rituals, but not the everlasting Gospel, to most nations of the earth.

9. And the third angel followed] Bishop Bale considers these three angels as three descriptions of preachers, who should bear their testimony against the corruptions of the papal church.

The beast and his image] See the notes on chap. xiii. Mark in his forehead] Such as the sectarian marks of the idolatrous Hindus, as has been observed before.

10. The wine of the wrath of God] As they had drunk the intoxicating wine of idolatry or spiritual fornication, they shall now drink the wine of God’s wrath, which is poured out into the cup of His indignation. This is an allusion to the poisoned cup, which certain criminals were obliged to drink; on which ensued speedy death.—See on Heb. ii. 9.

Shall be tormented with fire and brimstone] An allusion to the punishment of Sodom and Gomorrah, for their unnatural crimes.

Presence of the holy angels, and—of the Lamb] These being the instruments employed in their destruction; the Lamb, the Lord Jesus Christ, acting as Judge.

11. The smoke of their torment] Still an allusion to the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah.

12. Here is the patience of the saints] Here the faith of the true Christians shall be proved: they will follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth; they keep the commandments of God, and are steadfast in the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Sometimes εβραχον, patience, or perseverance, is taken for the reward of these virtues: the text, therefore, may be thus understood—here is the reward of the perseverance of the true Christians; for, although they die for the testimony of Jesus, yet they shall be unutterably blessed. See the next verse.

13. I heard a voice from heaven] As the information now to be given was of the utmost importance, it is solemnly communicated by a voice from heaven; and the apostle is commanded to write or record what is said.

Blessed are the dead] Happy are they. They are happy in two respects:—1. They do not see the evil that shall come upon the world; and are exempted from any further sufferings. 2. They actually and conscientiously enjoy happiness in a state of blessedness.

In the first sense, Happy are the dead! is a proverb frequently to be met with in the Greek and Roman poets.—R. gr.

5. The temple of the tabernacle of the testimony] The temple which succeeded the tabernacle; in which was the testimony, viz. the two tables; Aaron's rod; pot of manna; holy anointing oil, &c. All bearing testimony to the truth of God, and His miraculous interposition in their behalf.

6. The seven angels came out of the temple] To show that they were sent from God Himself.

Clothed in pure and white linen] Habited as priests. For these habits, see Exod. xxviii. 6, 8. and see the note on chap. i. ver. 13.

7. The temple was filled with smoke] So was the tabernacle when consecrated by Moses, Exod. xl. 34, 35. and the temple when consecrated by Solomon, 1 Kings viii. 10, 11. 2 Chron. v. 14. See Isa. vi. 4. This account seems at least partly copied from those above.

When the high-priest entered into the holy of holies, and the ordinary priest into the holy place, they always carried with them a great deal of smoking incense, which filled those places with smoke and darkness, which prevented them from considering, too attentively, the parts and ornaments of these holy places; and thus served to produce an air of majesty in the temple, which none dared to approach without the deepest reverence. To this, Calmet thinks, the allusions may be here.

CHAPTER XVI.

The angels are commanded to pour out their vials upon the earth. 1. The first pours out his vial on the earth, by which a grievous sore is produced. 2. The second angel pours out his vial on the sea, and it is turned into blood. 3. The third angel pours out his vial on the rivers and fountains, and they are turned also into blood. 4-7. The fourth angel pours out his vial on the sun, and men are scorched with fire. 8, 9. The fifth angel pours out his vial on the throne of the beast, 10, 11. The sixth angel pours out his vial on the river Euphrates. 12. Three unclean spirits come out of the mouth of the beast, dragon, and false prophet; and go forth to gather Armageddon, 13-16. The seventh angel pours out his vial on the air, on which followed thunders, lightnings, earthquakes, and extraordinary hail, 17-21. [A. M. cir. 4100. A. D. cir. 96. Impp. Flavio Domitiano Cæs. Aug. et Nervæ.]

AND I heard a great voice out of the temple, saying to the seven angels, Go your ways, and pour out the vials of the wrath of God upon the earth.

2 And the first went and poured out his vial upon the earth; and there fell a noisome and grievous sore upon the men which had the mark of the beast, and upon them which worshipped his image.

3 And the second angel poured out his vial upon the sea; and it became as the blood of a dead man: and every living soul died in the sea.

4 And the third angel poured out his vial upon the rivers and fountains of waters: and they became blood.

5 And I heard the angel of the waters say, Thou art righteous, O Lord, which art, and wast, and shalt be, because thou hast judged thus.

6 For they have shed the blood of saints and prophets, and thou hast given them blood to drink; for they are worthy.

7 And I heard another out of the altar say, Even so, Lord God Almighty, true and righteous are thy judgments.

8 And the fourth angel poured out his vial upon the sun; and power was given unto him to scorch men with fire.

9 And men were scorched with great heat, and blasphemed: and they repented not of their sores, neither did they repent of their blasphemy. [Ch. 11. 10-17. Exod. 9. 9, 10, 11. Ch. 15. 16, 17. NOTES—Verse 1. Go your ways, and pour out] These ministers of the Divine justice, were ready to execute vengeance upon transgressors, having full power, but could do nothing in this way till they received especial commission. Nothing can be done without the permission of God; and in the manifestation of justice or mercy by Divine agency, there must be positive command.

2. A noisome and grievous sore] This is a reference to the sixth Egyptian plague, bites and hains, Exod. ix. 8, &c.

3. As the blood of a dead man] Either meaning blood in a state of putrescency; or an effusion of blood in naval conflicts; even the sea was tinged with the blood of those who were slain in these wars. This is most probably the meaning of this vial. These engagements were so sanguinary, that both the conquerors and the conquered were nearly destroyed; every living soul died in the sea.

4. Upon the rivers and fountains of waters] This is an allusion to the first Egyptian plague, Exod. vii. 20—and to those plagues in general there are allusions throughout this chapter. It is a sentiment of the rabbins, that "whatever plagues God inflicted on the Egyptians in former times, He will inflict on the enemies of His people in all later times."—See a long quotation on this subject from Rabbi Tanchum in Schettgen.

5. The angel of the waters] The rabbins attribute angels not only to the four elements so called; but to almost every thing besides. We have already seen the angel of the bottomless pit, ch. ix. 11. and the angel of the fire, ch. xiv. 18. The angel of the earth is spoken of in Yalcut Rubeni, fol. 13. 2. and is called Admael. They have also an angel that presides over the grass; and another that presides over the cattle which feed upon the grass.

They say, that God employed the angel of the sea to swallow up the waters at the creation, that the dry land might appear. He disobeyed, and God slew him; the name of the angel of the sea is Rahab. See Baba bathra, fol. 74. 2. It is plain from several places, that the writer of the Apocalypse keeps these notions distinctly in view.

6. Thou hast given them blood to drink] They thirsted after blood, and massacred the saints of God; and now they have got blood to drink! It is said, that when Tomiris, queen of the Scythians, had vanquished Cyrus, she cut off his head, and threw it into a vessel of blood, saying these words:—Satis à sanguine, quem misisti, cuiusque insatiabilem semper fuisi: "Satisfy thyself with blood, for which thou hast thirsted; and for which thy desire has been insatiable."— ed the name of God, which hath power over these plagues; and they repented not of their deeds.

10 And the fifth angel poured out his vial upon the seat of the beast; and his kingdom was full of darkness; and they gnawed their tongues for pain,

11 And they blasphemed the God of heaven because of their pains and their sores, and repented not of their deeds.

12 And the sixth angel poured out his vial upon the great river Euphrates; and the water thereof was dried up, that the way of the kings of the east might be prepared.

13 And I saw three unclean spirits like frogs come out of the mouth of the dragon, and out of the mouth of the beast, and out of the mouth of the false prophet.

14 For they are the spirits of devils, working miracles, which go forth unto the kings of the earth, and of the whole world, to gather them to the battle of that great day of God Almighty.

15 Behold, I come as a thief. Blessed is he that watcheth, and keepeth his garments, lest he walk naked, and they see his shame.

16 And he gathered them together into a place called in the Hebrew tongue Armageddon.

17 And the seventh angel poured out his vial into the air;

See Justin. Hist. lib. i. c. 8. This figure of speech is called sarcasm in rhetoric.

"Sarcasmus with his biting taunt doth kill; Cyrus, thy thral was blood; now drink thy fill."

8. Poured out his vial upon the sun] Mr. Robert Fleming, more than one hundred years ago, in his View of Scripture Prophecy, supposed that this vial would be poured out on that empire about the year 1794. And it is remarkable that in 1793, the French king was deposed by the National Assembly; and great and unparalleled miseries fell upon the French nation, which nearly extinguished all their nobility, and brought about a war that has lasted twenty-three years, and has nearly ruined that country, and all the nations of Europe.

9. They repented not] No moral national amendment has taken place in consequence of the above calamities in that unhappy country; nor indeed any of those nations engaged against her, in that long and ruinous contest, which has now terminated, (1817,) without producing one political, moral, or religious advantage to herself, or to Europe.

10. The seat of the beast] Est vos operes vos deorum, upon the throne of the wild beast. The royal family was smitten by the fourth vial; they did not repent: then the fifth angel pours out his vial on the throne of the wild beast, or antichristian idolatrous power.

Was full of darkness] Confusion, dismay, and distress.

11. Blasphemed the God of heaven] Neither did they repent; therefore other judgments must follow. Some think that the sun was Vitellius, the Roman emperor; and that his throne means Rome; and the darkening refers to the injuries she sustained in her political consequence by the civil war which then took place, from which she never entirely recovered. Others apply it to papal Rome; and in this respect make out a very clear case! Thus have men conjectured; but how much nearer are we to the truth?

12. On the great river Euphrates] Probably meaning the people in the vicinity of this river; though some think that the Tiber is intended.

The water thereof was dried up] The people discomfited, and all impediments removed.

The kings of the east] There seems to be an allusion here to the ruin of Babylon by Cyrus, predicted by the prophet Jerem. chap. i. and li. But what city or people is pointed out by this Babylon is in vain to conjecture.

and there came a great voice out of the temple of heaven, from the throne, saying, "It is done.

18 And there were voices and thunders, and lightnings; and there was a great earthquake, such as was not since men were upon the earth, so mighty an earthquake, and so great.

19 And the great city was divided into three parts, and the cities of the nations fell: and great Babylon came in rebellion. [Ch. 9. 6.—Ch. 4. 5. & 8. 3. & 11. 19.—Ch. 11. 13.—w Daa. 12. 1.—Ch. 14. 8. & 17. 12.—y Ch. 18. 2.]

13. Three unclean spirits) Perhaps false teachers, called afterwards spirits of devils, which persuade the kings of the earth by lying miracles to come forth to the place of general slaughter, ver. 14, 16.

Some good critics apply this to Vespasian, and his pretended miracles.—See the account in Tacitus, lib. iv. c. 81.

15. Behold, I come as a thief) Here is a sudden but timely warning, to put every man on his guard, when this sudden and generally unexpected tribulation should take place.

Keepeth his garments, (as he walk naked) Here is a plain allusion to the office of him who was called the prefect, or overseer, of the mountain of the temple. His custom was to go his rounds during the watches of the night; and if he found any of the Levites sleeping on his watch, he had authority to beat him with a stick, and burn his vestments.—See Middoth, fol. 34. 1. and Tmid. fol. 27. 2., 28. 1. Such a person being found on his return home naked, it was at once known that he had been found asleep at his post; had been beaten, and his clothes burnt; thus his shame was seen; he was reproached for his infidelity and irreligion.

16. Armageddon.) The original of this word has been variously formed, and variously translated. It is ארמגדון Har-megiddon, "the mount of the assembly;" or ערמא חרמא חרמא חרמא gedehon, "the destruction of their army;" or it is ארמגדון Har megiddo, "Mount Megiddo;" the valley of which was remarkable for two great slaughterers: one of the Israelites, 2 Kings xxiii. 29., the other of the Canaanites, Judges iv. 16. v. 19. But Mount Megiddo, that is, Carmel, is the place, according to some, where these armies should be collected.

But what is the battle of Armageddon? How ridiculous have been the conjectures of men relative to this point?

membrance before God, to give unto her the cup of the wine of the fierceness of his wrath.

20 And every island fled away, and the mountains were not found.

21 And there fell upon men a great hail out of heaven, every stone about the weight of a talent: and men blasphemed God because of the plague of the hail; for the plague thereof was exceeding great.

[Is. 51. 17. 22. Jer. 51. 16. Ch. 14. 10.—Ch. 6. 14.—Ch. 11. 13.—v. 9, 11.—d See Exod. 9. 31, 32.]

Within the last twenty years this battle has been fought at various places, according to our purblind seers, and self-inspired prophets! At one time it was Austerlitz, at another Moscow, at another Leipzig, and now Waterloo! And thus they have gone on, and will go on, confounding and being confounded.

17. Poured out his vial into the air) To signify that this plague was to be widely diffused; and perhaps to intimate that pestilences and various deaths would be the effect of this vial. But possibly air, in this place, may have some emblematical meaning.

It is done) It is said, chap. x. 7. that in the days of the seventh trumpet the mystery of God should be finished: so here we find it completed. Eyev: All's over! Fulvius Troes! Illum fuit! Once there were Trojans, and they had a city; but now all are extinct.

18. A great earthquake) Most terrible commotions, both civil and religious. Or, a convulsion, shaking, or revolution.

19. The great city) Some say Jerusalem; others, Rome; some, others, Rome papal.

The cup of the wine of the fierceness of his wrath) Alluding to the mode of putting certain criminals to death, by making them drink a cup of poison.—See on Heb. ii. 9.

20. Every island fled away) Probably meaning the capture of sea-port towns, and fortified places.

21. A great hail, about the weight of a talent) Has this any reference to cannon balls, and bombs? It is very doubtful; we are all in the dark in these matters.

The words of Revelation, as a talent, are used to express something great, excessively oppressive; as φορηστων ταλαριων, terrible diseases, not diseases of the weight of a talent. See Rosenmüller.

CHAPTER XVII.

The judgment of the great whore, which sits on many waters, explains the mystery of the woman, of the beast, &c. 7—18. Aug. et Norv.]

AND there came one of the seven angels which had the seven vials, and talked with me, saying unto me, Come hither; I will show unto thee the judgment of the great whore, that sitteth upon many waters:

2 With whom the kings of the earth have committed fornication, and the inhabitants of the earth have been made drunk with the wine of her fornication. [Ch. 9. 3.—Ch. 18. 19. & 18. 16, 17, 18.—c Nah. 3. 4. Ch. 19. 2.—d Jer. 51. 13. Ver. 12.—Ch. 18. 3.]

This chapter is, on several accounts, very important; and particularly as it appears to explain several of the most remarkable symbols in the book. The same author, who has written so largely on the xliith and xliiith chapters, has also obliged me with his interpretation of this chapter. Not pretending to explain these things myself, I insert this as the most elaborate and learned exposition I have yet seen; leaving my readers at perfect liberty to reject it, and adopt any other mode of interpretation which they please. God alone knows all the secrets of His own wisdom.

NOTES by J. E. C.—Verse 1. And there came one of the seven angels which had the seven vials, and talked with me, saying unto me, Come hither, I will show unto thee the judgment of the great whore that sitteth upon many waters.) That idolatrous worship is frequently represented in Scripture under the character of a whore, or whoredom, it is evident from numerous passages which it is unnecessary to quote.—See Chron. v. 25. Ezek. xvi. xliii. &c. The woman mentioned here is called a great whore, to denote her excessive depravity, and the awful nature of her idolatry. She is also represented as sitting upon many waters, to show the vast extent of her influence.—See on ver. 13.

2. With whom the kings of the earth have committed fornication, and the inhabitants of the earth have been made drunk with the wine of her fornication.) What an awful picture this is of the state of the religion of the world, in subjection to this whore. Kings have committed spiritual fornication with her, and their subjects have drunk deep, dreadfully deep, into the doctrine of her abominable errors.

3. So he carried me away in the spirit into the wilderness) This wilderness into which the apostle was carried, is the desolate state of the true church of Christ, in one of the wings of the once mighty Roman empire. It was a truly awful sight, a terrible desert, a waste-howling wilderness; for when he came thither, he—Saw a woman sit upon a scarlet-coloured beast, full of names of blasphemy, having seven heads and ten horns.) No doubt can now be entertained that this woman is the Latin church; for she sits upon the beast with seven heads and ten horns, which has been already proved to be the Latin empire, because this empire alone contains the number 666.—See on chap. xliii. This is a representation of the Latin church in her highest state of anti-christian prosperity; for she sits upon the scarlet-coloured beast, a striking emblem of her complete domination over the secular Latin empire. The state of the Latin church from the commencement of the fourteenth century to the time of the Reformation, may be considered that which corresponds to this prophetic description in the most literal and extensive sense of the words; for during this period she was at her highest pitch of worldly grandeur and temporal authority. The beast is full of names of blasphemy; and it is well known that the nations, in support of the Latin or Romish church, have abounded in blasphemous appellations, and have not blushed to attribute to themselves and to their church the most sacred titles; not only blasphemy by the improper use of sacred names, but even by applying to its bishops those names which alone belong to God; for God hath expressly declared that He will not give his glory to another, neither his praises to graven images.

4. And the woman was arrayed in purple and scarlet colour, and decked with gold, and precious stones, and pearls, having a golden cup in her hand, full of abominations and filthiness of her fornication.) This strikingly represents the most pompous and costly manner in which the Latin church has held forth to the nations the rites and ceremonies of its idolatrous and corrupt worship.

5. And upon her forehead was a name written, Mystery, Babylon the Great, the Mother of Harlots and Abominations of the Earth.) This inscription being written upon her forehead is intended to show that she is not ashamed of her doctrines, but publicly professes and glories in them before the nations; she has, indeed, a whore's forehead; she has refused to be ashamed. The inscription upon her forehead is exactly the portraiture of the Latin church. This church is, as Bishop Newton well expresses it, A MYSTERY of iniquity. This woman is also called Babylon the Great; she is the exact antitype of the ancient Babylon in her idolatry and cruelty; but the ancient city called Babylon is only a drawing of her in miniature. This is, indeed, Babylon the Great. "She affects the style and title of our Holy Mother the Church; but she is, in truth, the mother of harlots and abominations of the earth."

4 And the woman <sup>was</sup> arrayed in purple and scarlet colour, and decked with gold, and precious stones, and pearls, <sup>having</sup> a golden cup in her hand full of abominations and filthiness of her fornication :

5 And upon her forehead was a name written, MYSTERY, BABYLON THE GREAT, THE MOTHER OF HARLOTS AND ABOMINATIONS OF THE EARTH.

6 And I saw the woman drunken with the blood of the saints, and with the blood of the martyrs of Jesus : and when I saw her, I wondered with great admiration.

7 And the angel said unto me, Wherefore didst thou marvel ?

8 And I saw the woman drunken with the blood of the saints, and with the blood of the martyrs of Jesus : and when I saw her, I wondered with great admiration.] How exactly the cruelties exercised by the Latin church against all it has denominated heretics correspond with this description, the reader need not be informed.

7. And the angel said unto me, Wherefore didst thou marvel ? I will tell thee the mystery of the woman, and of the beast that carrieth her, which hath the seven heads and ten horns) The apostle was greatly astonished, as well he might, at the woman's being drunk with the blood of the saints, when the beast which carried her abounded with sacred appetitions, such as holy, most holy, most Christian, sacred, most sacred. The angel undertakes to explain to St. John the vision, which had excited in him so great astonishment ; and the explication is of such great importance, that, had it not been given, the mystery of the dragon and the beast could never have been satisfactorily explained in all its particulars. The angel begins with saying—

8 The beast that thou sawest was, and is not ; and shall ascend out of the bottomless pit, and go into perdition) The beast is the Latin kingdom, (H. Latium βασιλεια) consequently the beast was, that is, was in existence previously to the time of St. John, for Latinus was the first king of the Latins, and Numitor the last ; is not now, because the Latin name has ceased long ago to be an independent power, and is now under the dominion of the Romans : but shall ascend out of the bottomless pit, that is, the Latin kingdom, the antichristian power, or that which ascendeth out of the abyss, or bottomless pit, is yet in futurity. But it is added—

And they that dwell on the earth shall wonder (whose names were not written in the book of life from the foundation of the world,) when they behold the beast that was, and is not, and yet is.) By the earth is here meant the Latin world ; therefore the meaning is, that all who dwell in the Latin world shall adhere to the idolatrous and blasphemous religion of the Latin church, which is supported by the Latin empire, except those who abide by the Sacred Scriptures, receiving them as the only rule of faith and practice. These believe in the true sacrifice, and keep themselves unspotted from the corruption that is in the world. But the inhabitants of the Latin world, under the dominion of the Romish religion, shall wonder when they behold the beast, or Latin empire ; that is, as Lord Napier remarks, "shall have in great admiration, reverence, and estimation, this great monarchie." They shall wonder at it, by considering it the most sacred empire in the world, that in which God peculiarly delights : but those that so wonder have not their names written in the book of life : but are such as prefer councils to Divine revelation, and take their religion from missals, rituals, and legends, instead of the Sacred Oracles : hence they are corrupt and idolatrous, and no idolater hath inheritance in the kingdom of God. In the preceding part of the verse, the beast is considered in three states, as that which was, and is not, and shall ascend out of the bottomless pit ; here a fourth is introduced, and yet is. This is added to show that, though the Latins were subjugated by the Romans, nevertheless the Romans themselves were Latins ; for Romulus, the founder of their monarchy, was a Latin ; consequently that denominated in St. John's days the Roman empire, was, in reality, the Latin kingdom, for the very language of the empire was the Latin ; and the Greek writers, who lived in the time of the Roman empire, expressly tell us that those formerly called Latins are now named Romans. The meaning of the whole verse is, therefore, as follows : The corrupt part of mankind shall have in great admiration the Latin empire yet in futurity, which has already been, but is now extinct, the Romans having conquered it ; and yet it is still in being, for though the Latin nation has been subjugated, its conquerors are themselves Latins. But it may be objected against the interpretation here given, that these phrases are spoken of the beast upon which the apostle saw the woman, or Latin church, sit ; for the angel says, the beast that was sawest was, and is not, &c. ; what reference, therefore, can the Latin empire, which supports the Latin church, have to the Latin kingdom which subsisted before St. John's time, or to the Roman empire which might properly be so denominated ? This objection has very great weight at first sight ; and cannot be answered satisfactorily till the angel's explanation of the heads and horns of the beast have been examined ; therefore it is added—

9 Here is the mind which hath wisdom) It was said before, chap. xiii. 18 Here is wisdom : let him that hath a mind, or understanding, (vovv), count the number of the beast. Wisdom, therefore, here means a correct view of what is intend-

I will tell thee the mystery of the woman, and of the beast that carrieth her, which hath the seven heads and ten horns.

8 The beast that thou sawest was, and is not ; and yet shall ascend out of the bottomless pit, and go into perdition : and they that dwell on the earth shall wonder, whose names were not written in the book of life from the foundation of the world, when they behold the beast that was, and is not, and yet is.

9 And here is the mind which hath wisdom. The seven heads are seven mountains, on which the woman sitteth.

10 And there are seven kings : five are fallen, and one is, ed by the number 666 ; consequently, the parallel passage, Here is the mind which hath wisdom, is a declaration that the number of the beast must first be understood, before the angel's interpretation of the vision concerning the whore and the beast can admit of a satisfactory explanation.

The seven heads are seven mountains on which the woman sitteth.) This verse has been almost universally considered to allude to the seven hills upon which Rome originally stood. But it has been objected that modern Rome is not thus situated ; and that, consequently, pagan Rome is intended in the prophecy. This is certainly a very formidable objection against the generally received opinion among Protestants, that papal Rome is the city meant by the woman sitting upon seven mountains. It has been already shown that the woman here mentioned is an emblem of the Latin church in her highest state of antichristian prosperity ; and therefore, the city of Rome, seated upon seven mountains, is not at all designed in the prophecy. In order to understand this Scripture and not a literal sense, as in chap. vi. 14. and xvi. 20. See also Isa. ii. 2. Jer. li. 25. Dan. ii. 35. &c. in which it is unequivocally the emblem of great and mighty power. The mountains upon which the woman sitteth, must be, therefore, seven great powers ; and as the mountains are heads of the beast, they must be the seven GREATEST eminences of the Latin world. As no other power was acknowledged at the head of the Latin empire but that of Germany, how can it be said that the beast has seven heads ? This question can only be solved by the feudal constitution of the late Germanic league ; the history of which is briefly as follows.—At first kings alone granted fiefs. They granted them to laymen only, and to such only who were free ; and the vassal had no power to alienate them. Every freeman, and particularly the feudal tenants, were subject to the obligation of military duty, and appointed to guard their sovereign's life, member, mind, and right honour. Soon after, or perhaps a little before, the extinction of the Carolingian dynasty in France, by the accession of the Capetian line, and in Germany by the accession of the house of Saxony, fiefs, which had been entirely at the disposal of the sovereign, became hereditary. Even the offices of duke, count, margrave, &c. were transmitted in the course of hereditary descent ; and not long after the right of primogeniture was universally established. The crown-vassals usurped the sovereign property of the land, with civil and military authority over the inhabitants. The possession thus usurped they granted out to their immediate tenants ; and these granted them over to others, in like manner. Thus the principal vassals gradually obtained every royal prerogative : they promulgated laws, exercised the power of life and death, coined money, fixed the standard of weights and measures, granted safeguards, entertained a military force, and imposed taxes, with every right supposed to be annexed to royalty. In their titles they styled themselves dukes, &c. Dei Gratia, by the grace of God, a prerogative now only confined to sovereign power. It was even admitted that, if the king refused to do the lord justice, the lord might make war upon him. The tenants, in their turn, made themselves independent of their vassal-lords, by which was introduced an ulterior state of vassalage. The king was called the sovereign lord, his immediate vassal was called the suzerain, and the tenants holding of him were called the arrere vassals. (See Boutier's Revolutions of the Germanic Empire, pp. 64—66.) Thus the power of the emperors of Germany, which was so very considerable in the ninth century, was gradually diminished by the means of the feudal system ; and during the anarchy of the long Interregnum, occasioned by the interference of the popes in the election of the emperors (from 1256 to 1273,) the imperial power was reduced almost to nothing. Rudolph of Hapsburgh, the founder of the house of Austria, was at length elected emperor, because his territories and influence were so inconsiderable as to excite no jealousy in the German princes, who were willing to preserve the forms of constitution, the power and rigour of which they had destroyed.—See Robertson's Introduction to his History of Charles V. In 1806 the dissolution of the empire, in 1806, Germany "presented a complex association of principalities, more or less powerful, and more or less connected, with a nominal sovereignty in the emperor, as its supreme feudal chief." There were about three hundred princes of the empire, each sovereign in his own country, and might enter into alliances, and pursue, by all political measures, his own private interest, as other sovereigns do ; for, if even an imperial war were declared, he might remain neutral, if the safety of the empire were not at stake.

Here then was an empire of a construction, w<sup>h</sup>

and the other is not yet come; and when he cometh, he must continue a short space.

tion, the most singular and intricate that ever appeared in the world; for the emperor was only the chief of the Germanic confederation." Gerinny was, therefore, speaking in the figurative language of Scripture, a country abounding in hills, or containing an immense number of distinct principalities. But the different German states, (as has been before observed,) did not each possess an equal share of power and influence; some were more eminent than others. Among them there were also a few which might, with the greatest propriety, be denominated mountains, or states possessing a very high degree of political importance. But the seven mountains on which the woman sits must have their elevations above all the other eminences in the whole Latin world; consequently, they can be no other than the SEVEN ELECTORATES of the German empire. These were, indeed, mountains of vast eminence; for in their sovereigns was vested the sole power of electing the head of the empire. But this was not all; for, besides the power of electing an emperor, the electors had a right to capitulate with the new head of the empire, to dictate the conditions on which he was to reign, and to depose him if he broke those conditions. They actually deposed Adolphus of Nassau in 1296, and Wenceslaus in 1400. They were sovereign and independent princes in their respective dominions, had the privilegium de non appellando ultimatium, that of making war, conling, and exercising every act of sovereignty; they formed a separate college in the diet of the empire, and had among themselves a particular covenant, or league, called Kurverein; they had precedence of all the other princes of the empire, and even ranked with kings. The heads of the beast, understood in this way, is one of the finest emblems of the German constitution which can possibly be conceived; for as the Roman empire of Germany had the precedence of all the other monarchies of which the Latin empire was composed, the seven mountains very fitly denote the seven PRINCIPAL POWERS of what has been named the Holy Roman empire. And also, as each electorate, by virtue of its union with the Germanic body, was more powerful than any other Roman Catholic state of Europe not so united; so each electorate, in the most proper sense of the word, one of the highest elevations in the Latin world. The time when the seven electorates of the empire were first instituted, is very uncertain. The most probable opinion appears to be that which places their origin some time in the thirteenth century. The uncertainty, however, in this respect, does not in the least weaken the evidence of the mountains being the seven electorates, but rather confirms it; for, as we have already observed, the representation of the woman sitting upon the beast, is a figure of the Latin church in the period of her greatest authority, spiritual and temporal; this we know did not take place before the commencement of the fourteenth century, a period subsequent to the institution of the seven electorates. Therefore the woman sits upon the seven mountains, or the German empire in its elective aristocratical state; she is said to sit upon them, to denote that she has the whole German empire under her direction and authority, and also that it is her chief support and strength. Supported by Germany, she is under no apprehension of being successfully opposed by any other power: she sits upon the seven mountains, therefore she is higher than the seven highest eminences of the Latin world; she must, therefore, have the secular Latin empire under her complete subjection. But this state of eminence did not continue above two or three centuries: the visible declension of the papal power in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, occasioned partly by the removal of the papal see from Rome to Avignon, and more particularly by the great schism from 1377 to 1417, though considered one of the remote causes of the Reformation, was at first the means of merely transferring the supreme power from the pope to a general council, while the dominion of the Latin church remained much the same. At the council of Constance, March 30, 1415, it was decreed, "that the synod being lawfully assembled in the name of the Holy Ghost, which constituted the general council, and represented the whole Catholic church militant, had its power immediately from Jesus Christ; and that every person, of whatsoever state or dignity, EVEN THE POPE HIMSELF, is obliged to obey it in what concerns the faith, the extirpation of schism, and the general reformation of the church in its head and members." The council of Basil, of 1432, decreed, "that every one of whatsoever dignity or condition, NOT EXCEPTING THE POPE HIMSELF, who shall refuse to obey the ordinances and decrees of this general council, or any other, shall be put under penance, and punished. It is also declared that the POPE has no power to dissolve the general council without the consent and decree of the assembly."—See the third Tome of Du Pin's Ecclesiastical History. But what gave the death-blow to the temporal sovereignty of the Latin church was the light of the glorious Reformation, which first broke out in Germany in 1517; and in a very few years gained its way not only over several of the great principalities of Germany, but was also made the established religion of other popish countries. Consequently, in which have received no kingdom as yet; but receive power as kings one hour with the beast.

the sixteenth century the woman no longer sat upon the seven mountains, the electorates not only having refused to be ruled by her, but some of them having also despised and abandoned her doctrines. The changes, therefore, which were made in the seventeenth, eighteenth, and nineteenth centuries in the number of the electorates, will not affect in the least the interpretation of the seven mountains already given. The seven electors were the archbishops of Mentz, Cologne, and Trier, the count palatine of the Rhine, the duke of Saxony, the margrave of Brandenburg, and the king of Bohemia. But the heads of the beast have a double signification, for the angel says,

10. And there are seven kings; Kai Basileis epra teiv, they are also seven kings. Before it was said, they are seven mountains; here, they are also seven kings, which is a demonstration that kingdoms are not here meant by mountains; and this is a farther argument that the seven electorates are represented by seven mountains, for though the sovereigns of these states ranked with kings, they were not kings; that is to say, they were not absolute and sole lords of the territories they possessed, independently of the emperor; for their states formed a part of the Germanic body. But the seven heads of the beast are also seven kings; that is to say, the Latin empire has had seven supreme forus of government; for king is used in the prophetic writings for any supreme governor of a state or people, as is evident from Deut. xxxiii. 5. where Moses is called a king. Of these seven kings, or supreme forms of Latin government, the angel informs St. John

Five are fallen, and one is; It is well known that the first form of Latin government was that of kings, which continued after the death of Latinus 428 years, till the building of Rome, B. C. 753. After Numitor's decease, the Albans or Latins, instituted the form of a republic, and were governed by dictators. We have only the names of two, viz. Clullius and Metius Fufetius or Fuffitius; but as the dictatorship continued at least eighty-eight years, there might have been others, though their names and actions are unknown. In the year before Christ 665, Alba, the metropolis of the Latin nation, was destroyed by Tullus Hostilius, the third king of the Romans, and the inhabitants carried to Rome. This put an end to the monarchical republic of the Latins; and the Latins elected two annual magistrates, whom Licinius calls dictators, but who are called prators by other writers. This form of government continued till the time of P. Decius Mus, the Roman consul; for Featus, in his fourteenth book, informs us, "that the Albans enjoyed prosperity till the time of king Tullus; but that Alba being then destroyed, the consuls, till the time of P. Decius Mus, held a consultation with the Latins at the head of Ferentina, and the empire was governed by the council of both nations." The Latin nation was entirely subjugated by the Romans B. C. 336, which put an end to the government by prators, after it had continued upwards of three hundred years. The Latins from this time ceased to be a nation, as it respects the name; therefore the three forms of government already mentioned were those which the Latins had during that period which the angel speaks of, when he says, the beast which thou sawest was. But as five heads, or forms of government, had fallen before St. John's time, it is evident that the two other forms of government which had fallen, must be among those of the Romans; first, because though the Latin nation so called was deprived of all authority by the Romans, yet the Latin power continued to exist, for the very conquerors of the Latin nation were Latins; and, consequently, the Latins, though a conquered people, continued to have a Latin government. Secondly, the angel expressly says, when speaking to St. John, that one is, that is, the sixth head, or Latin form of government, was then in existence, which could be no other than the imperial power, this being the only independent form of Latin government in the apostolic age. It therefore necessarily follows, that the Roman forms of government by which Latium was ruled, must be the remaining heads of the beast. Before the subjugation of the Latins by the Romans, four of the Roman or Draconic forms of government had fallen, the regal power, the dictatorship, the decemvirate, and the consular power, of the military tribunes; the last of which was abolished about 366 years before the commencement of the Christian era; none of these, therefore, ruled over the whole Latin nation. But as the Latins were finally subdued about 336 B. C. the consular government of the Romans, which was then the supreme power in the state, must be the fourth head of the beast. This form of government continued, with very little interruption, till the rising up of the triumvirate, the fifth head of the beast, B. C. 43. The dictatorship of Sylla and Julius Cæsar could not be considered a new head of the beast, as the Latins had already been ruled by it in the persons of Clullius and Fufetius. The sixth head of the beast, or that which existed in the time of St. John, was, consequently, as we have already proved, the imperial power of the heathen Cæsars, or the seventh draconic form of government shall overcome them: for he is Lord of lords, and King of kings: and they that are with him are called, and chosen, and faithful.

15 And he saith unto me, The waters which thou sawest, where the whore sitteth, are peoples, and multitudes, and nations, and tongues.

16 And the ten horns which thou sawest upon the beast, I see. 10. 17. 1 Tim. 6. 15. Ch. 18. 15.— Jer. 50. 44, 45. Ch. 14. 4.— 1. Sm. 8. 7. Ver. 1.— Ch. 10. 17.

And the other is not yet come! Bishop Newton considers the Roman duchy, under the eastern emperor's lieutenant, the exarch of Ravenna, the seventh head of the beast. But this cannot be the form of government signified by the seventh head, for a head of the beast, as we have already shown, is a supreme independent form of Latin government; consequently, the Roman duchy cannot be the seventh head, as it was dependant upon the exarchate of Ravenna: and the exarchate cannot be the head, as it was itself in subjection to the Greek empire. The Rev. G. Faber has ascertained the truth exactly, in denominating the Carlovingian patriciate the seventh head of the beast. That this was a supreme independent form of government is evident from history. Gibbon, in speaking of the patriciate, observes, that "the decrees of the senate and people successively invested Charles Martel and his posterity with the honours of patrician of Rome. The leaders of a powerful nation would have disdained a servile title and subordinate office: but the reign of the Greek emperors was suspended; and, in the vacancy of the empire, they derived a more glorious commission from the pope and the republic. The Roman ambassadors presented these patricians with the keys of the shrine of St. Peter, as a pledge and symbol of sovereignty; and with a holy banner, which it was their right and duty to unfurl in defence of the church and city. In the time of Charles Martel and of Pepin the interposition of the Lombard kingdom covered the freedom, while it threatened the safety, of Rome; and the patriciate represented only the title, the service, the alliance of these distant protectors. The power and policy of Charlemagne annihilated an enemy, and imposed a master. In his first visit to the capital, he was received with all the honours which had formerly been paid to the exarch, the representative of the emperor; and these honours obtained some new decorations from the joy and gratitude of Pope Adrian I.—In the portico Adrian expected him at the head of his clergy; they embraced as friends and equals: but, in their march to the altar, the king, or patrician, assumed the right hand of the pope.

Nor was the Frank content with these vain and empty demonstrations of respect. In the twenty-six years that elapsed between the conquest of Lombardy and his imperial coronation, Rome, which had been delivered by the sword, was subject, as his own, to the sceptre of Charlemagne. The people swore allegiance to his person and family; in his name money was coined, and justice was administered; and the election of the popes was examined and confirmed by his authority. Except an original and self-inherent claim of sovereignty, there was not any prerogative remaining which the title of emperor could add to the patrician of Rome." The seven heads of the beast are, therefore, the following: The Regal power, The Dictatorship, The power of the Prators, The Consulate, The Triumvirate, The Imperial power, and The Patriciate.

And when he cometh, he must continue a short space! The seventh form of government was only to remain a short time, which was actually the case; for from its first rise to independent power to its utter extinction, there passed only about forty-five years, a short time in comparison to the duration of several of the preceding forms of government; for the primitive regal government continued at least four hundred and twenty-eight years; the dictatorship was in power about eighty-eight years; the power of the prators was in being for upwards of three hundred years; the consulate lasted about two hundred and eighty years; and the imperial power continued upwards of five hundred years.

11. And the beast that was, and is not, even he is the eighth, and goeth into perdition. That is to say, the Latin kingdom that has already been, but is now no longer nominally in existence, shall immediately follow the dissolution of the seventh form of Latin government; and this dominion is called ochoos, an eighth, because it succeeds to the seventh. Yet it is not an eighth head of the beast, because the beast has only seven heads: for, to constitute a new head of the beast, the form of government must not only differ in nature, but also in name. This head of the beast is therefore, εξ τῶν ἑπτὰ, one of the seven. Consequently, the form of government represented by this head is the restoration of one of the preceding seven. The restored head can be, therefore, no other than the regal state of the Latins, or other words, the Latin Kingdom, (ἡ Λατίν Βασιλεια) which followed the patriciate, or seventh head of Latin government. But the beast, in his eighth state, or under his first head restored, goeth into perdition. No other form of Latin government shall succeed; but the beast, in his last or antichristian condition, shall be taken, together with the false prophet that wrought miracles in his sight, "and cast alive into a lake of fire burning with brimstone."

It is observable, that the eighth Latin power is called by the these shall hate the whore, and shall make her desolate and naked, and shall eat her flesh, and burn her with fire.

17 For God hath put in their hearts to fulfil his will, and to agree, and give their kingdom unto the beast, until the words of God shall be fulfilled.

18 And the woman which thou sawest is that great city, which reigneth over the kings of the earth.

angel the beast, and also one of his heads. This apparent discordance arises from the double signification of the heads: for if we take the beast upon which the woman sits to be merely a representation of that secular power which supports the Latin church, then the seven heads will represent the seven electorates of the Germanic empire; but if by the beast we understand the general Latin empire from first to last, then what is, according to the angel's first interpretation of the heads, called the beast, is, in this case, only one of his heads.—See on ver. 15.

12. And the ten horns which thou sawest are ten kings, which have received no kingdom as yet, but receive power as kings one hour with the beast. The meaning of horns has already been defined when speaking of those of the dragon.—The meaning is, therefore, as follows: Though the Latin empire be now in existence, the ten horns refer to ten Latin kingdoms, yet in futurity, and consequently they have received no dominion as yet; for that part of the Latin dominion now in power is the sixth head, or imperial government of the heathen Caesars. But the ten states of the Latins receive dominion as monarchies μια ὡρα, one time, (as it may be properly translated,) i. e. at the same time, with the beast, or that which ascendeth out of the bottomless pit; consequently, the Latin empire here intended, is the one which was in futurity in the apostolic age.

13. These have one mind, and shall give their power and strength unto the beast. Therefore the ten horns must constitute the principal strength of the Latin empire; that is to say, this empire is to be composed of the dominions of ten monarchs, independent of each other in every other sense, except in their implicit obedience to the Latin church. The beast, in this and the preceding verse, is distinguished from its horns; as the woman Latin empire is distinguished in history from its constituent powers.—See on ver. 16.

14. These shall make war with the Lamb, and the Lamb shall overcome them: for he is Lord of lords, and King of kings: and they that are with him are called, and chosen, and faithful. The ten powers of the beast must compose the secular kingdom of antichrist; for they make war with the Lamb, who is Christ Jesus. This is perfectly true of all popish states; for they have constantly opposed as long as they have had any secular power, the progress of pure Christianity. They make war with the Lamb by persecuting His followers; but the Lamb shall overcome them, for he is Lord of lords, and King of kings; all lords have their authority from Him, and no king can reign without Him; therefore the ten Latin kings are God's ministers, to execute His vengeance upon the idolatrous nations. But when these antichristian monarchies have executed the Divine purpose, those that are with the Lamb, the called, the chosen, and the faithful, those who have kept τῆς τρυφῆς in the love of it, shall prevail against all their adversaries, because their battles are fought by the Lamb, who is their God and Deliverer.—See chap. xix. 15, 20.

15. And he saith unto me, The waters which thou sawest, where the whore sitteth, are peoples, and multitudes, and nations, and tongues. "So many words," Bishop Newton observes, "in the plural number, duly denote the great extensiveness of her power and jurisdiction.—She herself glories in the title of the Catholic church, and exults in the number of her votaries as a certain proof of the true religion. Cardinal Bellarmin's first note on the true church is, the very name of the Catholic church: and his fourth note is, amplitude, or multitude, and variety of believers; for the truly Catholic church, says he, ought not only to comprehend all ages, but likewise all places, all nations, all kinds of men."

16. And the ten horns which thou sawest upon the beast, these shall hate the whore, and shall make her desolate and naked, and shall eat her flesh, and burn her with fire. Here is a clue to lead us to the right interpretation of the horns of the beast. It is said the ten horns shall hate the whore; by which is evidently meant, when connected with what follows, that the whole of the ten kingdoms in the interest of the Latin church, shall finally despise her doctrines, be reformed from popery, assist in depriving her of all influence, and in exposing her follies; and in the end consign her to utter destruction. From this it follows, that no Roman Catholic power which did not exist so late as the Reformation, can be numbered among the horns of the beast; the horns must, therefore, be found among the great states of Europe at the commencement of the Reformation. These were exactly ten, viz. France, Spain, England, Scotland, The Empire, Sweden, Denmark, Poland, Hungary, and Portugal. In these were comprehended most of the minor states, not styled monarchies; and which, from their first rise to the period of the Reformation, had been subdued by one or more of the ten grand Roman Catholic powers already named. Consequently, these ten constituted the power and strength of the beast; and each minor state is considered a part of that monarchy under the authority of which it was finally reduced, previously to the Reformation.

But, it may be asked, how could the empire, which was the revived head of the beast, have been at the same time one of its horns? The answer is as follows: horns of an animal, in the language of prophecy, represent the powers of which that empire or kingdom symbolized by the animal is composed. Thus the angel, in his interpretation of Daniel's vision of the ram and he-goat, expressly informs us, that "the ram with two horns are the kings of Media and Persia." One of the horns of the ram, therefore, represented the kingdom of Media, and the other the kingdom of Persia; and their union in one animal denoted the united kingdom of Media and Persia, viz. the Medo-Persian empire. In like manner the beast with ten horns denotes that the empire represented by the beast is composed of ten distinct powers; and the ten horns being united in one beast, very appropriately show that the monarchies symbolized by these horns are united together to form one empire; for we have already shown, in the notes on chap. xiii. ver. 1. that a beast is the symbol of an empire. Therefore, as the horns of an animal, agreeably to the angel's explanation, (and we can have no higher authority) represent all the powers of which that dominion symbolized by the animal is composed, the Roman empire of Germany, as one of those monarchies which gave their power and strength to the Latin empire, must consequently, have been a horn of the beast. But the Germanic empire was not only a Latin power, but at the same time was acknowledged by all Europe to have precedence of all the others. Therefore, as it is not possible to express these two circumstances by one symbol, it necessarily follows, from the nature of symbolical language, that what has been named the Holy Roman empire must have a double representation. Hence the empire, as one of the powers of the Latin monarchy, was a horn of the beast, and, in having precedence of all the others, was its revived head.—See a similar explanation of the tail of the dragon in the notes on chap. xii. ver. 4.

17. For God hath put in their hearts to fulfil his will, and to agree, and give their kingdom unto the beast, until the words of God shall be fulfilled.) Let no one imagine that those ten Latin kingdoms, because they support an idolatrous worship, have been raised up merely by the power of man, or the chances of war. No kingdom or state can exist without the will of God; therefore let the inhabitants of the world tremble, when they see a wicked monarchy rise to power; and let them consider that it is raised up by the Lord to execute His vengeance upon the idolatries and profligacies of the times. It is said of the kings in communion with the church of Rome, that God hath put in their hearts to fulfil his will. How is this divine will accomplished! In the most awful and afflictive manner! In causing ten Latin kings to unite their dominions into one mighty empire for the defence of the Latin church. Here is a dreadful disposition of Jehovah; but it is such as the nations have most righteously deserved, because when they had the truth, they lived not according to its most holy requisitions, but loved darkness rather than light, because their deeds were evil. Therefore hath "the Lord sent them strong delusion that they should believe a lie, that they might all be damned who believe not the truth, but have pleasure in unrighteousness." But this deplorable state of the world is not perpetual; it can only continue till every word of God is fulfilled upon His enemies; and when this time arrives, (which will be that of Christ's second advent,) then shall the Son of God slay that wicked "with the spirit of His mouth, and shall consume him with the brightness of His coming."

18. And the woman which thou seest is that great city, which reigneth over the kings of the earth.) It has already been shown that the woman sitting upon the seven-headed beast, is a representation of the Latin church; here we have the greatest assurance that it is so, because the woman is called a city, which is a much plainer emblem of a church, as the word is used unequivocally in this sense in so many parts of Scripture that we cannot well mistake its meaning.—See chap. iii. 12. xi. 2. xxi. 10. xxii. 19. and also Psa. xli. 4. lxxvii. 3. Heb. xii. 22. &c. The woman, therefore, must be the Latin church; and as the apostle saw her sitting upon the beast, this must signify that ἡ ἐκκλησία βασιλεύει ἐπὶ τοῦ κόσμου, she hath a kingdom over the kings of the earth, i. e. over the kings of the Latin world, for that this is the meaning of earth has been shown before in numerous instances. That kingdom which the woman has over the kings of the Latin world, or secular Latin empire, or, in other words, THE KINGDOM OF THE LATIN church, is the numbered Latin kingdom, or Romish hierarchy.—See on ch. xiii. 18. The woman is also called a GREAT city to denote the very great extent of her jurisdiction; for she has comprehended within her walls the subjects of the mighty dominions of France, Spain, England, Scotland, The Empire, Sweden, Denmark, Poland, Hungary, and Portugal. What an extensive city was this! Surely such as to justify the prophetic denunciation that GREAT city.

Having now gone through the whole of the angel's interpretation of St. John's vision of a whore sitting upon the seven-headed and ten-horned beast, it will be essentially necessary to examine a little more attentively the eighth verse of this chapter. It has already been shown that the phrases was, is *not, shall ascend out of the bottomless pit, and yet is, refer to the Latin kingdom which existed before the building of Rome: to the Roman empire in the time of St. John; and to the Latin empire which was in futurity in the apostolic age. But as the words was, is not, &c. are spoken of the beast upon which the apostle saw the woman, or Latin church, sit; how can it be said of this beast that it had an existence before the date of the Apocalypse, when the woman, whom it carried, was not in being till long after this period? And what connexion has the Latin empire of the middle ages with that which derived its name from Latinus, king of the Aborigines, and was subjugated by the ancient Romans; or even with that which existed in the time of the apostle? The answer is as follows:—St. John saw the beast upon which the woman sat, with all his seven heads and ten horns. Consequently, as the angel expressly says, that five of these seven heads had already fallen in the time of the vision, it therefore necessarily follows, that the apostle must have seen that part of the Latin empire represented by the seven-headed beast, which had already been under the emblem of five heads. Therefore, the woman sat upon the beast that was. But it is plain, from the angel's interpretation, that the whole of the seven heads fell, before the beast upon which the woman sat, arose; and yet, the woman is represented as sitting upon the seven-headed beast, to denote, as we have before observed, that it is the Latin kingdom in its last estate, or under one of its heads restored, which is the secular kingdom of antichrist. The beast is also said not to have any existence in the time of the vision; from which it is evident that the monarchy of the Latins, and not that of the Romans is here intended: because the latter was in the time of the vision. Again, the beast which St. John saw had not ascended out of the bottomless pit in his time; consequently, the whole seven heads and ten horns were in futurity; for all these heads and horns rose up out of the abyss at the same time with the beast. How is this apparent contradiction reconciled? In the most plain and satisfactory manner, by means of the angel's double interpretation of the heads; for if the seven heads be taken in the sense of seven mountains (heads, in the Scripture style, being a symbol of precedence as well as supremacy), then the beast with all his heads and horns was altogether in futurity in the apostle's time, for the seven heads are the seven electorates of the German empire, and the ten horns the ten monarchies in the interest of the Latin church. Finally, the beast is said to exist in the time of the vision; therefore, the Roman empire, which governed the world, must be here alluded to; and, consequently, the phrase and yet is, is a proof that as the beast is the Latin kingdom, and this beast is said to have an existence in the time of the apostle, that the empire of the Cæsars, though generally known by the name of the Roman, is in a very proper sense the Latin kingdom, as the Latin was the language which prevailed in it. Hence the seven-headed and ten-horned beast is at once the representation of the ancient Latin power: of the Roman empire which succeeded it; and of the Latin empire which supports the Latin church. Here is then the connexion of the ancient Latin and Roman powers with that upon which the woman sits. She sits upon the beast that was and is not, because three of his heads represent the three forms of government which the ancient Latins had before they were subjugated by the Romans, viz. The Royal Power, The Dictatorship, and the Power of the Prætors. She sits upon the beast which SHALL ASCEND out of the bottomless pit, because all his seven heads, taken in the sense of mountains, were in futurity in the apostolic age. She sits upon the beast that yet is, because four of his heads represent four forms of government of the Roman or Latin empire now in existence, viz. The Consulate, The Triumvirate, the Imperial Power, and the Patriarchate. It is hence evident that the beast, in the largest acceptation of this term, is a symbol of the Latin power in general from its commencement in Latinus, to the end of time; its seven heads denoting seven kings, or supreme forms of Latin government, during this period, king or kingdom, as we have already observed, being a general term in the prophetic writings (as any kind of supreme governor or government, no matter by what particular name such may have been designated among men). Thus the Latin power, from the time of Latinus to the death of Numitor, was the beast under the dominion of his first head; from the death of Numitor to the destruction of Alba it was the beast under the dominion of his second head; from the destruction of Alba to the final subjugation of the Latins by the Romans, it was the beast under the dominion of his third head. And as the four Roman forms of government which were subsequent to the final conquest of the Latins, were also Latin dominations, the Latin power under these forms of government was the beast under the dominion of his fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh heads. The beast of the bottomless pit which followed the fall of all the heads of the sea-beast, or general Latin empire, is, according to the angel's interpretation, (ὁ ὄψιμος βασιλεὺς) an eighth king, i. e. an eighth species of Latin power, or, in other words, a supreme form of Latin government essentially differing from all the foregoing: yet as it is nominally the same with one of the preceding seven, it is not accounted an eighth head of the beast. The first beast of chap. xiii. is a description of the eighth or last condition of the general Latin empire, and is said to arise *as τῆς θαλάσσης, out of the sea, because the Jews

Several of the most reputable MSS. Versions, and some of the Fathers, after cinnamon, add rai amomum, and amomum. What this shrub was is not easy to say, though mentioned and partially described by Pliny and Dioscorides. Some think it was a species of geranium; others, the rose of Jericha. It was an odoriferous plant, supposed to be a native of Assyria: and is thus mentioned by Virgil, Eclog. iv. v. 25.—

—Asyrium vulgè nascetur amomum. The Assyrian amomum shall grow in every soil." This is translated by some epicard; by others, lady's rose.

Thyne wood) The Thyne, or Thyn, is said to be a tree whose boughs, leaves, stalks, and fruit, resemble the cypress. It is mentioned by Homer, Odyss. lib. v. 60; by Theophrastus, Hist. Plant. v. 8; and by Pliny, Hist. Nat. lib. xiii. c. 16. How much the different articles mentioned in the 12th and 13th verses were in request among the ancients, and how highly valued, every scholar knows.

Slaves) Sycaraw, the bodies of men; probably distinguished here from ψυχαι, souls of men; to express bondmen and freemen.

14. And the fruits which thy soul lusted after) Καὶ ἡ σάρκα τῆς ἐπιθυμίας τῆς ψυχῆς σου. As σάρκα signifies autumnum, any and all kinds of autumnal fruits may be signified by the word in the above clause.

Delicacy and goodly) Τα λιπαρά, delicacies for the table. Τα λαγυρα, what is epicurid and costly in apparal.

15. Stand afar off) See ver. 10.

16. Clothed in fine linae, and purple, &c.) The verb περιβαλλασθε, which we here translate clothed, signifies often to attend, be enriched, laden with; and is so used by the best Greek writers: see many examples in Ezyrie. These articles are not to be considered here as personal ornaments but as articles of trade or merchandize, in which this city trafficked.

17. Every shipmaster] Captains of vessels; some think pilots are meant, and this is most likely to be the meaning of the original word κυβερνήται. This description appears to be at least partly taken from Ezek. xxvii. 26—28.

And all the company in ships] Και τας επι των πλοισιν ομιλεις, the crowd or passengers aboard: but the MSS. and Versions have και τας ε επι τον πλεωον, those who sail from place to place; or such as stop at particular places on the coast, without performing the whole voyage. This sufficiently marks the traffic on the coast of the Mediterranean Sea. Some might embark (in sailing from Rome) at the island of Sicily; others at different ports in Greece; some at Corinth, others at Crete, or the various islands of the Egean Sea; some at Rhodes, Pamphylia, &c. &c. as in those times, in which the compass was unknown, every voyage was performed coastwise; always keeping, if possible, within sight of the land.

18. What city is like unto this great city!] Viz. in magnitude, power, and luxury.

19. They cast dust on their heads] They showed every sign of the sincerest grief. The lamentation over this great ruined city, from ver. 9 to 19, is exceedingly strong and well drawn. Here is no dissembled sorrow; all is real to the mourners, and affecting to the spectators.

20. Rejoice over her, thou heaven] This is grand and sublime: the fall of this bad city was cause of grief to bad men. But as this city was a persecutor of the goodly, and an enemy to the works of God, angels, apostles, and * prophets, are called to rejoice over her fall.

21. Thus with violence shall that great city Babylon be thrown down] This action is finely and forcibly expressed by the original words:—Οπως δρυματι βληθηται Βαβυλων η μεγαλη σοφας. The millstone will in falling have not only an accelerated force from the law of gravitation; but that force will be greatly increased by the projectile force impressed upon it by the power of the destroying angel.

Shall be found no more at all.] In her government, consequence, or influence. This is true of ancient Babylon; we are not certain even of the place where it stood. It is also true of Jerusalem: her government, consequence, and influence, are gone. It is not true of Rome pagan, nor, as yet, of Rome papal: the latter still exists; and the former is most intimately blended with it; for in her religious service Rome papal has retained her language; and many of her heathen temples has she dedicated to saints, real or reputed; and incorporated many of her superstitions and absurdities in a professedly Christian service. It is true also that many idols are now restored under the names of Christian saints!

22. The voice of harpers, &c.] This seems to indicate not only a total destruction of influence, &c. but also of being. It seems as if this city was to be swallowed up by an earthquake, or burnt up by fire from heaven.

23. By thy sorceries] Political arts, state tricks, counterfeited miracles, and deceptive manœuvres of every kind. This may be spoken of many great cities of the world, which still continue to flourish!

24. In her was found the blood of the prophets, &c.] She was the persecutor and murderer of prophets and of righteous men.

And of all that were slain upon the earth.] This refers to her counsels and influence, exciting other nations and people to persecute and destroy the real followers of God. There is no city to which all these things are yet applicable; therefore we may presume that the prophecy remains yet to be fulfilled.

Bishop Bale, who applies this, as before, to the Romish church, has, on ver. 22 given some information to the curious antiquary.

“But be certaine,” says he, “and sure, thou miserable church, that thou shalt no longer enjoy the commodious pleasures of a free citie.—The merry noyes of them that play upon harpes, lutes, and Adels; the sweet voice of musicians, that sing with virginals, viols, and chimes; the armory of them that pipe in recorders, flutes, and drums; and the shrike showt of trumpets, waites, and shawmes, shall no more be heard in thee, to the delight of men. Neyther shall the sweet organs, containing the melodious noyse of all manner of instruments and byrdes, be played upon; nor the great bellies be rung after that; nor yet the fresh dancant, prick song, counter-point, and fawurdent, be called for in thee; which art the very sinages of Sathan. Thy lascivious armory, and delectable musicke, much provoking the weakke hartes of men to meddle in thy abominable whordom, by the wantonnes of idoltry in that kinde, shall perish with thee for ever. No cunning artificer, carver, paynter, nor gilder, embroiderer, gold-smith, nor silk-worker; with such other like of what occupation soever they be, or have bene to thy commodity, shall never more be found so agayne.

“Copcs, cruettes, candlestickes, miters, crosses, sensors, crismatoria, corporasses, and chalices, which for thy whorlike holines might not somtime be touched, will than, for thy sake, be abhorred of all men. Never more shall be builded for marchants of the livery and mark, palaces, temples, abbeyes, collages, covents, channtries, fair houses, and borcheris of pleasure. The clapping noise of neyther wyndmil, horsemil, nor watermil, shal any more be heard, to the gluttenous feeding of thy puffed up porklings, for the maintenance of thine idle observations and ceremonies.—For thy mitred marchants were somtimes princes of the earth, when they reigned in their roialty. Thy shorn shavelinges were lordes over the multitude, when they held their priestly authority over the soules and bodies of men. Yea, and with thy privy legardmain, with thy juggling castes, with thy craftes and enchantmentes of thy subtle charmes were all nacions of the world deceived.”

This is very plain language; and thus, on all hands, a monstrous system of superstition and idolatry was attacked by our reformers; and with these unfurnished weapons, directed by the Spirit of the living God, popery was driven from the throne, from the leech, from the universities, and from the churches, of this favoured kingdom. And by a proper application of Scripture, and by a universal diffusion of the word of God, it may be soon driven from the face of the universe. And when the inventions of men are separated from that church, and it becomes truly regenerated; and of this it is highly capable, as among its monstrous errors and absurdities, it contains all the essential truths of God, it will become a praise and a glory in the earth. Protestants wish not its destruction, but its reformation.

Some there may be, who, in their zeal for truth, would pull the whole edifice to pieces; but this is not God's method: He destroys what is evil, and saves what is good. It is reformation, not annihilation, that this church needs.

NOTES.—Verse 1. I heard a great voice of much people in heaven] The idolatrous city being destroyed, and the blood of the martyred saints being avenged, there is a universal joy among the redeemed of the Lord, which they commence with the word מן הנה Hallelu-Yah, praise ye Jah, or Jehovah; which the Septuagint, and St. John from them, put into Greek letters, thus, Αλληλουια, Allelu-ia: a form of praise which the heathens appear to have borrowed from the Jews, as is evident from their psans, or hymns in honour of Apollo, which began and ended with ελευε in, eleuε ic; a mere corruption of the Hebrew words. It is worthy of remark, that the Indians of North America have the same word in their religious worship, and use it in the same sense. “In their places of worship, or beloved square, they dance sometimes for a whole night, always in a bowing posture, and frequently singing halleluyah Ye ho wah; praise ye Yah, Ye ho yah:”

from Sardis to Smyrna." The figure is five palms in height; in his right hand he holds a dart, in his left a bow, armed after the manner of the Egyptians and Ethiopians. On a line drawn across the breast, from one shoulder to the other, are these words, written in Egyptian hieroglyphics; Eyes ravide την χώραν ἀποστή τοις ὤμοισιν "I obtained this country by force and shoulders; i. e. by my own power.

2. In the Etruria Regalis of Dempster, in the Appendix at the end of Vol. II. there is a beautiful female figure of brass, about twelve inches high, the hair gracefully plaited, and the head adorned with a diadem. She has a tunic, without sleeves, and over that a sort of pallium. On the outside of the right thigh, close to the tunic, and probably on it, in the original, is an inscription in Etruscan characters.—What these import I cannot say. Dempster has given a general explanation of the image, in the Appendix to the above Vol. p. 108. The plate itself is the LXXXIII. of the work.

3. There are two other images found in the same author, Vol. I. p. 91. tab. xxiv. the first is naked, with the exception of a short loose jupo, or petticoat, which goes round the loins, and over the left arm. On the left thigh of this image there is an inscription in Etruscan characters. The second has a similar jupo, but much longer, which extends to the calf of the leg, and is supported over the bonded left arm. Over the right thigh, on this vesture, there is an Etruscan inscription in two lines.

4. MONTFAUCON, Antiquité Égyptique, Vol. III. part 2. p. 263 has introduced an account of two fine images which are represented Tab. CLVII. The first is a warrior, entirely naked, except a collar, one bracelet, and boots. On his left thigh, extending from the groin to a little below the knee, is an inscription in very ancient Etruscan characters, in two lines; but the import is unknown.

The second is a small figure of brass, about six inches long, with a loose tunic, which is suspended from the left shoulder, down to the calf of the leg. On this tunic, over the left thigh, is an inscription, (perhaps) in very ancient Latin characters, but in the Etruscan language, as the learned author conjectures. It is in one line, but what it means is equally unknown.

5. In the same work, p. 263. Tab. CLVIII. another Etruscan image, is represented entirely naked; on the left thigh is the following word in uncial Greek letters, ΚΑΘΙΣΘΑΙΜΟΣ; and on the right thigh, ΑΙΕΞΑΜΙΟΥ; i. e. "Kaphisodorus, the son of Aechlanitus." All these inscriptions are written longitudinally on the thigh.

6. GRUYER, Vol. III. p. DOCCLEKXKX. Sub. Tit. Affectus Serenorum et Libertinorum inter se, et in suos, gives us the figure of a naked warrior, with his left hand on an axe, the end of whose helve rests on the ground; with the following inscription on the inside of his left thigh; longitudinally written, as in all other cases—

7. The rabbins say, that "God gave to the Israelites a sword, on which the ineffable name יהוה Yehovah, was inscribed: and as long as they held that sword the angel of death had no power over them."—Shemoth Rabba, sect. 51. fol. 143. 2. Bamidbar Rabba, sect. 12. fol. 214. 2.

In the latter tract, sect. 16. fol. 232. 3. and in Rab. Tanaim, fol. 68. mention is made of the guardian angels of the Israelites, who were clothed with purple vestiments, on which was inscribed שמחה shem hamphorash, the ineffable name. See more in Schoettgen.

8. But what comes nearer to the point in reference to the title given here to Christ, is what is related of Secostria by DIONYSIUS SICULUS, lib. i. c. 55. p. 166. Edit. Hypont. of whom he says, Having pushed his conquests as far as Thrace, he erected pillars on which were the following words in Egyptian hieroglyphics:—Ταύδε την χώραν βεβαιοσ καταστράτο τοις λαοις Βασιλευσ, Βασιλευσ, και Δεσποταισ Δεσποταισ Σεστωισ. This province, Secostria (Secostri) KING OF KINGS, AND LORD OF LORDS, conquered by his own arms. This inscription is recorded almost in the words of St. John. Now, the Greek historian did not borrow the words from the apostle; as he died in the reign of Augustus, about the time of our Lord's incarnation. This cannot be the same inscription mentioned above by Herodotus, the one being in Ionia, the other in Thrace; but as he erected several of those pillars or images probably a nearly similar inscription was found on each.

9. This custom seems to have been common among the ancient Egyptians. Inscriptions are frequently found on the insides of Isis, Oairis, Anubis, &c. at the feet, on the head, on the back, on the girdle, &c. &c. Eight of these ancient images in my own collection, abound with these inscriptions.

1. Oairis, four inches and a quarter high, standing on a throne, all covered over with hieroglyphics, exquisitely engraved.

2. Anubis, six inches high, with a tiara, on the back of which is cut ΑΙΕΤΟΠΝΥΣ, in uncial Greek characters.

3. The Cerapsithocus, seven inches long, sitting on a pedestal; and at his feet, in the same characters, CAEEO.

4. An Isis, about eight inches high; on her back ΔΡΥΤΟ.

5. Ditto, seven inches, beautifully cut, standing, holding a serpent in her left hand, and at her feet ΕΤΑΙΥΙΤΙ.

6. Ditto, five inches and a quarter, round whose girdle is ΠΕΥΤΥΔΑΙ; but part of this inscription appears to be hidden under her arms, which are extended by her side.

7. Ditto, five inches high, hooded, with a loose stole, upon the back of which are seven lines of Greek uncial characters, but nearly obliterated.

8. Ditto, four inches high, with a girdle going round the back immediately under the arms, the front of which is hidden under a sort of stomacher: on the part that appears are these characters, CENAA. These may be all intended as a kind of ambrosias, or tutelary deities; and I give this notice of them, and the inscriptions upon them, partly in illustration of the text; and partly to engage my learned and antiquarian readers in attempts to decipher them. I would have given the Etruscan characters on the other images described above; but have no method of imitating them except by an engraving.

As these kinds of inscriptions on the thigh, the garments, and different parts of the body, were in use among different nations, to express character, conduct, qualities, and conquests, we may rest assured that to them St. John alludes, when he represents our Sovereign Lord with an inscription upon his vesture and upon his thigh; and had we not found it a custom among other nations, we should have been at a loss to account for its introduction and meaning here.

17. An angel standing in the sun exceedingly luminous; every part of him emitting rays of light. From this representation, Milton has taken his description of Uriel, the angel of the sun. Paradise Lost, b. iii. l. 648.

"Th' arch-angel Uriel, one of the seven
Who, in God's presence, nearest to His throne
Stand ready at command, and see His eyes
That run through all the heavens, or down to th' earth
Bear His swift errands over moist and dry,
O'er sea and land."

All the fowls that fly) The carcasses of God's enemies shall be food for all the fowls of heaven. This is according to a Jewish tradition, Synopsis Schar, p. 114. n. 26. "In the time when God shall execute vengeance for the people of Israel, He shall feed all the beasts of the earth for twelve months, with their flesh; and all the fowls for seven years." It is well known that both beasts and birds of prey are accustomed to frequent fields of battle, and live upon the slain.

18. That ye may eat the flesh of kings) There shall be an universal destruction; the kings, generals, captains, and all their host, shall be slain.

19. I saw the beast) See the notes on chapters xii. xiii. and xvii.

20. And the beast was taken—and the false prophet) See the notes on ch. xvii. 8. &c.

That worshipped his image) The beast has been represented as the Latin empire; the image of the beast, the popes of Rome; and the false prophet, the papal clergy.

Were cast alive into a lake of fire) Were discomfited when alive, in the zenith of their power; and destroyed with an utter destruction.

21. With the sword of him that sat upon the horse) He who sat on the white horse, is Christ; and His sword is His word, the unadulterated Gospel.

An angel binds Satan a thousand years, and shuts him up in the bottomless pit, 1-3. They who were beheaded for the testimony of Jesus, who have part in the first resurrection, and shall reign with Christ a thousand years, 4-6. When the thousand years are expired, Satan shall be loosed out of his prison, shall go forth and deceive the nations, and shall gather Gog and Magog from the four corners of the earth, 7, 8. These shall besiege the holy city; but fire shall come down from heaven and consume them, and they and the devil be cast into a lake of fire, 9, 10. AND I saw an angel come down from heaven, having the key of the bottomless pit and a great chain in his hand. 2 And he laid hold on the dragon, that old serpent, which is the devil, and Satan, and bound him a thousand years. 3 And cast him into the bottomless pit, and shut him up, and set a seal upon him, that he should deceive the nations no more, till the thousand years should be fulfilled: and after that he must be loosed a little season. 4 And I saw thrones, and they sat upon them, and judgment was given unto them: and I saw the souls of them that were beheaded for the witness of Jesus, and for the word of God, and which had not worshipped the beast, neither had received the mark of the beast, neither had they worshipped the image of the beast, neither had they received the mark upon their foreheads, or in their hands; and they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years. 6 But the rest of the dead lived not again until the thousand years were finished. NOTES.—Verse 1. An angel comes down from heaven) One of the executors of the Divine justice, who receives criminals, and keeps them in prison, and delivers them up only to be tried and executed.

The key of the prison, and the chain, show who he is; and as the chain was great, it shows that the culprit was impeached of no ordinary crimes. 2. The dragon) See the notes on chap. xii. 9. That old serpent, which is the devil, and Satan) He who is called the old serpent, is the devil, the calumniator: and SATAN, the opposer. He who supposes that the term old serpent here, plainly proves that the creature that tempted our first parents was actually a snake, must enjoy his opinion; and those who can receive such a saying, why, let them receive it. Selah.

A thousand years.) In what this binding of Satan consists, who can tell? How many visions have been seen on this subject, both in ancient and modern times! This, and what is said ver. 3, 4, and 5, no doubt refers to a time in which the influence of Satan will be greatly restrained, and the true church of God enjoy great prosperity, which shall endure for a long time. But it is not likely that the number, a thousand years, is to be taken literally here, and year symbolically and figuratively in all the book beside. The doctrine of the millennium, or of the saints reigning on earth a thousand years, with Christ for their Head, has been illustrated and defended by many Christian writers, both among the ancients and moderns. Were I to give a collection of the conceits of the primitive Fathers on this subject, my readers would have little reason to applaud my pains. It has long been the idle expectation of many persons that the millennium, in their sense, was at hand: and its commencement has been expected in every century since the Christian era. It has been fixed for several different years, during the short period of my own life! I believed those predictions to be vain, and I have lived to see them such.

Yet, there is no doubt, that the earth is in a state of progressive moral improvement; and that the light of true religion is shining more copiously every where; and will shine more and more to the perfect day. But when the religion of Christ will be at its meridian of light and heat, we know not. In each believer, this may speedily take place; but probably no such time shall ever appear in which evil shall be wholly banished from the earth; till after the day of judgment, when the earth having been burnt up, a new heaven and a new earth shall be produced out of the ruins of the old, by the mighty power of God: righteousness alone shall dwell in them. The phraseology of the apostle here, seems partly taken from the ancient prophets, and partly rabbinical; and it is from the Jewish use of those terms, that we are to look for their interpretation.

3. He should deceive the nations no more) He was unable to blind men with superstition and idolatry, as he had formerly done.

4. I saw thrones) Christianity established in the earth, the kings and governors being all Christians. Reigned with Christ a thousand years.) I am satisfied that this period should not be taken literally. It may signify, that there shall be a long and undisturbed state of Christianity; and so universally shall the Gospel spirit prevail, that it will appear as if Christ reigned upon earth: which will in effect be the case, because His Spirit shall rule in the hearts of men: and in this time the martyrs are represented as living again; their testimony being revived, and the truth for which they died, and which was confirmed by their blood, being now every where prevalent. As to the term thousand years, it is a mystic number among the Jews. Midraah Tiliin, in Pa. xc. 15. Make us glad according to the days wherein thou hast afflicted us, adds, "by Babylon, Greece, and the Romans: and in the days of the Messiah. How many are the days of the Messiah? Rab. Eliezer, the son of R. Jose of Gallilee, said, The days of the Messiah are a thousand years."

his image, neither had received his mark upon their foreheads, or in their hands; and they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years.

6 But the rest of the dead lived not again until the thousand years were finished. This is the first resurrection.

6 Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection: on such the second death hath no power, but they shall be priests of God and of Christ, and shall reign with him a thousand years.

7 And when the thousand years are expired, Satan shall be loosed out of his prison,

8 And shall go out to deceive the nations which are in the

Sankhedrim, fol. 92. l. cited by the Aruch, under the word תור says, "There is a tradition in the house of Elias, that the righteous whom the holy blessed God shall raise from the dead shall not return again to the dust, but for the space of a thousand years, in which the holy blessed God shall renew the world, they shall have wings like the wings of eagles, and shall fly above the waters." It appears, therefore, that this phraseology is purely rabbinical. Both the Greeks and Latins have the same form of speech in speaking on the state of the righteous and wicked, after death. There is something like this in the Republic of Plato, book x. p. 322. Edit. Bip. where, speaking of Ereus, the son of Armenius, who came to life after having been dead twelve days; who described the states of departed souls; and asserted; "that some were obliged to make a long pergrination under the earth, before they arose to a state of happiness, οὐκ εἰς τὴν ἡμετέραν γῆν, for it was a journey of a thousand years;"—he adds, "that as the life of man is rated at a hundred years, those who have been wicked suffer in the other world a tenfold punishment; and therefore, their punishment lasts a thousand years."—Ibid.

A similar doctrine prevailed among the Romans; whether they borrowed it from the Greeks, or from the rabbinical Jews we cannot tell.

This Virgil, speaking of the punishment of the wicked in the infernal regions, says, "Hos omnes, ubi mille rotam volvere per annos. Letheum ad fluvium Deus evocat agmine magno: Scilicet immemoræ supra ut convexa revivant, Rursus et incipiunt in corpora velle reverti."

Æn. lib. vi. 748

"But when a thousand rolling years are past, So long their dreary punishment shall last, Whole droves of spirits, by the driving god, Are led to drink the deep Lethean flood

In large forgetful draughts, to sleep the cares Of their past labours and their irksome years; That, unremembering of its former pain, The soul may clothe itself with flesh again."

How the apostle applies this general tradition, or in what sense he may use it, who can tell?

5. The rest of the dead lived not again) It is generally supposed from these passages, that all who have been martyred for the truth of God, shall be raised a thousand years before the other dead, and reign on earth with Christ during that time; after which, the dead in general shall be raised; but this also is very doubtful.

6. Blessed) Makarios, happy. And holy; he was holy; and, therefore, he suffered for the testimony of Jesus in the time when nothing but holiness was called to such a trial.

The first resurrection) Supposed to be that of the martyrs, mentioned above.

The second death) Punishment in the eternal world: such is the acceptance of the phrase among the ancient Jews.

Hath no power) Οὐκ εἶς ἐξουσίαν, hath no authority, no dominion over him. This is also a rabbinical mode of speech. In E-rubin, fol. 19. l. Chagiga, fol. 27. l. "Res Lakish said, The fire of hell hath no power over an Israelite who sins: Rab. Eliezer says, The fire of hell has no power over the disciples of the wise men."

7. Satan shall be loosed) How can this be any kind of literal interpretation? Satan is bound a thousand years, and the earth is in peace; righteousness flourishes, and Jesus Christ alone reigns. This state of things may continue for ever, if the imprisonment of Satan be continued. Satan, however, is loosed at the end of the thousand years; and goes out and deceives the nations; and peace is banished from the face of the earth; and a most dreadful war takes place, &c. &c. These can be only symbolical representations; utterly incapable of the sense generally put upon them.

8. Gog and Magog) This seems to be almost literally taken from the Jerusalem Targum, and that of Jonathan ben Uzziel, on Numb. xi. 26. I shall give the words at length—four quarters of the earth, 'Gog and Magog,' together them together; to battle; the number of whom is as the sand of the sea. 9 And they went up on the breadth of the earth, and compassed the camp of the saints about, and the beloved city; and fire came down from God out of heaven, and devoured them.

10 And the devil that deceived them was cast into the lake of fire and brimstone, where the beast and the false prophet are, and shall be tormented day and night for ever and ever. 11 And I saw a great white throne, and him that sat on it, from whose face the earth and the heaven fled away; and there was found no place for them.

"And there were two men left in the camp, the name of the one was Eldad, the name of the other was Medad; and on them the spirit of prophecy rested. Eldad prophesied, and said, Behold, Moses the prophet, the scribe of Israel, shall be taken from this world; and Joshua, the son of Nun, captain of the host, shall succeed him. Medad prophesied, and said, Behold, quails shall arise out of the sea, and be a stumbling-block to Israel. Then they both prophesied together, and said, 'In the very end of time Gog and Magog and their army shall come up against Jerusalem; and they shall fall by the hand of the king Messiah; and for seven whole years shall the children of Israel light their fires with the wood of their warlike engines; and they shall not go to the wood nor cut down any tree.' In the Targum of Jonathan ben Uzziel, on the same place, the same account is given; only the latter part, that is, the conjoint prophecy of Eldad and Medad, is given more circumstantially; thus—"And they both prophesied together, and said, 'Behold, a king shall come up from the land of Magog, in the last days, and shall gather the kings together, and leaders clothed with armour, and all people shall obey them; and they shall wage war in the land of Israel, against the children of the captivity: but the hour of lamentation has been long prepared for them, for they shall be slain by the flame of fire which shall proceed from under the throne of glory, and their dead carcases shall fall on the mountains of the land of Israel; and all the wild beasts of the field, and the wild fowl of heaven, shall come and devour their carcases; and afterward all the dead of Israel shall rise again to life, and shall enjoy the delights prepared for them from the beginning, and shall receive the reward of their works.'"

This account seems, most evidently, to have been copied by St. John; but how he intended it to be applied is a question too difficult to be solved by the skill of man: yet both the account in the rabbins, and in St. John, is founded on Ezek. chap. xxxviii. and xxxix. The rabbinical writings are full of accounts concerning Gog and Magog; of which Wetstein has made a pretty large collection in his notes on this place. Under these names the enemies of God's truth are generally intended.

9. The beloved city] Primarily, Jerusalem; typically, the Christian church.

10. Was cast into the lake] Before, Satan was bound; and thus, his power was curtailed and restrained: now, he is cast into the lake of fire; his power being totally taken away.

11. A great white throne] Refulgent with glorious majesty. Him that sat on it] The indescribable Jehovah.

From whose face the earth and the heaven fled away] Even the brightness of His countenance dissolved the universe, and annihilated the laws by which it was governed. This is a very majestic figure, and finely expressed.

There was found no place for them.] The glorious Majesty of God filling all things; and being all in all.

12. The dead, small and great] All ranks, degrees, and conditions of men. This description seems to refer to Dan. vii. 9, 10.

And the books were opened] See Dan. xii. 1. "Rab. Jehuda said, all the actions of men, whether good or bad, are written in a book; and of all they shall give account."—Sohar, Gen. fol. 79. col. 296. "How careful should men be to shun vice,

12 And I saw the dead, small and great, stand before God, and the books were opened: and another book was opened, which is the book of life: and the dead were judged out of those things which were written in the books, according to their works.

13 And the sea gave up the dead which were in it; and death and hell delivered up the dead which were in them; and they were judged every man according to their works.

14 And death and hell were cast into the lake of fire. This is the second death.

15 And whosoever was not found written in the book of life was cast into the lake of fire.

and to act uprightly before the holy blessed God: seeing there are so many which go throughout the earth, see the works of men, testify of them, and write them in a book."—ib. fol. 105. col. 417.

"In the first day of the new year the holy blessed God sits; that He may judge the world; and all men, without exception, give an account of themselves: and the books of the living and the dead are opened."—Sohar Chadaash, fol. 19. 1.

The books mentioned here were the books of the living and the dead; or the book of life and the book of death; that is, the account of the good and evil actions of men: the former leading to life, the latter to death. St. John evidently alludes here to Dan. vii. 10, on which the rabbinical account of the books appears to be founded. The expressions are figurative in both.

According to their works] And according to their faith also, for their works would be the proof whether their faith were true or false: but faith exclusively, could be no rule in such a procedure.

13. The sea gave up the dead] Those who had been drowned in it; and those millions slain in naval contests, who had no other grave.

And death] All who died by any kind of disease. Death is here personified; and represented as a keeper of defunct human beings: probably no more than earth or the grave is meant; as properly belonging to the empire of death.

And hell] Ains, Hades, the place of separate spirits. The sea and death have the bodies of all human beings; hades has their spirits. That they may be judged, punished, or rewarded, according to their works, their bodies and souls must be reunited; hades, therefore, gives up the spirits: and the sea and the earth give up the bodies.

14. And death and hell were cast into the lake] Death himself is now abolished; and the place for separate spirits no longer needful. All dead bodies and separated souls being rejoined, and no more separation of bodies and souls by death to take place; consequently, the existence of these things is no farther necessary.

This is the second death.] The first death consisted in the separation of the soul from the body, for a season; the second death, in the separation of body and soul from God for ever. The first death is that from which there may be a resurrection; the second death, is that from which there can be no recovery. By the first, the body is destroyed during time; by the second, body and soul are destroyed through eternity.

15. Written in the book of life] Only those who had continued faithful unto death, were taken to heaven. All whose names were not found in the public registers, who either were not citizens, or whose names had been erased from those registers because of crimes against the state, could claim none of those emoluments or privileges which belong to the citizens; so those, who either did not belong to the new and spiritual Jerusalem, or who had forfeited their rights and privileges by sin, and had died in that state, were cast into the lake of fire.

This is the way in which God, at the day of judgment, will proceed with sinners and apostates. Reader, see that thy name be written in the Sacred Register; and, if written in, see that it never be blotted out.

NOTES.—Verse 1. A new heaven and a new earth] See the notes on 2 Pet. iii. 13. The ancient Jews believed that God would renew the heavens and the earth at the end of seven thousand years. The general supposition they founded on Isa. lxx. 17.

There was no more sea] The sea no more appeared than did the first heavens and earth. All was made new; and probably the new sea occupied a different position, and was differently distributed, from that of the old sea.

However, with respect to these subjects, as they stand in this most figurative book, I must express myself in the words of Calmet:—Vous diré quels seront ce nouveau Ciel, et cette nouvelle terre, quels seront leurs ornemens, et leur quantité & à mon avis, la plus grande de toutes les présomptions. En general, ces manières de parler marquent de très grands changemens dans l'univers. "To pretend to say what is meant by this new heaven and new earth, and what are their ornaments and qualities, is, in my opinion, the greatest of all presumptions. In general, these figures of speech point out great alterations in the universe."

17 And he measured the wall thereof, an hundred and forty and four cubits, according to the measure of a man, that is, of the angel.

18 And the building of the wall of it was of jasper: and the city was pure gold, like unto clear glass.

19 And the foundations of the wall of the city were garnished with all manner of precious stones. The first foundation was jasper; the second, sapphire; the third, a chalcedony; the fourth, an emerald;

20 The fifth, sardonyx; the sixth, sardius; the seventh, hyacinth; the eighth, beryl; the ninth, a topaz; the tenth, a hyacinth; the eleventh, a jacinth; the twelfth, an amethyst.

21 And the twelve gates were twelve pearls; every several gate was of one pearl: and the street of the city was pure gold, as it were transparent glass.

the distance from the plain country, to the place where the city stood. But what need is there of attempting to determine such measures in such a visionary representation? The quadrangular form intimates its perfection and stability, for the square figure was a figure of perfection among the Greeks; emp tetrapylon, the square or cubical man, was, with them, man of unassailed integrity, perfect in all things.

17. The wall—an hundred and forty and four cubits] This; twelve, the number of the apostles, multiplied by itself; for twelve times twelve make one hundred and forty-four.

The measure of a man, that is, of the angel.] The cubit, so called from cubitus, the elbow, is the measure from the tip of the elbow to the tip of the middle finger; and is generally reckoned at one foot and a half, or eighteen inches; though it appears, from some measurements at the pyramids of Egypt, that the cubit was, at least in some cases, twenty-one inches.

By the cubit of a man, we may here understand the ordinary cubit; and that this was the angel's cubit who appeared in the arm of a man. Or, suppose we understand the height of the arm as being here intended; and that this was the length of the measuring rod. Now, allowing this height and rod to be six feet, and that this was intended to have some kind of symbolical reference to the twelve tribes, mentioned ver. 12. represented by the twelve gates; and to the twelve apostles, represented by the twelve thresholds, or foundations: then twenty-four, the number of the tribes and apostles, multiplied by six, make precisely the number one hundred and forty-four.

18. The building of the wall of it was of jasper] The oriental jasper was exceedingly hard, and almost indestructible. Pillars made of this stone have lasted some thousands of years, and appear to have suffered scarcely any thing from the tooth of time.

Pure gold, like unto clear glass.] Does not this imply that the walls were made of some beautifully bright yellow stone, very highly polished? This description has been most injudiciously applied to heaven; and in some public discourses, or the comfort and edification of the pious, we hear of heaven with its golden walls, golden pavements, gates of pearl, &c. not considering that nothing of this description was ever intended to be literally understood; and that gold and jewels can have no place in the spiritual and eternal world. It does not such descriptions as these tend to keep up a fondness for gold and ornaments? In symbols they are proper; but construed into realities, they are very improper.

The ancient Jews teach, that "when Jerusalem and the temple shall be built, they will be all of precious stones, and pearls, and sapphires; and with every species of jewels."—ephr Raia hadadol, fol. 24. 1.

The same authors divide Paradise into seven parts, or mansions; the third they describe thus—"The third house is built of gold and pure silver, and all kinds of jewels and pearls. It is very spacious; and in it all kinds of the good things, either in heaven or earth, are to be found. All kinds of precious things, perfumes and spiritual virtues, are there wanted. In the midst of it is the tree of life, the height of which is five hundred years; (i. e. it is equal in height to the journey which a man might perform in five hundred years,) and under it dwell Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, the twelve patriarchs, and all that came out of Egypt, and died in the wilderness. Over these Moses and Aaron preside, and teach them the law," &c.—Yalcut Rubeni, fol. 13. 4. In the same tract, it. 182. 1. we find these words—"Know that we have a tradition, that when the Messiah, with the collected captivity, shall come to the land of Israel, in that day the dead in Israel shall rise again; and in that day the fiery walls of the city of Jerusalem shall descend from heaven; and in that day the temple will be builded of jewels and pearls."

19. The foundations of the wall] Does not this mean the foundations, or thresholds, of the gates? The gates represented the twelve tribes, ver. 12. and these foundations, or thresholds, the twelve apostles, ver. 14. There was no entrance into the city but through those gates; and none through the gates but over these thresholds. The whole of the Mosaic dispensation was the preparation of the Gospel system; without it the Gospel would have no original; without the Gospel, would have no reference, nor proper object. Every part of the Gospel necessarily supposes the law and the prophets. They are the gates, it is the threshold: without the Gospel, no person could enter through those gates. The doctrine of 22 And I saw no temple therein: for the Lord God Almighty and the Lamb are the temple of it.

23 And the city had no need of the sun, neither of the moon, to shine in it: for the glory of God did lighten it, and the Lamb is the light thereof.

24 And the nations of them which are saved shall walk in the light of it: and the kings of the earth do bring their glory and honour into it.

25 And the gates of it shall not be shut at all by day: for there shall be no night there.

26 And they shall bring the glory and honour of the nations into it.

27 And there shall in nowise enter into it any thing that defileth, neither whatsoever worketh abomination, or maketh a lie; but they which are written in the Lamb's book of life.

Christ crucified, preached by the apostles, gives a solid foundation to stand on; and we have an entrance into the holiest by the blood of Jesus, Heb. x. 19, &c. And in reference to this, we are said to be built on the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief cornerstone, Eph. ii. 20.

The first foundation was jasper] A stone very hard, some species of which are of a sea-green colour.

The second, sapphire] This is a stone of a fine blue colour, next in hardness to the diamond.

The third, a chalcedony] A genus of the semi-pellucid gems; of which there are four species:

1. A bluish white; this is the most common sort. 2. The dull milky veined; this is of little worth. 3. The brownish black, the least beautiful of all. 4. The yellow and red, the most beautiful, as it is the most valuable, of all. Hitherto this has been found only in the East Indies.

The fourth, an emerald] This is of a bright green colour, without any mixture; and is one of the most beautiful of all the gems. The true oriental emerald is very scarce, and said to be found only in the kingdom of Cambay.

20. The fifth, sardonyx] The onyx is an accidental variety of the agate kind: it is of a dark horny colour, in which is a plate of a bluish white, and sometimes of red. When on one or both sides the white there happens to lie also a plate of a reddish colour, the jewellers call the stone a sardonyx.

The sixth, sardius] The sardius, sardel, or sardine stone, is a precious stone, of a blood red colour.

The seventh, chrysolite] The gold stone. It is of a dusky green, with a cast of yellow. It is a species of the topaz.

The eighth, beryl] This is a pellucid gem of a bluish green colour.

The ninth, a topaz] A pale dead green, with a mixture of yellow. It is considered by the mineralogists, as a variety of the sapphire.

The tenth, a chrysoprasus] A variety of the chrysolite, called by some the yellowish green and cloudy topaz. It differs only from the chrysolite, in having a bluish hue.

The eleventh, a jacinth] A precious stone of a dead red colour, with a mixture of yellow.

The twelfth, an amethyst] A gem generally of a purple or violet colour, composed of a strong blue and deep red.

These stones are nearly the same with those on the breastplate of the high-priest, Exod. xxviii. 17, &c. and probably were intended to express the meaning of the Hebrew words there used.—See the notes on the above passages, where these gems are particularly explained.

21. The twelve gates were twelve pearls] This must be merely figurative, for it is out of all the order of nature to produce a pearl large enough to make a gate to such an immense city. But St. John may refer to some relations of this nature among his countrymen, who talk much of most prodigious pearls. I shall give an example.—"When Rabbi Juchanan (John) once taught that God could provide jewels and pearls, thirty cubits every way; ten of which should exceed in height twenty cubits, and should place them in the gates of Jerusalem, according to what is said, Isa. liv. 12. I will make thy windows of agates, and thy gates of carbuncles, one of his disciples ridiculed him, saying, Where can such be found, since, at present, there is none so large as a pigeon's egg?—Afterward, being at sea in a ship, he saw the ministering angels cutting gems and pearls; and he asked them for what purpose they were preparing those? They answered, To place them in the gates of Jerusalem. On his return, he found Rabbi Juchanan teaching, as usual; to whom he said, Explain, master, what I have seen! He answered, Thou knowest, unless thou hadst seen, thou wouldst not have believed; wilt thou not receive the saying of the wise men? At that moment he fixed his eyes upon him, and he was reduced into a heap of bones." Bava bathra, fol. 77. 1. and Sanhedrim, fol. 100. 1. p. 393. Edit. Coccetti.—See Schoettgen.

22. I saw no temple] There was no need of a temple, where God and the Lamb were manifestly present.

23. No need of the sun] This is also one of the traditions of the ancient Jews; that in the world to come, the Israelites shall have no need of the sun by day, nor the moon by night. Yalcut Rubeni, fol. 7. 3. God's light shines in this city; and in the Lamb that light is concentrated; and from Him every where diffused.

24. The nations of them which are saved] This is an allusion to the promise that the Gentiles should bring their riches, glory, and excellence, to the temple at Jerusalem, after it should be rebuilt.—See ver. 26.

25. The gates of it shall not be shut at all] The Christian church shall ever stand open to receive sinners of all sorts, degrees, and nations.

There shall be no night there] No more idolatry, no intellectual darkness: the Scriptures shall be every where read; the pure word every where preached; and the Spirit of God shall shine and work in every heart.

26. The glory and honour of the nations into it] Still alluding to the declarations of the prophets, (see the passages in the margin, ver. 24, &c.) that the Gentiles would be led to contribute to the riches and glory, of the temple by their gifts, &c.

27. There shall in no wise enter into it any thing that defileth] See Isa. xxxv. 8. III. 1. Neither an impure person, he who turns the grace of God into lasciviousness; nor a liar, he that holds and propagates false doctrines.

But they which are written] The acknowledged persevering members of the true church of Christ, shall enter into heaven: and only those who are saved from their sins, shall have a place in the church militant.

All Christians are bound by their baptism to renounce the devil and all his works, the pomps and vanities of this wicked world, and all the sinful lusts of the flesh; to keep God's holy word and commandments, and to walk in the same all the days of their life. This is the generation of them that seek thy face, O God of Jacob. Reader, art thou of this number! Or, art thou expecting an eternal glory, while living in sin! If so, thou wilt be fearfully disappointed. Presuming on the mercy of God, is as ruinous as despairing of His grace. Where God gives power both to will and to do, the individual should work out his salvation with fear and trembling.

CHAPTER XXII.

*The river of the water of life, 1. The tree of life, 2. There is no curse nor darkness in the city of God, 3-5. The angel assures John of the truth of what he has heard: and states that the time of the fulfilment is at hand, 6, 7. He forbids John to worship him, 8, 9. Again he states that the time of the fulfilment of the prophecies, of this book is at hand, 10-12. Christ is Alpha and Omega, 13. The blessedness of those who keep His commandments; they enter through the gates into the city, 14. All the unholy are excluded, 15. Christ sent his angel to testify of those things in the churches, 16. The invitation of the Spirit and the bride, 17. A curse denounced against those who shall either add to or take away from the prophecies of this book, 18, 19. Christ cometh quickly, 20. The apostolical benediction, 21. [A. M. cir. 4100. A. AND he showed me a pure river of water of life, clear as crystal, proceeding out of the throne of God and of the Lamb.

2 In the midst of the street of it, and on either side of the river, was there the tree of life, which bare twelve manner of fruits, and yielded her fruit every month: and the leaves of the tree were for the healing of the nations.

3 And there shall be no more curse: but the throne of God and of the Lamb shall be in it: and his servants shall serve him.

4 And they shall see his face; and his name shall be in their foreheads.

5 I And there shall be no night there; and they need no candle, neither light of the sun; for the Lord God giveth them light: and they shall reign for ever and ever.

6 And he said unto me, These sayings are faithful and true: and the Lord God of the holy prophets sent his angel to show unto his servants the things which must shortly be done.

7 Behold, I come quickly: blessed is he that keepeth the sayings of the prophecy of this book.

NOTES. Verse 1. Pure river of water of life] This is evidently a reference to the garden of Paradise, and the river by which it was watered; and there is also a reference to the account, Ezek. xlvii. 7-12. Water of life, as we have seen before, generally signifies spirit, or running water; here, it may signify incessant communications of happiness proceeding from God.

2. In the midst of the street of it] That is, of the city which was described in the preceding chapter.

The tree of life] An allusion to Gen. ii. 9. As this tree of life is stated to be in the streets of the city, and on each side of the river; trees must here be an enallage of the singular for the plural number, trees of life, or trees which yielded fruit, by which life was preserved. The account in Ezekiel is this: And by the river, upon the banks thereof, on this side and on that side, shall grow all trees for meat, whose leaf shall not fade—it shall bring forth new fruit according to his months—and the fruit thereof shall be for meat, and the leaf thereof for medicine. Ch. xlvii. 12.

Twelve manner of fruits] Καρπῶς δωδεκα, twelve fruits; that is, fruit twelve times in the year, as is immediately explained, yielded her fruit every month. As this was a great and spacious city, one fountain was not sufficient to provide water for it, therefore a river is mentioned, a great river, by which it was sufficiently watered. Some think that by this tree of life the Gospel is indicated: the twelve fruits are the twelve apostles; and the leaves are Gospel doctrines by which the nations, the Gentiles, are healed of the disease of sin. But this seems to be a fanciful interpretation.

3. No more curse] Instead of καταβάτης, curse, the best MSS. Versions, &c. read κατάβα, cursed person. As there shall be no more sinning against God, so there shall be no more curse of God upon the people; for they shall be all His servants, and serve Him. Our first parents came under the curse by sinning against their Maker in Paradise: these shall never apostatize; therefore, neither they, nor the earth shall be cursed.

4. See his face] Enjoy what is called the beatific vision: and they shall exhibit the fullest evidence, that they belong entirely to Him; for His name shall be written on their foreheads.

5. There shall be no night there] See the 23d and 26th verses of the preceding chapter.

8 And I John saw these things, and heard them. And when I had heard and seen, I fell down to worship before the feet of the angel which showed me these things.

9 Then saith he unto me, See thou do it not; for I am thy fellow-servant, and of thy brethren the prophets, and of them which keep the sayings of this book: worship God.

10 And he saith unto me, Seal not the sayings of the prophecy of this book: for the time is at hand.

11 He that is unjust, let him be unjust still: and he which is filthy, let him be filthy still: and he that is righteous, let him be righteous still: and he that is holy, let him be holy still.

12 And, behold, I come quickly; and my reward is with me, to give every man according as his work shall be.

13 I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end, the first and the last.

14 Blessed are they that do his commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city.

6. These sayings are faithful and true] See the preceding chapter, ver. 5. From this verse to the end of the chapter, is reckoned the epilogue of this book. 1. The angel affirms the truth of all that had been spoken, ver. 6-11. 2. Jesus Christ confirms what has been affirmed, and pledges Himself for the fulfilment of all the prophecies contained in it, ver. 12-17. 3. John cautions his readers against adding or diminishing, and concludes with the apostolical blessing, ver. 18-21.

The things which must shortly be done] There are many sayings in this book, which, if taken literally, would intimate that the prophecies delivered in the whole of the Apocalypse, were to be fulfilled in a short time after their delivery to John: and this is a strong support of the scheme of Wetstein, and those that maintain that the prophecies of this book all referred to those times in which the apostle lived; and to the disturbances which then took place not only among the Jews, but in the Roman empire. What they all mean, and when and how they are to be fulfilled, God in heaven alone knows!

8. I fell down to worship] I prostrated myself before him as before a superior being, to express my gratitude, and give him thanks for the communications he had made.—See on ch. ix. 10.

10. Seal not the sayings] Do not lay them up for future generations: they concern the present times; they must shortly come to pass—for the time is at hand.—See above, ver. 6. What concerned the Jews, was certainly at hand.

11. He that is unjust, let him be unjust still] The time of fulfilment will come so suddenly, that there will be but little space for repentance and amendment. What is done, must be done instantly; and let him that is holy persevere, and hold fast what he has received.

12. Behold, I come quickly] I come to establish My cause, comfort and support My followers, and punish the wicked.

13. I am Alpha and Omega] See on ch. i. 8, 18.

14. Blessed are they that do his commandments] They are happy who are obedient.

That they may have right to the tree of life] The original is much more expressive, ἵνα ἔσται ἡ κτίσις αὐτοῦ ἐκ τῆς ῥίζης τοῦ ὄμιου; which, they may have authority over the tree of life; an authority founded on right; this right founded on obedience to the commandments of God; and that obedience produced by the grace of God working in them. Without grace, no obedience; without obedience, no authority to the tree of

17. [I Jesus] The Maker, the Redeemer, and Judge, of all men.

Have sent mine angel] An especial messenger from heaven. I am the root and offspring of David] Christ is the root of David, as to his Divine nature; for, from that, all the human race sprang: for He is the Creator of all things, and without Him was nothing made which is made. And He is the offspring of David, as to His human nature; for that He took of the stock of David, becoming thereby Heir to the Jewish throne; and the only Heir which then existed; and it is remarkable, that the whole regal family terminated in Christ; and as an Ivesh for ever, He is the alone true David and everlasting King.

The bright and morning star.] I am splendour and glory to My kingdom; as the morning star ushers in the sun, so shall I usher in the unclouded and eternal glories of the everlasting kingdom.

17. The Spirit and the bride] All the prophets, and all the apostles; the church of God under the Old Testament, and the church of Christ under the New.

Say, Come.] Invite men to Jesus, that by Him they may be saved, and prepared for this kingdom.

Let him that heareth] Let all who are privileged with reading and hearing the word of God, join in the general invitation to sinners.

He that is athirst] He who feels his need of salvation, and is longing to drink of the living Fountain.

And whosoever will] No soul is excluded: Jesus died for every man; every man may be saved; therefore, he who wills, who wishes for salvation, let him come and take the water of life freely, without money or price!

18. If any man shall add] Shall give any other meaning to these prophecies, or any other application of them than God intends; he, though not originally intended, shall have the plagues threatened in this book for his portion.

19. If any man shall take away] If any man shall lessen this meaning, curtail the sense, explain away the spirit and design of these prophecies, God shall take away his part out of the book of life, &c. Thus Jesus Christ warns all those who consider this book, to beware of indulging their own conjectures concerning it. I confess that this warning has its own powerful influence upon my mind, and has prevented me from indulging my own conjectures concerning its meaning, or of adopting the conjectures of others. These visions and threatenings are too delicate and awful a subject to trifle with; or even to treat in the most solemn manner, where the meaning is obscure. I must leave these things to time and event, the surest interpreters. No jot or tittle of Christ's word shall fall to the ground; all shall have its fulfilment in due time.

This is termed a revelation, but it is a revelation of symbols: an exhibition of enigmas, to which no particular solution is given; and to which God alone can give the solution.

20. Surely I come quickly] This may be truly said to every person, in every age: Jesus, the Judge, is at the door!

Even so, come, Lord Jesus.] The wish and desire of the suffering church, and of all the followers of God, who are longing for the coming of His kingdom.

things, God shall add unto him the plagues that are written in this book.

19 And if any man shall take away from the words of the book of this prophecy, <sup>1</sup> God shall take away his part <sup>2</sup> out of the book of life, and out of <sup>3</sup> the holy city, and from the things which are written in this book.

20 He which testifieth these things saith, <sup>1</sup> Surely, I come quickly; <sup>2</sup> Amen. <sup>3</sup> Even so, come, Lord Jesus.

21 <sup>1</sup> The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen.

21. The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ] May the favour and powerful influence of Jesus Christ be with you all, you, of the seven churches, and the whole church of Christ, in every part of the earth, and through all the periods of time.

Instead of καρῶν τῶν ἁγίων, you all, the most excellent MSS. and Versions have καρῶν τῶν ἁγίων, with all the saints. This reading Griesbach has received into the text as indisputably genuine.

Amen.] So be it! and so it shall be for ever and ever.—The opinion of Dr. Priestley concerning the authenticity of this book, and the manner in which it is written, should not be withheld from either the learned or pious reader. "I think it impossible for any intelligent and candid person to peruse this book without being struck, in the most forcible manner, with the peculiar dignity and sublimity of its composition, superior to that of any other writing whatever, so as to be convinced that, considering the age in which it appeared, none but a person divinely inspired could have written it. These prophecies are also written in such a manner as to satisfy us, that the events announced to us were really foreseen; being described in such a manner as no person writing without that knowledge, could have done. This requires such a mixture of clearness and obscurity, as has never yet been imitated by any forgers of prophecy whatever. Forgeria, written of course after the events, have always been too plain. It is only in the Scriptures, and especially in the book of Daniel, and this of the Revelation, that we find this happy mixture of clearness and obscurity in the accounts of future events."—Notes on Revelation.

The subscriptions to this book are both few and unimportant:

The CODEX ALEXANDRINUS has simply—the Revelation of John.

The SYRIAC—doubles the Amen.

The ETHIOPIC—Here is ended the vision of John; the Apocalypse, Amen: this is, as one might say, the vision which he saw in his life: and it was written by the blessed John, the evangelist of God.

VULGATE and COPTIC—nothing.

ANCIENT ARABIC—By the assistance of our Lord Jesus Christ, the vision of John the apostle and evangelist, the beloved of the Lord, is finished: this is the apocalypse which the Lord revealed to him for the service of men. To Him be glory for ever and ever!

Having now brought my short notes on this very obscure book to a conclusion, it may be expected that, although I do not adopt any of the theories which have been delivered concerning it, yet I should give the most plausible scheme of the ancients or moderns which has come to my knowledge.—This I would gladly do, if I had any scheme to which I could give a decided preference. However, as I have given, in the preface, the scheme of Professor Wetstein, it is right that I should, at the conclusion, give the scheme of Mr. Lowman, which is nearly the same with that of Bishop Newton, and which, as far as I can learn, is considered by the most rational divines as being the most consistent and probable.

The scheme of the learned and pious Bengel may be found in the late Rev. John Wesley's notes on this book: that of Mr. Lowman, which now follows, may be found at the end of Dr. Dodd's notes.

Among other objections to this, and all such schemes, I have this which to me appears of vital consequence: its dates are too late. I think the book was written before the destruction of Jerusalem, and not in 96 or 98, the date which I follow in the margin: which date I give, not as my own opinion, but the opinion of others.

SCHEME AND ORDER OF THE PROPHECIES IN THE APOCALYPSE.

A. D. INTRODUCTION.

95—Ch. i. 1—19. A prophetic vision in the Isle of Patmos, representing Christ; His care of the churches; promising a revelation; with cautions and exhortations suitable to the then state of the church, and to its future state in after ages; to encourage patience and constancy in the faith.

FIRST PART of the Apocalypse, relating to the "things that are," or to the then state of the church.

Chap. ii. Seven epistles to the seven churches of Asia Minor; describing their present state.

Chap. iv. SECOND PART of the Apocalypse relating to the things which "shall be hereafter;" or to the state of the church in the ages to come after the time of the vision; with cautions and exhortations suitable to it.

Scene of the visions; the throne of God; the consistory above and heavenly church, representing God's power, majesty, authority, providence, and sure event of all His purposes.

A second book containing a revelation of the state of the church in after ages, given to the Lamb to open, or to Jesus Christ to reveal for the good of the church by St. John.

Var. 8. Chorus of angels and saints, or the whole heavenly church, sings a psalm of praise to the Lamb.

Ch. vi. The revelation begins by opening the sealed book, which describes the future state of the church in seven successive periods.

SEVEN PERIODS.

95—322 First Period showing the state of the church under the heathen Roman emperors, from about the year 95 to about the year 323; the seals of the book opened in order.

Seven Seals.

1. First seal represents a white horse; the rider with a crown, going forth to conquer, signifying the kingdom of Christ, or Christian religion prevailing against the opposition of Jews and heathens.

100—138 2. Second seal represents a red horse; power given to the rider to take peace from the earth, signifying the first memorable judgment on the persecutors of Christianity in the destruction of the Jews under Trajan and Hadrian.

138—139 3. Third seal represents a black horse; the rider with a balance, to measure oorn, signifying great scarcity of provisions, near to famine, in the time of the Antonines.

192—270 4. Fourth seal represents a pale horse; the name of the rider, Death; signifying great mortality and pestilence, wherewith the empire was punished in the reigns of Maximian and Valerian.

270—304 5. Fifth seal represents the souls of the martyrs under the altar; their reward and deliverance in a short time; signifying the severe persecution in the reign of Dioclesian; with an encouragement to constancy, suitable to such times of difficulty.

304—323 6. Sixth seal represents earthquakes, sun darkened, stars falling from heaven, signifying great commotions in the empire, from Maximian to Constantine the Great, who put a period to the persecution of Rome heathens.

Chap. vii. Interval between the first and second periods; representing an angel sealing 144,000 with the seal of the living God; signifying great numbers forsaking the idolatrous worship of the heathen Roman empire, and embracing the profession of Christianity.

Var. 9. Chorus of the heavenly church

A. D. blessing God for His salvation. One of the elders shows unto St. John the happiness of those who were faithful and constant to true religion in the great trial of so grievous persecution.

PERIOD II.

337—370 Chap. viii. Second Period reveals the state of the church and providence in times following the reign of Constantine, during the invasion of the empire by the northern nations; the rise and first progress of the Mohammedan imposture, till the stop put to it in the western empire, which reaches from about the year 337 to 760. Seven angels receive seven trumpets to sound.

Seven Trumpets

337—379 1. First trumpet represents hail and fire mingled with blood cast on the earth; signifying great storms of war to fall on the empire, and the blood that was shed in the reigns of the Constantine family, and their successors, till things were settled under Theodosius.

379—412 2. Second trumpet represents a mountain burning with fire, cast into the sea, whereby it became blood; signifying the invasion of Italy by the northern nations, and taking the city of Rome by Alaric.

412—493 3. Third trumpet represents a burning star falling upon the rivers, which became bitter; signifying the ravages in Italy, putting an end to the Roman empire, and founding a kingdom of Goths in Italy itself.

493—568 4. Fourth trumpet represents a part of the sun and moon darkened; signifying the wars in Italy between Justinian's generals, and the Goths, whereby the exarchate of Ravenna was erected, and all remaining power and authority of Rome quite suppressed.

568—675 Chap. ix. 5. Fifth trumpet represents the bottomless pit opened, and locusts coming out of it; signifying the rise of the Mohammedan religion and empire, and the great progress of both; till a stop was put to them by a contention for the succession.

675—750 6. Sixth trumpet represents four angels loosed which were bound in the river Euphrates; signifying the reunion of the divided Saracen power; the invasion of Europe by them, and threatening the conquest of it, till defeated by Charles Martel.

PERIOD III.

756—2016 Chap. x. Third Period of the vials reveals the state of the church and providence in the times of the last head of Roman government, represented by the beast, for 1260 years, to its final overthrow, from about the years 756 to about the year 2016. An angel, or nunciatus, brings a little book, the remainder of the sealed book opened by the Lamb; and gives it to St. John to eat; signifying a farther revelation of what was to follow in order of time, to the end of the world.

Chap. xi. Three general descriptions of this period:—1. First general description represents the temple measured; part given to the Gentiles; two witnesses prophesy in sackcloth 1260 days; signifying the corrupt state of the church, and the constancy of some faithful witnesses to the truth, though under severe persecutions, during this whole period.

Chap. xii. 2. Second general description represents a woman forced to fly into the wilderness for safety, and protected there 1260 days; signifying the persecution and preservation of the church during the same period.

Chap. xiii. 3. Third general description

A. D. represents a monstrous wild beast rising out of the sea, with seven heads, ten horns, as many crowns, and titles of blasphemy, who was to continue forty and two months; signifying that new Roman power, which should use its authority to promote idolatrous worship, and to persecute all who would not submit to it, and should be supported by another power like unto its own form and constitution, during the same period.

Chap. xiv. Chorus of the heavenly church celebrates, in a hymn, the happiness of those who remain faithful and constant.

A nunciatus, or angel, comes down from heaven to declare the certain and severe punishment of the enemies of truth and pure religion, in this period.

Chap. xv. Seven angels receive seven cups, full of the wrath of God; signifying that the enemies of truth and pure religion in this period shall be severely punished in the course of it; and that they shall be utterly destroyed in the end.

Chap. xvi. The oracle gives orders to the seven angels to pour out their vials, or cups.

Seven Vials.

830—968 First vial poured on the earth; a grievous sore upon the worshippers of the beast, signifying the great commotions throughout the whole empire, under the family of Charles the Great, by which that family becomes extinct, and by which both the empire and crown of France are transferred to other families.

1040—1190 2. Second vial poured on the sea; it becomes as the blood of a dead man; signifying the great bloodshed of the holy war, to recover Jerusalem from the Saracens.

1200—1371 3. Third vial poured on the rivers and fountains; they become blood, signifying the bloody civil war between the Guelphs and the Gibbelines, the papal and imperial factions, when the popes were driven out of Italy into France.

1378—1630 4. Fourth vial poured on the sun, which has power given it to scorch men; signifying the long wars in Italy, Germany, France, and Spain, occasioned by a long schism in the papacy. Turks take Constantinople, and put an end to the eastern empire. Pestilential diseases occasioned by impure heat.

1660—1660 5. Fifth vial poured on the seat of the beast, or his throne; signifying the Reformation, and the confirmation of it by the principal states of Europe, notwithstanding all opposition from the pope, and in opposition to the papal authority.

1676—1850 6. Sixth vial, poured on the river Euphrates, makes way for the kings of the East. This seems in the order of the prophecies to be yet future; but may likely mean some invasion of the pope's dominion from its eastern boundary, or the Adriatic.

1850—2016 7. Seventh vial poured on the air, the seat of Satan's empire, describes the utter ruin of this persecuting idolatrous Roman government, or mystical Babylon, at the end of this period.

Chap. xvii. Mentions an angel interpreter, who fully explains the character of this idolatrous persecuting power, which should corrupt the church, and persecute the faithful during this period.

Chap. xviii. Another angel sent from heaven to confirm the utter and lasting destruction of this mystical Babylon, as a punishment for her idolatrous corruptions and persecutions.

Chap. xix. Chorus of the heavenly church sings the praise of God, for His righteous judgments.

A vision of Christ leading an army out

A. D. of heaven, strongly represents the certain accomplishment of this prophecy.

PERIOD IV.

Chap. xx. An angel sent from heaven to shut up Satan in the bottomless pit, as in a secure prison, for one thousand years, during which time there will be a very happy state of the church, in purity, peace, and prosperity.

PERIOD V.

Ver. 7. After the thousand years of the church's prosperity shall be expired, Satan will be loosed again for a little season; a new attempt will be made to revive the corruptions of the church and a spirit of persecution, which shall end

A. D. in the final destruction of Satan's power, and of all the enemies of pure and true religion.

PERIOD VI.

Ver. 11. The general resurrection and final judgment; the everlasting destruction of the wicked.

PERIOD VII.

Chap. xxi. The seventh period concludes the whole prophecy, in the vision of a new heaven and a new earth, representing, in strong images, the extent, security, riches, and grandeur, of the heavenly Jerusalem; signifying the consummate happiness of the heavenly state.

A. D. Chap. xxii. Thus the prophecies of this Revelation issue in an eternal Sabbath, the future reward of all who remain faithful and constant in the true religion of Jesus Christ.

THE CONCLUSION.

Ver. 6. Confirms the truth and certainty of these prophecies; warns against corrupting; exhorts to hope for the accomplishment of them: a useful spirit and temper, to give good men consolation in all their present afflictions, and to preserve them from the corruptions of religion, how prevailing soever in their own times; which is

THE USEFUL MORAL, AND PRINCIPAL DOCTRINES, OF ALL THESE PROPHECIES.

PRINCIPLES

WHICH, ON CAREFULLY READING AND STUDYING THE SACRED WRITINGS, I THINK I FIND UNEQUIVOCALLY REVEALED THERE.

1. That there is but one uncreated, unoriginated, infinite, and eternal Being; the Creator, Preserver, and Governor of all things.

2. That there is in this infinite Essence a plurality of what are commonly called Persons, not separately subsisting, but essentially belonging to the Godhead; which Persons are commonly termed FATHER, SON, and HOLY GHOST; or GOD, the LOGOS, and the HOLY SPIRIT: and these are generally named the TRINITY; which term, though not found in the New Testament, seems properly enough applied, as we never read of more than three Persons in the Godhead.

3. That the Sacred Scriptures, or Holy Books which form the Old and New Testaments, contain a full revelation of the will of God in reference to man; and are alone sufficient for every thing relative to the faith and practice of a Christian; and were given by the inspiration of God.

4. That man was created in righteousness and true holiness, without any moral imperfection, or any kind of propensity to sin; but free to stand or fall.

5. That he fell from this state, became morally corrupt in his nature, and transmitted his moral defilement to all his posterity.

6. That, to counteract the evil principle, and bring man into a salvable state, God, from His infinite love, formed the purpose of redeeming man from his lost estate by Christ Jesus, and, in the interim, sent His Holy Spirit to enlighten, strive with, and convince men of sin, righteousness, and judgment.

7. That, in due time, the Divine Logos, called afterwards Jesus the Christ, the Son of God, the Saviour, &c. became incarnate, and sojourned among men, teaching the purest truth, and working the most stupendous and beneficent miracles.

8. That this Divine Person, foretold by the prophets, and described by evangelists and apostles, is really and properly God; having, by the inspired writers, assigned to Him every attribute essential to the Deity; being one with Him who is called God, Jehovah, &c.

9. That He is also perfect man, in consequence of His incarnation; and in that Man, or manhood, dwelt all the fulness of the Godhead bodily; so that His nature is twofold, Divine and human; or God manifested in the flesh.

10. That his human nature is derived from the blessed Virgin Mary, through the creative energy of the Holy Ghost; but His Divine Nature, because God, infinite and eternal, is uncreated, undevied, and ungenerated; which, were it otherwise, He could not be God in any proper sense of the word; but as He is God, the doctrine of the eternal Sonship must be false.

11. That as He took upon Him the nature of man, He died for the whole human race, without respect of persons; equally for all, and for every man.

12. That, on the third day after His crucifixion and burial, He rose from the dead; and, after showing Himself many days to His disciples and others, He ascended to heaven, where, as God manifest in the flesh, He continues, and shall continue, to be the Mediator of the human race, till the consummation of all things.

13. That there is no salvation but through Him; and that, throughout the Scriptures, his passion and death are considered as sacrificial; pardon and salvation being obtained by the shedding of his blood.

14. That no human being, since the fall, either has or can have merit or worthiness of or by himself; and therefore has nothing to claim from God, but in the way of His mercy through Christ: therefore, pardon, and every other blessing promised in the Gospel, have been purchased by His sacrificial death; and are given to men not on account of anything they have done or suffered, or can do or suffer, but for His sake, or through His merit alone

15. That these blessings are received by faith, because not of works, nor of sufferings.

16. That the power to believe, or grace of faith, is the free gift of God; without which none can believe: but that the act of faith, or actually believing, is the act of the soul, under the influence of that power. But, this power to believe, like all other gifts of God, may be slighted, not used, or misused; in consequence of which is that declaration, "He that believeth shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned."

17. That justification, or the pardon of sin, is an instantaneous act of God's infinite mercy, in behalf of a penitent soul, trusting only in the merits of Jesus Christ: that this act is absolute in respect of all past sin; all being forgiven, where any is forgiven.

18. That the souls of all believers may be purified from all sin in this life: and that a man may live under the continual influence of the grace of Christ, without sinning against his God: all evil tempers and sinful propensities being destroyed, and his heart filled with pure love both to God and man.

19. That unless a believer live and walk in the spirit of obedience, he will fall from the grace of God, and forfeit all his Christian privileges and rights: in which state of backsliding he may persevere; and, if so, perish everlastingly.

20. That the whole period of human life is a state of probation; in every part of which a sinner may repent and turn to God; and in every part of it a believer may give way to sin and fall from grace: and that this possibility of rising, and liability to falling, are essential to a state of trial or probation.

21. That all the promises and threatenings of the word of God are conditional, as they regard man in reference to his being here and hereafter: and that on this ground alone the Sacred Writings can be consistently interpreted, or rightly understood.

22. That man is a free agent, never being impelled by any necessitating influence either to do evil or good; but has it continually in his power to choose the life or death that is set before him: on which ground he is an accountable being, and answerable for his own actions: and on this ground also, he is alone capable of being rewarded or punished.

23. That his free will is a necessary constituent of his rational soul; without which man must be a mere machine, either the sport of blind chance, or the mere patient of an irresistible necessity; and, consequently, not accountable for any acts to which he was irresistibly impelled.

24. That every human being has this freedom of will, with a sufficiency of light and power to direct its operations: and that this powerful light is not inherent in any man's nature; but is graciously bestowed by Him who is the true Light that lighteneth every man that cometh into the world.

25. That as Christ has made, by His once offering Himself upon the cross, a sufficient sacrifice, oblation, and satisfaction for the sins of the whole world; and that, as His gracious Spirit strives with and enlightens all men, thus putting them in a salvable state; therefore every human soul may be saved, if it be not his own fault.

26. That Jesus Christ has instituted, and commanded to be perpetuated in His church, two sacraments: baptism, (sprinkling, washing with, or immersion in, water,) in the name of the Holy and ever-blessed Trinity, as a sign of the cleansing and regenerating influences of the Holy Ghost, producing a death unto sin, and a new birth unto righteousness; and the Eucharist, or Lord's supper, as commemorating the sacrificial death of Christ. That by the first once administered, every person may be initiated into the visible church; and by the second, frequently administered, all believers may be kept in mind of the foundation on which their salvation is built; and receive grace to enable them to adorn the doctrines of God their Saviour in all things.

27. That the soul is immaterial and immortal, and can subsist independently of the body.

28. That there will be a general resurrection of the dead; both of the just and unjust: that the souls of both shall be reunited to their respective bodies; and that both will be immortal, and live eternally.

29. That there will be a day of judgment, after which all shall be punished or rewarded, according to the deeds done in the body: the wicked being sent to hell, and the righteous taken into heaven.

30. That these states of rewards and punishments shall have no end; forasmuch as the time of probation or trial is for ever terminated; and the succeeding state must necessarily be fixed and unalterable.

31. That the origin of human salvation is found in the infinite philanthropy of God: and that, on this principle, the unconditional reprobation of any soul is absolutely impossible.

32. The SACRED WRITINGS are a system of pure unsophisticated reason, proceeding from the immaculate mind of God: in many places, it is true, vastly elevated beyond what the reason of man could have devised or found out; but in no case contrary to human reason. They are addressed not to the passions, but to the reason, of man; every command is urged with reasons of obedience; and every promise and threatening founded on the most evident reason and propriety. The whole, therefore, are to be rationally understood, and rationally interpreted. He who would discharge reason from this, its noblest province, is a friend in his heart to the anti-christian maxim, "Ignorance is the mother of devotion." Revelation and reason go hand in hand: faith is the servant of the former, and the friend of the latter: while the Spirit of God, which gave the revelation, improves and exalts reason, and gives energy and effect to faith.

To conclude, the doctrines or principles which I have stated above, and defended in this work, I believe to be the truths of God. Those against which I have argued, I believe to be either false or unproved. The doctrine which cannot stand the test of rational investigation, cannot be true. The doctrines or principles already enumerated, have stood this test: and those which shrink from such a test, are not doctrines of Divine Revelation. We have gone too far when we have said, "such and such doctrines should not be subjected to rational investigation, being doctrines of pure revelation." I know no such doctrine in the Bible. The doctrines of this Book are doctrines of eternal reason: and they are revealed, because they are such. Human reason could not have found them out; but, when revealed, reason can both apprehend and comprehend them. It sees their perfect harmony among themselves, their agreement with the perfections of the Divine Nature, and their sovereign suitableness to the nature and state of man: thus reason approves and applauds. Some men, it is true, cannot reason: and, therefore, they declaim against reason, and proscribe it in the examination of religious truth. Were all the nation of this mind, Mother Church might soon reassume her ascendancy, and "feed us with Latin masses and a wafer god."

Men may incorporate their doctrines in creeds or articles of faith, and sing them in hymns; and this may be all both useful and edifying, if the doctrine be true: but in every question which involves the eternal interests of man, the Holy Scriptures must be appealed to, in union with reason, for great commentator. He who forms his creed or confession of faith without these, may believe any thing or nothing, as is cunning of others, or his own caprices, may dictate. Human creeds and confessions of faith have been often put in the place of the Bible, to the disgrace both of revelation and reason. Let those go away: let these be retained, whatever be the consequence. Fiat justitia: ruat cælus.

No man either can or should believe a doctrine that contradicts reason: but he may safely credit (in any thing that concerns the nature of God) what is above his reason: and even this may be a reason why he should believe it. I cannot comprehend the divine nature, therefore I adore it: if I could comprehend, I could not adore; forasmuch as the nature or being which can be comprehended by my mind, must be less than that by which it is comprehended, and therefore unworthy of its homage. The more knowledge increases, the more we shall see that reason and learning, sanctified by piety toward God, are the best interpreters of the Sacred Oracles.

O thou who dwellest between the cherubim, shine forth and in thy light we shall see light.

I have but two words more to add at the conclusion of this long and severe work: one concerning myself,

Ὅσοι ἐσὶν χριστιανοὶ ἰδεὶ παρὰ τὴν γῆν,
Ὅσοις δὲ ἐ γράφοις ἰδεὶ ἐββλίου τούτου.
Like travellers, when they see their native land,
Writers rejoice to terminate their toil. T. Green.

And one to my readers,

Hinc labor extremus, longarum hæc mea vitæ:
Hinc me digressum, vestris Deus oppellit ora.
My latest labour's end at length is gained,
My longest journey's welcome goal obtained,
By God's assistance has the work been wrought,
By his direction to your dwellings brought. T. Green.
